5. He, launched in a surge with power along with his coursers, Indra, overcoming the precipitous, (sent) the waters (surging) to the right.
   Sent surging in just that way, without turning aside, day after day (the waters) have toiled at their purpose, not to be neglected.

VI.33 (474) Indra

Śunahotra Bhāradvāja
5 verses: triṣṭubh

A martial hymn. The poet reminds Indra that he will receive entreaties for help from all sides in the combat (vs. 2, using language almost identical to that in nearby VI.31.1), but begs him to help our side alone, in battles and in contests. The poetry is for the most part quite straightforward, except for the enigmatic expression in verse 3 (probably not coincidentally the middle verse), in which Indra's weapons against formidable enemies appear to be "well-placed cloaks." This expression has been much discussed, and a number of scholars have opted to emend it. But it likely refers to Indra's penchant for shape-shifting disguises in combat. Moreover, the word "well-placed" (súdhita) is phonologically close to a word for "hatchet" (svádhiti), and this pun may well be lurking in the simile about trees.

1. What is the most mighty, o Indra, give that to us: your (battle-)ecstasy, very superior and rich in gifts, o bull, which, possessing good horses, will win a mass of good horses and will defeat obstacles and enemies in battles.
2. For the separate peoples, disputants, call (separately) on you for help at the contest of champions.
   You dispersed the niggards through (the inspiration of) the inspired poets, and it is just through your aid that the charger is the winner of the prize.
3. You, o champion, smite both kinds of enemies, the Dāsa and the Ārya obstacles, like trees (with hatchets), with your well-placed cloaks. Break (them) apart in the battles, o most manly of men.

4. You, Indra—by your unstinting help become our lifelong companion and helper for our strengthening, when, in the winning of the sun, we call upon you as we fight, facing the other side in battles, o champion.
5. (So) should you be for us, now and for the future, Indra. Be there for us in mercy and in superiority.
   Singing in just this way, might we be under the protection of the great one and on the decisive day be the best winners of cattle.

VI.34 (475) Indra

Śunahotra Bhāradvāja
5 verses: triṣṭubh

The first verse of this hymn is a remarkably condensed expression of the poetic economy: Indra is both the recipient of praise songs and the source of inspiration for those poetic thoughts. Moreover, all poets, past and present, vie to attract Indra's attention, each with his own poem. The rest of the hymn develops these thoughts. Verses 2–3 continue the theme of multiple poets focusing on a single object, Indra, and then provide a transition to the final two verses (4–5), which celebrate the benefits that Indra receives from praise and sacrifice in a manner that indicates that our praise and sacrifice are happening now.

1. Many songs have converged on you, Indra, and out from you go inspired thoughts far and wide.
   Previously and now, the seers' songs of praise, their recitations and hymns, have contended over Indra.
2. The skillful one, who is called upon by many and welcomed by many, who alone is celebrated by many with sacrifices—like a chariot yoked for great power, Indra is to be cheered on.
3. Indra, whom neither insightful thoughts nor voices harm; they just approach him, making him strong.
   When a hundred, when a thousand praisers sing to him who longs for song, that is weal for him.
4. This is (weal) for him: seeking attachment, the soma has been set firmly in Indra, like the two shining ones, (sun and) moon, in heaven.
   Our invocations along with our sacrifices have entirely strengthened (him), like a man in the desert when waters con(verge) on him.
5. This is (weal) for him: a great song for him, a praise hymn for Indra has been spoken through our composed thoughts, so that, in the great overcoming of Vr̥tra [/obstacles], Indra will be our lifelong helper and strengthener.

VI.35 (476) Indra

Nara Bhāradvāja
5 verses: triṣṭubh

Unlike the last hymn, which calmly contemplates the good our praise is doing for Indra, this hymn inquires impatiently about the reward we should receive for this activity, a mood conveyed by the peremptory questions of the first three verses and the commands of verse 4.

The final verse (5) is syntactically very difficult and has given rise to a variety of interpretations, especially of the first half-verse. We consider it a reference to the Vala myth (as is clear at least in the mention of the Aṅgirases in d and also probably of the doors in b): the poet hopes that the mythic opening of the Vala cave and the good things that emerged from it will serve as a model for Indra's wished-for bounties now. The "community" is probably both the poet's own people and the Aṅgirases as comrades of Indra.

1. When will the sacred formulations find their resting place in the chariot?
   When will you give to the praiser what will prosper a thousandfold?
   When will you clothe his praise song with wealth? When will you make his insights have prizes as jewels?
2. Just when will it be, Indra, that you will place in your own nest our men with your men, our heroes with your heroes? Win the contests!
   With cattle at stake, you will win cattle three times over. Indra, grant to us sunlit brilliance.
3. Just when will it be, Indra, that you will make the sacred formulation provided with all goods for the singer, o strongest one?
   When will you team your teams, as (we do our) insights? When will you go to the calls whose bounty is cattle?
4. Lay on for the singer nourishments whose bounty is cattle, whose glitter is horses, whose fame is prizes of victory.
   Swell the good-milking cow with refreshments, Indra. Might you make them shine very bright among the Bharadvājas.
5. This community here and now do I sing, as (I did) also at another time, when as champion, able one, you (opened) wide the doors.
   May I not miss out on the milk-cow whose milk is clear (soma) [/semen].
   Quicken the Āṅgirases, o inspired poet, with your sacred formulation.

VI.36 (477) Indra

Nara Bhāradvāja
5 verses: triṣṭubh

An unqualified celebration of Indra's complete power and his control of all beings and things, both earthly and heavenly. It is hoped that the peoples' offerings to Indra, the soma (vs. 1), the sacrificial offerings (vs. 2), and the songs (vs. 3), will provoke answering generosity (vs. 4). This reciprocal relationship is economically expressed in the last half of verse 5.

1. Completely yours are the exhilarating (drinks) stemming from all peoples, and completely the riches that come from the earth.
   Completely have you become the apportioner of prizes, as you uphold your lordship among the gods.
2. The people have sacrificed fore and after offerings to his might. Completely have they conceded to his heroic power and to the headstrong charger pulling at the reins. They bend their will (to him) at the smashing of Vr̥tra [/obstacles].
3. Directed to the same goal, his forms of help, his bullish powers, his manly powers, and his teams accompany Indra.
   Like rivers to the sea, the songs whose gusts are solemn words enter him of broad expanse.
4. As you are sung, let loose the wellspring of wealth, Indra, and of much-glittering goods.
   You have become the unequalled lord of peoples, you alone the king of all creation.
5. You who seek friendship—hear what is worthy to be heard: Like heaven over the earth, sur(mount) the riches of the stranger, so that you will keep finding enjoyment in us and you will keep showing yourself with your strength and your vigor generation after generation.

VI.37 (478) Indra

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
5 verses: triṣṭubh

The first three verses follow the model of a "journey" hymn, but with a twist. The fallow bays of verse 1 are Indra's familiar horses, bringing his chariot to the sacrifice, but the same word (hárayaḥ) in verse 2 refers to the tawny soma drops. In verse 3 we return to the real horses, qualified as "charging straight on," just like the soma in the previous verse. The mention of Vāyu in verse 3 identifies the ritual in question as the Morning Pressing.

The remaining two verses of the hymn (4–5) do not continue the journey theme. Instead Indra is configured as a (divine) patron (vs. 5), who gives the priestly gift to the (human) patrons (vs. 4). See VI.29 for a similar identification of Indra with the sacrificial patron.

1. Close to here let your yoked fallow bays convey your chariot, which brings all desirable things, mighty Indra, for even the weakling calls upon you, (as well as the man) of solar glory. Might we achieve success as your feasting companions today.
2. The fallow bays [=soma drops] have gone forth to their labor in the wooden cup, and while being purified, they have come to be charging straight on.
   Indra should be the first to drink of this (soma) of ours, as the heaven-ruling king of soma's exhilaration.
3. Making their run here, the chariot-horses should convey powerful Indra on (the chariot) with good wheels, as they are charging straight on toward fame. Never should Vāyu's immortal (drink) give out.
4. Indra, the most excellent, the most powerfully ranging of the bounteous ones, sets in motion his priestly gift—with which, mace-bearer, you evade difficult straits and you apportion bounties to our patrons, bold one.
5. Indra is the giver of the enduring prize. Let Indra increase through the songs, his greatness increased;
   let Indra be the best smiter of Vr̥tra [/the obstacle] as a consummate warrior. Our patron brings these things to fulfillment as he keeps thrusting.

VI.38 (479) Indra

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
5 verses: triṣṭubh

The context of this hymn is the morning ritual, and its aim is to attract Indra to it by our invocation, which is the subject of the first two verses. In verse 1 Agni seems to carry the invocation heavenward; in the second the invocation turns Indra here. The strength Indra will derive from both praise and sacrifice occupy the next two verses (3–4), and the final verse summarizes our attempts to attract him and the benefits he will provide us.

Especially in the first two verses the poet is coy about reference, and the audience must guess the subjects of the verbs and the referents of the pronouns until the last pāda of verse 2.

1. He [=Agni?] has drunk from here; the most glittering one will carry up our great, heaven-bright invocation to Indra.
   On his journey he of good gifts will win a more admirable insightful thought as present for the divine folk.

2. Even from a distance, his two ears take residence here. It will sound—when speaking of Indra, it thunders:
   this invocation to the gods should turn him—Indra—here toward me, this one just now being recited.
3. With my highest insight, with my recitations I have roared for you to ageless Indra, born of old.
   Not only have the sacred formulations and the songs together been placed in him, but in Indra the great praise puts strength.
4. Indra, whom the sacrifice will strengthen and the soma, (whom) the sacred formulation will strengthen, and the songs, solemn words, and thoughts—
   so strengthen him at the coming of dawn from night. The months, autumns, and days will strengthen Indra.
5. In just this way we now would seek to attract him here—him who was born for vanquishing, who has been strengthened, and not by halves, for famed generosity, him, great and mighty, for help in the overcoming of obstacles [/Vr̥tra], o inspired poet.

VI.39 (480) Indra

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
5 verses: triṣṭubh

Like the previous hymn, this one is tied to the here-and-now of the ritual situation; also like the previous hymn, this one plays games with reference. The subject of the hymn is really soma, but the word "soma" does not appear in it, and in the middle verses of the hymn, which are insistently about soma, the poet intentionally misleads us about the referent.

In verse 1 a long series of adjectives in the genitive describing an unidentified being is resolved by the verb "you have drunk"—the subject is Indra, and the genitive referent must be soma. The three middle verses (2–4) form an omphalos defined by the repeated near deictic "this one here." This pronoun should have a referent in the immediate vicinity of the poet, but the first of these verses concerns what is clearly the Vala myth, which invites the audience to supply Indra as the subject. It is only as the sequence unfolds (and especially with the specification of "this one" as a "drop" in vs. 3) that it becomes clear that soma is taking the role of Indra is these verses.

For a similar covert coding of soma, there by the use of the genitive pronoun asya "of it, of this one" see VI.27.1–2.

1. Of the gladdening poet, of the heavenly draft-horse, of the one of inspired thought, of the speaking honey, of this companion of ours have you drunk, o god. Bind refreshments tipped with cows to the singer.

2. This one here eagerly (breaks) the rock en(closing) the ruddy (cows), as the one whose yoke is truth, having been yoked by those of true insights;
   he breaks apart the unbreakable back of the Vala cave. Indra will fight against the Paṇis with words.
3. This drop here lights up the unlit nights in the evening and at dawn through the autumns, o Indra.
   This one they established to be ever the beacon of the days: he has made the dawns to have blazing birth.
4. This one here, himself shining, makes the unshining ones shine. This one makes the many (dawns) dawn forth through truth.
   This one speeds with his horses whose yoke is truth, with his sun-finding (wheel-)nave, as he fills the domains.
5. Being sung now, ancient king, swell many refreshments for the giving of good things to the singer.
   Give waters, plants without poison, trees, cows, chargers, and men for the praising.

VI.40 (481) Indra

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
5 verses: triṣṭubh

This hymn is for the most part a typical invitation to Indra, to drive to our sacrifice and drink the soma. However, it is chronologically backward. The first two verses urge Indra to drink, the first opening with a peremptory command, "Indra, drink!" The next two verses (3–4) command Indra to "drive here," the logically prior action. Only in the last verse do the two actions occur together, in the temporally appropriate order. The imperative "drink!" (píba) found as the second word in the hymn is matched in the last pāda of the hymn by another imperative "take a drink" (pāhi), likewise second in its pāda, both verbs formed to the same root but in the present and aorist systems respectively.

Note also the reciprocal expressions in the final pādas of verses 1 and 4: in verse 1 it is Indra who will create vitality for the singer and the sacrifice; in verse 4 by contrast the sacrifice creates vitality for Indra.

The final word of the hymn, "with the Maruts," establishes the Midday Pressing as the ritual in question. The Maruts are also obliquely referred to in the first verse, in the phrase "amid your troop."

1. Indra, drink! It is pressed for you for your exhilaration. Unhitch your two fallow bays; let loose your two partners.

And sing forth here having sat down amid your troop. Then create vitality for the singer for sacrifice.

2. Drink of this, of which you drank when you were just born, Indra, for your exhilaration and for your resolve, o you who confer abundance. This drop have the cows, the men, the waters, and the stone together impelled for you—for it to be fully drunk.
3. With the fire kindled, Indra, the soma has been pressed. Let your fallow bays, the best conveyors, convey you here. With a mind seeking you, I call upon you again and again. Drive here, Indra, for our great good faring.
4. Drive here. Over and over you have driven with your great and eager mind to the soma-drinking, Indra. You will listen to these sacred formulations of ours, and then the sacrifice will create vitality for your body.
5. When, Indra, on the decisive day, whether (you are) remote or in your own seat, or wherever you are... from there (drive) with your team to our sacrifice to help us. Take a drink, joined in revelry with the Maruts, o you who long for the songs.

VI.41 (482) Indra

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
5 verses: triṣṭubh

Another invitation to Indra to drink the soma. The usual "drive" theme is also present (vss. 1, 4, 5), but backgrounded. The emphasis is on the attractions of the particular soma offered. Only in the last pāda of the last verse does the poet ask Indra for something in return.

1. Free of anger, drive here to the sacrifice. For you do the pressed soma drops purify themselves. Like cows toward their own home, o mace-bearer, come here, Indra, as the first of those worthy of the sacrifice.
2. Your throat, which is well-fashioned, which is the widest, with which you are always drinking the wave of honey, take a drink with it. The Adhvaryu has set (the soma) forth for you. Let your mace turn itself to the pursuit of cows, Indra.
3. This drop, the soma, a bull of all colors, has been brought to perfection for bullish Indra. Drink it, o powerful master of bays, (chariot-)mounter—this of which you are master from of old, which is your food.

4. Pressed soma is better than unpressed, Indra, and this (soma) here is even better, for the discriminating to enjoy.
   Drive here to this sacrifice, you overcomer. Through it fulfill all your powers.
5. We are calling you, Indra: drive nearby. The soma will be fit for your body.
   O you of a hundred resolves, bring yourself to exhilaration on the pressed (drinks). Further us in battles and among the clans.

VI.42 (483) Indra

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
4 verses: anuṣṭubh 1–3, bṛhatī 4

Yet another hymn concerned almost entirely with Indra's soma-drinking, but unlike the immediately preceding hymns, Indra is not directly urged to come and drink the soma. Rather, Indra is in the 3rd person throughout, and commands are issued to a single individual (vss. 1, 4) and to a group (vss. 2–3), to serve Indra. None of the addressees is identified until verse 4, with its vocative addressing the Adhvaryu. He is likely therefore also to be the addressee in verse 1; presumably the priests as a whole are addressed by the plural imperatives in the internal verses.

In this otherwise ritually focused hymn, the very specific anxiety expressed in the last half-verse comes as some surprise, a surprise mirrored in the meter, with the 12/8 half-verse contrasting with the 8/8 structure that has prevailed throughout. This wondering question about Indra's possible aid against the boastful slanderer functionally fills the usual hymn-final slot of direct plea to the god for help, despite its indirection.

1. Present (it) to him who desires to drink, who knows all things, to the superior man who comes fittingly, who comes regularly, who does not lag behind.
2. Go toward him, the best of the soma-drinkers, with the soma juices, to Indra possessing the silvery drink, with tankards, with the pressed drops.
3. When you attend on him with the pressed soma drops, the wise one knows of it all, but he boldly hastens just to that one [=soma].
4. Just to this one here [=Indra], o Adhvaryu, bring forth the pressed (juice) of the stalk.
   Surely he will rescue (us) from the calumny of anyone who boastfully claims high breeding?

VI.43 (484) Indra

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
4 verses: uṣṇih

A simple hymn, in which the refrain (pāda c of each verse) offers Indra soma to drink, and the first half of each verse consists of a definitional relative clause referring to Indra's deeds in his soma-exhilaration. As often, the pattern set in the rest of the hymn is modified but not entirely broken in the final verse: verses 1–3 contain the syntagm yásya... máda- "(in) whose exhilaration," while the final verse substitutes the participle mandānā́ "finding exhilaration" for the etymologically related noun máda, and also inserts a part of the soma plant, its stalk, on which the relative pronoun is dependent.

1. In whose exhilaration you subdued Śambara for Divodāsa—here is that soma, Indra, pressed for you. Drink!
2. Whose sharp-pressed exhilaration, whose middle and end, you guard—here is that soma, Indra, pressed for you. Drink!
3. In whose exhilaration you set loose from the rock the cows fixed firm within—here is that soma, Indra, pressed for you. Drink!
4. Finding exhilaration in whose stalk, you acquire the capacity for generosity—here is that soma, Indra, pressed for you. Drink!

VI.44 (485) Indra

Śaṃyu Bārhaspatya
24 verses: anuṣṭubh 1–6, triṣṭubh or virāj 7, 9, virāj 8, triṣṭubh 10–24, arranged in tr̥cas

A composite hymn placed toward the end of the Indra cycle in Maṇḍala VI, the hymn consists of eight tr̥cas, the first two (vss. 1–6) in anuṣṭubh, the third (vss. 7–9) in a mixture of triṣṭubh and virāj, and the remaining five (vss. 10–24) in triṣṭubh. Several of the tr̥cas are rhetorically unified: 1–3 with its repeated second half-verse following a definitional relative clause; 19–21 with its insistent "bull" theme; 22–24 with its repeated half-verse-initial "this one here" (ayám) referring to soma. The others have less obvious internal unity, though there is often a continuity of theme or subject. There is also no visible external unity among the tr̥cas collected in this "hymn," though it seldom strays far from Indra and the soma-drinking, the topic of many of the immediately preceding hymns. Indeed, Oldenberg (1888: 203) suggests that VI.44 owes its position to the similarity between the refrain of its first tr̥ca and the refrain of VI.43.

1. The one that is wealthiest, o wealthy one, that is most brilliant through its brilliance, the pressed soma—that is your exhilarating drink, o Indra, lord of independent power.
2. The capable one that is yours, o powerfully capable one, the giver of wealth and of thoughts, the pressed soma—that is your exhilarating drink, o Indra, lord of independent power.
3. The one through which (you are) like one grown strong by (his own) power and like one overpowering by his own forms of help, the pressed soma—that is your exhilarating drink, o Indra, lord of independent power.

4. I will sing for you to this lord of power, who never smites (us) away, to Indra, the all-conquering superior man, most bounteous, possessing all domains.
5. He whom songs make strong, the lord of overpowering generosity—his tempestuous force do the two world-halves, the goddesses, respect.
6. It (is mine) to lay on your behalf, with the power of solemn speech, the underlayer for Indra, whose forms of helps are like inspired words, since, dwelling together, they spread apart in their ascent.

7. Our newer ally [=Soma] has found the skill. Having been drunk, he has perceived what is better for the gods.
   Having won with the brawny racers [?], in making broad shelter he became a protector for his comrades.
8. On the path of truth, the ritual adept has been drunk. The gods have set their minds for glory.
   Acquiring the name of "great" by (ritual) speeches, the one worthy of the quest has disclosed his wondrous form to be seen.
9. Bestow the most brilliant skill on us. Repel the many hostilities of the peoples.
   Make our vitality higher through your abilities. Help us in the winning of the stake.

10. Indra, we have become ready just for you, the giver, you generous possessor of the fallow bays. Do not lose the track.
    No one has shown himself as our friend among mortals. Do they not call you a rouser (even) of the weak?
11. Give us not to exhaustion, bull. Let us not come to harm in our comradeship with you, the wealthy.
    Many are the tributes for you among the peoples, Indra. Smite the non-pressers; rip away those who don't deliver.

12. Like the thunderer the rain clouds, Indra stirs up bounties of horses and cattle.
    It is you who provide nourishment to the bard from of old. Let those without gifts not trick you away from (our) benefactor.

13. O Adhvaryu, hero, give of the pressed (soma drinks) to great Indra, for he is its king, he who has grown strong by the previous and the present songs of singing seers.
14. In its exhilaration, knowing many shapes, Indra smashed unopposable obstacles.
    Pour forth for him the honeyed soma, for the belipped hero to drink.
15. Let Indra be the one who drinks the pressed soma, who smashes the obstacle [/Vr̥tra] with his mace in his exhilaration, who goes to the sacrifice, even from far away, who is the good helper of insights, providing nourishment to the bard.

16. Here is this drinking cup, giving drink to Indra. Indra's dear immortal (drink) has been drunk, so that it will exhilarate the god for the sake of his good favor and will keep hatred and constraint away from us.
17. Becoming exhilarated by it, o champion, smash your rivals and your foes, both kin and non-kin, o bounteous one.
    Those with weapons aimed at us, setting their sights on us—pulverize and smash them, Indra, (for them to become) far away.
18. Once more, in these our battles, bounteous Indra, make for us a great wide space and easy passage.
    Go halves with our patrons, Indra, in the conquering of the waters, of life and lineage.

19. Your fallow bays, the bulls that have been yoked, the steeds with their bullish chariot and with their bullish reins, the bulls that convey your mace—let them, well-yoked, convey you here in our direction for bullish exhilaration.
20. The bulls have mounted the wooden cup for you, o bull, like waves spraying ghee as they bring exhilaration.
    Indra, to you, the bullish bull, they present soma from out of the (drops) pressed by bulls.
21. You are the bullish bull of heaven and of earth, the bullish bull of the rivers and of the standing waters.
    O bull, for bullish you the drop has swelled, the sweet sap, the honeyed drink, to your liking.

22. This god here, being born with strength, with Indra as his yokemate, blocked the Paṇi [/niggard].

This one here, the drop, stole the weapons of his own father, the tricks of the unkindly one.

23. This one gave the dawns a good husband; this one placed light within the sun.
This one found the threefold immortal one hidden in heaven among the third realms of light.

24. This one propped apart heaven and earth; this one yoked the chariot with seven reins.
This one, Soma, by his ability, secures the cooked (milk) within the cows, the wellspring with its ten fastenings: Soma!

VI.45 (486) Indra

Śaṃyu Bārhaspatya
33 verses: gāyatrī, except atinicr̥t 29, anuṣṭubh 33, arranged in tr̥cas

Like the preceding hymn, this one is composed of tr̥cas, the first ten to Indra, the last one (vss. 31–33) a dānastuti to the patron Br̥bu. Given its position in the Indra cycle, it is unlikely to have been originally a single hymn, but there are some themes that keep recurring throughout the hymn, such as the comparison of Indra with a cow or calf (vss. 7, 22, 25–26, 28), the sacred formulation as a vehicle for Indra (vss. 4, 7, 19), and the stake that is set as a prize in a contest (vss. 2, 11–13, 15). However, rhetorical unity within tr̥cas seems almost entirely lacking.

1. Who with good leading led Turvaśa and Yadu here from afar, he is Indra, our youthful comrade.
2. Placing vitality even in the uninspired, even with a steed lacking speed, Indra is the winner of the stake that is set.
3. Great is his guidance and many are the encomia for him.
His help does not perish.

4. Comrades, chant and sing forth to him whose vehicle is the sacred formulation, for he is great solicitude for us.
5. You, o Vr̥tra-smasher, are the helper of one, of two,
and for such as we are.
6. Only you lead (us) beyond hatreds; you make (us) proclaimers of solemn speech; and you are called rich in heroes by superior men.

7. To the formulator whose vehicle is the sacred formulation, to the comrade worthy of verses do I call with my songs, as to a cow to be milked,

8. In whose two hands all good things are at home, now as before—(in the hands) of the hero, victorious in battles.
9. (Tear) apart even the strongholds of the peoples, o possessor of the stone and lord of power;
tear (apart) their tricks, you who can't be bowed.

10. It is just you, o Indra, you real one, you drinker of soma and lord of prizes, that we have called upon, seeking fame—
11. Just you, who were before or who are now to be called upon when the stake is set.
Hear our call!
12. With insights as our steeds, (might we win) steeds and prizes worthy of fame, o Indra; with you might we win the stake that is set.

13. You became great when the stake was set, o Indra, you hero who longs for songs, and the one worth tussling for at the raid.
14. Your help that has the quickest speed, o smasher of foes—with that impel our chariot.
15. As the best charioteer, with our chariot on the attack, win, o winner, the stake that is set.

16. Praise only him, who alone was born as the limitless lord of the separate peoples, having a bullish will.
17. You who were the only friend with help, the kindly comrade of the singers, have mercy on us, Indra.
18. Set your mace in your hands to smash the demons, mace-bearer.
You should overpower your opponents.

19. The ancient yokemate of riches, the comrade who spurs on the weak, the one who most has the sacred formulation as his vehicle—upon him do I call.
20. For he alone is lord of all the good things of the earth, the rich one who most longs for songs.
21. (Coming) here with your teams, fulfill our desire with prizes of horses and of cows, lord of cows, acting boldly.

22. Sing this at the pressing to the warrior called upon by many,
(this) that is weal for the able one as if for a cow.
23. The good one will not hold back his gift of a prize of cattle when he will hear these songs.

24. For the smiter of Dasyus will certainly go forth to somebody's cattle enclosure; with his powers he will open it up.

25. These songs bellow out again and again to you, o you of a hundred resolves, like mothers to their calf, Indra.
26. Partnership with you is difficult to attain. You are, o hero, the cow for him who seeks cattle.
    Become the horse for him who seeks horses.
27. Find exhilaration from the stalk, then, to show great generosity with your own person.
    You will not put your praiser to scorn.

28. These songs come near to you at every pressing, o you who long for songs, as milk-cows do their calf—
29. (You,) the first among many at the verbal contest of the many praiser-singers, who compete for the prize with their prizes.
30. Let ours be the praise song that best conveys you nearest, Indra.
    Impel us toward great wealth.

31. Bṛbu has stood upon the highest head of the niggards [/Paṇis];
    (he is) as broad of girth as the Ganges—
32. (He) whose propitious gift in the thousands, at a speed like the wind's, is ready for giving all at once.
33. So then do all our bards always hymn here, away from (the sacrifice) of the stranger, Bṛbu, the best giver of thousands, the patron, the best winner of thousands.

VI.46 (487) Indra

Śaṃyu Bārhaspatya
14 verses: bṛhatī alternating with satobṛhatī, arranged in pragāthas

Like the previous two hymns, this one has too many verses for its position in the Indra cycle, though its division into the two-verse pragātha units may account for its placement. Nonetheless, the hymn seems to be a conceptual unity, rather than a collection of independent pragāthas.

The hymn concentrates on Indra as the helper of his praisers in contests and in battles. He is exhorted to come to our aid, to provide us with protection, to bring us the power inhering in rival peoples (see especially vss. 7–8), and to help us defeat our foes. The hymn is without major complications, and the theme is more repeated than developed. This regular repetition gives the hymn an unhurried pace, which contrasts with the urgency of the contests and battles described. This pace begins to quicken in the last verses: the repeated phrase introducing an imperative, "So then, as ever" (vss. 10, 11, 12), seems to be building to a finale. But the last pragātha (vss. 13–14), rather than providing the expected climactic plea to Indra for aid that would end the hymn conventionally, is instead a two-verse subordinate clause about Indra and his racing horses that utterly lacks a main clause, and it displays a density of imagery, with unrelated similes piled up pell-mell, that seems designed to replicate the breathless pace of a real contest—a remarkable effect. At the same time, it harkens back to the beginning of the hymn, with its mention of steeds and the racecourse (see vs. 1) and the "great stakes" (see vs. 4), so that the apparently reckless speed and lack of completion of the final two verses is contained within a ring-compositional structure.

1. Because it is just you that we bards call upon at the winning of the prize, you, Indra, as master of settlements that our men (call upon) amid obstacles, you at the finish lines of our steed,
2. So you—o dazzling one with mace in hand, o possessor of the stone, being praised as the great one—boldly heap up for us cow, horse, and chariotry altogether like a prize for the winner, o Indra.

3. The unbounded one who smites altogether, that Indra do we call upon.
   O you possessing a thousand testicles, of powerful manliness, master of settlements—be there to strengthen us in the combats.
4. Like a bull, you press the peoples hard with your battle fury at the spirited competition, o you who are equal to song.
   Become our helper at the (contest for) great stakes, at (the contest for) our bodies, the waters, and the sun.

5. Indra, bring us the best, the mightiest, fulfilling fame, with which you, o dazzling one with mace in hand, fill both these world-halves, o you of good lips.
6. It is you, the mighty conqueror of the bordered domains, that we call upon to help, o king among the gods.
   Make all our things that waver gain foothold and our foes be easily conquered, o good one.

7. The might and manliness that are in the Nahuṣa territories, Indra, or the brilliance that belongs to the five settlements—bring them here: all the masculine powers altogether.

8. Or what bullish power is in Tṛkṣi and in the Druhyu people, or whatever is in the Pūru, o bounteous one, grant that to us fully at (the time of) the conquering of men, for us to vanquish our foes in battles.

9. O Indra, your threefold, triple-armored shelter that provides well-being—that protection hold out to our benefactors and to me. Keep the arrow away from those
10. Who, with their mind set on cattle, outwit their rival and smite him boldly.
So then, as ever, o bounteous Indra longing for songs, as the protector of our bodies, come up close to us.

11. So then, as ever, be there to strengthen us. Indra, help our leader in the fight, when the feathered, sharp-headed arrows fly in the midspace, 12. Where champions stretch wide their own dear bodies as shelter for their ancestors.
So then, as ever, hold out protection to our body and lineage. Keep away unforeseen hatred.

13. When, Indra, at the charge, you will spur on your steeds at the (contest for) great stakes, on an uncrowded (race)course, on its twisting path, like falcons hunting fame, 14. (The steeds) going swiftly like rivers in a torrent when (the chariot?) has sounded following their roar, who, like birds over raw flesh, keep circling (the racecourse), being held firm in the cow [=leather (reins)] in your two arms…

VI.47 (488) Soma, Indra, etc.

Garga Bhāradvāja
31 verses: triṣṭubh, except bṛhatī 19, anuṣṭubh 23, gāyatrī 24, dvipadā 25, jagatī 27

Like III.53, the family hymn of the Viśvāmitras, dedicated primarily to Indra and placed at the end of the Indra cycle in Maṇḍala III, this hymn is the family hymn of the Bharadvājas, dedicated primarily to Indra and also positioned at the end of the Indra cycle in its maṇḍala. Also like III.53, VI.47 consists of a number of smaller units, some of which seem to have little or no connection with each other. Different scholars have suggested different divisions of the hymn; our own is based in great part on arguments based on rhetoric.

It begins with an extravagant praise of soma (vss. 1–5), rhetorically unified by the oft-repeated pronoun "this one here" (ayám), which in several of its occurrences takes an unusual final position (as opposed to its standard initial slot). With the presence of soma unquestionably established, Indra is then invited to drink it in the following verse (6), with the ritual context explicitly identified as the Midday Pressing. In fact already toward the end of the soma verses, there has been a modulation toward Indra: several of the deeds attributed to "this one here" are more Indraic than Somian, especially the propping of heaven in 5cd, and the final words of verse 5 "the bull accompanied by the Maruts" would ordinarily uniquely identify Indra, who is addressed in the next pāda (6a).

The extended middle section of the hymn (vss. 7–21) is entirely devoted to Indra. Verses 7–10 contain a series of direct pleas, for Indra to lead us forward to wider space and a better life and to provide refreshment and a good life. The next three verses (11–13) are similarly general, but couched in the 3rd person. (Two of these verses [12–13] are repeated in a very late hymn, X.131.6–7, and in turn are used in the later Sautrāmaṇī ritual, but we see no direct evidence of that ritual here.) Indra appears in these verses as a sort of universal protector and helper. This characterization seems to raise questions in the poet's mind: if Indra is the protector of all, then how does any particular group get ahead?

This implicit question prompts the next, somewhat jarring, section of the hymn (vss. 14–19), which concerns the fickle and unpredictable way in which Indra's patronage flits from one man to another. The section begins undramatically by announcing the many verbal and ritual offerings to Indra, coming (it seems) from many different groups (vs. 14), all seeking his aid. The next verse (15) seems to treat Indra's capriciousness as a positive trait: he doesn't only and always aid the strong, but will frequently promote a man who has fallen behind. The next two verses (16–17) continue this theme, but with Indra's behavior appearing in a darker light, as he arbitrarily breaks his agreements and betrays his followers. In the following verse (18) Indra is infinitely multiplied, presenting a different appearance to each different group and seemingly possessed of a thousand horses, each pair of which might take him to a different group pleading for his aid. This somewhat disturbing section is brought to a happy end in verse 19: only one pair of horses is yoked (to bring Indra to us?), the various forms are under Tvaṣṭar's control, and in the rhetorical question that forms the second half-verse (matching the question in vs. 15) it is concluded that Indra is unlikely to stay with the enemy when our own patrons are now providing such a good sacrifice. One of the most notable aspects of this little section (esp. vss. 15–18) about Indra's constantly changing behavior is its grammatical reflection: these verses are packed with āmreḍita nominal compounds "each x, x after x" and so-called "intensive" verb forms (really iterative-frequentative, meaning "keeps x-ing, continually x-es"), forms that are relatively marked in the Vedic grammatical system. The presence of four āmreḍitas and four intensives in four verses both calls attention to the message and reflects it by portraying a regularly alternating set of actions and objects.

The reassurance of verse 19 has come none too soon, for in verse 20 the poet and his group find themselves in a bad spot, not the wide and bountiful place they prayed Indra to lead them to in verses 7–8. In verse 21 the opposing forces are overcome (by Indra, it seems, though he is unnamed). Thus, verses 7–8 and 20–21 form a larger ring around the Indra section.

A dānastuti follows (vss. 22–25), in which the victorious kings distribute the bounty won in the battle referred to in verse 21. The dānastuti proceeds briskly and efficiently, without any of the jocularity commonly found in dānastutis elsewhere, just a list of the acquisitions.

The last part of the hymn (vss. 26–31) is the strangest. It consists of three verses (26–28) addressed to the war chariot and three (29–31) addressed to the war drum. These verses are also found in the Atharvaveda (VI.125–126). Each of these martial objects is praised in the most extravagant terms and compared with the attributes of the gods. Although this section seems to have no direct connection with the rest of the hymn, it may have been attached to the hymn (or even originally composed as part of it) in response to the battle depicted in verses 20–21 and the distribution of booty in verses 22–25. Chariots are part of the gift (24a), and it would not be surprising that a war drum might be allotted as part of the post-battle distribution. It is also worth remembering that in III.53, the family hymn of the Viśvāmitras mentioned above, one of the final sections (vss. 17–20) is devoted to the possible perils besetting a chariot and its team, with phraseology similar to verses 26–28 in this hymn.

1. Sweet is this one, certainly, and it is honeyed; sharp is this one, certainly, and it is full of sap.
   And now that Indra has drunk of it, no one at all overcomes him at the challenges.
2. This sweet one here was the most exhilarating, on which Indra became exhilarated for the smashing of Vṛtra, he who (having performed) many exploits smashed apart the nine and ninety walls of Śambara.
3. This one, when it is drunk, rouses my speech; it has awakened an eager inspired thought.
   This wise one measured out the six broad (realms), from which no world is at a distance.
4. This is the one who created the expanse of the earth; who created the height of heaven is this one here;
   this one (created) the beestings on the three slopes [=worlds?]. Soma upheld the broad midspace.
5. This one found the flood with its brilliant appearance at the (fore)front of the dawns with their gleaming seats.
   This one, great, with a great pillar propped up heaven—he, the bull, accompanied by the Maruts.

6. Boldly drink the soma in the tub, Indra—as smasher of Vṛtra at the confluence of goods, o champion.
   At the Midday Pressing, drench yourself. Standing amid wealth, establish wealth in us.
7. Indra, look forward for us, like the man who goes ahead; lead us further forward, toward a better state.
   Become one of good passage, who gives us passage beyond; become one of good guidance and valued guidance.
8. Lead us along to a wide world, as the one who knows—to sun-filled light, to fearlessness, to well-being.
   High are the arms of you who are stalwart, Indra. Might we approach these two lofty shelters.
9. Place us in the widest chariot box, Indra, on the two best-pulling horses, you possessor of hundreds.
   Convey hither the highest refreshment of refreshments. Let our (refreshment) not cross over to the "riches of the stranger," bounteous one.
10. Indra, be gracious. Seek a means of life for me. Spur on my poetic vision like a blade of copper.
    Whatever I say here in devotion to you, just this enjoy. Make me accompanied by the gods.
11. Indra the protector, Indra the helper, Indra the champion good to call at every call—
    I call on Indra, the able one, called on by many. Let bounteous Indra establish well-being for us.
12. Let Indra be of good protection, of good help with his help, very gracious, affording all possessions.
    Let him thrust away hatred; let him create fearlessness. Might we be lords of good heroes in abundance.
13. Might we be in the favor of him who deserves the sacrifice, in his propitious benevolence.
    Let Indra of good protection, of good help to us keep hatred away even from a distance.
14. Down to you, Indra, run the hymns and the sacred formulations as teams, like a wave along the slopes.
    As broad as your bounty are the many pressings. You join together the waters, the cows, and the drops, you possessor of the mace.
15. Who will praise him, who will fill him, who will sacrifice to him, if the bounteous one would always help only the strong?
    Like one who puts down his two feet one after the other, with his powers he makes the one who was behind to be in front.
16. He is famed as a hero who subdues every strong one, continually leading the one beyond the other in turn.

Hating the flashy, king of both (races [=human and divine]), Indra keeps prodding the clans, the sons of Manu—first one, then the other.

17. He twists away from his partnerships with those in front; continually double-crossing them, he goes with those behind.
    Indra keeps enduring through the many autumns, shaking them [=autumns] off so they don't close in.
18. He has a form corresponding to every form; this form of his is for display.
    Indra keeps going about in many forms through his magical powers, for ten hundred fallow bays are yoked for him.
19. Having yoked the two fallow bay mares to his chariot, Tvaṣṭar rules over the many (forms) here.
    Who will always sit on the side of the hostile—and especially when (our) patrons are sitting (a sacrificial session)?
20. We have come here to a field without pasturage, o gods. Though it was wide, the land has become narrow.
    O Bṛhaspati, o Indra, be on the lookout for a path for the singer who is in this state on his quest for cattle.
21. Day after day he drove off from their seat the other half, the black kindred all of the same appearance.
    The bull smashed the two Dāsas, mercenaries, Varcin and Śambara, at the moated place.

22. Prastoka from your bounty, Indra, has just now given ten casks, ten prizewinners.
    From Divodāsa, (son?) of Atithigva, we have accepted as bounty the goods belonging to Śambara.
23. Ten horses, ten casks, ten garments, with delights on top—ten golden balls have I gained from Divodāsa.
24. Ten chariots with side-horses, a hundred cows has Aśvatha given to the Atharvans, to Pāyu.
25. The descendant of Sṛñjaya has reached toward the Bharadvājas, who have acquired great bounty belonging to all people.

26. O tree, because you should become firm-limbed, a comrade to us, furthering (us), affording good heroes, you are knotted together with cows [=leather (straps)]. Be firm! Let the one who mounts you win what is to be won.
27. Strength has been brought up from heaven, from earth; might has been brought here from the trees.
    To the strongness of the waters enclosed by cows, to the mace of Indra—to the Chariot—sacrifice with an oblation.

28. The mace of Indra, the face of the Maruts, the embryo of Mitra, the navel of Varuṇa—taking pleasure in this oblation-giving of ours, god Chariot, accept our oblations.
29. Make Heaven and Earth gasp. Let the moving (world [=living creatures]) dispersed in many places pay attention to you.
    O Drum, along with Indra, with the gods, drive away the rivals farther than far.
30. Roar out your power. Set strength in us. Thunder down, thrusting away difficulties.
    Blast away misfortunes from here, o Drum. You are the fist of Indra: be firm!
31. Drive those yonder [=cows] hither and make the ones here turn back. The Drum keeps speaking, giving the signal.
    Our men, with horses as their wings, are converging: (so) let our charioteers win, o Indra.

VI.48 (489) Agni (1–10), Maruts (11–12, 20–21), Maruts or Liṅgoktadevatās (13–15), Pūṣan (16–19), Maruts or Heaven and Earth or Pr̥śni (22)

Śaṃyu Bārhaspatya
22 verses: various lyric meters, arranged for the most part in pragāthas

Another curious hymn, made up of apparently disparate sections and composed in a variety of different lyric meters. The headnote above reproduces the dedicands suggested by the Anukramaṇī, but they do not exactly fit the contents of the hymn. The first ten verses, dedicated to Agni, seem a conventional Agni hymn, the curiosity being that it is not placed among the other Agni hymns. It is also metrically the most stable portion of the hymn, with paired pragātha verses alternating br̥hatī and satobrḥatī, save for verses 6–8, where each verse has an extra eight-syllable pāda at the end.

The next three verses (11–13) offer an odd interlude: the priestly associates of the poet are ordered to drive a cow nearby, who will give milk for the Maruts. Although the Anukramaṇī identifies the Maruts as the dedicands of these verses, they seem incidental. The focus is on the cow—whether as a metaphor for Bharadvāja's poetic inspiration, as a real cow meant to provide the milk to mix with soma in the ongoing sacrifice, or as both. This cow is reminiscent of the apparent cow in the extremely enigmatic verses of the Viśvāmitra family hymn (III.53.15–16), a hymn that occupies a similar place in its maṇḍala.

Pūṣan is the subject of verses 14–19, the heart of the hymn. As Geldner points out, the Bharadvājas have a special relationship with Pūṣan: Maṇḍala VI contains the only series of hymns devoted to that god (VI.53–58). The first two verses of this section (14–15) present a solemn, formal praise of Pūṣan, who is compared to the great Vedic gods in his various qualities, despite his usual rustic and relatively lowly status. The two verses clearly form a pragātha, though the second of them (vs. 15) has five pādas (12 12 12 8 8) rather than the expected satobr̥hatī (12 8 12 8). After these two straightforward verses, notable only for the hyperbolic encomium of this minor divinity, there follow three verses (16–18) containing a remarkable, intimate address to Pūṣan, whispered into his ear (see 16ab), some of which, especially verse 17, is close to unintelligible. The translation of that verse given here is extremely provisional; what is clear is that the style and syntax are informal, and the poet probably uses idioms and popular sayings current in colloquial speech. Moreover, since it is whispered to Pūṣan, it should be unintelligible to us. The final verse devoted to Pūṣan (19), though it remains a 2nd-person address, returns to the high, formal style of the first two (14–15) and is in br̥hatī. It should be noted that the three intimate verses have the same metrical structure as the three verses about the cow (11–13) and share with those verses a certain idiomatic register. Each consists of a sequence of kakubh (8 12 8: vss. 11, 16), satobr̥hatī (12 8 12 8: vss. 12, 17), and puraüṣṇih (12 8 8: vss. 13, 18).

The final three verses (20–22) are dedicated to the Maruts. The first two form another pragātha (20 in the expected br̥hatī, 22 with an extra eight-syllable pāda at the end, like the extended satobr̥hatīs of vss. 6 and 8), while the final verse (22) is in anuṣṭubh. The reason for their position here is unclear. The final verse is enigmatic, as verses referring the Maruts' mother Pr̥śni and their birth often are (cf. II.34.2 and especially nearby VI.66.1), and the hymn, having presented us with a number of puzzles along the way, ends with a final one.

1. With your every sacrifice to Agni, and with your every hymn to his skill, we—that is, I—have proclaimed time after time the immortal Jātavedas, dear like an ally.
2. The child of nourishment—because he is inclined toward us, that one all on his own—we would ritually serve, for the bestowal of oblations.
   He will become our helper in the prize-contests; he will become the strengthener and protector of our bodies.

3. Because, Agni, as a great unaging bull, you radiate widely with your beam, constantly flaming up with your untiring flame, o flame-bright one, shine bright with your bright lights.
4. You sacrifice to the great gods: sacrifice in due order with your resolve and wondrous power.
   Bring them nearby for help, Agni. Bestow prizes and win them.

5. Whom the waters, the stones, and the trees carry to term as the embryo of truth,

who is born, when he is churned mightily by men, on the back of the earth,

6. Who has filled both world-halves with his radiance, he races to heaven with his smoke;
he is seen across the darkness in the nights, a ruddy bull among the dusky ones, a ruddy bull toward the dusky ones.

7. With your lofty beams, o Agni—with your flaming flame, o god, when kindled at Bharadvāja's, o youngest one, richly light up for us, o flaming one, brilliantly light up, o pure one.

8. You are houselord of all the clans stemming from Manu, o Agni.
With your hundred strongholds, o youngest one, protect your kindler from narrow straits for a hundred winters, and protect those who give to your praisers.

9. You good one, conspicuous by your help, impel bounties to us.
Of this wealth here you are the charioteer, Agni. Find a ford for our progeny.

10. Deliver our progeny and posterity to the further shore, with deliverers who are undeceivable and not absent-minded.
O Agni, keep godly rages away from us and ungodly tangles.

11. Comrades, drive near a juice-yielding milk-cow with your newer speech.
Send one who doesn't kick—

12. Who will milk out undying fame for the self-radiant troop of Maruts, who is in the grace of the precipitous Maruts, who goes her own way with benevolent thoughts.

13. For Bharadvāja, once again, milk both a milk-cow yielding all milk and refreshment yielding all nourishment.

14. Strong-willed like Indra, master of artifice like Varuṇa, gladdening and yielding lush nourishment like Aryaman, just like Viṣṇu—that one will I praise for you, to mark him out—

15. Turbulent like the troop of Maruts, powerfully noisy, without assailant—Pūṣan (I praise), so that hundreds, thousands (of goods) he will heap together from the settled domains.
He will make the hidden goods visible; he will make goods easy for us to find.

16. Run up to me, Pūṣan. I will announce close to your ear, o glowing one:
"Evil are the hostilities of the stranger.

17. "Don't tear out the Kākambīra tree—pursue the taunts and make them disappear!

And certainly don't (tear off the wheel) of the sun: for thus never could you give pursuit to the one who 'puts the necks' (of the horses to the chariot-pole?).

18. "Let (us) have a partnership that keeps the wolf away, with you who are like a leather bag—an unsplit one that holds curds, a well-filled one that holds curds."

19. For you are beyond mortals and equal with the gods in your splendor.
Keep an eye on us in our battles, Pūsan. Help us now, just as before.

20. O you shakers, let (us) have the valuable guidance of a valuable one and let there be the liberal spirit either of a god or of a mortal who has sacrificed, o Maruts who receive the forefront of the sacrifice.

21. He whose acclaim goes around heaven even in a single day, like the god Sun, the Maruts assume his vibrant power, his sacrificial name—his Vr̥tra-smashing power, his preeminent Vr̥tra-smashing power.

22. Only once was Heaven born; only once was Earth born.
Only once was the milk of Pr̥śni milked. Another (of the Maruts) is not born after this.

VI.49 (490) All Gods

15 verses: triṣṭubh, except śakvarī 15

A hymn of straightforward structure, typical of many All God hymns: each verse praises a single god (or divine entity, like the pair Night and Dawn [vs. 3] or the group of Maruts [vs. 11]). Most verses name the god in question, though the name can be postponed till late in the verse, as in verse 2 dedicated to Agni or verse 8 to Pūṣan, whose name is the last word in the verse. Two do not name the god at all: verse 3 to Night and Dawn and verse 12 to Indra. The riddling technique of postponing or omitting the name of an entity defined by the verse is of course common in R̥gvedic rhetoric, and its use in All God catalogues is especially appropriate.

There is no obvious ritual or other significance to the order of gods in this hymn, though many of the parties to the Morning Pressing occur early in the hymn: Agni (vs. 2), Night and Dawn (vs. 3), Vāyu (vs. 4), Aśvins (vs. 5). On the other hand, the verse dedicated to Indra (12), a regular participant in the dawn ritual, is late in the hymn, though he is obliquely present, with the Maruts, in 6cd. No god receives more than a single verse, though, as just mentioned, Indra and the Maruts have a presence in the Parjanya and Vāta [=Thunder and Wind] verse (6), as Agni does in the Mitra and Varuṇa verse (1) and in the Tvaṣṭar verse (9). The reference shifts between the 3rd and 2nd person, with the former predominating. The final verse of the hymn, in a slightly different meter (triṣṭubh but with an extra pāda), mentions no specific gods, but asks all of them for benefits.

1. I will praise the people of good commandment with newer hymns, will praise Mitra and Varuṇa the gracious.
   Let them come hither; let them listen here—those of good dominion, Varuṇa, Mitra, Agni.
2. The one to be reverently invoked at the ceremonies of every clan, of undistracted resolve, the spoked wheel of the two youthful ones [=Heaven and Earth], the child of Heaven, the son of strength—Agni—the ruddy beacon of the sacrifice (I invoke) to perform sacrifice.
3. The two daughters of the ruddy one, differing in form: the one is ornamented with stars, the other is the sun's.
   The two pure ones, transiting alternately, wandering apart—being hymned they both approach the prayerful thought once it is heard.
4. A lofty inspired thought (goes) forth to Vāyu, who, possessing lofty wealth and all valuables, fills the chariot.
   Having a brilliant course, master of teams, as poet you seek to reach the poet, you who are worshiped at the forefront of the sacrifice.
5. That seems to me a wonder—the chariot of the Aśvins, radiant, yoked with mind, by which you two, Nāsatyas, superior men, drive your circuit, for our descendants and ourselves to prosper.
6. Parjanya [/Thunder] and Vāta [/Wind], you two bulls of the earth, quicken the watery outpourings (for him [=human poet]) through whose hymns—you poets who really hear [=Maruts] and you mounter of the moving world [=Indra]—you made the moving world your own.
7. The daughter of Pavīru, the maiden with a brilliant lifespan, Sarasvatī, whose husband is a hero, will confer poetic insight.
   Together with the (divine) ladies she will hold out to the singer unbroken shelter, protection difficult to assail.
8. I will direct my eloquence to the complete protector of every path. Prompted by desire, he has attained the chant.
   He will bestow on us proliferating riches tipped with gold; he will cause every visionary thought to reach its goal—Pūṣan.
9. To him who receives the first portion, the glorious conferrer of vigor, the skillful god with lovely palms and lovely hands who deserves the sacrifice of the dwelling places—to Tvaṣṭar easy to invoke will far-radiant Agni, the Hotar, sacrifice.

10. The father of creation: with these hymns strengthen Rudra by day, Rudra by night; the lofty, high, ageless, very gracious one would we invoke separately, roused by the poet.
11. You youths, poets deserving the sacrifice, you Maruts—come hither in response to the singer's longing for space, for you in your strength quicken even (a place) without brightness, approaching in just the same way as to Aṅgiras, you superior men.
12. Forth to the hero, forth to the powerful, precipitous one will I drive (praise?), as a guardian of livestock drives his flocks home.
 He will make the inspired words of the speaker touch the body of him who is famed, as one makes the firmament touched by stars.
13. He who measured out the earthly realms three times exactly, for Manu, who was hard-pressed—Viṣṇu—in this shelter of yours (still) being offered might we rejoice with wealth, with life and lineage.
14. Let Ahi Budhnya take delight in this (praise?) of ours, along with the waters and the chants; in this let the Mountain, in this let Savitar take delight;
 let the Gift-Escorts, let Fortune, let Plenitude quicken this along with the plants, for wealth.
15. Now to us give wealth in chariots, filling the settled domains, consisting of many heroes, the herdsmen of great truth; give ageless peaceful dwelling (and that) with which we will trample upon the (other) peoples, the godless contenders, with which we will take on the godless clans.

VI.50 (491) All Gods

R̥jiśvan Bhāradvāja
15 verses: triṣṭubh

Unlike the last hymn, with its tidy organization allotting one verse per god, this All God hymn casts a wider and more inclusive net with multiple gods sometimes mixed in a single verse, some gods given more than one verse (Maruts, vss. 4–5), and marginally divinized figures, like the Waters (vs. 7), also addressed. The first verse establishes this messy inclusiveness, calling on Aditi, the three principal Ādityas (Varuṇa, Mitra, and Aryaman), Agni, Savitar, Bhaga, and the "rescuer gods," who may, but need not be, the Maruts. The hymn also has a more direct and intimate feel than VI.49: although both hymns mix 2nd-person and 3rd-person reference to the gods, in VI.50 the 2nd person predominates, in contrast to VI.49, and the 2nd-person invocations in VI.50 more often contain imperatives and requests in the optative, in contrast to the generally descriptive clauses of VI.49.

Another noteworthy feature is the relative prominence of female divinities. Again, the first verse sets the scene by placing Aditi first. Besides Earth, in the pair Heaven and Earth (vs. 3), we find Rodasī (vs. 5), the motherly Waters (vs. 7), Sarasvatī (vs. 12), the Wives of the Gods, associated with Tvaṣṭar (vs. 13), and Earth again (vss. 13–14). The divine ladies end the hymn (vs. 15).

1. I call upon goddess Aditi for you with reverences, on Varuṇa, Mitra, Agni, for mercy, on Aryaman the very well-disposed, who gives without being begged, on the rescuer gods, on Savitar and Bhaga.
2. O very great Sun, pursue the gods of good light whose father is skill, in (witness to our) blamelessness—they who have two births, the trusty ones who serve the truth, sunlit, worthy of worship, having Agni as their tongue.
3. And, Heaven and Earth, you two very gracious world-halves—you will make broad, lofty dominion as shelter great(ly), so that there will be a faultless wide realm for our peaceful dwelling, you two Holy Places.
4. Let the sons of Rudra incline themselves to us here, the unassailable good ones invoked today, since we, placed in petty or in great distress, have called upon the Maruts, the gods—
5. The ones to whom the goddess Rodasī is joined, on whom Pūṣan attends, sharing the sacrifice by halves.
   O Maruts, when, on having heard our call, you make your drive, the worlds tremble at your agitated course.
6. Chant to this hero who has a yearning for songs—to Indra with a new sacred formulation, o singer.
   He will hear the call. While being praised and being greatly hymned, he will give rewards.
7. O Waters belonging to Manu, establish unimpaired succor as luck and lifetime for our offspring and descendants.
   For you are the most motherly healers, the begetters of everything still and moving.
8. God Savitar, who gives protection, should come hither to us—the golden-palmed one deserving the sacrifice, who, rich in gifts, like the face of Dawn discloses valuables to the pious.
9. And you, Son of Strength—you should turn the gods hither to us today to this ceremony here.
   Might I be always within (the sphere of) your giving; by your help might I possess good heroes, Agni.

10. And you Nāsatyas should come here to my summons with your insightful thoughts—you certainly are inspired poets.
    (As you did) Atri from great darkness, release (me)—triumph, men!—from difficulty at close quarters.
11. Become for us givers of wealth that is brilliant, rich in prizes, in men, in much livestock.
    Showing favor, o gods—the heavenly, earthly, cow-born, and watery ones—be merciful.
12. Let those who grant rewards be merciful to us in concord—Rudra and Sarasvatī, Viṣṇu, Vāyu, the Master of the R̥bhus, Vāja, the divine Distributor. Let Parjanya [/Thunder] and Vāta [/Wind] swell refreshments for us.
13. And this god Savitar and Bhaga and the Child of the Waters—let (each) help us, supplying gifts, and Tvaṣṭar jointly with the divine ones, the Wives, Heaven with the gods, Earth with the seas.
14. And let Ahi Budhnya hear us and Aja Ekapad, Earth, Sea, and all the gods, strong through truth, when they are invoked and praised. Let the solemn utterances, pronounced by poets, help (us).
15. In just this way the Bharadvājas, the descendants of me, this Mamata, chant with their insightful thoughts, with their chants.
    The (divine) ladies, the unassailable good ones who are offered to—all of you be praised, you who deserve the sacrifice.

VI.51 (492) All Gods

16 verses: triṣṭubh 1–12, uṣṇih 13–15, anuṣṭubh 16

This sixteen-verse hymn falls metrically into three quite unequal portions: 1–12, 13–15, and 16. On the basis of both structure and content, it appears that these were originally at least two separate hymns. Verses 1–12 are unitary in tone, and the central, responsive verses 6–7 can be interpreted as an omphalos, supported by various lexical rings. (Oldenberg [1888: 199–200], however, divides these twelve verses into four tr̥ca hymns.)

The hymn so defined differs markedly from the last two All God hymns (VI.49–50), which catalogue a series of gods and their attributes in an unordered list. This hymn, in contrast, is highly reminiscent of the Mitra, Varuṇa, and Sūrya hymns in Maṇḍala VII (VII.60–63), in which the Sun surveys the human world and bears witness to Mitra and Varuṇa about the innocence and guilt of men. Like those hymns, this begins with the rising of the sun (vss. 1–2); it then turns to praise of the Ādityas. The emphasis is on their truth and lack of deceit—Ādityan preoccupations.

The omphalos verses (6–7), marked by initial repeated mā́ "don't!," beg the gods not to subject us to undeserved punishment, thus implicitly claiming our innocence, which should be visible to the all-seeing Sun (though the final pāda of the following vs. 8 seems to allow the possibility of a modicum of guilt). The remaining five verses (8–12) return to the theme of the truthful gods, with somewhat more insistent prayers for grace and help. Toward the end, in verse 11, a larger group of gods is named: invocations of additional gods at the end of a hymn are very common. The last verse (12), naming the priestly family and summarizing the content and intent of the hymn that precedes it, is a typical final verse.

The remaining verses (13–16) may have been appended to this hymn because they chiefly concern various malefactors whom we wish to banish or destroy, including the cheat (ripú, vs. 13) and the (clearly human) "wolf" (vṛ́ka, vs. 14), both of which were also mentioned as dangers in the omphalos verses ("cheat" vs. 7, "wolf" vs. 6).

1. Up goes this great eye of Mitra and of Varuṇa—dear and undeceivable.
   The blazing, sightly face of truth has flashed forth on its rising like the bright ornament of heaven.
2. The inspired poet who knows their three divisions and the breeds of the gods far away and here, who sees the straight and the crooked among mortals, the Sun looks upon the ways of the stranger.
3. I will praise you, the great herdsmen of truth: Aditi, Mitra, Varuṇa, the well-born ones.
   Aryaman, Bhaga, those of undeceivable inspired thoughts, the pure companions, do I call here.
4. Those who care for the stranger, the lords of settlements, undeceivable, the great kings, givers of good dwelling, the youths of good rule ruling over Heaven, the superior men—the Ādityas I beseech and Aditi, in quest of friendship.
5. O Father Heaven, Mother Earth lacking the lie, Brother Agni, good ones—have mercy on us.
   All you Ādityas and Aditi jointly—spread out ample shelter for us.
6. Don't make us subject to the wolf, to the she-wolf, to any at all who wishes us ill, o you who deserve the sacrifice, for you are the charioteers of our bodies and you have become (the charioteers) of (our?) skillful speech.
7. Don't let us pay for the offense done to you by another; don't let us do that which you avenge, o good ones, for you rule over all, All Gods. Let the cheat harm his own body.
8. Reverence is powerful. I seek to attract reverence here. Reverence upholds heaven and earth.
   Reverence to the gods; reverence is master of them. With reverence I seek to redeem even an offense committed.

9. You charioteers of truth who possess refined skill, settled in the dwelling places of truth, undeceivable, all you great superior men of broad gaze do I bend here with reverences, o you who deserve the sacrifice.
10. For they possess the best luster and they lead us across all difficulties—those of good rule, Varuṇa, Mitra, Agni, whose inspired thoughts are truth, who are in reality rulers of speech.
11. They strengthen our earthly realm—Indra, Earth, Pūṣan, Bhaga, Aditi, the Five Peoples.
Affording good shelter, good help, good guidance, let them be good herdsmen for us, offering us good protection.
12. To attain the one whose seat is in heaven, o gods, the Hotar of the Bhāradvājas now begs for favor.
Sacrificing with the ritual meals set here, desiring goods, he has extolled the breeds of the gods.

13. Away with this crooked, cheating, ill-intentioned thief, o Agni.
Make an easy passage for him far, far away, o lord of settlements.
14. Surely our pressing stones have bellowed for your companionship, Soma.
Smash down the rapacious niggard. For he is a wolf!
15. Because you of good drops, with Indra preeminent, are heaven-bound, make good passage for us on the road. (Be) herdsmen at home.
16. We have gone on the faultless path leading to well-being, on which one avoids all hatreds and finds goods.

VI.52 (493) All Gods

Ṛjiśvan Bhāradvāja
17 verses: triṣṭubh 1–6, gāyatrī 7–12, triṣṭubh 13, jagatī 14, triṣṭubh 15–17, generally arranged in tṛcas

This final, seventeen-verse hymn of the short All God cycle of Maṇḍala VI is metrically and thematically non-unified, and probably consists of originally separate pieces later joined together. (So also Oldenberg 1888: 199–200.) The first twelve verses divide into four tṛcas, the first two in one meter, the second two in another. The first tṛca (vss. 1–3) inveighs against a rival sacrificer and calls on the Maruts and Soma to destroy him, in lively and imaginative terms. In style, though not in meter, it more closely resembles verses 13–15 of the preceding hymn VI.51 than what follows. The second tṛca (vss. 4–6) is more staid, but notable for calling on not only the standard deities but also on natural phenomena for aid. The remainder of the hymn is generic and somewhat repetitive, urging the gods in general to hear our calls and partake of our sacrifice. Relatively few gods are mentioned by name; there is instead an effort to include all the gods, whatever their current or original location (see esp. vss. 13, 15). After the first two tr̥cas, the language is for the most part easy and without much character.

1. Not by Heaven nor by Earth do I concede this, not by my sacrifice and not by these ritual labors.
   Let the well-founded mountains crush him. Let the sacrificer of an excessive sacrifice be bent double.
2. Whoever disdains us, Maruts, or will scorn our sacred formulation as it is being performed, let his twisted (ways) be twisting, scorching (flames) for him. Let Heaven blaze at him who hates the formulation.
3. Do they not (call) you, o Soma, the herdsman of the sacred formulation? Do they not call you our protector from taunt?
   Do you not see us being scorned? Hurl your scorching lance at the hater of the formulation!

4. Let the dawns help me as they are being born; let the rivers help me as they are swelling.
   Let the steadfast mountains help me; let the forefathers help me at the invocation of the gods.
5. Might we always be of good mind; might we look now upon the sun as it rises:
   so shall he arrange it—he who is lauded over the gods as goods-lord of goods, as the most welcome arrival because of his help.
6. Indra the most welcome arrival in the nearest nearness because of his help; Sarasvatī swelling with the (other) rivers;
   Parjanya—joy itself for us with his plants; Agni good to proclaim, good to call on, like a father.

7. All you gods, come here. Hear this call of mine.
   Sit down here on this ritual grass.
8. The one who attends to you with a ghee-backed oblation, o gods—you all come close to him.
9. Let the sons of the immortal one listen to our hymns.
   Let them be very merciful to us.

10. Let all the gods, strong through truth, hearing the calls in their turns, enjoy the associated milk.
11. Let Indra along with his Marut-flock, let Mitra and Aryaman along with Tvaṣṭar, enjoy the praise song and these oblations of ours.
12. O Agni, Hotar, perform this ceremony as sacrifice for us according to its patterns, as one who attends to the divine folk.

13. All you gods, hear this call of mine—you who are in the midspace or you who are in heaven, you who have Agni as your tongue or you who are the means of sacrifice. Having sat on this ritual grass here, bring yourselves to exhilaration.
14. Let all the gods deserving the sacrifice hear me; let both world-halves and the Child of the Waters hear my thought.
Let me not speak speeches to you that can be disregarded. Might we, in nearest contact with you, reach exhilaration just on your favors.
15. Whichever great ones, snake-sly, were born on the earth or in the seat of heaven or of the waters, let those gods seek a wide place for us to prosper day and night for our whole lifetime.
16. O Agni and Parjanya, help my insightful thought, our lovely praise at this call here, you who are easy to call.
The one begets the refreshing drink, the other the embryo. Confer refreshments accompanied by offspring on us.
17. When the ritual grass has been strewn, when the fire is being kindled, I seek to entice (them) here with a hymn, with great reverence.
At this rite of ours here today, all you gods deserving the sacrifice, bring yourselves to exhilaration on the oblation.

VI.53 (494) Pūṣan

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
10 verses: gāyatrī, except anuṣṭubh 8

Pūṣan is a favorite minor god of the Bharadvājas: this short Pūṣan sequence (VI.53–58) is the only series of hymns dedicated to Pūṣan in the Ṛgveda. This particular hymn begins with gentle and positive requests of the god (vss. 1–2), but quickly becomes more bloodthirsty, seeking Pūṣan's punishment against stingy patrons. The instruments of punishment are the homely tools of Pūṣan, his awl (vss. 5–8) and goad (vs. 9). Despite the apparent viciousness of the actions urged on Pūṣan, the short lines, repeated phrases, colloquial expressions, and phonetic figures (what is translated anachronistically as "shred them, make them shrapnel" in vss. 7–8 is in Sanskrit the delightful ā́ rikha kikirā́ kṛṇu) give a light texture and playful feeling to the hymn.

1. We have yoked you, o lord of the path—like a chariot for prize-winning—for poetic vision, o Pūṣan.
2. Lead us toward goods stemming from men, toward a hero who has offered a ritual gift, toward a houselord of value.

3. Even one who doesn't want to give, o glowing Pūṣan—impel him to give.
   Soften up the mind even of the niggard.
4. Clear out the paths for prize-winning; smash away the negligent.
   Let our poetic visions reach their goal, o strong one.
5. Bore around the hearts of the niggards with an awl, you poet.
   And make them subject to us.
6. Thrust through (them) with an awl, Pūṣan. Seek what is dear to the heart of the niggard.
   And make him subject to us.
7. Shred them, make them shrapnel—the hearts of the niggards, you poet.
   And make them subject to us.
8. The awl that you carry, which impels the sacred formulation, o glowing Pūṣan, with it shred the heart of each one, make it shrapnel.
9. Your goad with its cow [=leather] "headband" [=strap] that sends the livestock to their goal, glowing one, we implore the favor of this (goad) of yours.
10. And make our poetic vision cow-winning for us, horse-winning, and prize-winning, make it manfully to be pursued.

VI.54 (495) Pūṣan

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
10 verses: gāyatrī

Pūṣan is here in his role as protector of livestock and finder of lost things, especially cows.

1. Pūṣan, lead (us) together with one who knows, who will direct (us) aright, who will say "just here it is."
2. Might we come together with Pūṣan, who will direct (us) to the houses, and who will say "just here they are."
3. Pūṣan's wheel does not suffer harm, nor does his (wagon's) cask fall down, nor his wheel-rim waver.
4. Whoever has done honor to him with an oblation, him Pūṣan does not neglect.
   He is the first to acquire goods.
5. Let Pūṣan follow after the cows for us; let Pūṣan protect the steeds;
   let Pūṣan win the prize for us.

6. Pūṣan, go forth after the cows of him who sacrifices and presses (soma), and of us who praise (you).
7. Let none disappear; let none be harmed, let none get fractured in a hole.
   But with unharmed (cows) come here.
8. Pūṣan who listens, the take-charge one whose possessions never get lost, him holding sway over wealth do we beseech for wealth.
9. Pūṣan, under your commandment might we never suffer harm.
   We here are your praisers.
10. (Even) from a distance let Pūṣan place his right hand around (us);
    let him drive our lost (livestock) back to us again.

VI.55 (496) Pūṣan

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
6 verses: gāyatrī

This little hymn is noteworthy for its structure, with a lexical chain knitting the verses together: each verse, except the last (6), contains at least one word or phrase from the preceding verse. The last verse does contain a phonological echo of the preceding one: "brother" in verse 5 (bhrā́tā) is echoed by the last word of verse 6 ("bearing" bíbhrataḥ).

It is also noteworthy for the startling, but oddly offhand and uncensorious, allusion to incest in verses 4–5, where Pūṣan is identified as the lover of his sister and the wooer of his mother. This follows on three verses (1–3) seeking Pūṣan as charioteer and giver of wealth, and after the incest verses the poet returns to the chariot motif to end the hymn (vs. 6). What the poet is alluding to is Pūṣan's alleged marriage to Sūryā, Daughter of the Sun, glancingly mentioned in nearby VI.58.4 as well as in X.26.6.

1. Come here! Let us two, o child of release, glowing one, together accompany each other.
   Become the charioteer of truth for us.
2. The best charioteer, with braided hair, holding sway over great bounty, the companion of wealth we beseech for wealth.
3. You are a stream of wealth, glowing one, a heap of goods, you with goats as horses,
   the companion of every visionary.
4. Pūṣan who has goats for horses let us now approach with praise—the prizewinner,
   who is said to be the lover of his sister.
5. The wooer of his mother I have spoken to: let the lover of his sister hear us,
   brother of Indra, companion to me.

6. Let the trusty [?] goats draw Pūṣan on his chariot, him who brings (all) to readiness *with his sharp (goad), they bearing the god.

VI.56 (497) Pūṣan

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
6 verses: gāyatrī, except anuṣṭubh 6

This hymn has several elements familiar from the previous Pūṣan hymns: he is "the best charioteer" (vs. 2, cf. VI.55.2); he helps the thoughts of poets reach their goal (vs. 4, cf. VI.53.4); he helps us win the prize of cattle (vs. 5, cf. VI.53.4, 10).

There are several novelties in the hymn as well. The hymn begins by naming Pūṣan as "porridge-eater" in an enigmatic construction. Porridge is indeed well known from elsewhere as Pūṣan's characteristic food (see, e.g., VI.57.2 in the next hymn), but is the last phrase of verse 1 an ominous warning, as some have taken it (Pūṣan will be insulted), or a positive indication of Pūṣan's eagerness to respond, as others have (he doesn't need to be invited twice, when porridge is mentioned)? We think that it is neither one; rather, "porridge eater" is such a unique designation for Pūṣan that a poet need provide no further clues to identify him.

In verse 2 Indra appears as Pūṣan's companion; this partnership is further developed in the next hymn, VI.57. The third verse is the most puzzling of the hymn. Nothing further is known about this story—if it is a story—of Pūṣan, the Sun's chariot wheel, and the gray cow, though we suspect that it is connected with the extremely puzzling nearby verse VI.48.17, also of Pūṣan. If so, this associates Pūṣan with Indra in the tearing off of the wheel of the Sun's chariot, a myth found in scattered pieces elsewhere. The "gray cow" may also be a naturalistic reference to a cloudy dawn twilight, with the sun rising through it. Whatever lies behind it, the image is striking.

1. Whoever will designate him, Pūṣan, as "porridge-eater," by him the god (need) not be designated (again).
2. And he is the best charioteer. With him as partner and yokemate, the lord of settlements, Indra, keeps smashing obstacles.
3. And yonder golden wheel of the Sun he set down in the "gray cow"—he the best charioteer.
4. What today we will say to you, much praised wondrous counselor, make that thought of ours reach its goal.
5. And make this cow-seeking troop of ours reach its goal for winning.
   From afar, Pūṣan, you are famed.
6. We beg of you well-being that keeps evil afar and goods nearby, for wholeness today and for wholeness tomorrow.

VI.57 (498) Indra and Pūṣan

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
6 verses: gāyatrī

Indra and Pūṣan are invoked together at the very beginning of this hymn, in a construction (the dual dvandva) that implies habitual intimacy. In the next two verses (2–3) their contrastive attributes are used as definitional descriptors; in verse 2 Indra is the first identified, while in verse 3 the order is the opposite. The end of verse 3 and verse 4 seem to background Pūṣan while foregrounding Indra's great deeds, but the final two verses (5–6) return them to equality, and indeed in both verses Pūṣan is mentioned first, with Indra almost an afterthought. The implied equipoise between the two gods would of course be amusing to a Vedic audience, given the sharp distinction between their importance in the pantheon.

In the translation we have retained as much as possible the order of the elements, even though this violates normal English patterns, because the balance between the two gods and their qualities is conveyed by their careful stationing in the verse.

1. Indra and Pūṣan would we—for partnership, for well-being—call upon—for prize-winning.
2. Soma has the one sat down to, to drink it pressed in the two cups.
   Porridge does the other one desire.
3. Goats are the draft-animals for the one; two fallow bay horses, fully equipped, are for the other;
   along with those two (horses) he keeps smashing obstacles.
4. When Indra the most bullish led the streams, the great waters, then Pūṣan came along.
5. The benevolence of Pūṣan—like the branch of a tree—and that of Indra we seize hold of.
6. We ease up on Pūṣan—like a charioteer the reins—and Indra, for great well-being.

VI.58 (499) Pūṣan

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
4 verses: triṣṭubh, except jagatī 2

This last hymn in the Pūṣan cycle in Maṇḍala VI is the only one in trimeter meter, rather than the less formal dimeter. It pictures Pūṣan in a more cosmic context than the previous hymns and ascribes rather more powers to him. The final verse (4), probably with verse 3, refers to the apparent marriage of Pūṣan to Sūryā, daughter of the Sun, a tale alluded to in passing earlier in this cycle.

1. The one of yours is gleaming, the other of yours belongs to the sacrifice: the two day(-halves [=night and day]) of dissimilar form. You are like heaven, for you give aid to all magical powers, o autonomous one. Let your giving be propitious here, Pūṣan.
2. Having goats as his horses, protecting livestock, granting a house full of prizes, quickening poetic vision, fitted into all creation, Pūṣan the god, always brandishing his pliant goad, goes speeding, as he surveys the creatures.
3. The ships of yours that are in the sea, the golden ones that wander in the midspace, with these you travel on a mission of the Sun, o you prompted by desire, as you seek fame.
4. Pūṣan has good lineage from Heaven and from Earth, lord of refreshment, bounteous, of wondrous luster, whom the gods gave to Sūryā, him prompted by desire, powerful, of lovely outlook.

VI.59 (500) Indra and Agni

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
10 verses: br̥hatī 1–6, anuṣṭubh 7–10

As has been discussed elsewhere, despite the major roles each of these gods plays in the R̥gveda, Indra and Agni have little in common ritually or mythologically. Nonetheless, eleven hymns are dedicated jointly to them. In this particular hymn, the pairing is insisted upon: every verse has a form of the dual dvandva compound "Indra-Agni." Moreover, their kinship and joint birth is the subject of the first two verses, which, as many scholars have claimed, may be conceptually connected to the murky hymn X.124, possibly concerning the defeat of the Asuras (the Fathers of vs. 1 in this hymn?) by the Devas or gods. Elsewhere in the R̥gveda there is no evidence for a family connection between Indra and Agni.

As in some other Indra-Agni hymns, Agni is assimilated to Indra at least in the early verses, since Indra has the more dynamic mythology. The standard promise to Indra to "proclaim (his) manly deeds" is made to Indra and Agni in verse 1; soma is offered to them in verses 1, 3 and 4, though it is really Indra's drink; and they are both said to possess the mace, Indra's weapon, in verse 3. The balance changes somewhat in verses 5–6. The two gods are separated and, though not named, are identified by their characteristics. The second hemistich of 5 refers to Agni alone, and in verse 6, after a reference to Dawn and her cows, probably alluding to the Morning Pressing where Agni is kindled and Indra appears, the second half-verse contrasts Agni (pāda c) and Indra (pāda d).

This brings to an end the first division of the hymn as defined metrically, and this portion forms a satisfactory unit celebrating the gods and offering them praise and soma. The last four verses, also metrically unified, make the singer's requests, for aid against enemies (vss. 7–8) and for wealth (vs. 9), and again invite them with praise and soma (vs. 10). Despite the metrical division, which corresponds to a functional and thematic difference, there is no reason to consider this a composite hymn, pace Oldenberg (1888: 200). It conforms to a common pattern: praise and then requests, and the shorter dimeter meter of the last four verses is appropriate to the specific requests, in contrast to the rhetorically more formal praise section in the lyric bṛhatī.

1. I shall now proclaim, when (soma drinks) have been pressed for you, the manly deeds that you two have done.
   Slain are your fathers whose rivals were the gods, but, o Indra and Agni, you are (still) alive.
2. Yes indeed! It is just so: your greatness is most to be marveled at, Indra and Agni.
   Your begetter was the same: you two are brothers, twins (though) with one mother here, one there.
3. The two who are accustomed to the pressed (soma), like a pair of teamed horses to their fodder, Indra and Agni, both possessing the mace, the two gods, we call here with their aid.
4. Indra and Agni, whoever will praise you, strong through truth, at these pressings—you two will never snap at one who speaks (such) a pleasurable speech, you gods who receive substantial oblations.
5. O gods Indra and Agni, what mortal shall perceive this one of you two?
   The single one, (though) having yoked his horses facing in all directions, goes speeding on the same chariot.
6. Indra and Agni, this footless one here [=Dawn] has gone in front of the footed ones [=cows?].
   While (this one [=Agni],) having left his head behind, constantly chattering with his tongue, goes wandering, (this one [=Indra?]) has trodden down thirty with his foot.

7. Indra and Agni, since gallant men are drawing their bows in their arms, do not shun us in this (contest) for great stakes, in our quests for cattle.
8. Indra and Agni, the evil hostilities of the stranger scorch me.
   Make hatreds stay far away from here; keep (him) away from the sun.
9. Indra and Agni, in you are heavenly and earthly goods.
   Extend to us here wealth that brings lifelong prosperity.

10. O Indra and Agni whose conveyance is hymns, who listen to the summons through our praise songs, through all our songs—come here to drink this soma.

VI.60 (501) Indra and Agni

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
15 verses: triṣṭubh 1–3, gāyatrī 4–12, triṣṭubh 13, br̥hatī 14, anuṣṭubh 15, arranged in tr̥cas

This Indra-Agni hymn, organized into tr̥cas, begins with three verses in trimeter meter notable for the tendency to address Indra and Agni separately, each in the vocative singular, though they receive joint epithets, are referred to by shared pronouns, and are generally, but not exclusively (see vs. 2d), the subjects of dual verbs. Our translation reflects this peculiar disjunction of vocatives. This separate address is not characteristic of the rest of the hymn, where the dual dvandva compound "Indra-Agni" (or, once, a conjoined phrase "Indra and Agni," vs. 12) is found in nine of the remaining twelve verses, and the last tr̥ca begins with a verse (13) containing four occurrences of the explicit adjective "(you) both" (ubhā́).

The content of the praise is generic, with a tendency toward Indraic deeds and qualities (see esp. vss. 3, 6). The second-to-last tr̥ca treats the two gods separately, without naming them: Agni in verse 10, Indra in verse 11, and a return to joint reference in verse 12. The final triplet (vss. 13–15) is in three different meters, and it has been suggested that it did not originally belong to the rest of the hymn. However, notice that the return to longer lines matches the meter of the first tr̥ca, and there are also verbal responsions with the first three verses, so that a ring-compositional structure is sketched. The strong emphasis on the unified front presented by the two gods in verses 13–15 contrasts implicitly with the separate address in the first tr̥ca, and may hint that our own hymn has brought about the close cooperation between the two gods that will benefit us.

1. He pierces the obstacle and wins the prize who will serve Indra and Agni, the mighty ones who have control over abundant goods, the two most mighty with their might as they seek the victory prize.
2. You two, do battle for cows now, o Indra, for the waters, the sun, and the dawns who were carried (away), o Agni.
The quarters, the sun, the brilliant dawns, o Indra—the waters, the cows, do you, o Agni, as teamster hitch up as your team.
3. O you two obstacle-smashers, with your obstacle-smashing tempests, o Indra, drive our direction, o Agni, by reason of our reverences.
You two, with unstinting, highest bounties, o Indra, be here for us, o Agni.

4. I call upon these two whose every previous deed is admired.
   Indra and Agni do not neglect (us).
5. The two strong ones who hew apart the negligent, Indra and Agni, do we call upon.
   They will be gracious to such as us.
6. They smash the Ārya obstacles; they smash those of the Dāsa—the two lords of settlements;
   they smash away all hatreds.

7. O Indra and Agni, these praises here have roared to you two.
   Drink the pressed (soma), you who are luck itself.
8. Those much-sought-after teams of yours which are for the pious, you superior men, come here with those, o Indra and Agni.
9. With those come here, you superior men, up to this pressing pressed here, o Indra and Agni, for soma-drinking.

10. Reverently invoke him who with his flame embraces all the trees, who makes them black with his tongue.
11. The mortal who, when (the ritual fire) has been kindled, seeks to win the favor of Indra, (for him Indra makes) the waters easy to cross for brilliance.
12. You two, deliver to us refreshments accompanied by prizes, and deliver (to safety) swift steeds to convey Indra and Agni.

13. You both, Indra and Agni, are to be called upon; both together are to invigorate yourselves on bounty.
    You both are givers of refreshments, of riches; you both do I call upon to win the victory prize.
14. Come here close to us with bovine and equine goods.
    The two partners, the two gods who are luck itself, Indra and Agni, do we call on for partnership.
15. O Indra and Agni, hear the call of the sacrificer who presses (soma).
    Pursue his oblations: come here, drink the somian honey.

VI.61 (502) Sarasvatī

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
14 verses: jagatī 1–3, gāyatrī 4–12, jagatī 13, triṣṭubh 14, organized in tr̥cas

This hymn has a metrical structure similar to the preceding one, VI.60: it is organized in tr̥cas, with the first tr̥ca (vss. 1–3) in a trimeter meter, the next three tr̥cas in dimeter (4–12), a return to the original meter in verse 13, and, here, a final verse (14) in yet a different meter. The complexity of the meter corresponds roughly with the density of the thought: the first tṛca is rich in imagery and particularities; the following three tṛcas are less adorned and more generic, though Sarasvatī's riverine nature is clear, especially in the second of these tṛcas, verses 7–9. The hymn ends with a final statement of her superiority (vs. 13) and a plea for her aid and sustenance (vs. 14).

The sheer power of the river and the potential menace of her relentless flow are nicely conveyed, especially in the first tṛca, where she punishes a series of human foes and even destroys the mountains while rewarding her praisers. In parts of the hymn, these rewards are clearly related to her identity as river—the streambeds in verse 3, the milk we pray for in verse 14—but in others the connection is not clear, especially the gift to Vadhryaśva of (apparently) a son Divodāsa, which opens the hymns. The hostile Bṛsaya of verse 3 is also unclear: the name occurs only once elsewhere in the Ṛgveda (I.93.4) in similar context.

1. She gave to the pious Vadhryaśva tempestuous Divodāsa who shakes the debtor, she who has wrenched away the provender from one niggard after another. These are your powerful gifts, o Sarasvatī.
2. She, like a root-grubbing (boar) with her snortings, broke the back of the mountains with her powerful waves.
   Sarasvatī, who smashes the foreigners, we would entice here for help with well-plaited (hymns), with visionary thoughts.
3. Sarasvatī, tear down the scorners of the gods, the offspring of every tricky Bṛsaya.
   And (while) you found streambeds for the settlements, you flowed poison for them, o you rich in prize mares.

4. Let goddess Sarasvatī, rich in prize mares, with her prizes help us—the helper of visionary thoughts.
5. Whoever makes appeal to you, goddess Sarasvatī, when the stake is set, as if to Indra at the overcoming of Vṛtra,
6. Aid (him), goddess Sarasvatī, at the prize (contests), you prizewinner.
   Channel gain to us, like Pūṣan.

7. And this Sarasvatī, having a golden course, fearsome, obstacle-smashing, wants our good praise—
8. Whose boundless, unswerving, turbulent, roving flood, her onslaught, proceeds ever roaring.
9. Beyond all hatreds, beyond her other sisters [=rivers] has the truthful one extended us, like the sun the days.

10. And she, dear(est) among the dear (rivers), having seven sisters, very delightful—Sarasvatī is (ever) worthy of our praise.

11. Having filled the earthly (places), the broad realm, the midspace, let Sarasvatī protect (us) from scorn.
12. Having three seats and seven parts, strengthening the five peoples, at every prize contest she is worthy to be invoked.

13. The one who by her greatness shines ever more brightly among the great (rivers), (beyond) the others by her brilliance, the busiest of the busy, like a chariot lofty and fashioned for wide ranging, she is to be praised by (every) observant one—Sarasvatī.
14. O Sarasvatī, lead us to a better state. Do not spring away with your milk; do not come up short for us.
 Take delight in our partnerships and communities. Let us not go from you to alien dwelling places.

VI.62 (503) Aśvins

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
11 verses: triṣṭubh

The first five verses of this hymn cover the familiar ground of Aśvin hymns—the poet's eager invitation to the two gods to drive to our sacrifice. Though the theme and sentiments are familiar, there are a number of nice touches—the enjambment across verse boundaries (1/2a; 2bcd/3a, at least in our opinion) and the play on the concepts of newer and older in verses 4–5. This section ends (5d) with the phrase, modifying the Aśvins, "providing bright gifts to the singer" (gr̥ṇaté citrárātī).

The following two verses (6–7) touch on several of the Aśvins' famous deeds, especially the rescue of Bhujyu from the sea (vs. 6), but the two verses after that (8–9) take a detour, addressing other gods and urging them to take violent action against various enemies. The poet seems so agitated that he loses his grip on grammar: verse 9, concerning Mitra and Varuṇa, is syntactically fragmented, shifting without warning or grammatical agreement between dual and singular and between 3rd and 2nd person. (We have not been able to render the full effect in English.)

Though verse 10 returns us to the Aśvins' journey and to a more tranquil grammatical level, it too enlists the Aśvins to attack and also suggests that their journey to us was prompted by the failure of other men. The final verse gives no hint of the agitation in the immediately preceding verses and ends with the same phrase as verse 5, thus implicitly indicating the bipartite structure of the hymn.

1. I shall praise the two outstanding men of this heaven; I call upon the Aśvins, singing [/awakening] with my chants—they who, at the breaking of the ruddy dawn, in a single day seek to encompass the ends of the earth and its broad expanses,

2. While striding to the sacrifice with their gleaming (horses). (The horses) have shone the radiant beam of their chariot through the dusky spaces.
   Measuring the many immeasurable expanses, you two drive over the waters, wastelands, and fields,
3. When (you drive) this circuit without slackening, o powerful ones. Over and over you have conveyed insights that are right to the point, with your horses swift as thought and vigorous, in order to circumscribe the wayward course of the pious mortal.
4. The two attend upon the thoughts of (me), the newer singer, having harnessed their team, conveying beauty and fortifying power, refreshment and nourishment. The age-old Hotar without deceit shall offer sacrifice to the two youths.
5. The two, obliging and skillful, best endowed with many abilities—those age-old ones do I seek to attract here with my newer speech—those two who become most wealful for the reciter and praiser, providing bright gifts to the singer.
6. You two with your birds conveyed Bhujyu, the son of Tugra, from the waters, from the sea, through the airy realms, through dustless treks, bending (him) away from the lap of the flood with your winged ones.
7. With your victorious (chariot), you charioteers drove through the rock; you harkened to the call of Vadhrīmatī, o bulls.
   Showing favor to Śayu, you made his cow swell. Thus (did you show) your benevolence, you stirring and bustling ones.
8. O world-halves, the anger of gods and among mortals that exists from of old on earth, direct that evil heat at the yokemate of demons, o Ādityas, Vasus, and Rudriyas.
9. Which (one of) the two kings, Mitra or Varuṇa, will keep watch over the airy realm, regulating it according to the proper sequence—hurl your missile at the deep-embedded demonic power and also at the deceitful speech of the Anu people.
10. With your wheels drawing nearer, with your heaven-bright chariot with its superior men, do you two drive your circuit for our lineage (to prosper), because of the distant dereliction of a(nother) mortal. Chop off the heads of the rapacious ones.
11. Drive here with your highest and midmost teams, this way with your lowest.
    Open the doors of the cattle pen, even though they are shut fast, you who provide bright gifts for the singer.

VI.63 (504) Aśvins

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
11 verses: triṣṭubh, except ekapadā 11

The first four verses of this hymn are divided more or less equally between the invitation to and journey of the Aśvins to our sacrifice (vss. 1–2) and the sacrifice itself (vss. 3–4). The next two verses (5–6) enter mythological territory: the journey of Sūryā, daughter of the Sun, on the Aśvins' chariot along with them. This mythological journey returns us to the actual journey of today (vs. 7) and the hopes we have of these gods when they attend our sacrifice (vs. 8). The final two verses (9–10) are a dānastuti, naming a number of the patrons of the poet, Bharadvāja, with the single pāda of verse 11 expressing his hope for the Aśvins' favor to both himself and his patrons at the place of sacrifice.

1. Where today did our reverential praise song, like a messenger, find these two obliging ones, called upon by many—
   (the praise song) that has (previously) turned the Nāsatyas this way? For you two will be the dearest in his [=poet's] thought.
2. Come fit for this summons of mine, so that, being hymned, you will drink the stalk.
   You drive, away from harm, around this circuit, which neither a distant one nor one close by may traverse.
3. It has been made for you from the stalk; on the expanse [=ritual ground] has been strewn the ritual grass, offering the easiest approach.
   With hands outstretched, seeking you, I have greeted (you). Approaching you, the stones have anointed you.
4. The fire has stood upright for you at the ceremonies. The gift goes forth, glowing, covered in ghee; forth the chosen Hotar whose thought is welcomed, who has yoked the Nāsatyas at his call.
5. For splendor the Daughter of the Sun mounted your chariot provided with hundredfold help, o you who offer much enjoyment.
   You became foremost then in the lineage of those worthy of the sacrifice by your magic powers, o magicians, superior men, dancers.
6. Along with these splendors lovely to see you conveyed the flourishing of Sūryā, for beauty.
   The birds flew forth after you, for wonder; (their) choir reached you (so you became) well-praised, o holy ones.
7. Let the birds, the horses that convey best, convey you to the pleasurable offering, o Nāsatyas.
   Your chariot swift as thought has been sent surging forth after the many refreshments and the fortifying powers that bring refreshment.

8. Because your giving is much, o you who give much enjoyment, swell our cow and our refreshment (so that they) don't dry up.
   To you belong praises and the good praise-hymn and the juices that have followed your gift, o honeyed ones.
9. And mine are two silver, swift (mares) of Puraya, a hundred (cows) at (the hands of) Sumīḷha, and cooked (foods) at (the hands of) Peruka.
   Śāṇḍa has given gold-bedecked (horses) along with their allotted (gear). Ten mated cows are attendant upon the high (horses).
10. Purupanthā has given altogether hundreds and thousands of horses for (my) song for you; to Bharadvāja he has given (them) for the song, o hero(es). Demonic powers should be smashed, o you of many wondrous powers.
11. Might I, along with my patrons, be in your favor on the expanse [=ritual ground].

VI.64 (505) Dawn

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
6 verses: triṣṭubh

The hymn begins with reference to multiple Dawns, but soon (by the second half of vs. 1) focuses only on a single Dawn. As so often, the hymn refers to the present and immediate past when Dawn has just dawned. The standard tropes are present: her wide radiance (vss. 2, 3), her ease of travel (vss. 1, 4), her feminine beauty (vs. 2), her accompanying bovines (vss. 3, 5), and especially her connection with the priestly gift distributed at the early-morning sacrifice and with wealth in general (vss. 1, 4, 5, 6). Although the hymn does not stand out for elaborate rhetorical tricks, it is characterized by pleasing imagery; see especially Dawn as archer and chariot-driver in verse 3 and the morning activities of birds and men in verse 6 (a verse found also at I.124.12).

1. The shining Dawns have arisen for splendor, glistening like the waves of the waters.
   She makes all pathways, all passages easy to travel. She has appeared— the good priestly gift, the bounteous one.
2. Auspicious, you have become visible; you radiate widely. Your flare, your radiant beams have flown up to heaven.
   You reveal your breast as you go in beauty, goddess Dawn, shining with all your might.
3. The ruddy, glistening cows convey her of good portion as she spreads widely.
   Like a champion archer his rivals, she drives away darkness; she repels it like a quick (chariot-)driver.

4. Easy are your pathways, easy your passages (even) in the mountains.
   (Even) when it is windless you cross over the waters, self-radiant one.
   Convey wealth here for us to prosper, high Daughter of Heaven with your broad course.
5. Convey (it)—you who as the unsurpassable one with your oxen convey the boon at your pleasure, Dawn, you who are a goddess, o Daughter of Heaven. Become worthy to be seen with your munificence at the early invocation!
6. The birds have also flown up from their dwelling, and the men who partake of food, at your first flush.
   To the one who is at home you convey much of value, o goddess Dawn, and to the pious mortal.

VI.65 (506) Dawn

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
6 verses: triṣṭubh

In virtual mirror-image to the previous hymn, this one begins with a single Dawn, but turns for some verses (2–4) to the plural Dawns, before returning to a single Dawn in the final two verses (5–6). The structure of this hymn is more cunning than the somewhat bland VI.64, however. The poet uses identical pāda openings (4a, 4b, 4c, 5a: idā́ [hí] "[for] right now…"), with insistence on the here-and-now, to modulate from the present situation and current poet to the mythological model for the dawn and the associated distribution of treasures, namely the Aṅgirases opening the Vala cave (vs. 5), which is presented as if it were happening now. As often when this myth is mentioned as a model for the singer (see, e.g., V.45), there is no mention of Indra, to whom the leadership in this deed is usually attributed. By the end of verse 5 the mythical and successful Aṅgirases have merged with the current poets, and the invocation of both is proclaimed as having come true. The connection between past and present is continued in the pleas for wealth and fame made in the last verse (6).

1. This very one, the daughter born of heaven dawning for us, has awakened the human settlements, she who with her glistening radiance amid the nights has been recognized even across the nocturnal shades of darkness.
2. They have driven through it with their ruddy-yoked horses; brightly shine the Dawns with their gleaming chariots.
   Leading the vanguard of the lofty sacrifice, they thrust aside the darkness of the night.
3. Bringing down to the pious mortal fame, reward, refreshment, nourishment, o Dawns,

as bounteous masters of (wealth) in heroes, establish aid and a treasure for the one who does honor today.

4. For right now there exists a treasure for the one who does you honor, right now for the hero, for the pious one, o Dawns, right now for the poet, when he sings his hymns. Even before you used to carry (it) down to one such as me.
5. For right now the Aṅgirases are hymning the cowpens of the cows for you, o Dawn, you who own the high backs of the mountains.
They have split (them) apart with their chant and sacred formulation.
The men's invocation of the gods has come true.
6. Dawn for us, Daughter of Heaven, as of old, for the one who does (you) honor like Bharadvāja, o bounteous one.
Grant wealth in good heroes to the singer. Confer wide-ranging fame upon us.

VI.66 (507) Maruts

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
11 verses: triṣṭubh

The only hymn to the Maruts in Maṇḍala VI, this poem is complex, playful, allusive, and very difficult in parts.

It begins with five dense and syntactically contorted verses about the birth of the Maruts, a topic that regularly invites such treatment. The story of the birth is introduced by a signal that it is esoteric knowledge; verse 1a announces it as a marvel even for someone who really perceives properly. The rest of the verse is both a paradox and a riddle: two entities have the same name, "milker," but one of them constantly gives milk, and the other has done so only once. The riddle is solved by the last word of the verse, "udder"; the paradox juxtaposes the normal udder of a cow, which constantly swells with milk, with the udder of the Marut's mother, Pṛśni, who bore them, that is, milked them out, all at once. (This same phenomenon is referred to in riddling terms in VI.48.22.) Verse 2 continues this theme, and the other parent of the Maruts, their father Rudra, is introduced in verse 3. But both 1 and 3 also allude to the androgynous behavior of the mother Pṛśni, who elsewhere (see esp. IV.3.10) is identified as a bull who gives milk that is identical with semen; in verse 3 here she is the subject of the quintessentially male verb of impregnation (gárbhaṃ √dhā "implant an embryo"). Verse 4 is the most opaque verse in this sequence. It clearly describes the moment of the Maruts' birth; they did not resist being born, but in fact were milked out when they wished, after having "purified their flaws" while still within her womb. A two-word expression early in the verse (áyā nú) seems to have a double meaning: on the one hand, it is the poet's comment about the manner of birth: "now (it happened) in this way"; on the other, it can be read as the direct speech of the Maruts (considered as a group), "Now I will go" (that is, be born), an indication of their moment of choice. The final verse of the birth story relates the fact that Pṛśni, having given them as milk, did not give them milk after they were born, but they were undeterred. There is much that is doubtful in our translation of these verses, but the main outlines seem clear, while the tricks of the poet are much on display.

Though more of his tricks appear in the rest of the hymn, none of it is as difficult as these first five verses. Verse 6 turns on a pun between the word for the "two world-halves" (ródasī) and the female who is often found as the Maruts' lover, Rodasī́ (distinguished from the first only by accent). The marvel of their journey through the midspace is described in verse 7, and the good fortune of the man who receives their aid in verse 8. The journey of verse 7 must be to carry them to our sacrifice, for the remaining verses bring the hymn to a fairly conventional end: in verse 9 we produce a hymn for the Maruts; in verse 10 they are compared to the ritual fire, an appropriate simile if they are situated on the ritual ground; in the final verse (10) the aim of attracting them to the sacrifice is made explicit and the competing hymns of rival sacrificers are alluded to.

Unlike many Marut hymns, this one lacks any significant description of their thunderstorm-like aspects.

1. Let this be a marvel even for one who (truly) perceives—(though) owning the same name "milker," while the one stays swollen to give milk to mortals, only once did Pṛśni milk the gleaming (milk/semen) from (the other) udder.
2. Those who kept blazing up like fires being kindled, when the Maruts were strengthened two or three times over—dustless, golden were their (chariots)—they came into being all at once with their manly and male powers.
3. Those who are the sons of Rudra the rewarder, and whom she was stalwart (enough) to bear—for she is known as the great mother of the great—just she, Pṛśni, implanted the embryo for good offspring.
4. Those who do not retreat from their birth: now (it happened) in this way [/(saying) "Now I will go"]—purifying their flaws while still within (their mother), they were milked forth gleaming, at their pleasure, growing in splendor all along their bodies.
5. Those for whom even right away [=right after their birth] the irrepressible one [=Pṛśni] was not there to give milk—those who, assuming the bold name "Marut," did not (stand still) like posts, (but were themselves) irrepressible in their greatness. Even now [/never] would the one of good drops [=Pṛśni] appease (those) mighty ones.

6. Just these mighty ones in a bold host yoked both well-fixed world-halves [=ródasī] through their vast power.
   Then Rodasī mounted among these impetuous ones like a self-blazing light.
7. Let your course be without antelopes, o Maruts, also without horses— the course that one who is no charioteer drives.
   Without halt, without reins as it crosses the dusky realm, it travels through the two world-halves along its paths, heading toward its goal.
8. There exists now no one to obstruct, no one to overcome him whom you aid in the winning of prizes, o Maruts, whom (you aid in the winning) of progeny, of cows, of descendants, of waters. He is the splitter of the (cow)pen just then at the decisive end of the day.
9. Bring forward a brilliant chant for the singing, swift, self-strong Marut(-troop).
   Those who overpower powers with power, before (those) combatants the earth trembles, o Agni.
10. Flaring like the dart of the ceremony [=ritual fire], stirring thirstily like tongues of fire, chanting like boisterous heroes, the Maruts with their flashing birth are unassailable.
11. This Marut(-troop) grown strong, with flashing spears, the son(s) of Rudra I seek to entice here with an invocation.
    For (the favor of) the troop of heaven the gleaming inspired thoughts, mighty like mountains or waters, have contended (with each other).

VI.67 (508) Mitra and Varuṇa

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
11 verses: triṣṭubh

This is the only hymn dedicated to Mitra and Varuṇa in Maṇḍala VI, though Indra and Varuṇa are the recipients of the next, unremarkable hymn. By contrast, this hymn is obscure in reference and meaning, and full of rare words, unclear morphological forms, contorted phraseology, puzzling imagery, and ellipses difficult to fill. Our interpretation of the hymn both in detail and in general outline differs from the many incompatible interpretations offered by other scholars (differences that we cannot discuss here), but our interpretation does produce a clear structure within which the many puzzles can be evaluated.

The hymn begins straightforwardly enough, with an exhortation to the priests to offer ritual praise to Mitra and Varuṇa (vs. 1) and an invitation to the two gods to come to our ritual sacrifice (vss. 2, 3ab). This first section ends (3cd), in our view, with an elaborated version of 1ab, declaring the gods' power to control even the rich and powerful.

The ritual context returns later in the hymn (vss. 7–8), and the two ritually oriented portions frame a section relating to the birth of Mitra and Varuṇa from Aditi (vs. 4) and the powers they assumed to regulate the cosmos (vss. 5–6). The allusion to their birth recalls the lengthy birth narrative of the Maruts in the immediately preceding hymn (VI.66.1–5). With the return to the ritual situation, the two gods are first exhorted to drink the soma, whose preparation is described in enigmatic terms (vs. 7). In verse 8, again in our view, the two gods receive a summons from Agni (not named), the ritual fire through whom they will consume ghee, because he finds they are not there. (See the calls in the structurally matching vss. 2–3.)

This absence leads to the final section of the hymn (vss. 9–11), which appears to treat the rivalry among competing sacrificers. If Mitra and Varuṇa are not at our sacrifice (vs. 8b), they must be elsewhere. The poet describes these competitors in extremely negative terms (vs. 9) as violating the ordinances that are the most prominent feature of Mitra and Varuṇa's moral command. In contrast, verse 10 presents the proper ritual behavior and attitudes of our side, ending with yet another affirmation of the gods' power to control and set in place the people (10d, reminiscent of 1cd and 3cd). And in the final verse (11) we are ourselves properly placed in the shelter of Mitra and Varuṇa (a placement first requested in vs. 2), hoping for generous gifts when the soma sacrifice is performed. The last half-verse refers, in our view, to this sacrifice: the cows are the milk mixture pursuing the straight-flying soma; the bold bull in battle-lust is also the soma. But the expressions also evoke martial images appropriate to the rivalry among sacrificers found in the preceding two verses. It is worth noting that the preceding hymn also made brief allusion to sacrificial rivalry in its final verse (VI.66.11).

1. Of all beings the most preeminent, Mitra and Varuṇa are to be continuously strengthened by your songs.
 The best controllers, the two without equal, who, like reins, firmly control the peoples with their own arms.
2. This inspired thought from me is spread forth for you two, (calling you) two dear ones with homage to the ritual grass.
 Hold forth to us, Mitra and Varuṇa, the unbesiegable shelter of yours that provides defense, o you of good drops.
3. Drive hither, Mitra and Varuṇa, dear ones being called to (the ritual grass) with good recitation, with homage.
 You two who like industrious workers firmly (control) (even) the peoples ensconced in prosperity, you set in their place even those (who themselves say) "listen!" [=bosses], with your greatness.

4. When at her season Aditi (was ready) to bear as embryo (the two) who like prizewinning horses were of pure breed, who were being born forth greatly great, she pushed downward (at delivery) the two to be terrible for the cheating mortal.
5. Since all the gods in concert, being exhilarated, magnanimously established dominion for you two, such that you two surround even the two wide world-halves, there exist spies (in your service), undeceivable, ungullible.
6. Because you uphold your dominion through the days and you make firm (heaven's) back as if from highest heaven, firm (also) is the heavenly body [=sun], and belonging to all the gods it has stretched to earth and to heaven with the gushing [=rain] of those two [=Mitra and Varuṇa].
7. You should appropriate the lively (soma) to fill your belly, when those of the same pedigree [=soma-pressing fingers?] fill the seat.
   The unsurpassable maidens [=fingers] are not neglectful when they distribute their milk [=soma], o you two who enliven all.
8. (You) two (does) the one of good wisdom [=Agni] always (call) here with his tongue, when the true wheel (of the sacrifice) [=Agni] has come to be without you.
   Let this be your greatness, you who have ghee for food: you open up the narrow place for the pious one.
9. When they start contending over you two but violate the dear ordinances ordained by you, Mitra and Varuṇa, they, not attending upon the sacrifice, are neither gods, despite their vaunting, nor mortals, but like children who do not swell [=grow/thrive].
10. When the praisers distribute their speech and some recite the formal invocations, paying them heed, after that we will speak to you pronouncements that come true: "No one (will violate your ordinances). You set in their places (the peoples) along with the gods by your greatness."
11. In just this way, in the charge of you two and of your shelter, (we seek) of you, Mitra and Varuṇa, (giving) that is not stunted, when the cows [=milk mixture] will bound after the straight-flying one [=soma], when they will yoke the bold bull [=soma] in battle-lust.

VI.68 (509) Indra and Varuṇa

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
11 verses: triṣṭubh, except jagatī 9–10

The theme of ritual reciprocity dominates here, with praise of the two dedicands fairly spare, whether individual or joint. The message is simple: the piously performed sacrifice that we offer to the two gods should be generously rewarded with wealth.

The sacrifice is announced in the first verse, as an enticement to bring the two gods here. The praise, such as it is, comes in the next three verses, a series of superlatives characterizing them both in verse 2, a contrastive glance at their respective functions in the second half of verse 3, and an assertion that the two are preeminent even among the other gods in verse 4. (Verse 4 is also noteworthy for the gendered description of the gods; female deities are not usually given recognition when the gods in general are mentioned.)

Wealth is the target of the middle verses (5–8), wealth for priests and patrons alike. The word rayí "wealth" is prominent in all four verses.

The final verses (9–11) depict the here-and-now of the sacrifice, happening in real time, as it were, signaled by an occurrence of a form of the annunciatory near-deictic pronoun ("here is/this here") in each verse (ayám 9c, imám 10a, idám 11c). The gods are present at our sacrifice and urged to drink the soma formally announced to them.

1. The sacrifice has been raised up in concert with obedience, for the man who has twisted the ritual grass to perform sacrifice to you two, as Manu (did)—
   (the sacrifice) that will turn Indra and Varuṇa here today for great refreshment and for great favor.
2. For you two are the most glorious among the gods with your thrusting, and you two are the mightiest of mighty warriors, the most bountiful of bountiful benefactors, powerfully forceful, fully armed, overcoming obstacles by truth.
3. By reason of their favors, sing to Indra and Varuṇa, who take delight, with forceful, reverential (songs).
   The one smites Vr̥tra with his might and mace; the other as inspired poet attends upon the (ritual) enclosures.
4. When all the gods, both ladies and men, grow strong, (their praises) sung for their own sake by (our) men, you stand out from them by your greatness, o Indra and Varuṇa, (and also you two) wide ones, o Heaven and Earth.
5. Just he acquires good gifts and good help and possesses the truth who ritually serves you, o Indra and Varuṇa, in his own person.
   With refreshment he, possessing gifts, could overcome hostilities; he will gain wealth and wealthy peoples.
6. The wealth that you two provide to the man who performs pious ceremonies—wealth consisting of goods and much livestock—may that abide in us, o Indra and Varuṇa—(the wealth) that shatters the taunts of the rapacious ones.
7. And, o Indra and Varuṇa, for our patrons may there be wealth offering good protection, with gods as its herdsmen—

(our patrons) whose impetuous force, victorious in battles, surpassingly extends their éclat all at once.

8. Now, Indra and Varuṇa, as you are being sung, replenish our wealth for the excellence of our fame, o gods.
   In just this way singing the force of the great one, might we cross over difficulties, as if over waters by boat.
9. Now chant forth at length your own dear thought to the lofty sovereign king, to the god Varuṇa.
   Here is the one of great commandments who radiates through the two wide (worlds) with his greatness and by his resolve, like unaging (fire) with its flame.
10. O Indra and Varuṇa, soma-drinkers—drink this exhilarating pressed soma here, o you of steadfast commandments.
    Your chariot drives to the ceremony for attracting the gods, (as if) to good pasture to drink.
11. O Indra and Varuṇa, you bulls—drench yourselves in the most honeyed, bullish soma.
    This stalk has been poured all around for you here among us. Having sat down on this ritual grass, bring yourselves to exhilaration.

VI.69 (510) Indra and Viṣṇu

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
8 verses: triṣṭubh

The focus of most of this hymn is entirely ritual, with the two divine recipients of the hymn treated as a unit. The gods are repeatedly urged to come together to the sacrifice, to enjoy the various forms of praise, and to drink the soma—as well as to give us wealth in return. Only one verse (4) is devoted to the gods' deeds, with the "wide striding" that is Viṣṇu's best-known exploit attributed to both of them. Their unity is reinforced by the grammar. Every verse in this hymn contains a vocative address to the two gods, always in a dvandva compound, except for the final verse (8).

In that verse, the two gods are grammatically separated though still addressed in the vocative, and this grammatical change marks a sharp change in conception as well. Though it is emphasized in the first half of the verse that both have conquered and not been conquered, in the second half it is said that they contended with each other, but in the end divided the stake of a thousand (cows?) in thirds, with each taking a part. As Geldner points out, this dispute between Indra and Viṣṇu is referred to a number of times in early Vedic prose and later, and according to the Taittirīya Saṃhitā (VII.1.5.5) Indra received two thirds of the stake, Viṣṇu one third. The hymn thus springs a surprise at its end, by this glancing allusion to strife between the two gods who were depicted throughout the rest of the hymn as an indissoluble pair.

The language and style of most of the hymn are unremarkable and somewhat repetitive. Noteworthy are verses 2 and 3, with parallel structures in their second halves, deploying parallel puns on day (the sun's rays) and night, homonymous with words referring to verbal productions at the sacrifice.

1. With ritual action and with refreshment I propel both of you together, o Indra and Viṣṇu, to the far shore of this labor.
   Enjoy the sacrifice and confer wealth, causing us to cross on paths free of harm.
2. O Indra and Viṣṇu, who are the begetters of all thoughts, the two tubs holding soma—let the hymns as they are being recited help you forward, forward the praises as they are being sung in the form of chants [/along with the rays (of the sun)].
3. O Indra and Viṣṇu, exhilaration-lords of the exhilarating drinks, drive here to the soma, while conferring wealth.
   Let the praises as they are being recited in solemn words anoint both of you together with the ointments of thoughts [/through the nights].
4. Let your horses, vanquishing hostility, sharers in exhilaration, convey you two here, o Indra and Viṣṇu.
   Enjoy all the invocations of our thoughts. Harken to my sacred formulations, my hymns.
5. O Indra and Viṣṇu, this (deed) of yours is worthy of admiration: in the exhilaration of soma you two strode widely;
   you made the midspace wider; you spread out the realms for us to live.
6. O Indra and Viṣṇu, you who eat first, you on whom the oblation is bestowed with reverence—having grown strong through the oblation, confer wealth on us, o you whose drink is ghee. You two are the sea, the tub holding soma.
7. O Indra and Viṣṇu, drink of this honey, of the soma, o wondrous ones. Fill your belly.
   The exhilarating stalks have come to you. Harken to my sacred formulations, my call.
8. You both have conquered; you are not conquered. Neither one of these two has been conquered.
   O Viṣṇu and you Indra, when you two were contending, you broke apart the thousand in three parts.

VI.70 (511) Heaven and Earth

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
6 verses: jagatī

This celebration of Heaven and Earth associates them with all sorts of beneficial liquids. The first word in the hymn is "ghee," and in the rest of that verse we find milk, honey, and semen, all of which recur in the hymn: note especially the parallel verses 4 and 5 devoted to ghee and honey respectively. Besides these liquid endowments, the physical qualities of the two divinities are barely mentioned; it is instead their status as objects of worship and praise at the sacrifice and their ability to grant rewards to us that preoccupy the poet.

1. The two rich in ghee, excelling in glory over the creatures, wide and broad, milking out honey, well-ornamented—
   Heaven and Earth were propped apart according to the foundation of Varuṇa, the two unaging ones possessing abundant semen.
2. Never drying up, with abundant streams, rich in milk, they milk out ghee for the good performer (of rituals), the two of pure commandments.
   Ruling over this creation, you two World-Halves, for us pour the semen, as was established by Manu.
3. The mortal who, to stride straight, ritually serves you two—you World-Halves, you two Holy Places—that one reaches his goal.
   He is propagated through his progeny forth from your foundation. Those (creatures) that are poured out from you, (though) of diverse forms, have the same commandments.
4. Heaven and Earth, covered over with ghee, glorious with ghee, mixing with ghee, strong through ghee, wide and broad, set in front at the choosing of the Hotar—just these two do the inspired poets reverently invoke, to seek their favor.
5. Let Heaven and Earth trickle honey on us, the two dripping with honey, milking out honey, having honeyed commandments, through their divinity establishing sacrifice for themselves, and material wealth, great fame, the prize of victory, and an abundance of heroes for us.
6. Nourishment let both Heaven and Earth swell for us—father and mother, all-knowing, of wondrous power.
   Jointly bestowing, let the two World-Halves, beneficial for all, jointly impel gain, the prize of victory, and wealth to us.

VI.71 (512) Savitar

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
6 verses: jagatī 1–3, triṣṭubh 4–6

The two halves of this hymn (vss. 1–3, 4–6) are distinguished by meter, and in fact they appear to have been originally two hymns, which pattern together in vocabulary and themes. Geldner suggests that the first is a morning hymn, the second an evening hymn.

The parallelism is especially clear at the beginning: the first verses of each (1, 4) begin identically: "Up this god Savitar…" (úd u ṣyá deváḥ savitā́…) and follow with a mention of his golden arms/hands. The second verses (2, 5) are each appropriate for the time of day they represent: in the morning hymn (vs. 2) Savitar impels the creatures forth to their daily activities, while in the evening hymn (vs. 5) he brings them to rest. The third verses (3, 6) make the expected pleas for help and benefit from the god.

1. Up has this god Savitar raised his two golden arms for impelling, the very resolute one.
   He sprinkles his hands with ghee, the young battler of good skill, in his spreading apart of the dusky realm.
2. May we be (there) at the best impulsion of the god Savitar and for his giving of goods—you [=Savitar] who are (busy) at bringing to rest and at impelling forth the whole two-footed and four-footed creation.
3. With your kindly, undeceivable protectors, o Savitar, today protect our household all around.
   You of golden tongue, guard us for our ever newer welfare; let none who curse hold sway over us.

4. Up has this god Savitar stood—the golden-handed friend of the house—facing evening [=toward the west].
   Copper-jawed, deserving the sacrifice, possessing a gladdening tongue, he impels here to the pious man much of value.
5. And up has Savitar raised his golden arms with their lovely fronts like the Upavaktar priest.
   He has mounted the heights of heaven, of earth; he has brought to rest whatever is flying, even the formless [=wind].
6. A thing of value today, o Savitar, and one of value tomorrow—day after day impel to us a thing of value, for, o god, *you have control over much of value. Through this poetic insight may we be partakers of the valuables.

VI.72 (513) Indra and Soma

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
5 verses: triṣṭubh

Each verse in this brief hymn begins with a vocative addressing the two recipients of the hymn, joined in a dual dvandva compound. Each of the verses recounts one or more of Indra's cosmogonic deeds or his beneficial acts for mankind, here ascribed equally to both gods. Since Indra needs to drink soma in order to accomplish his feats, this sharing of credit is not surprising. Some of the acts are expressed in the past tense, some in the present, even those that belong to the mythical past like the smashing of the serpent (vs. 3). The language is straightforward, even in the expression of the familiar paradox in verse 4 of the cooked milk found in the raw cows.

1. Indra and Soma, great is this greatness of you two. You did the first great things:
   you found the sun; you found the sunlight; you smashed away all the shades of darkness—and the scorners.
2. Indra and Soma, you make the dawn shine; you lead the sun upward with its light.
   You propped up the heaven with a prop; you spread out Mother Earth.
3. Indra and Soma, you smash the serpent surrounding the waters—Vṛtra. Heaven gave consent to you.
   You roused forth the floods of the rivers; you filled the many (floods) of the sea.
4. Indra and Soma, you deposited the cooked (milk) within the raw (cows), just in the udders of the cows.
   You held the gleaming (milk), (though) it was not tied on, within the dappled, moving (cows).
5. Indra and Soma, it is you, certainly, who bestowed surpassing (wealth), bringing descendants in its train, worthy of fame.
   You made unbridled force, manly and victorious in battle, as cloak for the settled domains, you strong ones.

VI.73 (514) Bṛhaspati

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
3 verses: triṣṭubh

In this brief hymn Bṛhaspati is credited with many of Indra's exploits and is described with Indraic vocabulary. It is only in the very last word of the hymn "with his chants" (arkaíḥ) that the particular character of Bṛhaspati and his particular role in the opening of the Vala cave, that of singer and formulator, are referred to.

1. He who is splitter of the stone, first born, possessed of truth—Bṛhaspati Āṅgirasa, possessing the oblation—(*filling) the doubly exalted earth, sitting in front of the heated pot, our father the bull keeps bellowing to the two world-halves.
2. Bṛhaspati, who even for such a man (as me) has made wide space at the invocation to the gods, smashing obstacles, he keeps splitting apart the strongholds, conquering rivals, overcoming enemies in battles.
3. Bṛhaspati entirely conquered goods; this god conquered the great enclosures full of cattle.
   When he sets out to win the waters and the sun, Bṛhaspati is unopposable. He smites the foe with his chants.

VI.74 (515) Soma and Rudra

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
4 verses: triṣṭubh

Although there is another Ṛgvedic hymn dedicated to Rudra and Soma (I.43), in that hymn they are invoked and described in separate verses; this hymn is the only place in which the two gods are invoked jointly, in a dual dvandva compound that appears in every verse and is found only in this hymn. Indeed, the gods have little in common, and the elements in this hymn that are not generic to divinity in general are applicable only to Rudra—in particular, the plea to destroy disease (vs. 2) and give healing remedies (vs. 3). The adjective "very kindly" (suśévau) in verse 4 is etymologically related to and anticipates the epithet śíva "kindly," which later characterizes Rudra (already ṚV X.92.9) and ultimately replaces his name.

1. O Soma and Rudra, uphold your lordly power; let our desires [/sacrifices] reach you fittingly.
   Depositing seven treasures in every house, be weal for our two-footed, weal for our four-footed.
2. O Soma and Rudra, tear out, tear to pieces the disease that has entered our household.
   Drive calamity into the distance far away. For us let there be auspicious things bringing good fame.
3. O Soma and Rudra, place all these healing remedies on us, in our bodies.
   Unhitch, release the outrage committed (by us,) which is bound onto our bodies—(release it) from us.
4. You two with sharp weapons, with sharp missiles, very kindly—o Soma and Rudra, be merciful to us here.
   Release us from the noose of Varuṇa; protect us, showing your benevolence.

VI.75 (516) Weapons

Pāyu Bhāradvāja
19 verses: triṣṭubh, except jagatī 6, 10; anuṣṭubh 12–13, 15–16, 19

This supplemental hymn attached to the end of the maṇḍala is one of the most memorable and delightful in the R̥gveda. It praises the weapons of battle and their parts, and it is structured as a list of riddles. Each weapon receives one verse; sometimes the weapon is named at the beginning of the verse (as in vs. 2), but more often it is found only toward the end, preceded by a riddling definition. Particularly striking are the verses in which the subject is described as a seductive woman or tender mother (vss. 3–4), a characterization that contrasts sharply with the violence of battle. (Weapons so described are feminine in grammatical gender.) In the following translation the weapon that is the answer to the riddle is italicized.

The hymn is more or less metrically unified for the first ten verses, and verse 10 reads like a hymn-final verse, breaking the riddle pattern to beg a collection of gods and ancestors for protection. The rest of the hymn alternates trimeter and dimeter meter, and although the riddling verses continue (vss. 11, 13–15), there is also direct address to the weapons themselves and prayers to various gods for protection. The more various character of this second part of the hymn has led some scholars to consider it an even later addition, although this does not seem a necessary conclusion. The final verse (19) calls down destruction on every type of enemy and affirms the primacy of the protective sacred formulation—as "inner armor," thus paired with the outer armor (the same word várman) found in the first verse of the hymn. Thus, whether secondarily or not, the hymn has a faint ring structure.

1. His mien is like that of a thundercloud, when he drives armored into the lap of battles.
   With an unpierceable body, conquer! Let the greatness of your armor carry you through.
2. With the bow may we win cattle, with the bow the contest, with the bow may we win the sharp battles.
   The bow banishes the (battle-)lust of our rival. With the bow may we win all the quarters.
3. Just like (a woman) about to speak, she keeps going up to his ear, while embracing her dear partner.
   Like a maiden (with her anklets?), she jangles when stretched out on the bow: this bowstring here that makes (the arrow) cross over into the melee (as if to a [festive] gathering).
4. The two faring forth to the melees, like a maiden to (festive) gatherings—let them carry (the arrow) as a mother does a child in her lap.
   Let them pierce our rivals when the two find each other: these bow-ends here when they spring apart (against) the enemies.

5. Father of many (daughters [=arrows]), he (also) has many a son; he makes a clattering when he descends into the melees.
   The quiver, tied onto the back, wins clashes and battles—all of them—when it is thrust into action.
6. Standing on the chariot, he leads the prizewinners [=horses] forward wherever he desires: the good charioteer.
   Admire the greatness of the reins. The cords guide, following the (charioteer's) mind (though it is) behind them.
7. They make their sharp cries—the bullish-hooved horses along with the chariots, as they seek the prize, trampling down the enemies with their forefeet, they destroy our rivals, without (even) divesting (them of their armor).
8. The chariot-stand, "Oblation(-deposit)" its name, where his weapon, his armor is deposited—there may we reverently approach the powerful chariot always when we seek its benevolence.
9. The forefathers: assembling for the sweet (soma), conferring vigor, they who are props in distress, skillful, deep, with glittering weapons, arrow-strong, not shirking, entirely heroic, broad, overwhelming the troops.
10. O Brahmins, forefathers, deserving of soma, let Heaven and Earth, blameless ones, (be) kindly to us;
    let Pūṣan protect us from difficult passage, you who are strong through truth. Guard (us): let none who curse hold sway over us.

11. She wears the fine-feathered (eagle); a wild deer is her tooth. Lashed together with cows, she flies when propelled forth.
    Where men clash and separate, there will our arrows provide shelter for us.
12. You (arrow, though) of straight course, avoid us. Let our body become a rock.
    Let Soma speak on our behalf; let Aditi provide us shelter.
13. It smashes hard on their back, keeps beating at their haunches—o horsewhip, impel the cautious horses into battles.
14. Like a snake with its coils, it encircles the arm, parrying the blow of the bowstring—the handguard, knowing all the trajectories (of the bowstring): as a male let it protect the male all around.
15. She who is smeared with poison, with the head of a deer, but whose mouth is metal:
    here is lofty reverence to her who has (received) the semen of Thunder, to the goddess Arrow.

16. Once released, fly away, you arrow, sharpened by a sacred formulation.
    Go to the enemies; fall on them. Do not leave a single one of them standing.
17. Where the darts fly together, like lads with unruly hair, there let Brahmaṇaspati, let Aditi provide us shelter—always provide shelter.
18. Your vulnerable places I cover with armor; let Soma the king clothe you with immortality.
    Let Varuṇa make (a space) wider than wide for you; let the gods cheer you on as you win.
19. Whoever wishes to smite us—one of our own or a foreigner, or even one outside the pale—him let all the gods injure. The sacred formulation is my inner armor.

Maṇḍala VII

Maṇḍala VII is unusual because in this, the longest of the Family Books, almost all the hymns are attributed to just one poet, Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi, Vasiṣṭha the son of Mitra and Varuṇa. According to the Anukramaṇī two hymns were composed either by Vasiṣṭha or by Kumāra Āgneya (101, 102), and two hymns were joint compositions of Vasiṣṭha and his sons (32, 33). In 32, however, it assigns one pāda, or at most one and a half verses, to Śakti Vāsiṣṭha, and the rest of the hymn is by his father. The Anukramaṇī unequivocally attributes all the other one hundred hymns of the maṇḍala to Vasiṣṭha alone.

This attribution of all these hymns to a single poet is historically unlikely. Perhaps many of the poems were composed by Vasiṣṭha, but unlike the other family poets, the Vasiṣṭha poets apparently developed a tradition of crediting their work to their illustrious ancestor. Because of this focus on him, Vasiṣṭha emerges as a distinct literary figure in the maṇḍala. He is mentioned—or mentions himself—twenty-four times in VII, and he appears as a model ritualist also in hymns from later maṇḍalas, for example, X.150.5, X.181.1, both attributed to his descendants, and X.65.15. Not only is he a distinct figure in the Ṛgveda, he also has a distinct literary personality. For the construction of a poetic persona, see Jamison (2007: esp. chap. 1, and the following chapters) for a discussion of Vasiṣṭha.

Maṇḍala VII also has a distinctive distribution of hymns. It includes nine hymns dedicated, either wholly or in part, to the Ādityas or to Mitra and Varuṇa, four hymns to Indra and Varuṇa, and four hymns to Varuṇa alone. The significant role that the Ādityas and particularly Varuṇa play in VII perhaps reflects a family connection to these gods, which also figures in the tradition that Vasiṣṭha was the son of Mitra and Varuṇa. The personality of Vasiṣṭha is defined most strongly in the four hymns to Varuṇa (VII.86–89). They describe an intimate relationship between the poet and the god, in which the poet fears the god's displeasure but hopes for his mercy and his guidance, while recalling their previous friendship.

The maṇḍala also contains the Ṛgveda's longest continuous series of hymns to the Aśvins (67–74) and to Dawn (75–81), although the hymns of neither collection show the originality of the Varuṇa hymns. There are a number of noteworthy individual hymns. Among the most significant is VII.18, depicting the so-called Battle of the Ten Kings, which may reflect actual events, although with what accuracy it is hard to say. In distinctly triumphalist language, it tells how King Sudās and the Bharatas were victorious over an alliance of ten kings ranged against him. This battle may have been historically important if it marked the dominance of the Bharatas over other Vedic tribes and significant movement toward a political consolidation of the Vedic peoples. Closely connected with VII.18 is VII.33, attributed partly to Vasiṣṭha himself and partly to his sons. The hymn affirms the role of Vasiṣṭha in securing Indra's critical help in Sudās's victory over the ten kings and concludes with his sons' story of the birth of Vasiṣṭha. Another quite remarkable hymn, although in a very different vein, is VII.103, the Frog Hymn, in which the poet compares the action and croaking of frogs to the ritual acts and recitations of priests. The hymn was likely composed for the beginning of the rainy season and with the purpose of spurring the fertility appropriate to the season. Equally unusual and delightful is the sleep charm (VII.55).

The Vasiṣṭha clan refrain, "Do you protect us always with your blessings," occupies the final pāda of most of the triṣṭubh hymns in this maṇḍala.

VII.1 (517) Agni

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
25 verses: virāj 1–18, triṣṭubh 19–25

This hymn contains a double ending. The first is at verse 20, which concludes with the signature pāda of the Vasiṣṭhas in 20d and which is marked by a shift to triṣṭubh meter in verses 19–20. The hymn continues in triṣṭubh to verse 25, which repeats verse 20. Oldenberg suggests that there is a deliberate attempt to make this hymn parallel to VII.34, the first of the hymns to All Gods, which also has twenty-five verses. The two parts of the hymn, verses 1–20 and 21–25, are thematically similar since both are concerned with the life and lineage of the householder, although the second part places particular emphasis on Agni as the sacrificial fire and the blessings that he can bring.

The hymn describes the kindling of Agni in the house so that the household fire will guard its prosperity and help it flourish. Agni will be the leader of the household (vs. 3) and the fire of the sacrifice (vs. 16). In particular, the householder desires sons and other males in his extended family, who will bring prosperity to the home and guarantee the householder's continued lineage. These are the vīrā́ḥ "men, heroes" (vss. 5, 11, 15, 19, 24), an abundance of whom the poet desires and the lack of whom he fears (19). The poet also mentions the náraḥ "men" or "fine men" (vss. 1, 4, 9, 10, 11), who in the first three of these verses are described as ritually serving Agni. That function is typical of náraḥ, who elsewhere in the R̥gveda are often priests. Here the vīrā́ḥ and náraḥ do not appear to be different people, however, since they are described in similar terms. So the náraḥ in 4c and the vīrā́ḥ in 15c are both "well born," and the poet asks that the householder never suffer from the lack of either (11a and 19a).

The poet repeats the word nítya in reference to Agni as "our own" or "their own" (vss. 2, 12) and to "his own" offerings (vs. 17) and "our own" lineage (vs. 21). He also repeats svá, which has a similar sense, with reference to "our own" devotion (vs. 6) and the householder's "own" kin (vs. 12). Through their repetition and meaning, the two words form a nexus between Agni and the householder, which connects the kindling and tending of the fire to the longevity of the householder's family. Likewise in verse 17, as Geldner notes, the circumambulation of the Hotar with the fire around the fire-place is described as the procession of a bride and groom around the fire at a wedding. The imagery of the wedding affirms that Agni is now a member of the family of the householder.

More generally, the poet creates a close connection between Agni and humans by allowing either one to be the subject of verse 23cd and either one to be the object. That is, either the god Agni allows the priest to obtain goods from the gods and the patronage of a sacrificer, or the priest makes it possible for Agni to obtain goods for mortals and to become accessible to the patrons of the sacrifice.

1. Our men gave birth to Agni in the two fire-churning sticks, by their insights and the motion of their hands—to him who is proclaimed, to the flaming houselord, visible far away.
2. To give help anywhere, the good (gods) installed in the home Agni, beautiful to look upon, the one to be skillfully tended, who was in the house as their own.
3. When you are kindled forth, Agni, shine in front for us with your inexhaustible shaft of light, o youngest one.
   Prizes of victory ever go toward you.
4. Your brilliant fires blaze forth, abounding in good men, better than (others') fires, here where our well-born men sit together.
5. Through insight, Agni, give us wealth abounding in good men and, o capable one, a good lineage that is proclaimed and that the invading sorcerer does not overcome.
6. The very skillful one toward whom the young, oblation-bearing girl [=the ladle], filled with ghee, goes in the evening and at dawn, toward him (goes) our own devotion, seeking goods.
7. Agni, burn away all hostile powers with the heat by which you burned Jarūtha.
   Make sickness disappear without a sound.
8. O best Agni—flaming, shining, pure—he who will kindle your face here—also because of these praise songs (of his) you should be here for us.

9. Our ancestral, mortal men, who shared among themselves your face many times, o Agni—also because of these you should be favorable here to us.
10. Let these men, champions at the smashing of obstacles, prevail over all ungodly wiles—they who marvel at my insight that is proclaimed.
11. Agni, let us not sit in the absence of men, nor (let us sit) around you without posterity because of a lack of heroes [=sons] amid (other) houses filled with offspring, o you belonging to the house—
12. (Let Agni approach) our dwelling, which the horseman [=Agni] approaches as his own to sacrifice, (a dwelling) filled with offspring and endowed with a good lineage, having increased by our own kin's posterity.
13. Protect us, Agni, from the detestable demon. Protect us from the crookedness of the ungenerous and malicious one.
With you as my yokemate, I would prevail over those doing battle (with me).
14. Let this very Agni be superior to other fires, here where there gather a prizewinning horse, a strong-handed lineage, and the syllable [/the inexhaustible cow] with a thousand cattle-shelters.
15. This very Agni, who protects against the rapacious ones, should free his kindler from constriction.
Well-born men circle around him.
16. Here is that Agni, receiving poured oblations in many places, whom the master kindles, bringing the offering, and whom the Hotar goes around at the rites.
17. In you, Agni, as masters we would pour many oblations that are your own, as we make the twin bridal processions at the sacrificial meal.
18. And, Agni, these oblations are most sought: unwearying, convey them to the divine assembly.
Let them [=the gods] seek these, our sweet-scented (oblations).
19. Agni, do not hand us over to a lack of men. To neglect with its shabby dress—do not hand us over to this.
Do not (hand) us (over) to hunger nor to the demon, o you who possess the truth. Do not be angry at us in our house or in the forest.
20. Now direct my formulations upward, Agni. O god, you will sweeten them for our generous (patrons).
We on both sides [=priests and patrons] would be in your generosity.
– Do you protect us always with your blessings.
21. O Agni, you are of easy summons and joy-bringing appearance. Be brilliant with good brilliance, o son of strength.

In company with you, let there be no falling short for our own lineage.
Let not the manly hero fade away among us.

22. Do not declare that we maintain them badly, Agni, since these fires are kindled by the gods.
Let not bad thoughts from you, a god, reach us, not even because of our confusion, o son of strength.
23. That mortal is rich, o Agni of beautiful face, who pours the oblation in the immortal one.
He [=Agni or the mortal] establishes him [=the mortal or Agni] as one who gains goods among the gods, the one to whom the inquiring patron goes, seeking his ends.
24. Since you know of the great, easy passage, Agni, convey here to our patrons lofty wealth, by which, o powerful one, we would rejoice as those undiminished in lifetime and having abundant good heroes.
25. Now direct my formulations upward, Agni. O god, you will sweeten them for our generous (patrons).
We on both sides would be in your generosity. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.2 (518) Āprī

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
11 verses: triṣṭubh

This Āprī hymn offers several original images and turns of phrase, even as it follows the prescribed sequence of invocations. In verse 2cd the gods who sweeten the offerings are probably the assembly of the deities and divine objects who are invoked in the hymn. Two similes complicate the second half of verse 5. The priests open the doors so that the chariot, probably the sacrifice itself, can pass into the realm of the gods. In 5cd with their oblations of ghee the priests anoint the many doors that lead to the gods. In pāda c the doors are compared to cows licking a calf. We have suggested that the "divine chariot," the sacrifice, corresponds to the calf and that the ghee-offerings at the Prayājas, the "fore-offerings," are the "licks." It is not entirely clear why the doors are compared to unmarried girls in pāda d. The ritual situation to which the verse refers, however, is explained by I.124.8, which describes anointed brides-to-be who about to choose a husband (vrā́) at the assemblies (sámana) that include prospective grooms. The two similes are united by the representation of the dúraḥ, which are grammatically feminine, as females: mothers and brides. And finally, rather unusually, verse 7 identifies the two divine Hotars, who are not actually named, each as Agni Jātavedas. The phrasing suggests that this verse may be a reversal of V.9.1–2. In V.9.1c the poet says mánye tvā jātávedasam "I think you [=Agni] to be Jātavedas," and then in 2a, he calls Agni a Hotar. Alternatively, the form jātávedasā could be an elliptical dual, as Geldner suggests, in which one of the pair is Agni Jātavedas and the other the "inspired praise poet."

The conclusion of the hymn, verses 8–11, is identical to III.4.8–11, so either the Viśvāmitra Āprī hymn has borrowed from this Vasiṣṭha hymn or vice versa. Presumably the first part of the hymn was enough to make each of the two hymns sufficiently unique to its gotra.

1. Today find pleasure in our kindling wood, Agni. Blaze aloft, sending up the smoke of the sacrifice.
   Touch the back of heaven with your tufts of hair; you will extend together with the rays of the sun.
2. With our sacrifices we will praise the greatness of Narāśaṃsa, worthy of the sacrifice, among these, the bright gods of strong resolve, the ones granting insight, who sweeten both offerings [=oblations and words].
3. The very skillful lord to be invoked, the truth-speaking messenger between the two world-halves, Agni kindled by Manu—him would we like Manu ever exalt for you for the sake of the rite.
4. Ritually serving, carrying it in a crouch, they spread ritual grass at the fire with reverence.
   Pouring (ghee) on it, o Adhvaryus, groom the ghee-backed, dappled (ritual grass) with the oblation.
5. Serving the gods, very attentive, they have laid the doors that seek the (divine) chariot open to the gods' realm.
   They jointly anoint like unwed girls in (marriage) assemblies the many double (doors) that lick (the chariot) like two mother cows a calf.
6. And the two great, heavenly young women, Dawn and Night, like a milk-cow that gives good milk, the two generous ones sitting on the ritual grass, summoned by many, worthy of the sacrifice—let them rest here for our safe passage.
7. I think you two inspired praise poets [=divine Hotars] at the sacrifices of the sons of Manu are both Jātavedas and are to perform the sacrifice.
   Raise up our rite at our calls. You will win desirable rewards (for us) among the gods.
8. Bhāratī along with the Bhāratīs, Iḷā along with the gods, Agni along with the sons of Manu, and Sarasvatī along with the Sārasvatas are near: let the three goddesses sit here on the ritual grass.
9. O god Tvaṣṭar, unbind for us this flow of semen and what prospers, granting (that) from which a hero is born, fit for action and very skilled, who yokes up the pressing stones and desires the gods.

10. O Lord of the Forest, send it [=the sacrificial animal] to the gods. Agni, the Śamitar-priest, will sweeten the offering.
   And it is he, the more real Hotar [=Agni], who will offer sacrifice, since he knows the births of the gods.
11. Journey near here, o Agni, as you are kindled, on the same chariot with Indra and the swift gods.
   Let Aditi of good sons sit on our ritual grass. Svāhā! Let the immortal gods rejoice!

VII.3 (519) Agni

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
10 verses: triṣṭubh

Verses 1cd and 9cd share a similar structure with an opening relative clause and concluding pāvakáḥ "pure" and thereby define the hymn. The last verse, which contains the poet's requests for blessings concluding with the usual Vasiṣṭha signature line, thus stands outside of hymn's principal development.

The hymn describes the emergence of fire from the friction sticks that give birth to it. Agni breaks free of these fire-churning sticks as he is fanned into flame (vs. 2). He then appears as a new-born, who never grows old (vs. 3). His flames rapidly advance over the wood (vs. 4), and then, in the middle verse of this principal section, he becomes the recipient of offerings (vs. 5). The descriptions of the fire after that point reflect its intensification through the offerings covered with ghee (vss. 6–7). The "strongholds" in verse 7 and in verse 8 (if this is how the ellipsis in that verse is to be completed) refer to Agni's now brightly shining flames. Their brilliance cuts through space, protecting the sacrificer and opening a way for the songs to reach the gods.

The hymn is notable especially for its skillful use of simile, especially in the first half of the hymn. The poet compares Agni to a horse (vs. 2), a weapon (vs. 4), a stallion (vs. 5), and a jewel (vs. 6), and he calls Agni a bull (vs. 3). In each case the same verb describes the action of the fire and of the object to which it is compared. So, for example, in verse 2 Agni and the horse both "snort" and both "stand free"—Agni of the fire-churning wood and the horse of its corral. In verse 5 the fire and a stallion are both "groomed," and in verse 6 both fire and a jewel "glow." In 4d we may have an exception to this pattern. In this case, the verb is vivekṣi which should be from √viṣ "toil at," and we reflect that analysis in our translation. But there is a pun, for vivekṣi can formally be derived from √vic "sift," an action that would apply to the barley in the simile. That is to say, whereas the same action applies to the simile and the frame in the previous examples, here the same verb form but not in the same meaning applies to the wood and the barley.

1. Make the god Agni along with the fires your best sacrificing messenger in the rite—he who is firmly established among mortals and possessing the truth, the pure one with burning head, with ghee as his food.
2. He has snorted like a hungry horse in his pasture, when he has stood free of his great enclosure.
   Then the wind fans his flame, and as always your track is black.
3. You the new-born bull, o Agni, whose ageless (flames), being kindled, climb upward—your ruddy smoke goes toward heaven, for as our messenger, o Agni, you speed to the gods.
4. You whose leading edge has spread out upon the earth when it has hungrily encircled its food with its jaws—your advance comes like a loosed weapon; wondrous one, you work over (the wood) like barley with your tongue.
5. In the evening and at dawn our men groom just that very young Agni like a stallion, sharpening their guest in his womb. His flame shines when the bull is offered oblations.
6. Your visage is lovely to see, o you of lovely face, when, like a jewel, you glow nearby.
   Your outburst comes like heaven's thunder. Like the shimmering sun, show your radiant beam.
7. In order that with our svāhā-call we would serve Agni for you all with libations and ghee-drenched oblations, protect us, Agni, by these immeasurable powers (of yours) and by your hundred metal strongholds.
8. Your unassailable (strongholds)—either those which are for your servant or those by which you will make a wide path for our manly songs—by these, son of strength, protect us altogether, both patrons and singers, o Jātavedas.
9. When, gleaming like a (heat-)purified axe, he has come out, glowing in his own form, in his own body—who, eagerly sought, has been born in his two mothers [=the friction sticks], the pure one strongly resolved to sacrifice to the gods—
10. Shine on us these things that bring good fortune, Agni. We would acquire a resolve based on good perception.
    Let all these things be for the praise singers and the chanter. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.4 (520) Agni

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
10 verses: triṣṭubh

According to Geldner, this hymn expresses the wish for a son or for a replacement for a lost son. This is a wish found already in VII.1, but it is even more strongly articulated here. The best evidence for this interpretation is verses 7–8, which describe the importance of a son of one's own. Nonetheless, in our view, the subject of this hymn is more likely Agni than a son, and its concern is with a fire that has not come or is just coming to birth. The poet wants a fire of his own, which will bring wealth to him and preserve his life. To be sure, the hymn does contain an implicit analogy between Agni and a son, who likewise brings wealth and preserves the family.

One of the features of this hymn is the repetition of a word or of related words in successive lines or verses: jagr̥bhré (3b) and gŕ̥bham (3c); uvóca (3c) and durókam (3d); agnír amŕ̥taḥ (4b), agnír amŕ̥tān (5b), and agnír amŕ̥tasya (6a); pári ṣadāma (6d) and pariṣádyam (7a); and áraṇasya (7a) and áraṇaḥ (8a). Other repetitions occur at a greater distance. Thus verse 8, the third from the last verse, has grábhāya (8a) and ókaḥ (8c), echoing the repetitions within verse 3. This technique does not occur in the first, introductory verse, nor in the last two verses, which are also VI.15.12 and VII.3.10 respectively and which may have been borrowed from these hymns. These verbal repetitions are a challenge to translate, particularly because in some cases the poet uses the words in different senses. So, for example, amŕ̥ta refers to the "immortal" gods in verse 5 but to "living" human beings in verse 6. In verse 6 pári √sad describes the sacrificers "sitting around" the fire, but in verse 7 it probably refers to sequestering something or keeping it separate by drawing a notional circle around it.

1. Bring forth your offering and your thought, well-purified, to the flaming ray of light, to Agni, who with wisdom goes among all races, the divine ones and those descended from Manu.
2. Let Agni be sharp-witted, though of tender age, since he has been born as his mother's youngest, who with his flaming teeth completely grips the pieces of wood. He completely eats his food all at once, even though it be abundant.
3. In the company and before the face of this god, the luminous one whom mortals have accepted as their own, who is at home with human ownership, but beyond domestication, Agni flames for Āyu.
4. Here the prescient poet has been installed among non-poets, immortal Agni among mortals.
   Do not become angry with us here, o strong one. We would ever have good thoughts in your company.

5. Who has sat here upon the womb made by the gods—for Agni has surpassed the deathless (gods) in his resolve (to sacrifice)— that all-nurturing child do plants, trees, and the land carry.
6. Because Agni is the master of what is free of death [=alive] and abundant, (because) he is the master of giving a wealth of men, lacking men, let us not (sit around) you, o strong one; lacking lifebreath or friendship, let us not sit around (you).
7. Because the legacy of an outsider is to be "sat around" [=sequestered], might we be lords of our own wealth.
   What is born of another is no posterity (for us), o Agni. Do not milk dry the paths (even) of an inconspicuous man.
8. For an outsider, (even one) of great kindness, is not to be accepted as one's own, nor is one born of another's belly to be well regarded in one's thinking.
   He returns again to his home. Let the overpowering, prizewinning horse come here to us anew.
9. You, Agni—protect (us) from the rapacious one, and you, mighty one—(protect) us from reproach.
   Let the smoke-enwrapped (oblation) come entirely to you, to the fold (of the gods); and let thousandfold desirable wealth (come) entirely.
10. Shine on us these things that bring good fortune, Agni. We would acquire a resolve based on good perception.
   Let all these things be for the praise singers and the chanter. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.5 (521) Agni Vaiśvānara

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
9 verses: triṣṭubh

The hymn invokes Agni as both the fire on earth and the sun in heaven. More specifically, Agni is a tribal fire, which here represents an aggregation of clans in the Pūru tribe (vs. 3). This hymn thus accords with VII.19.3, in which Indra also supports the Pūru tribe, but contrasts with VII.18.13, in which Indra supports Sudās, the enemy of the Pūru. As Proferes (2007: 46–49) details, it is as a tribal fire and as the sun that Agni is called Vaiśvānara, a name repeated in each of the first five verses and then again in the last two (8–9).

The hymn begins with a statement of Agni's presence in heaven and on earth, nurtured by both the gods and priests (vs. 1). In the second verse Agni is called the master of both flowing and pooling waters, a theme echoed in verse 8, the second to last verse, in which Agni is asked to send the "refreshing drink," which might be the rain for humans or the soma for the gods or both. Having descended to earth, Agni's radiance extends to the Ārya clans (vs. 2cd). In verse 3 the víśaḥ… aśiknīḥ "dark clans" are Dasyus (vs. 6), but they are not dark because they are "dark-skinned," as the description is often interpreted, but rather because they represent powers of darkness opposed to the Āryas (cf. Hock 1999). Note that the brilliance of Agni in 3cd breaks apart the "dark clans" and, as light, disperses darkness. Or likewise in verse 6 Agni drives away the Dasyus, providing a "broad light" for Āryas. As fire and sun, Agni extends his light throughout the worlds (vs. 4). In verse 5, the middle verse of the hymn, the poet concretizes Agni as the present sacrificial fire, who guards and prospers the different communities and as both the sacrificial fire and the sun, both of which appear in the early morning as beacons of the day.

1. Bring forth a song to the mighty Agni, to the spoked wheel of heaven and earth, who as Vaiśvānara has grown strong in the lap of all the immortals through the watchful (priests).
2. Sought after in heaven, Agni has been placed on earth as the leader of the rivers and the bull of standing waters.
   He radiates outward toward the clans descended from Manu: Vaiśvānara having grown strong according to his wish.
3. The dark clans went breaking ranks, leaving their supplies, from fear of you, o Vaiśvānara, when you shone, breaking their strongholds, blazing for Pūru, o Agni.
4. Heaven and earth, (each) in its three parts, follow your commandment, o Agni Vaiśvānara.
   You stretch throughout the two world-halves with your radiance, blazing with your inexhaustible blaze.
5. Resounding ghee-rich songs—bellowing tawny mares—follow you, Agni, the lord of settlements, the charioteer of riches, Vaiśvānara, the beacon of the dawns and of the days.
6. The good (gods) installed their lordship in you, for they find pleasure in your resolve, o you having Mitra's might.
   You drove the Dasyus away from their home, o Agni, giving birth to broad light for the Ārya.
7. Being born in the highest heaven, at once you protect the fold on every side like Vāyu.
   Giving birth to living beings, you cry out, doing service to their descendants, Jātavedas.
8. Send the heaven-bright refreshing drink for us, o Agni Vaiśvānara, o Jātavedas, by which you swell your bounty and broad fame for the pious mortal, o you who grant all wishes.

9. Bind wealth that brings many cattle to our generous patrons, o Agni, as well as the prize of victory worthy of fame.
   O Vaiśvānara, along with the Rudras and Vasus, offer great protection to us, o Agni.

VII.6 (522) Agni Vaiśvānara

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
7 verses: triṣṭubh

In its first verse this poem implicitly connects Agni with Varuṇa and Indra. In 1ab Agni is called a "universal king and lord" to be honored "by the settlements." This description recalls Varuṇa and his rule over settled communities. Then in the second hemistich Agni's acts are explicitly compared to the heroic deeds of Indra during war. The description of Agni as the "breaker"—if that is the meaning of dārú in 1d—is appropriate to him: in X.69.3d the poet asks of Agni sá vā́jaṃ darṣi "Break out victory's prize." But the word also anticipates puraṃdará "breaker of strongholds" in 2c, here an epithet of Agni but normally one of Indra. In 2cd the two gods, Indra and Varuṇa, are combined in Agni through the description of him as puraṃdará and through reference to his vratá "commandment," a term that is conceptually and etymologically connected to Varuṇa. But then in verse 3 Agni takes on the persona of Indra more exclusively as one who pursues the Paṇis, who are the great enemies of Indra in his destruction of the Vala cave. The reference to Agni as the one who brings the dawn in verses 4–5 is appropriate to the fire of the morning sacrifice, but it also continues the reference to the Vala story, telling of the release of the dawns. In verse 5cd Nahuṣ is the ancestor of the Nahuṣa, a tribe of whom Agni takes possession. In I.31.11 Agni is the clanlord of the Nahuṣa, but it is still not clear why they are mentioned here, although doing so does bring Agni's action down to earth and perhaps into the present. The last two verses give Agni possession of the whole earth, including the goods and peoples on it.

1. (I proclaim) the praise of the universal king and lord, of the man to be celebrated by the settlements.
   Extolling the deeds of the mighty one—I extol the breaker—I proclaim them like those of Indra.
2. They urge on the poet and beacon (of the sacrifice), the wellspring and light beam from the stone, the luck and rule of the two world-halves.
   By my songs, I seek to gain the ancient and great commandments of Agni the breaker of strongholds.
3. Down with those of no intelligence, those tying in knots, those of disdainful words: the Paṇis, not giving hospitality, not giving strength, not giving sacrifices.

Onward and onward Agni has pursued those Dasyus. The first has made the last to be without sacrifices.

4. The best of men, who by his powers has put those (Dawns) in the east, though they were finding joy in the western darkness—
   I shall sing to that Agni, master of the good, the one unable to be bent, who subdues those doing battle.
5. Who bent the ramparts by his deadly weapons, who made the Dawns to have our compatriot [=Agni] as their husband, he, the young Agni, having halted the (clans) of Nahuṣ, made (those) clans give tribute through his powers.
6. Under whose protection all the peoples approach in their separate ways, asking for his favor, Agni Vaiśvānara has sat here in the lap of the two world-halves, of his parents, according to his wish.
7. The god Vaiśvānara has taken the goods on the land for his own at the rising of the sun.
   From the lower sea and from the higher one, from heaven and from earth, Agni has taken them.

VII.7 (523) Agni

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
7 verses: triṣṭubh

The poet invokes the powerful Agni—the god who acts with strength (sahasānám) in the first verse and is summoned as the "son of strength" (sūno sahasaḥ) in the last. Within this recursive frame the poet follows the descent of Agni from the heaven onto the earth. In 1d Agni runs at "a measured pace" and is found "among the gods in his own person," that is, in the form of the burning sun. He is then invited to journey to earth (vs. 2) and to the sacrificial place as a participant in the rite (vs. 3). Still, Agni remains simultaneously earthly and heavenly. His "two mothers" or "mother and father" in 3c are Earth and Heaven, but they can also be the two fire-churning sticks, the aráṇī̆. In verse 4 Agni's birth is set squarely on earth and at the sacrifice, where he assumes his role as chief priest of the rite (vss. 4–5). Verse 6 presents an interesting problem since it is not clear who is spoken about. In our view the subject is most likely the gods, to whom the poet now returns at the end of the hymn, thus balancing the reference to them in verses 1–2. But pādas a and cd can also describe the patrons of the sacrifice and b can parenthetically refer to the priests, as Geldner suggests. This ambiguity is likely intentional, allowing a double reference to gods and humans.

1. For you I shall urge on Agni like a prizewinning horse, the very god acting with strength, by my homage:

"Become for us the knowing messenger of the rite!" Running with measured pace, he has been found among the gods in his own person.

2. Journey here along your own paths, o Agni, as the delighting one who takes pleasure in companionship with the gods;
(journey) here along the back of the earth, bellowing with outbursts, burning everything, burning the wood at will with your jaws.
3. The sacrifice is turned eastward, for the ritual grass is rightly laid. Agni is pleased, invoked like a Hotar, being summoned here to the two mothers [=Earth and Heaven] who fulfill all desires, from whom, o youngest one, you have been born as the very kind one.
4. At once the discerning descendants of Manu gave birth in the rite to the charioteer who is theirs.
As their clanlord, he has been placed in the home of the clans—he the delighting Agni of honeyed speech, possessing the truth.
5. Having come here, the chosen conveyor (of oblations) has been seated at the seat of men—Agni, the ritual formulator and distributor, whom Heaven and Earth have made strong, the one fulfilling all desires, to whom the Hotar sacrifices.
6. These surpass everything through their heavenly brilliance—the manly ones who fashioned the solemn utterance and its desirable reward, who, heeding them, extend the clans and who will reflect upon this, my truth.
7. And now we Vasiṣṭhas beseech you, the master of good things, o Agni, son of strength.
You have obtained refreshment for the singers of praise and for our generous (patrons). – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.8 (524) Agni

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
7 verses: triṣṭubh

Commenting on verse 4, Proferes (2007: 37) rightly says that this Agni, the fire of the Bharatas, is linked to the military power of the tribe, and it is he, not the king or the warriors, who is credited for the victory over the enemy tribe of the Pūrus. There are hints of the extent of Agni's power to repel the Pūrus in the repetition of ví "afar" in verses 2, 3, and 4. Likewise, the poet describes how Agni, the son of strength (vs. 7), becomes mighty (vs. 2) and makes his body strong (vs. 5). In an interesting twist, Agni's bodily strength, which is marked by his brightness, will drive human bodily illness into darkness (vs. 6).

1. Our compatriot king is kindled by our homage, upon whose face ghee is offered.
   Our men urgently summon him with oblations. Here, at the head of the dawns, Agni has been set ablaze.
2. And here has this very great one been found—the delighting Hotar, the young Agni of Manu.
   Let loose, he has spread afar his radiance upon the earth. Whose wheel-rim is black, he has grown mighty by the plants.
3. In what way, Agni, will you shine our intricate hymn afar, and what self-resolve will you put into action when you are proclaimed?
   When would we become lords and winners of hard-gained wealth that brings success, o very generous one?
4. Farther and farther is this Agni of Bharata famed when his lofty radiance gleams afar like the sun.
   He who dominated the Pūru in battles blazes as our glowing, godly guest.
5. There will surely be many offerings poured in you, and you will become benevolent in all your faces.
   Though praised, o Agni, you are (already) renowned, as you are being sung. By yourself make your own body strong, o well-born one.
6. Here is our speech: winning hundreds along with thousands, it should be born doubly lofty for Agni, so that he, the smasher of demons, will become for his praisers and his friend [=the singer] brilliant good luck that chases sickness into hiding.
7. And now we Vasiṣṭhas beseech you, the master of good things, o Agni, son of strength.
   You have obtained refreshment for the praisers and our generous (patrons). – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.9 (525) Agni

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
6 verses: triṣṭubh

The appearance of Agni as the fire of the morning sacrifice and also as the sun marks the beginning of the sacrifice, and it is he who establishes the two signs of the sacrifice: the oblations given to the gods and the wealth received in return by humans (vs. 1). The exchange between sacrificers and gods is reasserted at the end of the penultimate verse (vs. 5cd), which urges Agni to sacrifice to the gods in order that they will benefit humans. The theme of exchange is continued in verse 2a, since Agni's "strong resolve" is to sacrifice, and as a result of this resolve he opens the pens of the Paṇis and, as in the Vala story, lets loose cattle, symbols of both wealth and the dawns. In the latter part of this verse the function of Agni in promoting the exchange between gods and sacrificers is suggested by word play that turns on the ambiguity of arká, which can mean either "chant" or "flame," and of the compound purubhójas, either "bringing sustenance" or "consuming sustenance." That is, Agni purifies either the chant that creates food for humans or the flames that consume it on behalf of the gods.

In 3ab, in a different kind of word play, Agni bears the names of three gods, all of whom, like Agni, have roles in carrying out the ritual: Aditi is the embodiment of the "Guiltlessness" of one who performs the rite correctly, Vivasvant is the first sacrificer (as Geldner notes), and Mitra is the deity of the sacrificial alliance between gods and humans. The name Vivasvant may also carry its appellative significance "shining forth," which would also fit the fire. In 3cd Agni is brought into connection with two groups of goddesses, who are complicit in the birth of Agni: the Dawns, with whom he appears in the early morning, and the Waters, who give birth to Agni and place him in the "fruitful" plants, from which the fire emerges. There is a final word play in verse 6c, where puruṇīthā́ . . . jarasva can mean that, as a god, Agni should awaken to the musical modes of the ritual chants or, as a priest, should sing musical modes through the sounds of the fire. There is even battle imagery in the latter part of the hymn: in verse 4 Agni enters the "melee" and in verse 5 with Agni's help Vasiṣṭha destroys the Jarūtha, probably a demonized enemy who is part of the Vasiṣṭha family lore. In that context, puruṇīthā́ could also have a secondary reference to warriors' strategems by which wealth is won.

1. The lover of the Dawns has awakened from their lap, the delighting Hotar, the best of sage poets, the pure one.
   He sets in place the beacon for both races: the oblations among the gods and wealth among the good ritual performers.
2. He of strong resolve, who (opens) up the doors of the Paṇis as he purifies the chant that brings much sustenance for us, he, the delighting Hotar and the housemaster of the clans, has become visible, across the darkness of the nights.
3. The sage poet who is never misled—Aditi and Vivasvant, Mitra of good fellowship and our kind guest—with shimmering radiance, he radiates at the head of the Dawns. The infant of the Waters has entered the fruitful ones.
4. The one to be invoked by you among the generations of Manu, entering the melee, Jātavedas blazed.
   He who radiates forth with a radiance beautiful to see—cows awaken in response to him as he is kindled.
5. O Agni, travel on your mission toward the gods—intend us no harm!—
   along with the band that creates poetic formulations.

Sacrifice to Sarasvatī, to the Maruts, to the Aśvins, and to the Waters, and to all the gods so that they grant wealth.

6. Kindling you, o Agni, Vasiṣṭha smashed Jarūtha. Sacrifice to Plenitude for riches.

   Jātavedas, awaken to many modes. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.10 (526) Agni

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
5 verses: triṣṭubh

The poet is particularly fond of alliteration and assonance, which he uses extensively in the hymn. The first words of the first verse uṣó ná jāráḥ echo its last uśatī́r ajīgaḥ, and throughout the verse the poet pairs initial sounds: pr̥thú pā́jaḥ, dávidyutad dī́dyat, and bhāti bhāṣā́, in what may be a sonic representation of the flickering fire repeatedly flaming. In verses 2 and 3 he strings sets of three repetitions: dravád dūtó devayā́vā (2d) and susaṃdŕ̥śaṃ suprátīkaṃ sváñcam (3c). He then returns to pairs in verse 4: rudráṃ rudrébhiḥ, ādityébhir áditim. These repetitions abruptly stop at the last verse, which states matter-of-factly the principal theme of the hymn first enunciated at verse 2: Agni brings offerings to the gods in heaven and wealth to mortals on earth. There is a variation on this theme in verse 4, in which Agni not only conveys oblations to the gods (as in vs. 3), but also conveys the gods to earth at the sacrificial place.

1. Like the lover of Dawn, flaring, shining, and blazing, he has held up his broad face.

   The bull, the blazing fallow bay, radiates with his radiance. Urging on our eager insights, he has awakened them.

2. Like the sun, at the dawning of the Dawns he has shone, stretching forth the sacrifice, like fire-priests their thought.

   Distinguishing the kinds (of gods and mortals), the god Agni (comes) here at a run as a messenger, seeking the gods and best bringing gain (to mortals).

3. Our songs and thoughts, serving the gods, come to Agni, seeking a share in wealth, to him of lovely appearance, of lovely face, and of lovely look, to him conveying oblations as the spoked wheel of the descendants of Manu.

4. O Agni, convey Indra to us along with the Vasus, lofty Rudra along with the Rudras, Aditi belonging to all peoples along with the Ādityas, and Br̥haspati granting all wishes along with the reciters of verses.

5. The fire-priests invoke him, the delighting Hotar, the youngest one; the clans invoke Agni at the rites, for he has become the protector of riches on earth and the unwearying messenger to bring sacrifice to the gods.

VII.11 (527) Agni

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
5 verses: triṣṭubh

The keywords in this hymn are ā́ "hither" and ihá "here." The poet asks that Agni come "hither" (vs. 1c) to sacrifice "here" (vss. 1d, 3c). And not only should Agni come, but he should also bring the gods "hither" (vs. 5a) to enjoy the sacrifice "here" (vs. 5b). The last pāda—excluding the Vasiṣṭha signature pāda—presents an interesting twist, for the poet asks that this sacrifice, the sacrifice that is at this place on earth, that is here where he has asked Agni to come and here where he is to bring the gods, be placed "in heaven among the gods" (vs. 5c). At the end, therefore, what is present and local should become celestial and divine.

Verse 3 of this hymn presents an additional puzzle. What does it mean when it says that good things become visible in Agni "three times at night"? Following Sāyaṇa, Geldner argues that "night" here means the whole day, and therefore the reference is to the three soma-pressings. Recognizing the difficulty of this interpretation, Oldenberg wonders whether there might be a reference here to an Atirātra or "overnight" rite. We agree and think that the reference here is to the rites that take place at night. But what rites these are or why "good things" are visible in the fire during them remains unclear.

1. You are the great sign of the rite; without you the immortals find no elation.
Travel hither in the same chariot with all the gods. Agni, take your seat here as the first Hotar.
2. Bringing offerings, the descendants of Manu always invoke you, the nimble one, to act as messenger.
Upon whose sacred grass you sit with the gods, o Agni, for him the days become bright shining.
3. Three times at night, good things become visible within you for the pious mortal.
As you did for Manu, o Agni, sacrifice here to the gods. Become our messenger, protecting us from curses.
4. Agni is master of the rite reaching aloft; Agni, of every offering that is made, for the good (gods) rejoice in his intention, and so the gods established him as the conveyor of oblations.

5. Agni, convey the gods hither to consume the oblations. Let those whose chief is Indra find elation here.
   Place this sacrifice here in heaven among the gods. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.12 (528) Agni

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
3 verses: triṣṭubh

This brief hymn describes Agni's appearance "in his own home" (vs. 1b) and "in the household" (vs. 2b), but although he is a domestic fire, Agni also extends to heaven and earth and the four directions (vs. 1cd). Agni's principal function here is to protect the household against unnamed difficulties (vss. 2a, 2c) and accusations (vs. 2c). It is because he protects the family that he is Varuṇa and Mitra (vs. 3a), since these two gods guard the structure of the household and of the larger society.

1. We have come with great reverence to the youngest one, who, kindled, shines in his own home—to him of shimmering radiance between the two wide world-halves, to him facing out in every direction, receiving the well-poured offering.
2. Overcoming all difficulties by his greatness, Agni is praised in the household as Jātavedas.
   He will guard us from difficulty and reproach, (guard) both us, who are singing, and our generous patrons.
3. You, Agni, are Varuṇa and Mitra. You do the Vasiṣṭhas make strong through their thoughts.
   In you let there be good things easy to gain. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.13 (529) Agni Vaiśvānara

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
3 verses: triṣṭubh

In each of the three verses of this hymn, the poet calls Agni vaiśvānara (vss. 1d, 2d, 3c), thereby identifying the emerging ritual fire with the rising sun. Because Agni is the sun, he blazes everywhere, smashes enemies, fills heaven and earth with his light, releases the gods from the curse (of darkness), looks upon all beings, and encompasses the earth. The poet brings to Agni his hymn as an offering in the hope that with these powers Agni will bring success to the poet's words.

1. Bring forth to Agni—blazing everywhere, granting insight, smashing (enemy) lords—our thought, our vision.
   Being pleased (with it), I bring it, like an offering on the ritual grass, to Vaiśvānara for him to hold fast to our thoughts.
2. You, o Agni, blazing with your blaze, filled the two world-halves as you were coming to birth.
   You released the gods from the curse, o Vaiśvānara, Jātavedas, through your greatness.
3. Since, o Agni, when just born, you surveyed living beings like a herdsman his animals—alert and earth-encircling, o Vaiśvānara, find a way for our formulation. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.14 (530) Agni

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
3 verses: br̥hatī 1, triṣṭubh 2, 3

This hymn marks the raising of the sacrificial fire by placing kindling, by pouring ghee, and by reciting praises and invocations, which verbal products, as much as the wood and ghee, bring the fire to life. Noteworthy in this hymn is the repetition of an emphatic vayám "we" at the beginning of each pāda in verse 2, continuing its placement in 1d. The poet is drawing the god's attention not only to the forms of ritual service he is being offered, but also to the poet and his people as those offering that service.

1. To Jātavedas with our kindling wood, to the god with our invocations to the gods, to him of bright flame with our oblations—to Agni we would offer service with reverence.
2. We would honor you with our kindling wood, o Agni; we would offer service with our good praise, o you worthy of the sacrifice—we with ghee, o Hotar of the rite, and we with our oblation, o god of noble flame.
3. Travel here with the gods to our invocation to the gods, taking pleasure in our vaṣaṭ-call, o Agni.
   We would be those offering service to you, a god. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.15 (531) Agni

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
15 verses: gāyatrī, arranged in tr̥cas

This hymn divides into five tr̥cas. The first triplet of verses defines Agni as the clan fire, which lives close to the family and protects it. In the second triplet Agni is invoked to be present as the fire of the sacrifice. Structurally, the second triplet replicates the first, since the second two verses in each form a single syntactic unit that begins with a relative clause and continues with an imperative. This repeated structure iconically suggests the identity of the clan fire and the sacrificial fire, and in the third triplet the sacrificial fire and the clan fire are explicitly blended. Agni represents the clanlord and he receives the sacrificial oblations (vs. 7). Through the sacrifice Agni provides the clan with "heroes," the male children who guarantee the prosperity of the clan. In verse 9, as also in VII.1.14, the ákṣarā refers to both a syllable—its primary meaning—and a cow that always gives milk. Thus, the "syllable" of the poets comes with thousands of syllables, and because their speech is an inexhaustible cow, it brings thousands of cattle.

The fourth tr̥ca takes Agni into the sphere of the minor Ādityas, Savitar, Bhaga, and the mysterious Diti, who is here the personification of giving embodied in the sacrificial fire. Geldner suggests that Diti is the female counterpart of Bhaga, but Diti is as easily male (and we believe more likely so) as female. Diti and Aditi, the mother of the Ādityas, appear to be in a systematic grammatical relationship, with the latter being a negated version of the former. But here Diti is not the opposite of Aditi but seemingly one of her children, since Diti appears alongside other Ādityas.

If the fourth tr̥ca emphasizes the gifts of the Agni, the last appeals for his power to protect from bad times and evil people.

1. Pour the oblation in his mouth for him to be reverently approached, for him granting rewards, who is closest friendship for us.
2. Who has sat down in every house, (presiding) over the five peoples—the sage poet and houselord, the youthful one—
3. Let him, Agni, guard our household possessions in every direction, and let him protect us from difficult straits.

4. Now I give birth to a new praise song for Agni, the falcon of heaven.
   Will he not win for us what is good?
5. Whose glories are eagerly sought to be seen, like the wealth of one rich in heroes—
   (the glories of him) who flames at the beginning of the sacrifice—
6. Let him pursue this vaṣaṭ-call. Agni takes pleasure in our songs, as the best sacrificer, as the conveyor of oblations.

7. We would establish you as the brilliant one, o clanlord to be attained, o god, as the one having good heroes, o Agni, receiving the poured offering.
8. Shine throughout the nights and dawns. Through you we have good fires; seeking us, you have good heroes.
9. Our men, inspired poets, come to you with their visions in order to win gain, as does their syllable [/their inexhaustible cow] bringing thousands.

10. The brightly blazing, immortal Agni wards off demons—the blazing pure one to be invoked.
11. Bring us gifts, being their master, o young (son) of strength, and let Bhaga give us a desirable reward.
12. Agni, you (give) the glory that accompanies heroes. And god Savitar and Bhaga (give), and Diti gives a desirable reward to us.

13. Agni, guard us from difficult straits. As ever, o god, as the unaging one burn back those doing harm with your hottest (fires).
14. So then, o you who are unchallengeable, become for us a great metal fortress with a hundred coils to protect our men.
15. Guard us from difficult straits and from him wishing evil, o you dawning in the evening, by day and at night, o undeceivable one.

VII.16 (532) Agni

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
12 verses: bṛhatī alternating with satobṛhatī, arranged in pragāthas

The hymn emphasizes the exchange mediated by Agni, who takes the oblations to the gods (or brings the gods to the oblations) and who offers sustenance to the sacrificers (see esp. vs. 2cd). Because he thus nourishes both gods and humans, he is the "child of nourishment" (vs. 1). The poet repeatedly mentions the patron or patrons of the rite alongside the priests. Agni himself is not only the Hotar, who recites, and the Potar, who purifies the soma, but also the householder, who is the patron of the rite (vs. 5). In verse 6 the poet calls on Agni to sharpen not only the priests but also the one who "praises well" and "is skillful," a combination of the ability to recite and the ability to perform the rites. The latter may be a priest, but it might be again the householder, who is also a participant in the rite and who owns, in a sense, all of the priestly functions. In verses 7–10 the poet asks Agni to bless generous patrons, who give cattle (vs. 7) and horses along with other gifts (vs. 10). In the final two verses the poet addresses his fellow priests, urging them to prepare ample offerings for the gods, but at the end he especially mentions the rewards of wealth and good men for "the pious man," who again is likely the householder.

1. For you with this homage I summon Agni, the child of nourishment, the dear, most visible circle of spokes that makes the rite good, the immortal messenger for all.
2. He will hitch up his two flame-red (horses) that bring nurture to all. He will run swiftly, when he receives the well-poured offering.
   With its good formulations and with good labor, the sacrifice belongs to the good (gods), and the divine gift belongs to the peoples.

3. Upward has risen the flame belonging to him, the one giving rewards, when he receives the poured offering; upward the ruddy smoke, touching heaven: our men kindle Agni.
4. We make you our most glorious messenger. Convey the gods here to pursue (our oblations).
   Son of strength, give everything that nourishes mortals; give that which we beg of you.

5. Agni, you are the houselord; you the Hotar in the rite;
   you the attentive Potar, o you who grant all wishes—sacrifice and seek out a desirable reward (for us).
6. Create treasure for the sacrificer, o you of good resolve, for you are the grantor of treasure.
   Sharpen us—every priest—upon the truth, and also him who, praising well, is skillful.

7. Agni, let our patrons be dear to you, who receive the well-poured offering—they, the generous guides of the peoples, who distribute pens of cattle.
8. Those in whose house Iḷā [/Libation] sits down, with her hands of ghee and filled to the brim—save them from deceit and blame, o powerful one. Hold out to us far-famed protection.

9. As the more knowing conveyor, with your delighting tongue and your mouth convey wealth to our generous (patrons), Agni, and sweeten our gift of oblations.
10. Who give gifts and rewards of horses with a desire for great fame—rescue them from difficult straits with your rescuers and with your hundred fortresses, o youngest one.

11. The god Wealth-Giver [=Agni] wishes your full outpouring.
    Pour it out or fill it up: only then will the god honor you.
12. The gods made him, the attentive Hotar of the rite, their conveyor (of oblations).
    Agni grants treasure and an abundance of good heroes to him who worships, to the pious man.

VII.17 (533) Agni

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
7 verses: dvipadā triṣṭubh

Quite reasonably, Oldenberg holds that this hymn, the last of the Agni hymns of VII, is an addition to the original collection. It is a general description of the preparations for the sacrifice (vss. 1, 2), its performance (vss. 3, 4), and its rewards (vs. 5). The last two verses reaffirm the relationship of Agni to the gods (vs. 6) and to mortals (vs. 7).

1. Agni, be kindled by our good kindling and let the ritual grass become spread widely.
2. And let the eager doors gape open, and, (o Agni), convey the eager gods here to this place.
3. Agni, pursue them with the offering, sacrifice to the gods. Make the rites good, Jātavedas.
4. Jātavedas will make the rites good. He will sacrifice to the gods, and he will please the immortals.
5. Win all desirable rewards, o attentive one, and let our hopes come true today.
6. And, o Agni, the gods have established you here as the conveyor of oblations, as the child of nourishment.
7. We would be those serving you, the god. Being beseeched, you will grandly distribute treasures to us.

VII.18 (534) Battle of the Ten Kings: Indra (1–21), Sudās Paijavana's Dānastuti (22–25)

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
25 verses: triṣṭubh

This very famous hymn, the first in Vasiṣṭha's Indra cycle, relates, if we can use so positive a term, the so-called Battle of the Ten Kings, in which King Sudās and his Bharata followers, with Indra on their side, defeat an alliance of ten kings, which includes their former allies, the Pūrus. The hymn has long been used as a major source for the reconstruction of R̥gvedic history, perhaps somewhat too credulously, as the description of the battle is anything but clear and is also clearly full of puns, derisive word plays, phonological deformations of the names of opponents, and other poetic tricks, all couched in slangy language. Since the "historical" dimension of the hymn has been fully treated elsewhere (see especially Schmidt 1980 and Witzel 1995a), we will not discuss it further here.

The hymn falls into three parts. Verses 1–4 recall the aid that Indra has given us in the past and ask for his help and gifts now. The poet names himself at the very end of verse 4, which forms a clever ring with verse 1: the description of Indra in 1d, ... vásu ... vániṣṭhaḥ "best gainer of goods," is condensed into the poet's own name in 4d, vás(u)(ván)iṣṭhaḥ → vásiṣṭhaḥ. The language and contents of these first four verses are well-crafted but unremarkable.

The battle proper and its immediate aftermath occupy verses 5–21; the battle itself takes place in and around the Paruṣṇī River (see esp. vss. 8–10), whose course seems to have been diverted during the battle and in which a number of the combatants seem to have drowned. The account, especially the earlier verses, seems to mirror the confusion and chaos of battle itself (reminiscent on a much smaller scale of Tolstoy's great accounts of the unintelligible disorder of battle in War and Peace, or of Stephen Crane's in The Red Badge of Courage). The confusion begins to sort itself out as Indra's role becomes more prominently featured. It is emphasized several times that the forces of Sudās were outnumbered but that Indra was able to marshal this overmastered force to defeat their foes (esp. vss. 14, 17). This section ends with several verses celebrating the victory and Indra's benevolence (20–21).

The final four verses (22–25) are a dānastuti, praising the extravagant gifts of Sudās to the poet, ending (vs. 25) by commending Sudās to the protection of the Maruts.

1. Since with you beside (them), o Indra, our fathers, the singers, also won all things of value—because in you are the good milking cows, in you the horses—you are the best gainer of goods for one who serves the gods.
2. Because you are simply dwelling peacefully like a king with his wives, help (us) throughout the days, being preeminent as a wise poet.
   O bounteous one, ornament our hymns with cows and horses; whet us, who are devoted to you, for wealth.
3. These gladdening hymns, contending with each other here, seeking the gods, have reverently approached you.
   Let the path of your wealth lead our way. Might we be in your good thought, Indra, in your shelter.
4. Wishing to milk you like a milk-cow in good pasture, I, Vasiṣṭha, have dispatched sacred formulations to you.
   Everyone says that you alone are my herdsman. Let Indra come to our good thought.

5. Even the floods that had spread out—Indra made them into fords easy to cross for Sudās.
   Śimyu, who was vaunting himself above our newer speech—he [=Indra] made him into the flotsam of the rivers and his taunts (too).
6. Turvaśa Yakṣu (the "sacrificer") was himself the offering cake—also the Matsyas ["fish"], whetted down (in their quest) for wealth, like fish in water.
   The Bhr̥gus and the Druhyus (just) followed orders. (Former) comrade crossed (former) comrade on the two opposing (sides).
7. The Pakthas ["cooked oblations"?] and the Bhalānases ["raiders"?] spoke out, and the Alinas, the Viṣānins, and the Śivas:
   "The feasting companion of the Ārya [=Indra?], who led (us?) hither—with desire for cattle for the Tr̥tsus he has gone with battle against superior men [=us]."
8. The ill-intentioned ones without insight, causing Aditi to abort, diverted (the course of) the (river) Paruṣṇī.
   With his greatness he [=Indra? Turvaśa?] enveloped the earth, being master (of it). The poet lay there, being perceived as (just) a (sacrificial) animal.
9. They came to the Paruṣṇī, to a failed end as if to their (real) goal. Not even the swift one made it home for supper.
   Indra made those without alliance (to us) subject to Sudās, those, easy to thrust away, who, (though) in Manu's (race), were of gelded speech.
10. They went like cows without a cowherd from a pasture, (though) seeming (to go) to an alliance properly concluded—the Pr̥śnigus, propelled down to the dappled one [/P(a)r(u)ṣṇī]. The teams and the battlers [?] followed orders.
11. He who as king with desire for fame has strewn down the one and twenty peoples of the two Vaikarṇas, just as a wonder-worker "whets down" the ritual grass on the seat. The champion Indra made a gush of them.
12. Then famous old Kavaṣa he wrenched down into the waters, and *Anu and Druhyu—he with the mace in his arms.
    The ones devoted to you, who cheered you on, (were) choosing there your partnership for their partnership.
13. In an instant Indra split open all their fortified places, their seven strongholds, with his might.
    He shared out the patrimony of the descendant of Anu to Tr̥tsu. We defeated the Pūru of scornful speech at the rite of distribution.
14. The cow-seeking Anu and Druhyu people fell down to sleep—sixty hundred, six thousand (of them).
    (But on the other side there were just) sixty heroes with six on top, in search of (Indra's) favor. All these are the manly deeds of Indra.

15. These Tr̥tsus, constantly laboring alongside Indra, ran like waters released downward.
    The ill-allied ones, meting (their supplies) out with a miser's eye, (yet) left behind all their goodies for Sudās.
16. The (mere) half a hero, who drinks the cooked oblation without Indra, who vaunts himself, did he thrust away to the ground.
    Indra confounded the battle fury of the one who confounds the battle fury (of others). He took to the course of the path, being master of it.
17. Even with a feeble thing he performed this unique (deed): he smote even the lioness with a wether.
    Indra hewed down the poles with a pin. He handed over all the goodies to Sudās.
18. "Because one after the other, the rivals become subject to you, procure the subjugation even of vaunting Bheda.
    Who(ever) commits an offense against mortals who praise, smash your sharp mace down on him, o Indra."
19. The Yamunā (River) helped Indra, as did the Tr̥tsus. He despoiled Bheda there entirely, and the Ajas, Śighras, and the Yakṣus brought horses's heads as tribute.
20. Neither your favors nor your riches, o Indra, can be entirely surveyed, through the previous dawns, nor through the current ones.
    You smote even the one who fancied himself a little god. You cut down Śambara from the lofty (mountain) by yourself.
21. Those from (this?) house who reached elation in devotion to you— Parāśara, Śatayātu, Vasiṣṭha—they did not neglect their partnership with you, who provided for (them). So now day-bright (dawns) will dawn forth for the patrons.

22. Two hundred (head) of cattle from the descendant of Devavant, two chariots carrying brides from Sudās—deserving the gift of Paijavana, o Agni, I circle around (it), like a Hotar the seat (of the sacrificial victim), as I "rasp" [=sing].
23. The four gift(-horse)s of Paijavana, along with their allotted (gear), covered with pearls, (convey) me exclusively.
    The silvery ones of Sudās who tread the earth convey me and my progeny, for my progeny to be famed.
24. He whose fame the Apportioner has apportioned to every head between the two wide world-halves, they hymn (him) just as the seven streams do Indra. He "whetted down" Yudhyāmadhi at the moment of encounter.
25. You superior men, you Maruts, accompany this (man) here, like Divodāsa, the father of Sudās.
    Give aid to the aspiration of Paijavana—lordly power difficult to attain and unaging—(as he) seeks (your) favor.

VII.19 (535) Indra

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
11 verses: triṣṭubh

The first half of this hymn (vss. 1–5) celebrates various victories of Indra, giving aid both to men of the mythic past (e.g., Kutsa, vs. 2) and those of the present, especially King Sudās (vss. 3, also 6), the leader also in the Battle of the Ten Kings treated in the preceding, well-known hymn (VII.18). The allegiances and enmities of that hymn are strikingly different here: for example, Indra helps the Pūru king in this hymn (vs. 3), whereas in VII.18 the Pūrus are the enemy.

Beginning with verse 6 we attempt to mobilize the powers and protection that Indra has previously provided for us, and as usual we offer praise in return.

1. Who, like a fearsome sharp-horned bull, alone rouses forth all the communities;
   (you) who hold forth to the better (soma-)presser the patrimony and possessions of each and every impious man—
2. Just you, o Indra, helped Kutsa, while seeking fame for yourself with your own body in the clash, when for him you weakened the Dāsa Śuṣṇa bringing bad harvest, doing your best for Arjuna's offspring.
3. You, o bold one, boldly helped on Sudās, whose oblation is worth pursuing, with all forms of help; you helped on Trasadasyu, son of Purukutsa, and Pūru in the winning of land, in the smashing of obstacles.
4. You—whose mind is inclined toward men in their pursuit of the gods—along with men you smash many obstacles, you of the fallow bays;
   you put to sleep the Dasyu Cumuri and Dhuni, easy to smash, for Dabhīti.
5. Yours are these exploits, you with the mace in hand—that nine and ninety fortifications at once along with the hundredth you worked to the end, in bringing them to rest [=collapse]. You smashed Vr̥tra, and moreover Namuci you smashed.
6. Win these delights of yours, Indra, for the pious Sudās, who has given an oblation.
   For you, the bull, I yoke the two bullish fallow bays. Let my sacred formulations pursue the prize, o you of many talents.
7. (Being) within this enclosure of yours here, may we not be (available) to be delivered to evil, o mighty possessor of the fallow bays.
   Protect us with defenses that keep the wolf away. May we be your dear ones, and dear to our patrons.

8. Dear indeed to you, o bounteous one, may we men rejoice in your charge, in your protection, as your comrades.
   Grind down Turvaśa, down Yādva, intending to do (a deed) worthy to be proclaimed for Atithigva.
9. Even now, all at once, o bounteous one, those in your charge, the men, the hymn-proclaimers, are proclaiming hymns, they who by their invocations of you have distanced the niggards through ritual service. Choose us for this same yoking [=ritual companionship].
10. These praises are for you, o most manly of men. Those granting bounties, inclined toward us—o Indra, become kindly disposed to them at the obstacle-smashing, as a champion who is both comrade and helper of men.
11. Now, o champion Indra, being praised by reason of your help, aroused by sacred formulations, become strengthened in your own body.
   Measure out prizes to us, measure out beings [=people]. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.20 (536) Indra

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
10 verses: triṣṭubh

The hymn begins (vss. 1–2) by implicitly contrasting Indra's history, in the odd pādas, with his current activity in the even ones. It continues with praise especially of Indra's martial powers (vss. 3–5). Verse 5 takes up the theme of Indra's birth, found in the first pāda of the hymn, but it is not entirely clear who the father and mother are. In our opinion this is only a metaphorical reference to birth: Indra's vivification at the soma sacrifice, with the bull-father actually soma, referred to in the immediately preceding pāda (4d). The identification of the mother is more difficult in this interpretation: it could be a reference to the cow whose milk is mixed with soma. A non-ritual reading of the verse is also possible, with the father and mother the unnamed parents of Indra referred to elsewhere in the R̥gveda.

The second half of the hymn (vss. 6–10) describes the usual reciprocal relation between worshiper and god: anyone who gives the appropriate ritual devotion to Indra will be appropriately rewarded (see esp. vss. 6, 8). Yet the poet is not entirely sure Indra is doing his part, and in verse 7 he rather saucily (and even slangily) contrasts the proper patron–client behavior among humans with Indra's failure to come through. The poet also treats himself somewhat mockingly: in verse 9 he compares his praise first to a bellowing bull and then—in our view (the relevant word is a disputed hapax)—to another animal with a wailing or screeching cry, perhaps a monkey. But these light moments give way to the usual pleas for benefits at the end of the hymn.

1. He was born strong for heroic activity, autonomous—doing the work that a manly one will do.
   (Even as) a youth coming to the (ritual) session of men with his help— Indra is our rescuer from transgression, even if it is great.
2. The smasher of Vṛtra, Indra, swollen with strength—the hero has now aided the singer with help.
   The maker of wide space for Sudās [/the good giver], certainly that too!—in an instant he has become the giver of goods to the pious man.
3. An unassailable battler, creating tumult, combat-hardened—a champion, conquering entirely, unconquerable even at his birth—
   Indra of great strength dispersed the battle arrays; then he smashed everyone who played the rival.
4. You have filled even the two world-halves with your greatness, Indra, with your powers, powerful one.
   Indra of the fallow bays, holding fast to his mace, is accustomed to the exhilarating drinks along with the stalk.
5. The bull begat the bull for battle; that manly one did a woman bear.
   He who as leader of the army stands out from the (other) superior men, a powerful warrior, he is the daring seeker of cattle.
6. Never will that person be injured, nor be harmed, who seeks to win his [=Indra's] terrible mind.
   Whoever with sacrifices will place his friendship in Indra, he will rule over wealth as protector of truth, born in truth.
7. When, o Indra, a predecessor will be doing his best for his successor and a more important man will embark on giving to a lesser one, should the immortal be the only one sitting it out far away? Bright one, bring bright wealth here to us.
8. The person dear to you who will perform ritual service for you, he will be your comrade exclusively, o possessor of the stone.
   Most pleasing to you, may we be in this benevolence of yours, in your defense, in your protection for men, (so that) you will not smite (us).
9. This praise has bellowed (like) a bull to you, and (like) a thieving [?] (monkey?) has screeched, o bounteous one.
   Desire for wealth has come over your singer. You alone, powerful one, hold power over goods for us.
10. So, Indra, position us for the refreshment offered by you—and also position those bounteous ones who themselves incite (us).
    Let there be goodly skill for your singer. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.21 (537) Indra

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
10 verses: triṣṭubh

The hymn begins with two verses establishing the sacrificial context, the second of which describes the pressing stones as enthusiastic participants in the ritual. The remaining verses celebrate Indra's deeds and powers and beg him to display these powers for our benefit. Verses 3 and 4 treat previous deeds, verses 6–7 primarily his incomparable power.

The most striking verse is 5, the middle verse (vs. 10 being a refrain and thus extra-hymnic). Here various threats to the "truth" of our people are rendered helpless by our resistance and Indra's power: threats internal to the community, namely sorcerers and flatterers, and the "stranger" (an Ārya but an enemy), people who deviate from our ways, and phallus-worshipers (presumably non-Āryas) outside it.

The final two verses before the refrain (8–9) recognize Indra's help in the past and request it for the future.

1. It has been pressed—the divine stalk, foamy with cows [=milk]. Indra is accustomed to it even from birth.
   We take heed of you with sacrifices, you of the fallow bays. Take heed of our praise amid the exhilarating drinks from the stalk.
2. They go forth to the sacrifice, they make the ritual grass tremble—(the pressing stones) exhilarated on soma at the ceremony, possessing headstrong speech.
   The glorious ones are carried down from their handler—the bulls whose trampling (is heard) in the distance, the companions of the superior man [=Indra].
3. You, Indra, have made the waters flow, the many waters hemmed around by the serpent, o hero.
   The nourishing streams have twisted away from you like charioteers (maneuvering). All the finely made (fortifications) tremble with fear.
4. Fearsome, with their [=pressing stones'] weapons [=soma drinks] he toiled at all manly labors, the knowing one.
   Indra, bristling with excitement, shook apart the fortifications. With mace in hand, he smashed them apart with his greatness.
5. Sorcerers do not incite us, Indra, nor sycophants with their knowing wiles, o most powerful one.
   He [=Indra?] will vaunt himself over the stranger, over the race contrary (to our ways). Let the phallus-worshipers not penetrate our truth.
6. Be superior through your will, Indra, on the earth. The realms do not contain your greatness.
   Since with your own vast power you smashed Vṛtra, no rival will find the end (of it) in battle with you.

7. Even the gods, the ancient ones, measured their strengths (as inferior) to your lordship, your dominion.
   Indra, having conquered, distributes bounties. It is Indra whom (men) keep calling to in the winning of victory's prize.
8. For even the weakling has called upon you for help, o Indra, who have control over much good fortune.
   O you of a hundred forms of help, you have become a help to us, and you have become the defender of a man who, like you, distributes portions.
9. May we always be your comrades, Indra, increasing our homage because of your greatness, surpassing one.
   With your help in the encounter, may they combat the attack of the stranger, the powers of the rapacious ones.
10. So, Indra, position us for the refreshment offered by you—and also position those bounteous ones who themselves incite (us).
    Let there be goodly skill for your singer. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.22 (538) Indra

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
9 verses: virāj 1–8, triṣṭubh 9

The focus of this hymn is entirely ritual: Indra is invited to drink the soma and to listen to the hymns of the poet, Vasiṣṭha, who in the 1st person names himself in verse 3 and calls attention to his devotion in verses 5 and 7. He acknowledges that there are competing rituals designed for Indra (vss. 6–7) and also acknowledges that no ritual activities and no hymns of men can quite measure up to the worth of Indra (vss. 8–9). Indeed, in this case Vasiṣṭha's modesty seems justified: though the hymn is pleasingly phrased, it hardly counts as one of the pinnacles of R̥gvedic praise poetry.

1. Drink soma, Indra. Let it exhilarate you—(the soma) that the stone has pressed for you, you of the fallow bays,
   (the stone) like a steed well guided by the arms of the presser.
2. The dear exhilarating drink that exists to be yoked by you, with which you smash obstacles, you of the fallow bays, let that one exhilarate you, Indra of preeminent goods.
3. Take heed of this speech of mine, o bounteous one, which Vasiṣṭha chants to you as an encomium;
   enjoy these sacred formulations at the (time of) joint revelry.
4. Hear the call of the (pressing) stone as it drinks out (the sap); take heed of the inspired thought of the poet as he chants.

Make these gestures of friendship most intimately your own here (at the pressing).

5. I, a knowing (man), do not neglect the hymns for you, the surpassing one, nor the good praise of your lordship:
always I keep pronouncing your name, self-glorious one.
6. Since there are many pressings for you among the sons of Manu, many times does a man of inspired thought call on you alone.
Don't make a long delay at a distance from us, bounteous one.
7. For you alone are all these pressings, o champion; for you I make strengthening sacred formulations.
You are to be invoked by men at all times.
8. Never do they (quite) reach up to the greatness of you, o wondrous strong one, (so great as) you are considered to be—nor to your heroism, Indra, nor to your generosity—
9. Neither the older seers nor the new ones, the inspired poets, who have created sacred formulations, Indra.
Let there be friendly fellowship of you for us. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.23 (539) Indra

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
6 verses: triṣṭubh

The hymn begins with Vasiṣṭha's self-address, exhorting himself to praise Indra, and it ends (vs. 6) with a verse summarizing the hymn, in which the plural Vasiṣṭhas chant to Indra. The first two verses seem to establish the context as a verbal contest between competing poets, although this context is not prominent in the rest of the hymn. The dominating theme is simply the soma sacrifice (soma drinks, vs. 5) and especially the accompanying verbal offerings (vss. 1–4). Praise of Indra's great deeds and powers is limited to a single pāda in the first verse (1c) and the second half of verse 3. Even this latter provides a transition to the ritual: 3d seems to refer to the Vr̥tra myth, and 4a might be taken as expressing the aftermath of the Vr̥tra-slaying, namely the release of the waters. But we consider its primary reference to be the waters used to swell the soma stalks before pressing; "swell" is regularly used of fertile, milking cows, but here the paradox is that the waters swell as if with milk although they are not themselves fertile.

Noteworthy is the second half of verse 2, a variant of the usual plea to the gods to extend our lifetime for a hundred years. Here we ask that we be carried across the various dangers to long life, though we do not know the lifetime we will have. Otherwise, Indra receives the standard requests to distribute wealth to us (vss. 4–6).

1. The sacred formulations have risen up, seeking fame. Magnify Indra at the encounter, o Vasiṣṭha.
   He who stretches over all with his vast power will hearken to the words of such as me.
2. The cry that is the gods' kinsman has been offered, Indra, as the rich spoils were put in order at the verbal contest.
   Because (the length of) their own lifetime is not perceptible to people, carry us across just these straits.
3. The sacred formulations have approached the one who has enjoyed (them), (for him) to yoke the cow-seeking chariot with his two fallow bays.
   This Indra thrust apart the two world-halves with his greatness, after he smashed the unopposable obstacles.
4. Even the waters swell, (though) barren like barren cows. The singers attain the truth [=a true hymn] for you.
   Drive to our teams [=hymns] like the Wind, for you distribute the prizes along with visionary thoughts.
5. Let these exhilarating drinks make you exhilarated, o Indra, the tempestuous one, powerfully generous to the singer, for alone among the gods you distribute to mortals. At this pressing, o champion, make yourself exhilarated.
6. In this way, just to Indra the bull with the mace in his arm do the Vasiṣṭhas chant with chants.
   Let him, praised, establish (wealth) consisting of men and of cows for us. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.24 (540) Indra

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
6 verses: triṣṭubh

Entirely an invitation to the sacrifice, this hymn conforms to the "journey" model, with repeated exhortations to Indra to "drive here," declarations that the sacrifice has been prepared, and, especially in the final verse (6), hopes for reciprocal benefits given by a satisfied Indra.

1. A womb has been made for you, Indra, on the seat (of the sacrifice). Drive forth to it along with your men, much-invoked one, so that you will be a helper for us and for our strengthening, and you will give goods and will reach exhilaration through the soma drinks.
2. Your doubly lofty mind has been captured, Indra; the soma has been pressed, the honeyed (drinks) poured.
   With the milk-streams released, the well-turned (hymn) is borne (forth)—this inspired thought constantly invoking Indra.

3. Drive here to us from heaven, here from earth, you of the silvery drink, to this ritual grass to drink the soma.
   Let the fallow bays convey you, the powerful one, turned toward me, to the song, to reach exhilaration.
4. Drive here to us, along with all your forms of help, o possessor of the fallow bays, taking pleasure in the sacred formulation, twisting and turning (on your route) with your stalwart (horses), you of good lips, providing to us your bullish impetuous force.
5. This praise is to convey the great, strong (Indra); it has been placed like a prize-seeking steed at the chariot-pole.
   Indra, this chant reverently invokes you for goods. Set your hearing in us (as you set) heaven upon heaven.
6. Just so, Indra, give to us of what is choice. May we continually procure your great benevolence.
   Swell nourishment rich in heroes for the bounteous ones [=patrons].
   – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.25 (541) Indra

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
6 verses: triṣṭubh

King Sudās, the leader in the Battle of the Ten Kings (VII.18), appears here in verse 3, and the context is once again that of war and hostility. In sometimes vivid language we beg Indra to support our side in the conflict and to destroy our enemies.

1. (Be) here with your help, o great strong Indra, when armies equal in battle fury clash together and the missile in the arms of a manly one will fly. Let your mind not roam widely in other directions.
2. Indra, jab the foes down into a place of no exit—the mortals who plague us.
   Put the "laud" of the one intending scorn in the distance. Bring here to us an assemblage of goods.
3. Let there be a hundred forms of your help for Sudās, you of the (lovely) lips, a thousand your lauds and giving.
   Smash the weapon of the rapacious mortal. Set brilliance and treasure upon us.
4. Because I am within (the sphere of) the will of one like you, o Indra; within (the sphere of) the giving of a helper like you, o champion, for all your days, o powerful strong one, make a home for yourself (here), o you of the fallow bays. Do not neglect (us).

5. The Kutsas are those (who chant) a fortifying (hymn) to the one of the fallow bays, begging for the god-sped might in Indra.
   Make the obstacles utterly easy to smash, o champion. May we, victorious, win spoils.
6. Just so, Indra, give to us of what is choice. May we continually procure your great benevolence.
   Swell nourishment rich in heroes for the bounteous ones [=patrons].
   – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.26 (542) Indra

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
5 verses: triṣṭubh

This brief hymn displays several competing yet complementary types of structure. On the one hand, the first two verses respond to each other and establish pressed soma and hymns as the linked indispensible requisites of the sacrifice to Indra; the doubly negative formulation of the first half of verse 1 is especially striking. The last two verses (4–5) also respond to each other, each beginning with evā́ "in just this way." These two pairs of verses highlight the excluded verse 3, the middle verse, as an omphalos, and this verse does contrast with the rest of the hymn in several ways. It is the only place where Indra's deeds are spoken of, and it also contains in its second half a striking simile (the only simile describing Indra in the hymn), in which the submission of fortresses to Indra is compared to the submission of cowives to their common husband. Thus verse 3 is in a sense a miniature example of proper praise-poetry, celebrating a god's mythic exploits in artful language.

A different structural feature pairs verse 1 with the final verse 5, in opposition to the three middle verses (2–4). In the first verse the speaker is "I"; in the last (vs. 5) it is Vasiṣṭha, who is doubtless identical with the "I" of verse 1. The middle verses instead have plural ritual participants: "those of equal skill" who call on Indra (vs. 2), ritual adepts (vs. 3), and the unidentified subject of "they speak" in verse 4. These middle verses may refer to the competing invocations of rival sacrificers, a subject that is something of a preoccupation of this set of Indra hymns (see, e.g., VII.22.6, 27.4, 28.1). The fear is always that they will attract Indra to their sacrifice rather than to that of the current speaker. The position of the Vasiṣṭha verses on both sides of these verses and enclosing them seems implicitly to assert that Vasiṣṭha's invocation has been successful. The parallelism of the last two verses, "just in this way [evá] they speak . . . " (vs. 4) and "just in this way [evá] Vasiṣṭha hymns . . . ," highlights this contrast.

The pleasing contrastive balance of both types of ring structures gives substance to the poet's boast in verse 1 that he is composing a "newer hymn that [Indra] will enjoy."

1. Soma, unpressed, does not exhilarate Indra, nor do pressings unaccompanied by sacred formulations (exhilarate) the bounteous one.
   For him I beget a hymn that he will enjoy, a newer manly one, so that he will listen to us.
2. Wherever there is a hymn, soma exhilarates Indra; whenever there is (ritual) conduct, the pressings (exhilarate) the bounteous one, when, like sons to their father, those of equal skill [=poets/sacrificers] call urgently upon him for help.
3. He did those (deeds)—he will now do others—which the ritual adepts proclaim at the pressings.
   As a single common husband does his wives, Indra has dragged down all the strongholds to submission.
4. Just in this way they speak of him. And Indra becomes famed as the single, surpassing apportioner of bounties, whose many forms of help compete for the lead. His dear auspicious things will be companions to us.
5. Just in this way at the pressing Vasiṣṭha hymns Indra, the bull of the communities, to help men.
   Mete out prizes to us in thousands. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.27 (543) Indra

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
5 verses: triṣṭubh

This hymn is much preoccupied with receiving material goods from Indra. The words "bounty," "bounteous," "largesse," and so forth are prominent. What would prompt his giving, namely our praise and sacrifice, is barely, but significantly, mentioned: the first verse opens with the martial context that is common throughout these Indra hymns in the VIIth Maṇḍala, with men in battle position. In our interpretation of pāda b, Indra is expected to harness the praise hymns directed to him by the poets of our side "to be decisive"—that is, the hymns will ensure that Indra will fight on our side and bring us victory. This concern to have Indra on our side in battle is echoed in verse 4 with the "coincident call." This call can refer both to warriors on opposing sides each calling Indra to fight on their own side, as in verse 1, and also to rival sacrificers each calling Indra to come to their sacrifice, as we have seen elsewhere in this Indra cycle.

Another important theme in the hymn is confinement, with subtle allusion to the Vala myth. We ask for a share of the cattle enclosure in 1d and in 2d exhort Indra to break apart the firmly closed fortresses and uncover what is enclosed there; the swelling gift-cow in 4cd was previously enclosed (in our opinion; this adjective is ordinarily ascribed to a different root, and it can be a pun, with the second meaning "sought after"); and in the final verse (5) we ask Indra to make wide space for our wealth.

1. Indra do men call upon when facing the other side, so that he will hitch up these insights (of theirs) (to be) decisive.
   As champion at the winning of men, taking pleasure in your strength, give us a share in the enclosure containing cattle.
2. The unbridled power that is yours, bounteous Indra, (with it) do your best for your comrades, your men, o much invoked one.
   Because as one who can tell things apart you (take) apart the fastnesses, o bounteous one, (now) uncover largesse like something confined.
3. Indra is king of the moving world, of the settled domains, (and of) whatever of diverse form exists on the earth.
   From this he gives goods to the pious man; he impels largesse nearby, just when he is praised.
4. Never does bounteous Indra, because of (another) call coincident with ours, hold back from giving spoils along with help to us, he whose unfailing gift-cow swells, a thing of value for his men, his comrades, she who was (previously) enclosed.
5. Now, Indra, make wide space for our wealth. May we turn your mind here for bounty, as we pursue (wealth) in cows, horses, and chariots. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.28 (544) Indra

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
5 verses: triṣṭubh

Another hymn in this series concerned with competition between sacrificers. The first verse exhorts Indra to heed only our call, though others are calling, too, and in the second verse the phrase "penetrate through" seems to refer to Indra's ability to ignore the competitive calls in order to come to ours. The second half of verse 2 and verse 3 then turn to Indra's great deeds, but this section is connected to the first by a word play. Although it cannot be rendered easily in English, both the "vie in invoking" of verse 1 and the "penetrate through" in verse 2 contain the preverb ví "apart, through," which is in regular opposition to sám "together." In verse 3 it is said that Indra "united" the two world-halves, using a verb phrase including the preverb sám (literally "lead together"). But the cosmogonic deed that is regularly credited to Indra is rather the separation or pushing apart of the same two world-halves (for a nearby example see VII.23.3); we contend that here this underlying formula is evoked by its opposite—the audience, familiar with the verbal formulae encapsulating Indra's great deeds, would understand "lead together [sám]" as "lead apart [ví]," primed by the ví forms found earlier in the hymn. For another example of an underlying formula appearing on the surface as its opposite, see Jamison (1982/83).

Verse 4 is notable because of the intrusion of Varuṇa into this Indra hymn, and Varuṇa in his role as observer and judge of the moral behavior of humans. Varuṇa is the tutelary deity of Vasiṣṭha (see the remarkable series of Varuṇa hymns, VII.86–89 below), but Varuṇa's presence is otherwise not found, or expected, in Indraic context. Since the last verse (5) is a refrain verse, in this Indra hymn Varuṇa has the last word, as it were. For Mitra and Varuṇa's parentage of Vasiṣṭha, see VII.33.10–14.

1. Drive up to our sacred formulations, Indra, as knowing one. Let your yoked fallow bays be turned our way, for although all mortals vie in invoking you, listen only to us, o all-impeller.
2. Your greatness, Indra, has penetrated through to our call, in that you protect the sacred formulations of the seers, o powerful one, when, o strong one, you have taken the mace in your hand. Being terrible by virtue of your will, you were born invincible—
3. When with your guidance you "united" the two world-halves, which were like men eagerly calling upon (you).
   Because he was born for great dominion, for power, the thruster pierced just the non-thruster.
4. Through these days, Indra, show favor to us, for the settled peoples who possess bad alliances are purifying themselves.
   When the sinless one [=Varuṇa] observes untruth, once again Varuṇa, master of artifice, (will) unloose us (from it).
5. We would proclaim him, just him: Indra the bounteous, so that he will give to us of the largesse of great wealth, he who best aids the preparation of the chanter's sacred formulation.
   – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.29 (545) Indra

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
5 verses: triṣṭubh

Although in many ways this is a straightforward invitation to soma, the hymn is also shot through with the anxiety about whether Indra will choose our sacrifice that is characteristic of other hymns in this Indra cycle. The first two verses are simple collections of the clichés of the journey/invitation hymn genre, but in verse 3 the poet worries about the best means of ritual service and in verse 4 reminds Indra that earlier poets were no different from us.

1. This soma here is pressed for you, Indra. Drive here toward (it), you of the fallow bays, since you are at home with it.
   Drink of this pleasing well-pressed (soma). You will give bounties, bounteous one, when you are implored.
2. Formulator, hero, taking pleasure in the preparation of the sacred formulation, drive swiftly close by here with your fallow bays.
   At just this pressing here reach exhilaration. You will listen to these sacred formulations of ours.
3. What is the proper way to prepare for you with hymns? When now might we do ritual service for you, bounteous one?
   I will stretch out all my thoughts, seeking you. So now will you listen to these invocations of mine?
4. They too were just men—those earlier seers you listened to.
   So now it is I who eagerly invoke you, bounteous one. You, Indra, are solicitude for us, like a father.
5. We would proclaim him, just him: Indra the bounteous, so that he will give to us of the largesse of great wealth, he who best aids the preparation of the chanter's sacred formulation. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.30 (546) Indra

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
5 verses: triṣṭubh

Again this hymn expresses a martial and competitive spirit, especially in verse 2. Also, as in VII.28, another god is introduced into an Indra hymn, this time Agni (vs. 3), rather than Varuṇa (VII.28.4). The combination of Agni and the dawns suggests a dawn sacrifice, and the praise of patrons in verse 4 must refer to the distribution of the dakṣiṇā or priestly gift by patrons to priests and poets at that ceremony.

1. Drive here to us, o god, with your vast power, tempestuous one. As increaser of this wealth, Indra, be there (for us) for great manliness, o lord of men, possessing a good mace—for great dominion, for masculine power, o champion.
2. The champions invoke you who are to be invoked at the verbal contest, at (the contest) for their own persons, at the winning of the sun.
   You are the martial one among all peoples. You—weaken the obstacles for easy smashing.
3. So that the days will dawn forth day-bright, so that you will establish your utmost beacon in the combats, Indra, Agni has sat down as Hotar, like a lord, calling the gods here for the one of good portion.

4. We are yours, god Indra, and so are those who are praised as giving bounties [=patrons], o champion.
   To our patrons grant utmost defense: being there (for us), they shall reach old age.
5. We would proclaim him, just him: Indra the bounteous, so that he will give to us of the largesse of great wealth, he who best aids the preparation of the chanter's sacred formulation.
   – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.31 (547) Indra

12 verses: gāyatrī 1–9, virāj 10–12, arranged in tr̥cas.

This twelve-verse hymn is organized into tr̥cas, the first three (1–9) in dimeter meter, the last in trimeter, but the hymn seems conceived as a unity. It begins with the poet's address to his priestly comrades (vs. 1), followed by his self-address (vs. 2a), and the joint production of his comrades and himself is referred to in the 1st plural in 2bc. The last tr̥ca likewise begins with an address to the priests by the poet (vs. 10). At regular intervals throughout the hymn the poet and his fellow celebrants are compared to the Maruts, who likewise hymned Indra (vss. 2, 8, 12).

The praise of Indra and the benefits we request of him are generic, but nicely balanced.

1. Sing forth your exhilarating (song) to Indra of the fallow bays, to the soma-drinker, o comrades.
2. (You yourself, o poet—) recite solemn speech to him of good gifts. And thus, like the superior men [=Maruts], we have made a heavenly (speech) for him whose generosity is real.
3. You, Indra, are seeking spoils for us; you are seeking cows, o you of a hundred resolves;
   you are seeking gold, o good one.

4. We are seeking you, o Indra; we keep bellowing out to you, o bull.
   Know this (cry?) of ours, o good one.
5. Do not make us subject to scorn to be spoken or to the hostility of the stranger.
   On you is my determination (fixed).
6. You are armor of broad extent and a fighter in the front, o Vr̥tra-smasher.
   With you as yokemate, I respond to (the challenger).

7. And you are great, you to whose might the two autonomous world-halves have yielded, o Indra.

8. The choir of Maruts, your fellow travelers, surrounds you, reaching you all together throughout the days.
9. The (soma) drops aloft in heaven come close to you, the wondrous one;
the communities jointly bow to you.

10. (Sacrificers,) bear forth your (offering) for the great one of great strengthening; for the forethoughtful one put forth your good thought.
(Indra,) fare forth to the many clans, as the one filling up the settled domains.
11. For the great one of broad expanse, for Indra, the inspired poets begat a (hymn) with a good twist, a sacred formulation.
His commandments the clever do not transgress.
12. The (Marut) choirs entirely established Indra—just him to whom the battle fury is conceded—as king, to be victorious.
Swell his friends altogether for the one of the fallow bays.

VII.32 (548) Indra

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi (1–25), Śakti Vāsiṣṭha (26ab), Vasiṣṭha or Śakti Vāsiṣṭha (26cd–27)
27 verses: bṛhatī alternating with satobṛhatī, except dvipadā virāj 3, arranged in pragāthas

This final hymn in the VIIth Maṇḍala Indra cycle is a loose collection of pragāthas, the first of which has a two-pāda extension (vs. 3). Even within the verse pairs there is little cohesion. But there is a unifying theme that runs throughout: Indra's generous giving and our grateful receiving, to an extent unusual even in an Indra hymn. Moreover, it is not only Indra's giving that we seek: it is repeatedly emphasized that Indra helps and gives to mortals who themselves give, that is, the patrons of the sacrifice (see, e.g., vss. 7, 8, 10, 15).

The hymn opens (vs. 1) with the preoccupation that has been visible in many Indra hymns in VII, the fear that rival sacrificers may attract Indra to their own rituals, and Indra's epithet "invoked by many" appears several times (vss. 17, 20, 26). Much of the hymn is concerned with defining the type of ritual behavior that will cause Indra to choose one sacrifice over another.

Indra is supreme in this hymn. In its twenty-seven verses there is only one mention of another divinity, the Maruts in verse 10.

1. Let not (any other) cantors at all stop you at a distance from us.
Even from afar come here to our joint revelry, or being (already) here hearken (to us),
2. Because these who craft sacred formulations for you sit like flies on honey when (the soma) is pressed.

The singers, seeking goods, set their desire on Indra, like a foot on a chariot.

3. Desirous of wealth I call upon the one with mace in hand, possessing a good right (hand/horse) [/bringing good priestly gifts], like a son upon his father.

4. These soma drinks here, mixed with curds, have been pressed for Indra.
Drive to them with your pair of fallow bays, o you with mace in hand—for exhilaration, for drinking—(as if) to your home.

5. He will listen: he of listening ears is implored for goods. He will never neglect our songs.
The one who just in a single day will give hundreds, thousands—no one will confound him when he is about to give.

6. That hero cannot be repulsed—he becomes puffed up by Indra, along with his men—who presses and rinses deep pressings for you, o Vr̥tra-smasher.

7. Be a defense for the bounteous (patrons), bounteous one, when you will herd together those who vaunt themselves.
Might we have a share in the possessions of the one slain by you. Bring here the patrimony of the one difficult to get at.

8. Press soma for soma-drinking Indra who holds the mace.
Cook cooked dishes. Just cause (him) to help. It is only the generous giver who is a joy to the one who generously gives.

9. You pressers of soma, do not fail; be skillful for the great one. Make (him inclined) to thrust wealth (to us).
It is just the surpassing man who wins: he dwells peacefully, he thrives. The gods are not for the petty.

10. No one has encircled the chariot of Sudās [/the good giver], nor stopped it.
Whoever has Indra as helper, whoever has the Maruts, he will come to a pen full of cattle.

11. He will come to the prize when he strives for the prize—the mortal whose helper you will be, Indra.
Become a helper to our chariots, o champion, to our men.

12. His share now is outstanding like the spoils of a victor.
Indra of the fallow bays—cheats do not outwit him. He places skill in the one who has soma.

13. A mantra—not stunted, well arranged, well adorned—set it among those worthy of the sacrifice.
The many onslaughts never overcome him who through ritual work comes to be in (the good grace) of Indra.

14. What mortal will dare against him who has you as his possession, Indra?
 It is with trust in you, bounteous one, that on the decisive day the one vying for the prize seeks to win the prize.
15. At the smashing of obstacles spur on the bounteous ones who give their own dear goods.
 O you of the fallow bays, with your guidance may we, along with our patrons, overcome all difficulties.

16. Yours alone is the lowest good thing, Indra; you prosper the middling one.
 You rule over each highest one entirely. No one obstructs you when cattle (are at stake).
17. You are famed as the giver of spoils to everyone, whenever there are (battle-)drives.
 Every earth-dweller here, when seeking help, desires a share in your name, o you who are invoked by many.

18. If I were lord of as much as you are, Indra,
 I would seek to make just my praiser (well) set up, you excavator of goods; I would not give him over to ill-estate.
19. I would do my best just for the one who magnifies (the god) every day, to (bring him) wealth here wherever it is to be found, for there exists no other, better friendship for us than you, nor even a father, bounteous one.

20. It is just the surpassing one who seeks to win the prize, as yokemate with Plenitude.
 I bend Indra, invoked by many, here to you with a song, as a carpenter bends a felly made of good wood.
21. Not by a bad(ly made) praise does a mortal find goods, nor will wealth reach the one who fails.
 It's an easy skill for you, bounteous one—giving to the likes of me on the decisive day.

22. We keep bellowing to you, o champion, like unmilked cows—to you, Indra, who see (like) the sun, lord of this moving (world), lord of the still one.
23. There is no other heavenly one like you, nor earthly; neither born, nor to be born.
 Seeking horses, seeking cows, vying for the prize, we call upon you, bounteous Indra.

24. Bring this greater (good) here, Indra, to those who are lesser, for you, bounteous one, are from of old one with many goods, and the one to be called upon at every raid.

25. Thrust away the foes, bounteous one; make goods easy for us to find.
 Become a helper for us in (the contest for) great stakes; become a strengthener of our comrades.

26. Indra, bring your resolve to bear for us, like a father for his sons.
 Do your best for us on this drive, you who are invoked by many. May we, (still) alive, reach the light.

27. Let not communities unknown—ill-intentioned and unkindly disposed—trample us down.
 With you, o champion, let us cross over the (river-)courses one after another, cross over the waters.

VII.33 (549) Vasiṣṭha's Sons (1–9); Vasiṣṭha (10–14)

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi (1–9), Vasiṣṭha's sons (10–14)
14 verses: triṣṭubh

This famous hymn, coming at the very end of the Vasiṣṭha Indra cycle, treats the mystical birth of Vasiṣṭha and the accomplishments of Vasiṣṭha and his descendants, particularly the feat of attracting Indra to the side of King Sudās and ensuring Indra's support in the Battle of the Ten Kings, the battle treated at length in VII.18. The Anukramaṇī identifies the poet of verses 1–9 as Vasiṣṭha and the "deity" as Vasiṣṭha's sons, with the opposite identifications for verses 10–14, but this does not seem the most perspicuous assignment of roles. Rather, it seems that the hymn falls into three parts: 1–6, 7–9, 10–14, starting with a time close to the (semi-mythical) present and moving backward to the deep mythical past.

The first six verses celebrate the Vasiṣṭhas' successful invitation of Indra to their soma sacrifice and Indra's subsequent aid to Sudās and the Tr̥tsus in the Ten Kings battle. Indra himself appears to be the speaker in verses 1 and 4. The first two verses depict one of the themes running through this set of Indra hymns: competing sacrifices. Here, Indra seems actually to rise from his seat at another sacrifice to go to the Vasiṣṭhas in verse 1, with his journey described in verse 2. Verses 3–6 treat his aid to Sudās in the Ten Kings battle, with all credit given to the Vasiṣṭhas' poetic skill for bringing this aid (vss. 3–5), and Indra himself declaring this in verse 4.

The next section begins with a trio of riddles based on the number three (vs. 7), with the last pāda of that verse asserting that it is exactly this knowledge that the Vasiṣṭhas control—a nice meta-comment on what Vedic poets were supposed to know. There is no consensus (modern or ancient) on the answers to these three riddles. The three producers of semen may be the three soma-pressings, or heaven (with its rain), soma, and man—and other answers have also been suggested. The three Ārya "creatures" with light in front could be the three ritual fires, or the fire, the sun, and dawn—and, again, there are other possible solutions. As for the three "heats," these could again be the ritual fires, or the sun, the fire, and the gharma drink, or some other triad. It is perhaps pleasing that the Vasiṣṭhas' esoteric knowledge has remained safe with them for over three millennia! This skill of theirs at decoding secrets and putting them in proper verbal form is celebrated further in verse 8 and the first half of verse 9.

The second half of verse 9 provides the transition to the last section, concerning the birth of Vasiṣṭha. What the Vasiṣṭhas are weaving (a motif recurring almost verbatim in vs. 12) is not entirely clear, but we are inclined to think it concerns the institution and performance of the sacrifice. It is clear why they are approaching the Apsarases (the heavenly "nymphs" of Vedic and later Indian culture): one of the Apsarases' number, Urvaśī, is their mother (see vss. 11–12), with Mitra and Varuṇa as their father (see vss. 11, 13), in the first of their forefather Vasiṣṭha's births. Both births are referred to in verse 10, both that from Mitra and Varuṇa and that when Agastya presented him to the clan. To say that the details of the births are murky is an understatement, and we will not attempt here to interpret all the mysteries in these verses. The last verse (14) is traditionally taken as Agastya's words, introducing Vasiṣṭha to his adoptive clan, the Tr̥tsus, and outlining Vasiṣṭha's ritual role. The address to "you thrusters forth" (pratr̥daḥ) is most likely a pun on their name.

1. [Indra:] They, bright-faced, with their braids on the right side, quickening thought—because they exhilarated me,
   I, standing up from the ritual grass, speak about the superior men: "They cannot be helped by me from a distance—the Vasiṣṭhas."
2. From a distance they led Indra here with pressed (soma)—across a lake's worth (of soma), on beyond the powerful drink.
   Over the pressed soma of Pāśadyumna Vāyata he preferred the Vasiṣṭhas.
3. It was certainly just with them that he crossed the Sindhu; certainly just with them that he smashed Bheda [/the "Splitter"];
   it was certainly just by reason of your sacred formulation that Indra helped Sudās in the Battle of the Ten Kings, o Vasiṣṭhas.
4. [Indra:] Gladly, you superior men, by reason of your fathers' sacred formulation, I have engirded the axle: you will certainly not be harmed, since with a lofty cry in Śakvarī [=martial] (meter) you established impetuous force in Indra, o Vasiṣṭhas.
5. Like thirsty ones looking toward heaven (for rain), in distress they looked toward (Indra) when they were surrounded in the Battle of the Ten Kings.
   Indra hearkened to Vasiṣṭha as he was praising; he made the broad space broad for the Tr̥tsus.
6. They were cut off short, like goads for driving cattle—the puny Bharatas.
   When Vasiṣṭha came to be the leader, right after that did the clans of the Tr̥tsus spread out.

7. Three produce semen in the world; three creatures belonging to the Ārya have light in front.
   Three heats accompany the dawn. All these (triads) do they know through and through—the Vasiṣṭhas.
8. Their light is like the waxing of the sun; their greatness is deep as the sea's; like the speed of the wind, your praise hymn, o Vasiṣṭhas, can be pursued by no other.
9. Only they converge upon the thousand-twigged secret with the insights of their heart.
   Weaving the covering (garment) stretched by Yama, they reverently approached the Apsarases—the Vasiṣṭhas.
10. When Mitra and Varuṇa saw you as light compacting itself from out of the lightning—that was (one) birth of yours, Vasiṣṭha, and (there was) one when Agastya brought you here for the clan.
11. And you are the descendant of Mitra and Varuṇa, o Vasiṣṭha, born from Urvaśī, from her mind, you formulator.
    A drop (of semen?) spurted forth: with a heavenly formulation all the gods took you in a lotus.
12. He, foreknowing of both in his insight, possessing a thousand gifts and one gift (more), intending to weave the covering stretched by Yama, was born from the Apsaras—Vasiṣṭha.
13. The two [=Mitra and Varuṇa?], brought into being at a (ritual) Session, aroused by reverences, poured their common semen into a pot.
    From it arose Māna from the middle. From it they say the seer was born—Vasiṣṭha.
14. [Agastya?:] He supports the supporter of solemn speech [=Hotar], the supporter of the melody [=Udgātar]; supporting the pressing stone he will speak forth at the beginning.
    Do you reverently approach him, seeking benevolence. He will come to you, you thrusters forth—Vasiṣṭha.

VII.34 (550) All Gods (except Ahi 16, Ahi Budhnya 17a)

25 verses: dvipadā 1–21, triṣṭubh 22–25

This loosely structured hymn intersperses verses relating to the sacrifice, especially its poetic portion (e.g., vss. 1, 4–5, 8–9), with verses dedicated to particular gods.

In the early parts of the hymn, the verses to gods are structured as riddles, and the god is not named: Indra in verse 3, Savitar in verse 4, Agni (?) in verse 7. But in later parts of the hymn the gods and divine forces are identified, starting with Varuṇa in verses 10–11. Minor gods predominate in this section (e.g., Ahi Budhnya, the Serpent of the Deep, vss. 16–17), through verse 23. There are also several interludes requesting help against hostility and bodily harm (vss. 12–13, 18–19). The final two verses call on many of the major gods of the pantheon, without distinguishing characteristics.

There is a distinct watery theme running throughout the hymn, beginning with the waters themselves (vss. 2–3). When Varuṇa is mentioned (vss. 10–11), it is in his association with waters, a mostly later quality of Varuṇa's. The Child of the Waters (Apām Napāt, vs. 15) and the "water-born" Serpent of the Deep (vss. 16–17) contribute to this aqueous environment, and the waters themselves reappear in verse 23. The reason for this emphasis on water is not clear.

1. Let the gleaming divine inspired thought go forth from us, well-fashioned like a prizewinning chariot.
2. They know the means of begetting of earth and of heaven;
   the waters listen then, even as they flow.
3. The broad waters swell just for him; they will be considered as powerful champions in the (battles against) obstacles.
4. Put the horses to the chariot-poles for him.
   Golden-armed, he carries the mace like Indra.
5. Set out on the sacrifice as if through the days.
   Like a (chariot-)driver in flight, spur it on by yourself.
6. By yourself spur on the sacrifice at the combats.
   Establish it as a beacon, a hero for the people.
7. From its tempestuous force it has arisen like a radiant beam.
   It bears its burden, like the earth its ground.
8. I invoke the gods without sorcery, o Agni.
   Assuring its success through truth, I produce my insight.
9. Harness your divine insight.
   Put your speech forward among the gods.
10. He inspects the haven of these (waters), of the rivers—powerful Varuṇa of a thousand eyes.
11. King of kingdoms, ornament of the rivers:
    lifelong lordship has been conceded to him.
12. Aid us amid all the clans; render harmless the "laud" of him who wishes to scorn.
13. Let the unfriendly missile of the haters go wide.
    Keep the infirmity of bodies away, off to the side.
14. Agni, the oblation-eater, has aided us with our acts of reverence.
    The dearest praise has been produced for him.

15. Along with the gods, make the Child of the Waters your companion.
    Let him be friendly to us.
16. I will sing to the water-born serpent with hymns:
    he is sitting in the depth of the rivers, in the dusky realms.
17. Let Ahi Budhnya [/the Serpent of the Deep] not set us up for harm;
    let the sacrifice of him who seeks the truth not fail.
18. And they have placed fame upon these men of ours.
    Let them [=men] go forth for wealth, vaunting themselves over the stranger.
19. They scorch the rival, like the sun the worlds—those possessing great weapons with their onslaughts.
20. When the Wives (of the Gods) will come to us, let Tvaṣṭar of the lovely hands confer heroes (on us).
21. Might Tvaṣṭar enjoy our praise.
    Might Aramati [/Devotion], seeking goods, be in us.
22. The Gift-Escorts will give goods to us. Let Rodasī, let Varuṇāṇī pay heed.
    Let him be one affording good shelter (along?) with the Shielding Goddesses; let generously giving Tvaṣṭar apportion wealth.
23. Then let the mountains (apportion) us wealth, then let the waters, then the Gift-Escorts, the plants, and Heaven, and Earth jointly with the trees. The two world-halves will protect us all around.
24. Then let the two broad world-halves follow suit, let heaven-ruling Varuṇa, whose comrade is Indra, follow;
    let all the Maruts, who are victorious, follow. Might we be (fit) to found the buttress of wealth.
25. Indra, Varuṇa, Mitra, Agni, the waters, the plants, the trees shall enjoy this of ours.
    Might we be in the shelter, in the lap of the Maruts. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.35 (551) All Gods

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
15 verses: triṣṭubh

This fifteen-verse hymn is in competition for the most boring hymn in the R̥gveda (a competition in which there are remarkably few entries). In the first thirteen verses every pāda begins with the indeclinable word śám "luck, weal" in the hardly varying formula "luck for us be X," with X a god or gods, power, or sacrificial element. There is generally a rationale for the groupings found in each verse, though it not always transparent (see, e.g., vs. 3). The final two verses (14–15) inclusively beg all the gods in various groupings to enjoy the praise and grant space to us.

1. Luck for us be Indra and Agni with their help; luck for us Indra and Varuṇa, on whom oblations are bestowed.
   Luck Indra and Soma—luck and lifetime for good faring; luck for us Indra and Pūṣan at the winning of prizes.
2. Luck for us Fortune, and luck for us be Laud. Luck for us Plenitude and luck be Riches.
   Luck for us the Laud of what is real and easy to guide; luck for us be Aryaman, born many times.
3. Luck for us the Establisher and luck be the Upholder for us. Luck for us be the Wide-Spreading (Earth?) with her own powers.
   Luck be the lofty World-Halves, luck for us the Stone; luck let the easily called (names) of the gods be for us.
4. Luck for us be Agni, whose face is light; luck for us Mitra and Varuṇa, the Aśvins luck.
   Luck for us be the good deeds of the good doers; luck let the vigorous Wind blow to us.
5. Luck for us Heaven and Earth at the Early Invocation; luck be the Midspace for us to see.
   Luck for us be the plants, the trees; luck be the victorious lord of the dusky realm.
6. Luck for us be god Indra along with the Vasus; luck Varuṇa of good laud along with the Ādityas; luck for us healing Rudra along with the Rudras [=Maruts]; for luck let Tvaṣṭar along with the Wives hear us here.
7. Luck for us be Soma; the Sacred Formulation luck for us; luck for us be the Pressing Stones and luck the Sacrifices.
   Luck for us be the Fixing of the Posts; luck for us be the Fruitful (plants) and the Altar.
8. For luck for us let the Sun of broad gaze go up; luck for us be the four Directions.
   Luck for us be the steadfast Mountains. Luck for us the Rivers and luck be the Waters.
9. Luck for us be Aditi with her commandments; luck for us be the Maruts of good chant.
   Luck for us Viṣṇu and luck be Pūṣan; luck for us (the means of) Creation and luck be the Wind.
10. Luck for us god Savitar who gives protection; luck for us be the widely radiant Dawns.
    Luck be Parjanya for us and for our offspring; luck for us be the Lord of the Dwelling Place, who is Luck itself.

11. Luck for us be the Gods, the All Gods; luck be Sarasvatī along with her insights.
    Luck the Escorts and luck the Gift-Escorts; luck for us the Heavenly ones, the Earthly ones, luck for us the Watery ones.
12. Luck for us be the masters of the real; luck for us the steeds, and luck be the cows.
    Luck for us the R̥bhus of good action and good hands; luck for us be the Fathers at the invocations.
13. Luck for us be god Aja Ekapad; luck for us Ahi Budhnya [/Serpent of the Deep], luck the Sea.
    Luck for us be the swelling Child of the Waters; luck for us be Pr̥śni, who has the gods as her protectors.
14. The Ādityas, the Rudras, the Vasus enjoy this sacred formulation being made here anew.
    Let them hear us—the Heavenly ones, the Earthly ones, the Cow-Born ones, and those who are worthy of the sacrifice.
15. Those who are the sacrificial ones of the sacrificial gods, the occasion of sacrifice for Manu, immortal, knowing the truth, let them grant us wide-ranging space today. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.36 (552) All Gods

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
9 verses: triṣṭubh

Like many All God hymns, this one allots a verse each to a god or group of gods, most named, some not named but obvious from their description, and a few less transparently characterized. The verses whose divinities are clear are 1: Sun; 2: Mitra and Varuṇa; 5: Rudra, 6: Rivers, 7: Maruts (and their mother Pr̥śni?); 8: Aramati, Pūṣan, and Bhaga; 9: Maruts and Viṣṇu. For verse 3 some scholars identify the Wind and Parjanya [Thunder] as the dedicands, but we assign it instead to Soma; verse 4 may belong to both Indra and Aryaman, but we consider aryamán here to be used as a descriptor of Indra, rather than as the name of the third member of the Ādityan triad, since the other descriptors—strong resolution and confounding of the enemy's battle fury—are characteristic of Indra.

The hymn can also be read as a chronological progress through a sacrifice. In verse 1 the fire is kindled at dawn and ritual speech is uttered on the ritual ground. The hymn is mentioned in verse 2, and the preparation of soma in verse 3. The invitation to Indra to come to the sacrifice with his horses is given in verse 4, and the actual sacrifice occurs in verse 5. Although the verse to the rivers (6) does not appear to fit this pattern, it could refer to the waters used to swell the soma stalks

(see also vs. 3) or to other ritual uses of water. The final three verses (7–9) call upon the various gods for wealth and progeny.

1. Let the sacred formulation go forth from the seat of truth. The Sun with his rays has dispatched the cows outward.
   The broad Earth has stretched out on her back. Agni has been kindled on her wide face.
2. This well-twisted (hymn) here do I make anew, like a refreshing drink, for you two, lordly Mitra and Varuṇa.
   One of you two, the strong one, is an undeceivable tracer of the track, and (the other), Mitra, arranges the people in their place when called upon.
3. The movements of the swooping wind come to rest. The sweet (stalks?) have swelled like milk-cows.
   Being born in the seat of great heaven, the bull has roared in the self-same udder.
4. Whoever will yoke with a hymn these two fallow bays of yours, o champion Indra, the two dear ones, good at the chariot, seeking fodder,
   I (as that person) would turn hither the very resolute god of custom [/Aryaman, here = Indra] who confounds the battle fury of the one who wishes to do harm.
5. The reverent ones worship his fellowship and vitality on the domain of truth itself.
   He has thrust outward the fortifying nourishments when being praised by men. This reverence is dearest to Rudra.
6. When the glorious ones are bellowing simultaneously—(the other rivers and) Sarasvatī, whose mother is the Sindhu, as seventh—who are richly fertile, rich in milk, rich in streams, they (come) toward (us), swelling with their own milk.
7. And these Maruts, exulting—let the prizewinners aid our insight and progeny.
   Let not the imperishable (cow? [=Pr̥śni?]) overlook us as she roams. They have increased wealth to be harnessed for us.
8. Set in front of yourselves great Devotion [/Aramati], in front Pūṣan, like a hero deserving of the ceremonial distribution; and Bhaga, who aids this insight of ours, and the prize at its winning, and Plenitude the Gift-Escort.
9. Let this signal-call of ours go to you, o Maruts, to Viṣṇu, who protects the poured out (semen) with his help.
   And let them establish vitality for the singer to produce progeny. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.37 (553) All Gods

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
8 verses: triṣṭubh

Although this hymn is technically dedicated to the All Gods, it is only the R̥bhus and Indra who feature in the hymn proper (R̥bhus esp. vss. 1–2, Indra vss. 3–7), with Savitar addressed in the final verse (8). The association of Indra with the R̥bhus identifies the ritual moment as the Third Pressing, which they share, and since Savitar is often associated with the evening, his presence is also appropriate.

The first four verses concern the sacrifice: the gods come, drink together, and give gifts to the sacrificer and his patrons. In verse 4 Indra is sent home with a final chorus. The next verses change the scene. In verses 5–6 Indra is praised for his help in winning more territory for us, but he seems to be withholding the wealth we expect. The most puzzling verse is 7, which has elicited various interpretations. In our opinion, the "triple kin-bonds" refers to the three-generation model, in which a man is situated conceptually between his father and his sons; this man is threatened by dissolution and premature death, not only of himself but also of his sons, and he approaches Indra for aid, since Indra himself successfully attains old age (an interesting conceit for a "deathless" or "immortal" god). But this interpretation remains uncertain and speculative. The first pāda of the final verse (8) forms a ring with the first pāda of the hymn, and the topic returns to the gifts we expect and hope for.

1. Let the chariot, the best conveyor, convey you here to be praised, o Vājas, R̥bhukṣans—(a chariot) indestructible.
   Fill yourselves to exhilaration with great triple-backed soma drinks at the pressings, you lovely-lipped ones.
2. You confer a treasure on the bounteous (patrons), you R̥bhukṣans of sunlike sight—(a treasure) indestructible.
   Drink together at the sacrifices, autonomous ones. Apportion rewards to us in accordance with our thoughts.
3. Because you, bounteous one, are accustomed to giving at the distribution of goods great and small, both your fists are filled with goods. No (one) will hold back your liberalities, your masses of goods.
4. You, Indra, are the self-glorious R̥bhukṣan. Like a prize reaching its goal, you go home accompanied by verses.
   May we Vasiṣṭhas now be your pious servers, you of the fallow bays, as we prepare the sacred formulation.
5. You regularly gain the (river-)courses just for your pious server, along which you will accomplish your work in accord with your visions, you of the fallow bays.
   We have now won by your help allied (to us). When, Indra, would you show the favor of your wealth to us?

6. You seem to be causing us, your ritual adepts, to bide our time. When will you take notice of our speech, Indra?
   In accord with a papa's vision the fortifying prizewinning steed should carry home to us wealth rich in heroes.
7. Even (a man) toward whom the goddess Disorder extends her dominion—(because) the autumns rich in fortifying nourishment reach Indra, that man of triple kin-bonds draws near to him [=Indra, who is] one who reaches old age—(even a man) whom (other) mortals would render bereft of his own clansmen.
8. Let rewards come here to us to be praised, o Savitar; let the riches of the mountain come here at (the time for) giving.
   Always let the heavenly protector accompany us. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.38 (554) Savitar, except Savitar or Bhaga (6cd), Prizewinning Horses (7–8)

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
8 verses: triṣṭubh

Although the Anukramaṇī assigns most of this hymn to Savitar, with possibly a half-verse to Bhaga and the final two verses to the Vājins (prizewinning horses), it seems more likely to have been an All God hymn in original conception. It is found in the middle of the All God hymns of the VIIth Maṇḍala in proper sequence as to meter and number of verses, and, in addition to Savitar, mentions a number of divinities, including several minor ones found also in the surrounding All God hymns: see especially verse 5 with the Gift-Escorts (also VII.34.22, 23; 35.11; 40.6), Ahi Budhnya (the Serpent of the Deep; also VII.34.17; 35.13), and the Shielding Goddess(es); also VII.34.22; 40.6). The mysterious Ekadhenus (literally, "having a single milk-cow") are found only here. It is not unusual in an All God hymn for a single god to predominate and others to be mentioned only in passing; compare nearby VII.37 with its primary focus on Indra and the R̥bhus.

Savitar's role is most prominent in the first two verses, where, as usual, he stands up and raises his emblem, demonstrating his power to impel and compel. The group of gods known as Vasus praises him in verse 3; Aditi and the Ādityas greet him in verse 4; and, as already mentioned, several minor divinities are found in verse 5. As often, the god Bhaga ("Fortune") is invoked along with Savitar (vss. 1 and 6) as the distributor of goods, which we seek. The last two verses (7–8) concern the "prize-winners" (vājín). This word is frequently a descriptor of horses in competition, and a number of scholars consider the reference here to be actual horses in the human realm. However, the sacrificial context in these two verses is strong, and on the basis of phraseological parallels we consider the referents to be the Maruts (who are called prizewinners in VII.36.7, while the phrase "let the Maruts of good chant be luck for us" is found in VII.35.9).

1. This god Savitar holds up the golden emblem which he has fixed firm.
   Now is Bhaga to be invoked by the sons of Manu—he of many goods who distributes treasures.
2. Stand up, Savitar. Listen, o golden-palmed one, at the (ritual) presentation of this truth, unloosing your emblem wide and broad, impelling mortals' sustenance here for men.
3. Let god Savitar, when praised, be nearby, whom also all the Vasus hymn.
   Let him, worthy of reverence, take delight in our praises. Let him protect the patrons with all his protectors.
4. Whom goddess Aditi greets, taking pleasure in the impulsion of god Savitar,
   (him) do the sovereign kings Varuṇa, Mitra, Aryaman and their allies greet in concert—
5. (As do) those who, zealous in rivalry, serve the gift of Heaven and Earth as Gift-Escorts.
   And let Ahi Budhnya hear us; let the Shielding Goddess defend (us) with the Ekadhenus.
6. Might the Lord of the Family [=Bhaga] concede this treasure of god Savitar's to us, when he is begged for it.
   Bhaga does the powerful one keep calling for help, and Bhaga does the powerless one beg for a treasure.
7. Let these prizewinners [=Maruts]—those of measured pace and lovely chants—be luck for us at the invocations in the divine assembly.
   Crushing the serpent, the wolf, the demonic powers, they will keep afflictions away from us, bag and baggage.
8. Help us to every prize, o prizewinners, when the stakes (are set), you truth-knowing, immortal inspired poets.
   Drink of this honey here; make yourselves exhilarated. Satisfied, drive along the paths that lead to the gods.

VII.39 (555) All Gods

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
7 verses: triṣṭubh

The organizing principle of this hymn is the ritual fire (Agni) and the dawn sacrifice over which he presides. In verse 1 the sacrifice is set in motion; the gods begin to assemble at dawn at the sacrificial ground (vss. 2–3), and Agni is exhorted to perform the sacrifice (vs. 4) and to bring the various gods to it (vs. 5). The poet declares his own contribution to the sacrifice and asks Agni for the appropriate rewards (vs. 6). The final verse (7) summarizes what has gone before, in the name of the Vasiṣṭhas.

Verse 2b contains an impossible hapax, bī́riṭe, phonologically aberrant and morphologically opaque. It is generally taken as "crowd, troop," following Yāska, but, as there is no particular etymological or contextual support for this, we have simply declined to translate it.

1. Agni, erect, has just propped up the favor of the good one. The firebrand goes, facing toward the divine assemblage.
   The two (pressing-)stones take to the path like charioteers. The Hotar, when prompted, will offer a true (hymn) as sacrifice.
2. The one receiving very pleasurable offerings [=Agni] has twisted the ritual grass for them [=gods]. Like two clanlords at [/in] bī́riṭa [?], they hasten here,
   (the clanlords) of clans, at (the coming) of dawn from night, at the Early Invocation—Pūṣan and Vāyu with his team, for well-being.
3. Here on the earth the good ones, the gods have come to rest. The resplendent ones groom themselves in the wide midspace.
   You all who extend widely, make your paths inclined hither. Harken to this messenger of ours [=Agni] who has gone (to you).
4. Because these helpers, worthy to receive sacrifice at the sacrifices, the gods, all surmount the seat, sacrifice to them, who desire it, at the ceremony, o Agni, with obedience—to Bhaga, the Nāsatyas, Plenitude.
5. O Agni, bring Mitra, Varuṇa, and Indra here from heaven and from earth to the hymns and to the fire—also Aryaman, Aditi, Viṣṇu the quick. Let Sarasvatī and the Maruts make themselves exhilarated.
6. I have bestowed an oblation along with poetic thoughts on those worthy of the sacrifice. The insatiable one [=Agni] will attain the desire of mortals.
   Confer inexhaustible ever-winning wealth. Might we be accompanied by the gods, who will now be our yokemates.
7. Now have the two World-Halves been praised by the Vasiṣṭhas, and the truthful ones, Varuṇa, Mitra, and Agni.
   Let the glittering ones hold out to us the utmost chant. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.40 (556) All Gods

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
7 verses: triṣṭubh

The preoccupation of this hymn is the distribution of wealth, to be carried out in orderly and fair fashion by a series of gods, starting in verse 1 with Savitar and Bhaga (Fortune), whose involvement in the apportioning of treasures we met in the nearby hymn VII.38. But a wide variety of gods are implicated in this giving, as well as in providing other help (see vss. 3–4). There is little to attract particular attention in this hymn, save for the sly admonition to Pūṣan not to be jealous of our receiving gifts (vs. 6).

1. Let attentive hearing come together with (speech?) appropriate to the rite of distribution. Might we (properly) aim our praise of the surpassing ones.
   When today god Savitar will give the impetus, may we be at the apportioning of him who possesses treasures [=Bhaga].
2. Let Mitra, Varuṇa, and the two World-Halves, let Indra and Aryaman give us what is apportioned by heaven.
   Let goddess Aditi designate the legacy that both Vāyu and Bhaga will harness.
3. Let him be powerful, Maruts, let him be headstrong—just that mortal whom you will help, you of the dappled horses.
   And Agni and Sarasvatī spur him on. There exists no one who can encompass his wealth.
4. Because this leader of truth, Varuṇa, as well as Mitra and Aryaman, (all) kings, have accomplished their work—and goddess Aditi, easy to invoke and without assault—they will bring us unharmed across difficult straits.
5. There is propitiation for this god who grants rewards [=Rudra], at the ritual offering to quick Viṣṇu, with oblations, for Rudra knows his own Rudrian might. Aśvins, drive your circuit of refreshment.
6. Don't get envious now, glowing Pūṣan, when the Shielding Goddess and the Gift-Escorts will make bestowal.
   Let the steeds who are joy itself protect us. Let Wind in his circling give rain.
7. Now have the two World-Halves been praised by the Vasiṣṭhas, and the truthful ones, Varuṇa, Mitra, and Agni.
   Let the glittering ones hold out to us the utmost chant. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.41 (557) Bhaga, except Assorted Divinities (1) and Dawn (7)

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
7 verses: triṣṭubh, except jagatī 1

Like the last hymn, this one is completely devoted to our acquisition of wealth by distribution, but here the distribution is ascribed almost entirely to Bhaga, the god of Fortune, whose name also means "portion." The hymn begins (vs. 1) with a general invocation of a range of gods in early morning, including Bhaga, but the next five verses (2–5) call insistently on Bhaga, punning several times on his name. The early-morning context of the hymn returns with the last two verses (6–7), concerning the Dawns, who bring Bhaga with them (vs. 6). The final verse, which does not mention Bhaga, is found also in a Dawn hymn later in the VIIth Maṇḍala (VII.80.3) and is clearly extra-hymnic here.

1. At early morning we call on Agni, at early morning on Indra, at early morning on Mitra and Varuṇa, at early morning on the Aśvins; at early morning on Bhaga, Pūṣan, Brahmaṇaspati, at early morning on Soma and Rudra should we call.
2. We should call on the one victorious at early morning, Bhaga the strong, Aditi's son, who is the distributor, to whom even a person who thinks himself weak (and also) even the powerful, even the king says "Apportion me a portion."
3. O Bhaga the leader, o Bhaga whose generosity is real, o Bhaga—promote this poetic insight of ours as you give to us.
   Bhaga, propagate us with cows and horses; Bhaga, might we, possessed of superior men, be preeminent through our men.
4. And just now might we be possessed of portion [/accompanied by Bhaga], and at evening and at the middle of the days, and at the rising of the sun, o bounteous one, might we be in the good grace of the gods.
5. Let Bhaga himself be possessed of portion, o gods. In this way might we be possessed of portion [/accompanied by Bhaga].
   Each and every one constantly calls on you, Bhaga. Become our guide here, Bhaga.
6. The Dawns (will) jointly bow in reverence to the ceremony, like Dadhikrāvan to the gleaming footprint [=sacrificial ground].
   Like prizewinning horses a chariot let them convey the goods-finding Bhaga here in our direction.
7. Let the Dawns, accompanied by horses, by cows, by heroes, dawn always auspicious for us, milking out ghee on all sides, teeming. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.42 (558) All Gods

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
6 verses: triṣṭubh

Like VII.39, this hymn concerns the dawn soma sacrifice and especially Agni's role in it. The hymn begins with a verse expressing the readiness of all the ritual elements. Then Agni takes over and provides the impetus, hitching up his flames in verse 2, and, as he gets larger, performing the sacrifice (vss. 3, 5). In verse 4 Agni (identified as a guest, as often) is asked for the reward that is the expected return for a successful sacrifice. The final verse (6) is a typical summary verse and names Vasiṣṭha as the poet, as in another summary verse in this series (VII.39.7=40.7). Although this is an All God hymn, the participation of named gods other than Agni is limited to verse 5, where they are the simply the recipients of the sacrifice. The mention of Aṅgirases in verse 1 is probably meant as a reference to the poet and the other priests.

1. The Aṅgirases, possessors of the sacred formulation, are reaching forth.
   Let the roar of (the hymn? fire? soma?) that is set to burst out go questing forth.
   The cows swimming in the waters are bellowing forth. The two pressing-stones should be yoked, as the ornament of the ceremony.
2. Easy is your road, Agni, which was found long ago. Yoke your fallow bays and chestnuts when the soma is pressed, or those ruddy ones which, conveying heroes, are at your seat. Seated, I call the races of gods.
3. They magnify the sacrifice for you all with acts of reverence; the gladdening Hotar [=Agni] is projecting in the nearness.
   Sacrifice well to the gods, o you of many faces. You should turn hither Aramati [/Devotion] worthy of the sacrifice.
4. When in the dwelling of a rich hero the guest will show brightly, lying in his comfortable womb, Agni, well pleased, well established in the house, will give to a clan such as this a desirable reward.
5. Enjoy this ceremony of ours, o Agni. Make it glorious for us among the Maruts and Indra.
   Then sit here on the ritual grass night and dawn. Sacrifice here to Mitra and Varuṇa, who desire it.
6. Just in this way Vasiṣṭha, desirous of wealth (like) the distillate of all mother's milk, praised powerful Agni.
   He will spread out refreshment, wealth, and victory's prize for us. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.43 (559) All Gods

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
5 verses: triṣṭubh

This hymn has even less interest in individual gods than the most recent in this All God series. Instead the sacrifice is again the focus: it is set in motion in verses 1–2, with the priests exhorted to perform the ritual actions in the latter verse. The gods' attendance is described in verses 3–4, and the poet's relative indifference to their individual identities is expressed in the phrase "however many you are" at the end of verse 4. Appropriate to the ritual focus, Agni is the only god named (besides a glancing reference to Heaven and Earth in vs. 1), and his actions and companionship are crucial to our well-being.

1. At the sacrifices those seeking the gods chant forth for you all to Heaven and Earth with acts of reverence, in order to prosper—those whose unequalled, inspired sacred formulations go questing in divergent directions like the branches of a tree.
2. Let the sacrifice go forth, like a team to be spurred on. Being of one mind, hold up the (ladles) facing toward the ghee; spread the ritual grass that brings success to the ceremony. The flames, seeking the gods, have stood up erect.
3. Like piggyback children on their mother, let the gods sit on the back of the ritual grass.
   Let (the ladle) facing in all directions anoint (the speech?) appropriate to the rite of distribution. O Agni, do not make us negligent in our attendance on the gods.
4. Those worthy of sacrifices do service to themselves according to their pleasure, milking for themselves the good milkers, the streams of truth.
   Preeminent is the greatness of you good ones here today: come here, being of one mind, however many you are.
5. In just this way, o Agni, show favor to our clans. In company with you, o mighty one, with wealth as our yokemate, we feasting companions are free from harm. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.44 (560) Dadhikrā, except Assorted Divinities (1)

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
5 verses: triṣṭubh, except jagatī 1

Like VII.41, this hymn begins with a verse in jagatī calling on a number of gods, especially those associated with the dawn ritual, and including the figure that will be the subject of most of the rest of the hymn, in this case the celebrated racehorse Dadhikrā(van). (See IV.38–40 for other hymns devoted to Dadhikrā; the last two [39—40] also show significant dawn associations.) Unlike VII.41, however, where the god who is subject of the rest of the hymn, Bhaga, holds the stage essentially alone after the first verse, Dadhikrā shares each of the subsequent verses with a number of gods, again primarily characteristic of the dawn ritual.

The most difficult verse is 3, not coincidentally the middle verse, whose third pāda contains two color terms as addressees and a next-to-impossible hapax (mām̐ścatóḥ), whose meaning is hotly disputed. Most commentators interpret the color terms as referring to other horses. Our interpretation is quite different and unavoidably speculative, but rather than introducing two otherwise unknown horses, we identify the two addressees as gods associated with the ritual. In our view the hapax refers to the two twilights (literally, "the time of the hiding of the moon," originally applied just to dawn), and the copper-colored one is the sun, whose color is reddish at rising and setting, while the reddish-brown one is soma: the same color term is used of soma a number of times.

Though it is not entirely clear why Dadhikrā is so strongly associated with the dawn, it may be significant that the priestly gifts (dakṣiṇā) are distributed at the dawn ritual and horses are among the most prized of these gifts. In most of this hymn the equine aspects of Dadhikrā are not emphasized, except for vs. 4, unlike the Dadhikrā hymns in Maṇḍala IV.

1. Upon Dadhikrā as the first, upon the Aśvins and Dawn, upon the kindled Agni and Bhaga, do I call for your sake for help, upon Indra, Viṣṇu, Pūṣan, and Brahmaṇaspati, upon the Ādityas, Heaven and Earth, the Waters, and the Sun.
2. Awakening Dadhikrā with homage, rousing ourselves and reverently approaching the sacrifice, seating the goddess Refreshment on the ritual grass, we would call upon the Aśvins, inspired poets easy to call.
3. To Dadhikrāvan and Agni do I speak on having awakened, and to Dawn, the Sun, and the Cow, to the one of Varuṇa who is copper-colored at the twilights [=sun?] and to the reddish-brown one [=soma?]. Let them keep all difficulties away from us.
4. Dadhikrāvan becomes the foremost prizewinning steed at the forefront of the chariots, as the foreknowing one, being in accord with Dawn and the Sun, with the Ādityas, Vasus, and Aṅgirases.
5. Let Dadhikrā anoint our pathway, for us to follow along the path of truth.
   Let the divine troop and Agni hear us. Let all the buffaloes, who are never fooled, hear us.

VII.45 (561) Savitar

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
4 verses: triṣṭubh

This simple hymn concentrates on Savitar as giver of goods and human necessities, though several of his other characteristic acts are mentioned, notably the raising of his golden arms (vs. 2) and the daily bringing to rest and impelling forth of the living world (vs. 1).

1. Let god Savitar drive here, possessed of good treasure, filling the midspace, journeying with his horses, holding many things meant for men in his hand, bringing the world to rest and impelling it forth.
2. His two golden arms, pliant and lofty, have reached up to the ends of heaven.
   Now this greatness of his has been marveled at. Even the sun has ceded to him his task.
3. The overpowering god Savitar will impel good things here as the lord of goods.
   Spreading wide his broad emblem, he will then grant to us the sustenance for mortals.
4. These songs here reverently invoke Savitar of good tongue and good palms, whose fists are full.
   Let him confer on us brilliant, lofty vigor. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.46 (562) Rudra

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
4 verses: jagatī 1–3, triṣṭubh 4

This brief hymn primarily begs Rudra to restrain his characteristic power to do harm, though it also mentions in passing his healing and helpful gifts (vss. 3–4).

1. Bring these songs to Rudra, whose bow is taut and whose arrow is swift, to the god of independent power, to the unvanquishable, vanquishing adept whose weapons are sharp. Let him hear us.
2. For in consequence of his dwelling place he takes cognizance of the earthly race and, in consequence of his universal rule, of the heavenly.
   Providing help, proceed toward our doors that provide help (in return). Bring no affliction to our children, Rudra.
3. The missile of yours, which, shot downward from heaven, circles around the earth—let it avoid us.

A thousand are your remedies, o you who are our familiar. Do no harm to our offspring and descendants.

4. Do not smite us, Rudra. Do not deliver us up. Let us not be in the toils of you in your anger.
   Give us a share in the ritual grass and in the praise of the living. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.47 (563) Waters

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
4 verses: triṣṭubh

The waters are celebrated here primarily in their ritual employment, in the preparation of soma—though soma itself is not explicitly mentioned. These waters come to be replaced by the rivers in the last two verses (3–4), but their physical characteristics are not mentioned either. However, the final pāda before the refrain (4c) alludes to the rivers' making "wide space" for us, quite possibly an allusion to the enlarging of the Ārya territory by crossing and conquering rivers.

1. O Waters, your wave of refreshments that those devoted to the gods made Indra's first drink—it, gleaming and unbesmirched, showering ghee and filled with honey, might we win today.
2. That wave of yours, o Waters, most filled with honey—let the Child of the Waters who impels swift (horses) help it.
   That on which Indra, along with the Vasus, will bring himself to exhilaration, that one of yours might we, seeking the gods, attain today.
3. Possessing a hundred filters, delighting in their independent power, the goddesses [=Waters] merge into the fold of the gods.
   They do not confound the commandments of Indra. To the rivers pour an oblation filled with ghee.
4. Toward whom the sun has stretched out with its rays, for whom Indra has dug out a way, a wave, do you, o Rivers, provide wide space for us. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.48 (564) Ṛbhus

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
4 verses: triṣṭubh

The three Ṛbhus are most commonly named Ṛbhu, Vāja, and Vibhvan, and they stand alongside Indra, who is sometimes called ṛbhukṣán "Master of the Ṛbhus," although ṛbhukṣán can also be a description or name for Ṛbhu, as it clearly is in 3c and must also be in 1a. Here as elsewhere the three Ṛbhus can be invoked by the name of any one of them in the plural. A partial exception is that the stem vibhván or víbhvan is replaced by víbhū or vibhú in the plural to name Vibhvan and the other two Ṛbhus. Further, in this hymn verse 2 employs víbhvaḥ as an equivalent to víbhvā(m̐), the nominative of Vibhvan. Although the use of the plural of one name to designate the three gods is peculiar in translation, we have retained the Vedic idiom to avoid prolonging the addresses to the gods.

The complex mixing of stems and singular and plural forms in such a short hymn suggests that the poet is deliberately drawing attention to the names of the Ṛbhus and their meanings. Such a strategy is probably behind the repetitions in verse 2, which mentions "Ṛbhu with the Ṛbhus," then "Vibhvan" (or more accurately "Vibhva") "with the Vibhus," and "Vāja… in winning the vā́ja." The meaning of ṛbhú is approximately "craftsman," víbhū and vibhú are "far-ranging," and vā́ja is "prize." These are all things or imply qualities that the sacrificers want, and indeed in 2ab the poet asks that the sacrificers be a "Ṛbhu" or "a craftsman" and a "Vibhvan" or "far-ranging" in the company of Ṛbhus and Vibhus in order to win a vā́ja, a prize.

1. O Ṛbhukṣans, o Vājas, among us find exhilaration in our pressed soma, o generous men.
   Like travelers' intentions, let them [=your horses] make you, who are turned this way, and your manly chariot roll here, o Vibhūs.
2. As Ṛbhu with the Ṛbhus, as Vibhvan with the Vibhus, we would overcome vast powers by your vast powers.
   Let Vāja help us in winning the prize (vā́ja). With Indra as our yokemate, we would overcome our Vṛtra [=obstacle].
3. Because these very ones [=Indra and the Ṛbhus] overcome many (commands) by their command, they conquer (even) in the face of the superiority of the outsider.
   Indra, Vibhvan, Ṛbhukṣan, and Vāja will put away the manliness of the outsider and of the rival by confronting it.
4. O gods, now make for us wide space. Be of one accord to help us.
   The good (gods) should give refreshment to us. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.49 (565) Waters

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
4 verses: triṣṭubh

In contrast to VII.47, the waters in this hymn have more physical definition: in particular, verse 2 gives a notable typology of types of water: "heavenly waters" (rain),

"those that flow" (rivers), "those found by digging" (well water), and "those that arise by themselves" (springs)—all of which end by flowing into the sea. But the purity and purifying power of flowing waters, noted in the first three verses, gives them a moral as well as a physical quality, and in verse 3 the god Varuṇa in his role as observer and judge of human actions is found among them. From passages like this it is easy to see how Varuṇa came to be so closely associated with the waters, a dominant characteristic of Varuṇa in later times. Verse 4 moves from the physical and moral to the ritual realm, to the employment of water in the soma sacrifice, the theme that prevailed in VII.47.

1. They come from the middle of the (heavenly?) ocean, those whose chief is the sea—becoming pure, never settling down, whom the mace-bearing Indra, the bull, dug out—let those waters, goddesses, help me here.
2. The heavenly waters, or those that flow, or are found by digging, or arise by themselves, those, clear and pure, whose goal is the sea—let those waters, goddesses, help me here.
3. In the middle of which King Varuṇa travels, looking down upon the truth and falsehood of the peoples, those, clear and pure, that drip honey—let those waters, goddesses, help me here.
4. Among which King Varuṇa, among which Soma, among which all the gods take their nourishment for exhilaration, into which Agni Vaiśvānara entered—let those waters, goddesses, help me here.

VII.50 (566) Mitra and Varuṇa (1), Agni (2), the All Gods (3), the Rivers (4)

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
4 verses: jagatī 1–3, atijagatī or śakvarī 4

This is one of the relatively few healing hymns in the Ṛgveda. The hymn is included among those to the waters because of the last verse invoking the rivers for their help. For a translation of the hymn and notes on the various lexical problems in it, see Zysk (1985: 28 and 130–32).

The afflictions against which this hymn is recited center on the feet. The reference to the "creeping thing" in the refrain of 1–3 led Velankar (1963) to propose that the hymn is for treatment against different kinds of poison but especially against snake venom. However, the symptoms and the causes of the foot problems, even though they are too unclear to determine, appear to be varied. Zysk (p. 131) identifies the "creeping thing" as the ajakāva (vs. 1), "an evil-looking, crawling animal. . . which was known to have lived under the skin and to have formed a swelling or eruption" (pp. 25–26). However, the ajakāva could also be referred to in 1b and therefore be an ulcer or a swelling, if, as Renou (EVP XVI: 111) suggests, "the nesting thing" is a skin lesion in contrast to a "swelling thing" on the skin. Likewise, we cannot identify the vijāman joint, although it could be located in the foot, since the eruption apparently spreads from it to the ankles and knees. And, as Zysk (pp. 131–32) argues, the last verse probably refers to two kinds of female demons, the śipadā and śimidā, who polluted waters and caused the foot problems.

1. Guard me here, Mitra and Varuṇa. Do not let the nesting or the swelling thing come upon us.
   I put the ajakāva of vile appearance out of sight. – Let not the creeping thing find me, bringing a disease of the foot.
2. What eruption will appear on the vijāman joint and will become smeared over the knees and ankles, let blazing Agni force that away from here. – Let not the creeping thing find me, bringing a disease of the foot.
3. What poison is in the silk cotton tree, what in streams, and what is produced from plants, let the All Gods propel that away from here. – Let not the creeping thing find me, bringing a disease of the foot.
4. (The rivers) that are from the slope, depth, and height, those that are filled with water and those empty of water—let (these) kindly (river-)goddesses, swelling with (waters as their) milk, become for us free of śipadā-demons, let all the rivers become free of śimidā-demons.

VII.51 (567) Ādityas

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
3 verses: triṣṭubh

This hymn is a general exhortation to the Ādityas to protect the sacrifice, keeping its performance in "offenselessness" (adititvá), in accordance with their character as sons of Aditi, the goddess who represents offenselessness or innocence. In the later rite the offering of soma to Mitra and Varuṇa (as well as to the other dual divinities) takes place in the morning and that to the Ādityas (as well as to other divine collectives) in the evening. The gods in the last verse are worshiped at various times in the sacrificial day, but there appears to be an emphasis on gods associated with the evening rite: the Ādityas, All Gods, R̥bhus, and even the Aśvins, who are connected with both the morning and the evening rituals.

1. We would be accompanied by the present help of the Ādityas and by their most luck-bringing protection.

Let the overpowering ones establish this sacrifice in guiltlessness and in offenselessness (adititvá), listening (to us).

2. Let the Ādityas and Aditi find exhilaration, let Mitra, Aryaman, and Varuṇa, who are the most straightforward.
   Let the herdsmen of the living world be ours. Let them drink the soma to help us today.
3. All the Ādityas, and all the Maruts, and the All Gods, and all the R̥bhus, Indra, Agni, and the two Aśvins, (all) being praised. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.52 (568) Ādityas

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
3 verses: triṣṭubh

This short and probably late hymn has a number of unusual features. In verse 1 the poet describes himself and his fellow sacrificers as áditi "offenseless," and because they are áditi they are also ādityá "Ādityas" or "sons of Aditi." This is a surprising claim, and Geldner understandably softens it by turning the metaphor into a simile. According to him, the poet asks that he and his people be offenseless like Ādityas. Were we to adopt Geldner's approach, then in 1b we could supply a different verb form and translate "there should be for us a fortress" (so Geldner) or "you [=Ādityas] should be for us a fortress." This solution is attractive since gods are called fortresses in, for example, I.189.2 and VII.95.1. But there is no signal in the text for the simile or for the ellipsis, and therefore, albeit with considerable hesitation, we have translated the verse as if the speakers embody the "offenseless" gods. That theme of offenselessness is continued in the next verse, in which the poet begs that he and the sacrificers not be held responsible for the evil actions done by others.

In the last verse the poet speaks of the presence of the Aṅgirases in this sacrifice, which suggests that the present priests now embody the legendary Aṅgiras priests, a claim implicitly made elsewhere as well. The appeal to Savitar, who is associated with the evening, and in verse 3d the reference to the All Gods, who in the later rite receive offerings at the Third Pressing, place this hymn in that soma-pressing. The identity of the "father" (vs. 3c) remains mysterious. Sāyaṇa identifies him as Varuṇa since Varuṇa and Mitra are the fathers of Vasiṣṭha (cf. VII.33.11–13), but there is little basis for associating Varuṇa here with either the Aṅgirases or the All Gods.

1. We would be offenseless (áditi) sons of Aditi, and a fortress among gods and mortals, o Vasus.
   Winning (this) we would win, o Mitra and Varuṇa. Becoming (this) we would become greater, o Heaven and Earth.
2. Mitra, Varuṇa, (and the other Vasus) will be ready to give us this: protection as our herdsmen for our kith and kin.

Let us not suffer the guilt toward you that is born from another. Let us not do that which you avenge, o Vasus.

3. The swift Aṅgirases have reached here, begging treasure of the god Savitar; our great father, worthy of the sacrifice, and the All Gods, of one mind, will find pleasure in this.

VII.53 (569) Heaven and Earth

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
3 verses: triṣṭubh

Heaven and Earth here figure just as objects of worship, not as physically conceived entities. Verses 1–2 emphasize their antiquity and the antiquity of the poetic celebration of them, while verse 3 asks, as usual, for their gifts.

1. I urgently invoke Heaven and Earth, the lofty ones worthy of the sacrifice, with sacrifices and acts of reverence, for the ancient poets who also hymned them set in front those two great ones whose sons are the gods.
2. With newer hymns bring forward into the seat of truth the two ancient-born parents.
O Heaven and Earth, journey here to us with the divine folk. Great is your protection.
3. And because there exist many occasions for you to provide treasures to the good giver [/Sudās], o Heaven and Earth, provide for us something that will not be stunted. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.54 (570) Lord of the Dwelling Place (Vāstoṣpati)

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
3 verses: triṣṭubh

This short hymn (but also see the first verse of the next one) is addressed to the personified guardian spirit of the house and household and in later ritual is recited for entry into a new house.

1. O Lord of the Dwelling Place, greet us. Become easy to enter and without affliction for us.
When we entreat you, favor us in return: become weal for our two-footed, weal for our four-footed.

2. O Lord of the Dwelling Place, be one who furthers us, fattening the livestock with cows, with horses, o drop.
   In your companionship might we be unaging. Like a father his sons, favor us in return.
3. O Lord of the Dwelling Place, might we be accompanied by your capable fellowship, joy-bringing, providing the way.
   Protect us at will in peace and war. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.55 (571) Lord of the Dwelling Place (Vāstoṣpati) (1), Sleep Incantations (2–8)

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
8 verses: gāyatrī 1, upariṣṭādbr̥hatī 2–4, anuṣṭubh 5–8

As was noted in the introduction to VII.54, the first verse of this hymn, dedicated to the Lord of the Dwelling Place, really belongs with the previous hymn—though it was not simply wrongly divided from that hymn: it is in a different meter, and the final verse of VII.54 ends with the Vasiṣṭha clan refrain, which is always the final pāda of the hymns in which it is found.

What follows this first verse is one of the most beloved and most delightful of R̥gvedic hymns, a sleep charm, a species of lullaby. It is divided into two parts by the meter (vss. 2–4, 5–8), but forms a conceptual unity. Verses 2–4 are addressed to a dog, presumably a watchdog barking in the night, who is urged to go to sleep. The dog is given a grand metronymic, "son of Saramā," the legendary bitch of Indra, who on Indra's behalf tracked down the cows stolen by the Paṇis and retrieved them, in the memorable dialogue hymn X.108.

The next two verses (5–6) are an incantatory listing of each member of the household, sending them all to sleep one by one (reminiscent of the modern American children's book Goodnight Moon). The next verse (7) puts them all to sleep with the moonrise, with the final verse devoted to an intriguing set of unidentified women falling asleep wherever they happen to be. This fleeting picture of somnolent ladies reminds us of several similar famous scenes in much later Indian literature, such as the sleeping *rākṣasī*s in Rāvaṇa's household in Laṅka in the Rāmāyaṇa (V.7.30–62, 8.30–46) and the sleeping women whose fleshy sensuality disgusts Siddhārtha, the future Buddha, in Aśvaghoṣa's Buddhacarita (V.47–67).

A number of fanciful scenarios have been devised, both ancient and modern, Indian and Western, as the backstory of this hymn, but this creative plotting seems unnecessary: the hymn can be simply enjoyed for itself.

1. Destroying affliction, o Lord of the Dwelling Place, entering all forms, be a companion well disposed to us.

2. When, o silvery son of Saramā, you bare your teeth, tawny one, they glint like spears, in the jaws of (you) who are snapping. Go to sleep!
3. Bark at the thief, o son of Saramā, or at the robber, you who lunge (at them) again and again.
   You are barking at the praisers of Indra. Why do you torment us? Go to sleep!
4. Keep tearing at the boar; let the boar keep tearing at you.
   You are barking at the praisers of Indra. Why do you torment us? Go to sleep!
5. Let the mother sleep, let the father sleep; let the dog sleep, let the clanlord sleep.
   Let all the relations sleep; let this folk round about sleep.
6. Whoever sits still and whoever wanders, and whoever sees us—such folk—their eyes do we slam shut—just like this house.
7. The thousand-horned bull who rises up from the sea [=moon], with this mighty one we make the folks sleep.
8. The ladies lying on benches, those lying on litters, those lying on beds, the women of pleasant scent—all these do we make sleep.

VII.56 (572) Maruts

25 verses: dvipadā virāj 1–11, triṣṭubh 12–25

This hymn is structured like VII.34, an All God hymn, in that the first part is in the short dvipadā meter and the second part in triṣṭubh, although the proportions of verses in each meter are different. It also shares a final verse with VII.34, a generic plea for the gods' protection. But in content there is little in common between the two hymns.

This hymn begins with four verses about the birth and identity of the Maruts, alluding both to their mysterious generation from Pṛśni (see esp. vs. 4) and the paradox that they are both identical ("belonging to the same nest," vs. 1) and separate and rivalrous. This theme then disappears from the hymn, save for several references to their plural "names" (vss. 10, 14; we of course know them only under one name, "Maruts"). The rest of the dvipadā section (vss. 5–11) is essentially descriptive, of their power, beauty, and accoutrements.

Although this celebration of the Maruts' qualities continues in the triṣṭubh portion, there is also a significant ritual component, initiated in the first half of verse 12. Subsequent verses make clear what ritual is involved: in verse 14 it is said that they are worshiped at the beginning of the sacrifice, and they are invited to enjoy the House-offering; in verse 16 they are called "playful." In middle Vedic ritual the third and last of the "Four-monthly" (Cāturmāsyāni) rituals is the Sākamedha, celebrated in the autumn. On the day before the Sākamedha day proper, the Maruts receive two oblations—thus, they are worshiped at the beginning of the sacrifice. Moreover, the second of these two oblations is the "House-offering" (Gr̥hamedhīya). And on the next day there is an offering to the "playful Maruts," using the same word that describes their behavior in verse 16d. (For further reference to the Maruts at the Sākamedha in this Marut cycle, see VII.59.9–10. On the ritual itself see, e.g., Hillebrandt 1897: 117–19; Keith 1925: 322–23.)

As usual, offerings to the gods prompt us to ask for reciprocal benefits from the gods, and these requests occupy much of the remaining verses (17–24), with the final refrain verse (25) extending the requests to other gods as well. The last few request verses specific to the Maruts (vss. 22–24) ask for their help in battles over land and waters, alluding presumably to the Ārya expansion.

1. Who, separately, are these anointed superior men who belong to the same nest—the young bloods of Rudra, possessing good horses?
2. For no one knows their (separate) births.
   But certainly they know, mutually, each his own separate means of begetting.
3. They sprinkled each other mutually, each with his own self-purifying (rain drops? semen?).
   The falcons with the wind's roar contended among themselves.
4. These are the secrets the insightful one perceives:
   what great Pr̥śni bore as her udder.
5. Let this clan be possessed of good heroes in (the form of) Maruts, the clan prevailing from of old, fostering its manly power.
6. Best driving their drive, most beautiful in beauty, supplied with splendor, strong with strengths—
7. Strong is your strength, steadfast your forces. Thus the flock with its Maruts is powerful.
8. Beautiful is your bluster, raging are the minds of the bold troop, like a raving ecstatic.
9. Keep your missile away from us, with all its gear;
   let your ill-will not reach us here.
10. I call the dear names of you precipitate ones, when you are here bellowing to your hearts' content, o Maruts.
11. They are possessed of good weapons and arrows, of lovely neck-ornaments, and are themselves beautifying their own bodies.

12. Gleaming are the oblations for you gleaming ones, o Maruts. I set in motion a gleaming ceremonial course for the gleaming ones.
    By truth the servers of truth came to reality—the gleaming ones of gleaming birth, pure.

13. On your shoulders, Maruts, are spangles, on your breasts brilliants are being set.
Like lightning flashes shining forth with the rains, (you are) holding yourselves ready with your weapons according to your nature.
14. Your deep-grounded great powers rise forth. Set forth your names, you who are worshiped at the forefront of the sacrifice.
Enjoy this thousandfold domestic portion of the House-offering, o Maruts.
15. If, Maruts, you give study to what is praised in just this way at the invocation of the prizewinning inspired poet, right away give of wealth consisting of heroes, which another man, a non-giver, will never swindle.
16. The Maruts, well directed like racehorses—the young bloods beautify themselves to look like wondrous apparitions; they are beautiful like children who live in a grand house, playful like calves still suckling.
17. Showing favor, let the Maruts be merciful to us, as they make the two well-fixed world-halves spacious.
Let your cow-smiting, man-smiting weapon stay at a distance. With benevolent thoughts bow to us, good ones.
18. The Hotar, once installed, keeps calling for your giving to be completely directed hither, Maruts, while he is himself being hymned.
He who is the herdsman of such (wealth), o bulls, without duplicity he calls upon you with solemn words.
19. These Maruts here bring the hasty to a halt; they make might bow to might.
They protect the laud from the rapacious; they establish heavy hatred for the ungenerous.
20. These Maruts here spur on even the feeble, likewise also the whirlwind, in whatever way the good ones please.
Thrust aside the dark shades, o bulls. Confer all life and lineage on us.
21. Let us not miss out on your gift, o Maruts; let us not lag behind at the distribution, o charioteers.
Give us a share in the goods we crave, whatever you have of good quality, o bulls.
22. When the peoples, the champions clash together in frenzies at (contests for) the boisterous (rivers), the plants, and the clans, then, o Maruts, Rudriyas, become our rescuers in the battles with the stranger.
23. Maruts, you have given rise to many solemn speeches from the Forefathers, which have been recited to you long since:

along with the Maruts the strong one is the victor in battles; just along with the Maruts does the charger win the prize.

24. Beside us let there be a forceful hero, o Maruts, who is lord and apportioner for the people, with whom we might cross over the waters to good dwelling. Then, (thanks to) you, might we dominate our own home.
25. Indra, Varuṇa, Mitra, Agni, the waters, the plants, the trees shall enjoy this of ours.
 May we be in the shelter, in the lap of the Maruts. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.57 (573) Maruts

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
7 verses: triṣṭubh

Ritual offering to the Maruts is the subject of this whole hymn, although, unlike the preceding hymn, no specific ritual is referred to. The hymn begins with an invitation offered to the Maruts to the sacrificial "honey" (soma), an invitation phrased in a way very close to the English idiom indicating potential possession "has their name on it" (at least in our interpretation). They travel to the sacrifice and, having received the guest reception, are asked to sit on the ritual grass, to receive the oblation (vs. 2). The sacrifice is successfully concluded in verse 5, and their help and gifts requested. The last two verses (6–7) seem to be a summary of the ritual process—in 6 they are urged to come in pursuit of oblations, in 7 to come in order to give help in return—the two verses being unified by the opening "when praised."

Verse 4 is somewhat odd in a Marut context. Although it is common to beg the Maruts to keep their missile away from us (see, e.g., the preceding hymn, VII.56.9), the reference to an "offense" committed by us humans is more appropriate to a Varuṇa or Āditya context: see especially the use of the term in the Vasiṣṭha-Varuṇa hymns later in this maṇḍala (VII.86.4, 87.7, 88.6), since the Maruts are not usually associated with moral issues (though see vs. 5 in the next hymn, VII.58). Much more typical is the lovely description of the glittering Maruts in verse 3.

1. Your honey has the name "Marut," o you who deserve the sacrifice. At the sacrifices they become invigorated with its strength:
 they who set even the two wide world-halves to trembling, the mighty ones swell the wellspring, when they have journeyed.
2. It's surely the Maruts who take note of the singer, who lead forward the thought of the sacrificer.
 Sit on our ritual grass today, having been graciously received, to pursue (the oblations) at the rites of distribution.

3. The others do not glitter like these Maruts here, with their brilliants, their weapons, their bodies.
   All adorned, themselves adorning the two world-halves, they smear a common unguent on themselves for beauty.
4. Let your missile stay aside, Maruts. When we will do offense to you in our human fashion, let us not come into its way [=missile], o you who deserve the sacrifice. Let your most delightful favor rest in us.
5. The Maruts have taken pleasure in what has been done here [=sacrifice]—those faultless, gleaming, pure ones.
   Promote us with your favors, o you who deserve the sacrifice. Further us with prizes for our thriving.
6. And, when praised by all their names, let the Maruts, superior men, pursue the oblations.
   Give of immortality to our progeny; awaken riches, liberalities, bounties.
7. When praised, o Maruts, come hither, all of you in your totality, with help to the patrons, who, possessing hundreds, strengthen us by themselves. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.58 (574) Maruts

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
6 verses: triṣṭub

A description of the fearsome power of the Maruts, embodiments of the thunderstorm, begins the hymn (vss. 1–2), but the topic turns to their power to help the poet and his patrons in verses 3–4, with the mythic model, their aid to Indra, invoked briefly in verse 4. In verse 5 the potential anger of the Maruts is mentioned, and we seek to atone for whatever act occasioned it. Like the human offense punished in verse 4 of the previous hymn, VII.57, this moral tone is somewhat out of place in a Marut hymn. However, here the reference to the Maruts' father, Rudra the punisher and healer, provides a better context for this scene of anger and atonement. The final verse (6) is a summary verse, referring to the performance in the immediate past of the praise hymn that constitutes the first five verses.

1. Chant forth to the flock, grown strong all together, which has the power of its divine nature.
   They pound the two world-halves with their greatness; they reach to the vault from chaos, from propless (space).
2. Even your birth, Maruts, (was attended) by turbulence, you fearsome ones, of powerful battle fury, unruly, who stand out because of their great powers and their strength.

Everyone who sees the sun takes fear at your journey.

3. Impart lofty vigor to our bounteous (patrons). Only the Maruts shall enjoy our good praise.
Like a road when it's traveled, (the flock) will bring the people across; may it further us with the help we crave.
4. Aided by you, Maruts, the inspired poet gets hundreds; aided by you, the charger is victorious, bringing thousands; aided by you, (Indra) is sovereign king and smites Vṛtra. Let this giving of yours stand out, you shakers.
5. I seek to entice here these (sons) of Rudra the rewarder. Surely the Maruts will bow to us again?
If they are angry in secret, if openly, we make recompense for this transgression to the forceful ones.
6. The good praise hymn of the bounteous ones has been proclaimed: this is the hymn the Maruts enjoy.
Even from a distance keep away hatred, you bulls. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.59 (575) Maruts (1–11), Rudra (12)

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
12 verses: bṛhatī alternating with satobṛhatī 1–6, arranged in pragāthas, triṣṭubh 7–8, gāyatrī 9–11, anuṣṭubh 12

As the variety of meters suggests, this is a composite hymn, with some of the sections clearly appended at the end of the Marut sequence. Its length confirms this analysis, since the previous hymn contained only six verses.

The first six verses consist of three pairs of pragāthas concerning the ritual service offered first to a collection of gods (vs. 1, probably vs. 2) and then particularly to the Maruts (vss. 3–6) and the benefits that accrue to the sacrificer. Vasiṣṭha names himself in verse 3. This six-verse sequence conforms to the numerical pattern of the Marut cycle and could have been original to it. The following two triṣṭubh verses (7–8) continue the same theme, though more vividly. In particular, in verse 7 the Maruts are compared to "dark-backed geese," preening themselves in secret and then flying here. This may be a reference to how quickly storms can seem to arise, with thunderclouds fully developed ("preened in secret").

The last four verses are clearly late additions. They make reference to the Sākamedha rite encountered also in VII.56.14, the last of the Four-monthly rituals described in middle Vedic texts. In verse 9 the Maruts are called "descendants of the scorcher" (sā́ṃtapana), in verse 10 "sharers of the House-offering" (gṛ́hamedha); at the Sākamedha the Maruts as Sāṃtapana receive an offering at midday, and in the evening as Gr̥hamedha. The final verse (12), in a different meter, is dedicated to "Tryambaka," an epithet of Rudra. The Sākamedha ends with an oblation to Rudra Tryambaka.

1. Whom you safeguard, o gods, and whom you lead right up here, to him—o Agni, Varuṇa, Mitra, Aryaman, Maruts—extend shelter.
2. With the help of you, o gods, on a favorable day the one who has sacrificed crosses over hatreds.
   He furthers his dwelling place, ex(tends) his great refreshments, who does ritual service to your liking.

3. Vasiṣṭha will certainly not neglect even the last of you:
   when our (soma) is pressed today, o Maruts, drink it avidly, all of you.
4. Your help in battles certainly does not desert him to whom you have granted it, o men.
   Your favor has turned here anew. Drive straightaway, you who desire to drink.

5. You of ardent generosity, drive here to drink the stalks.
   Here are the oblations for you, o Maruts. Because I have bestowed them, don't go somewhere else.
6. Sit here on our ritual grass and undertake to give us coveted goods.
   O unfailing Maruts, you will exhilarate yourselves here on the somian honey—Hail!

7. Surely even in secret they keep preening their bodies. The dark-backed geese have flown here.
   As a whole troop you have sat down all around me, like battle-lusty men, becoming exhilarated on the pressing.
8. O Maruts, whoever, being evilly angry at us and at cross-purposes, seeks to strike us, you good ones, may he be fastened to the fetters of deceit. With your most scorching stroke strike him.

9. You descendants of the scorcher, Maruts, enjoy this oblation here.
   (Come here) with your help, you who care for the stranger.
10. Come here, you sharers of the House-offering—Maruts, don't stay away—with your help, you of good drops.
11. Here, just here—you self-strong, sun-skinned poets—
    I will you (to come) here to (my) sacrifice, o Maruts.

12. We sacrifice to Tryambaka the fragrant, increaser of prosperity.
    Like a cucumber from its stem, might I be freed from death, not from deathlessness.

VII.60 (576) Mitra and Varuṇa

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
12 verses: triṣṭubh

The opening four verses describe the rising Sun, who watches over the good and evil that people do. As such, he is the agent of Mitra, Varuṇa, and Aryaman, since they are the gods whose central character is to govern the actions of mortals. In verses 3–4 the poet blends the offerings that rise to the gods at dawn with the antelopes of the Sun that carry him aloft. These antelopes are "rich in ghee" (vs. 3), as the offerings would be. In verse 4 the "strengthening, honeyed ones" are primarily the offerings given to Mitra and Varuṇa, but juxtaposed to the Sun's ascent and to the description of his antelopes, they also become reflections of these antelopes, lifting the Sun to the heaven. In 4cd the Ādityas clear a path for the Sun, and this image leads to the principal theme of the succeeding verses and of the hymn itself—the ability of the Ādityas to lead even through difficult circumstances. The Ādityas keep away those who oppose the truths they embody (vs. 5), and they guide even those who may not understand their truths (vss. 6–7). The "unwinking, perceptive ones" in 7a might be the gods themselves, although they could also be the spies of Mitra and Varuṇa, who are described in similar ways (cf. VII.61.3, 5) and who would be present both in heaven and on earth (cf. VI.61.3).

If there is benefit in following the Ādityas, there is also danger in not doing so. The poet warns of the anger of the Ādityas (vs. 8), the hostility of Aryaman (vs. 9), the secret attack they can bring, and the hidden strength they possess (vs. 10). All this leaves the poet and his people "trembling" (vs. 10) before them. The sense of danger, either from those who do not follow the ways of the Ādityas or from not following those ways, is strongly articulated in the second half of the hymn. It is also here that the hymn designates Sudās, the king, as the special recipient of the Ādityas' protection and mercy (vss. 8, 9). This may point toward a time in which the king and his people were trying to find and to establish a settlement after the normal period of migration and battle, a time that might well be one of particular peril.

1. If today as you arise, o Sun, you who are free of offense will speak the truth [=that we are free of offense] to Mitra and Varuṇa, we would be (offenseless) before the gods, Aditi, and dear to you, Aryaman, as we sing.
2. O Mitra and Varuṇa, this very Sun, who draws the gaze of men, rises up over both [=standing and moving beings] on earth—the herdsman of everything, (both) the standing and the moving, seeing the straight and crooked (acts) among mortals.
3. He has harnessed from his abode his seven antelopes, which, rich in ghee, convey him, the Sun,

who, seeking you, o Mitra and Varuṇa, surveys your domains and the tribes (of men), like your herds.

4. The strengthening, honeyed ones [=offerings] belonging to you two have risen up, and the Sun has mounted the gleaming flood—he for whom the Ādityas—Mitra, Aryaman, and Varuṇa all together—clear his roads.
5. These are the avengers of much untruth, for they are Mitra, Aryaman, and Varuṇa.
These have grown strong in the house of truth—the capable, undeceivable sons of Aditi.
6. These hard to deceive—Mitra, Varuṇa, (and Aryaman)—cause even the unperceptive man to perceive through their skills.
Fully knowing the resolve based on good perception, they lead by a good path even across narrow straits.
7. These unwinking, perceptive ones of heaven and of earth lead the unperceptive man.
Even in the onrush of a stream there is a ford. They will bring us across to the far shore of this peril.
8. Since Aditi, Mitra, and Varuṇa offer their welcome herdsmanlike protection to Sudās, let us, securing our kith and kin under it, not do that which angers the gods, o overpowering ones.
9. By his libations he should ritually cleanse the altar of any double-dealing that deceives Varuṇa.
Let Aryaman with his hostilities avoid (him [=Sudās], creating) a wide world for Sudās, o you two bulls.
10. Because their fiery attack is even in secret and they are strong with hidden strength,
(we are) trembling in fear before you, bulls—by the greatness of your very skill, have mercy on us!
11. Who by sacrifice will gain your favor for his formulation at the winning of victory's prize and of the highest wealth, his generous patrons will strive to overpower the battle fury of the outsider. They have made for themselves a wide and secure place for their dwelling.
12. This installation of the god [=Agni] to the fore has been made for you two, Mitra and Varuṇa.
Take us across all difficulties. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.61 (577) Mitra and Varuṇa

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
7 verses: triṣṭubh

Like the preceding hymn, with which it shares its final verse, this hymn begins with a description of the rising Sun, who here is the eye of Mitra and Varuṇa, watching over the good and evils deeds of humans. In verse 2 the rising Sun parallels the voice of the poet, who raises his hymn to Mitra and Varuṇa. And just as the Sun fills the worlds with light, Mitra and Varuṇa penetrate all the worlds and even go beyond them. Like kings who send their agents into the communities to note what their subjects are doing and saying, Mitra and Varuṇa also have spies who are everywhere (vs. 3).

The mention of these spies in verse 3 may help explain the most problematic verse in the hymn, verse 5. There are several ways to construe the verse: ámūrā víśvā could be vocative and nominative dual respectively, describing Mitra and Varuṇa as those who can never be fooled (so Geldner), but more likely they describe the drúhaḥ "deceptions" in 5c. As Oldenberg notes, grammatically dispersing the phrase ámūrā víśvā(ḥ)... imā́ḥ "all these who are never fooled" seems forced. But the idea that Mitra and Varuṇa themselves deceive has understandably given interpreters pause. Still, in X.109.4 Indra is said never to be deceived but himself deceiving (√dabh) and in the previous hymn, in VII.60.9c, Aryaman can bring "hostilities" against those who do not act rightly. The "deceptions" of Mitra and Varuṇa are probably their hidden spies. These spies are actually not seen and accordingly in this verse they are unidentified and hence verbally hidden. The verse even works a deception of its own, describing the spies in the feminine plural—spáśaḥ "spies" is masculine plural—and delaying the feminine term that stands for them, drúhaḥ, until pāda c.

1. Upward arises the eye of lovely appearance that belongs to you two gods, o Varuṇa—the Sun, who has extended himself.
   He who watches over all living beings marks the battle fury among mortals.
2. Truth-possessing, the far-famed inspired poet raises his thoughts forth to you, o Mitra and Varuṇa—he whose formulations you will help, o you of strong will, when you two will bring his autumns to fullness, as if by his will.
3. (You have reached) past the wide (midspace), past the earth, o Mitra and Varuṇa, past the high heaven aloft, o you who bring good gifts.
   You have placed your spies among the plants and among the clans, guarding unwinkingly against him who goes his own way.
4. I shall praise the institutes of Mitra and Varuṇa: in its greatness their unbridled power ever presses upon the two world-halves.

The months of those not sacrificing will pass without bringing heroes, but he whose thoughts belong to the sacrifice will extend his settlement.

5. O you two bulls, all these of yours who are never fooled, among whom has been seen neither sign nor wonder—(these, your) deceptions!—follow the untruths of men. There have not been secrets that cannot be perceived by you two.
6. I make the sacrifice great for you two with my acts of reverence; eagerly I call upon you two, Mitra and Varuṇa; my new thoughts (go) forth to you to chant praise. They will enjoy these formulations created (by me)!
7. This installation of the god [=Agni] to the fore has been made for you two, Mitra and Varuṇa.
Take us across all difficulties. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.62 (578) Sūrya (1–3), Mitra and Varuṇa (4–6)

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
6 verses: triṣṭubh

As in the two previous hymns, the poet begins with the rising Sun, who shines down upon all the Ārya tribes and fills the heaven with his light and therefore becomes equal to heaven (vs. 1). The antelopes of the Sun carry him up, as do the praise songs as they rise, and from heaven the Sun witnesses the deeds of humans and attests to the Ādityas and Agni the innocence of the sacrificers (vs. 2). In verse 3 the poet asks that Varuṇa, Mitra, and Agni bring them the highest arká. The primary meaning of arká is "chant," and therefore the first idea is that these gods will inspire the chant of the sacrificers. But arká can carry a secondary meaning, "flame," a sense that is actualized here through the description of the gods as candrá "glittering" and by arcís "flame," the latter etymologically related to arká in this meaning. So like the Sun these gods will brighten themselves and also make bright the world of the sacrificers.

In verse 4 three gods—Heaven and Earth and Aditi, the mother of the Ādityas—are addressed in pāda a, but the remainder of ab refers only to two gods, Heaven and Earth. The poet continues to address two gods in verse 5, revealing only in the last pāda that the two gods are Mitra and Varuṇa. Finally, in the last verse the poet matches the image of light spreading over earth and heaven that was introduced in the first verse with the "wide space" across generations and the freedom of movement that Mitra and Varuṇa will offer.

Although the poet does not continue the strategy through the whole hymn, verses 1–2 have a striking number of sound repetitions. Thus 1d is krátvā kr̥táḥ súkr̥taḥ kartŕ̥bhir bhūt, 2b ebhí stómebhir etaśébhir évaiḥ, and 2d (á)nāgaso aryamṇé agnáye ca. In verse 2 the sound repetitions underscore the tie between the Sun's animals and the praise songs and the bonds between Aryaman, Agni, and the innocent sacrificers.

1. The Sun has raised up his flames aloft, (facing) all the many tribes of Manu's sons.
   Radiating, he is visible as the equal to heaven. Created by their will, he has become well created by his creators.
2. O Sun, you have arisen in front facing us with these praise songs, with your coursers in their usual ways.
   You will proclaim us to Mitra and Varuṇa to be without offense, and to Aryaman and to Agni.
3. Let those possessing the truth—Varuṇa, Mitra, and Agni—clear the way to a thousand ritual gifts for us.
   Let the glittering ones offer us the highest chant [/flame]. Being praised, let them fulfill our wish.
4. O Heaven and Earth, o Aditi, you two should rescue us, (and so also should) those good birth-givers [=the gods] who gave birth to you two, o you two on high.
   Let us not be in the anger of Varuṇa or of Vāyu, nor in that of Mitra, most dear to men.
5. Stretch forth your arms for us to live. Sprinkle our pasture-land with ghee.
   Make us famed among the people, you two youths. Hear these my invocations, Mitra and Varuṇa.
6. Now let Mitra, Varuṇa, and Aryaman provide wide space for ourselves and for our offspring.
   Let all our paths be easy to travel. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.63 (579) Sūrya (1–5ab), Mitra and Varuṇa (5cd–6)

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
6 verses: triṣṭubh

Even more than the other hymns in the sequence VII.60–65, this hymn concentrates on the rising Sun. Here the Sun becomes the visible sign and the embodiment of the Ādityas. He is the eye of Mitra and Varuṇa (vs. 1) and subhága "bringing good fortune," like Bhaga, the god Fortune (vs. 1). But the Sun is especially like the god Savitar, the "Impeller." He is prasavitár, who "impels forth" (vs. 2); he takes the form of Savitar (vs. 3); and the people are impelled (prasūtá) by him (vs. 4). The god Savitar especially drives living beings to their homes at night, so here the Sun assumes the complementary function of impelling them forth to their various daytime tasks.

The Sun is also the fire common to all the Vedic peoples. He is the "common support of the sons of Manu," creating a cultural or even possibly a political unity among them (vs. 1) and the "common wheel" (vs. 2), whose turning commences the day and the activities of the day. Representing Savitar, the Sun upholds the "common institute" (vs. 3) that governs all the peoples.

In verse 5b, the images of the herd and the falcon are puzzling. If the herd belongs to the frame as we have translated the verse, then it is probably the gods whom the Sun follows as they clear a road for him across the sky. On the other hand, if the herd is part of the comparison, then a hungry falcon might follow a herd of cattle because the cattle would attract birds, which could become its prey. Of course it is also possible, even likely, that the poem legitimately allows both interpretations. See also IV.38.5, in which there are like uncertainties.

1. Upward he rises, bringing good fortune and with his gaze on everything, the common support of the sons of Manu—the Sun, the eye of Mitra and Varuṇa, the god who has rolled together the shades of darkness like hides.
2. And upward he rises, the one impelling the peoples forth—the great, undulating beacon of the Sun, about to turn the common wheel that Etaśa pulls, harnessed on the yoke poles.
3. Gleaming forth from the lap of the Dawns, he rises upward, being celebrated by the husky-voiced singers.
 He appears to me as the god Savitar, who does not violate the common institute.
4. The bright ornament of heaven, having a broad gaze, rises upward—he whose goal is in the far distance, gleaming as he crosses over (toward it).
 Now the peoples, impelled forth by the Sun, will go toward their goals, and they will perform their tasks.
5. Where the immortals have made a way for him, he follows after the herd
 [=the gods?], flying like a falcon.
 When the sun has risen, we would worship you two with our acts of reverence and with our oblations, o Mitra and Varuṇa.
6. Now let Mitra, Varuṇa, and Aryaman provide wide space for ourselves and for our offspring.
 Let all our paths be easy to travel. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.64 (580) Mitra and Varuṇa

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
5 verses: triṣṭubh

This hymn is a prayer to the Ādityas for rain, as the poet makes explicit in verse 2cd. Geldner rightly sees the likelihood of a double reading of verse 1. The "cloaks of ghee" are butter offerings given to Mitra and Varuṇa, but at the same time they are rain that the Ādityas send in response to these offerings. So also in verse 4, the "ghee" that Mitra and Varuṇa should sprinkle on the composer of this hymn is rain. As a result of the rain, the dwellings of the sacrificers will prosper (4cd, 5c).

As often, the middle verse of the hymn is more cryptic than the others. Mitra and Varuṇa are addressed, as is the devó aryáḥ, translated here the "civilizing god" and referring to Aryaman. The point of mentioning Aryaman in such an indirect way is to create a verbal connection between the devó aryáḥ and the arí, the "stranger" in pāda c. An arí is an outsider, but one who belongs to the Vedic peoples and follows the customs of the Āryas. The point is that such a stranger will recognize the sacrificers as those who prosper because they follow the Ādityas and the ways of the Āryas and will honor them as sudā́saḥ "good givers," generous people. But Sudās is also the Bharata king who figures very prominently in the Vasiṣṭha hymns, and, inescapably, this designation must recall him. That is to say, even one who belongs to another Vedic tribe will see that the sacrificers are "Sudāses" or like Sudās, the great king, in their prosperity and generosity.

In verse 4, the "chariot seat" is the seat of honor here at the sacrifice, which is implicitly imagined as a chariot, as often elsewhere.

1. You two who are masters of space in heaven and on earth—to you they should give cloaks of ghee.
   Mitra, well-born Aryaman, and King Varuṇa of strong rule enjoy our oblation.
2. O you two kings, herdsmen of great truth, lords of the rivers, and rulers—travel here to this place.
   Send down refreshment to us and rain from heaven, o Mitra and Varuṇa, you of lively drops.
3. Then let Mitra, Varuṇa, and the civilizing god [=Aryaman] lead us forth by the most successful paths, so that a (civilized) stranger will thereby speak of us as "good givers."
   With gods as our herdsmen, might we find exhilaration by your refreshment!
4. Who will fashion for you two this chariot seat by his thought and who will make and sustain a high vision—sprinkle him with ghee, Mitra and Varuṇa. Bring satisfaction to our good dwellings, o kings.

5. This praise song, o Varuṇa, o Mitra, has been offered to each of you, like the gleaming soma to Vāyu.
   Give help to our insights. Awaken the ways to plenty. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.65 (581) Mitra and Varuṇa

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
5 verses: triṣṭubh

This hymn is similar in theme and phrasing to the preceding hymn, with which it also shares the final verse. It too is fundamentally a prayer for rain to Mitra and Varuṇa. There is no reference to Aryaman, although there is an indirect reference to his function as god of customs in the poet's description of Mitra and Varuṇa as aryá "civilizing" (vs. 2a). Verse 4 most explicitly states the theme of the hymn. In pāda a the poet offers the gods oblations, which include ghee and other ritual libations, and in b he asks for these in return, though in the form of rain. In c we read váram "wish" twice, once in the phrase práti… váram "at your wish," referring to the wish of the gods for oblations, and second in the phrase váram ā́… pr̥ṇītám "fill our wish" for rain. Thus in both ab and cd, the poet first refers to the desire of the gods and then his own desire.

The translation below also takes víśva "everyone" twice in the translation of verse 1, which, like the first verse of the preceding hymn, offers a possible double reading. According to the translation below, in pāda d Mitra and Varuṇa move "upon the course of everyone," that is, they follow or accompany the actions of all beings. But yā́man "course" can also mean "entreaty," and if construed with ācít "attentive," the line could also mean, "moving on the course of everyone, attentive to the entreaty of everyone."

1. When the sun has risen, I call upon you two with hymns, upon Mitra and upon Varuṇa of purified skill, you two, who possess imperishable and preeminent lordship, you two moving upon the course of everyone, attentive to the entreaty of everyone.
2. Because you two are lords of the gods and you two are civilizing, make our dwellings to be nourishing.
   Might we reach you two, Mitra and Varuṇa, where heaven and earth will swell and also the days.
3. These two have many fetters, are bonds for untruth, and are hard to overcome for the cheating mortal.
   By your path of truth, Mitra and Varuṇa, we would cross over difficulties, as (we would) waters by a boat.

4. (Come) here to the enjoyment of our oblation, Mitra and Varuṇa!
 Sprinkle our pasture with ghee, with refreshments.
 At your wish, in this place and for our people, fill our wish from the beloved heavenly water.
5. This praise song, o Varuṇa, o Mitra, has been offered to each of you, like the gleaming soma to Vāyu.
 Give help to our insights. Awaken the ways to plenty. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.66 (582) Mitra and Varuṇa (1–3, 17–19), Ādityas (4–13), Sūrya (14–16)

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
19 verses: gāyatrī 1–9, 17–19, arranged in tr̥cas; br̥hatī alternating with satobr̥hatī 10–15, arranged in pragāthas; puraüṣṇih 16

This hymn consists of eight metrical units of various meters. The first three are three gāyatrī tr̥cas, followed by three br̥hatī/satobr̥hatī strophes and one more gāyatrī tr̥ca. The hymn then concludes with a final, single puraüṣṇih verse. Despite its metrical complexity, the hymn sustains its basic themes throughout. Once again this is a hymn recited at sunrise, and indeed the phrase "at the rising of the sun" occurs at the beginning of three of its seven strophes (vss. 4, 7, 12). Also the beginning of fourth strophe (vs. 14) contains a variant of the phrase, the final tr̥ca starts (vs. 16) with a reference to the rising of the sun, and the pragātha beginning at verse 10 opens with a mention of the sun. Therefore of the hymn's eight units, only the first tr̥ca (vss. 1–3), which establishes Mitra and Varuṇa as the dedicands of the hymn, and the final summary invitation to Mitra and Varuṇa lack a reference to the rising sun in its first verse. This repeated mention of the rising sun is a structuring device that unifies the hymn despite the diversity of its meter. Thematically, the rise and movement of the Sun across the heavens becomes the representation of the Ādityas' lordship extending across the world.

The actions of the Ādityas are also linked with the words and action of the ritual. This theme is introduced at the outset, when they are described as sudákṣa "of good skill" and the children of Dakṣa, the embodiment of skill and specifically sacrificial skill (vs. 2). The gods sustain "the three divisions" (vs. 10), a phrase that likely refers both to the divisions of the world (earth, midspace, and heaven), and to the divisions of the ritual (the three soma-pressings). They also sustain the divisions of time (vs. 11): the year, month, and day, but also the sacrifice and the night, a division that could refer to the sacrificial rites by day and the continuation of the rites across the night. The Ādityas "impel" (√sū)—a word connected with Savitar, of course, and therefore with the Ādityas—the sacrificers and thereby bring their rituals success and take their worshipers "across difficult straits" (vss. 4–5).

1. Let our thunderous praise song go forth with our reverence to Mitra and Varuṇa, the two powerfully born,
2. Whom the gods uphold, the two of good skill whose father is Skill, whose greatness (goes) forward to lordship.
3. You two, protectors of our dependents and of our bodies, o Varuṇa—bring the insights of (us) singers to success, o Mitra.

4. If today, at the rising of the sun, the one free of offense [=the Sun], Mitra, Aryaman, Savitar, and Bhaga will each impel (us),
5. Let this dwelling be one that ritually pursues (the gods) well. Now, o you bringing good drops, (let those go) forth on their course who take us across difficult straits.
6. And the sovereign kings and Aditi, who (are masters) of the undeceivable command, as kings are masters of (all that is) great.

7. At the rising of the sun I will sing to you two, to Mitra and Varuṇa, to Aryaman, who cares for the stranger.
8. With longing for wealth and gold, this thought is for power that knows no wolf;
this inspired (thought) is for winning wisdom.
9. Together with our patrons, might we be these, o god Varuṇa, o Mitra:
might we receive refreshment and the sun.

10. Many are they whose eye is the Sun, whose tongue is Agni, who strengthen through the truth, who sustain the three divisions by their insights, all (the divisions) by their encompassing powers.
11. They who divided the year, the month, then the day; the sacrifice and the night, then the verse—as kings, Varuṇa, Mitra, and Aryaman have attained an unobtainable rule.

12. Today for you, at the rising of the sun, with our hymns we will conceive what Varuṇa, Mitra, and Aryaman solemnly declare. You are charioteers of truth!
13. (You) possessing the truth, born of the truth, and strengthening through the truth, (you) terrifying haters of untruth—might we be in the most protective favor of you, o men, and might also our patrons.

14. This lovely marvel [=the Sun] arises on the curve of heaven, when the swift god Etaśa conveys him, right for everyone to gaze upon.

15. For his easy passage, the seven sisters—the antelopes on his chariot—convey the Sun—
 the lord of each one, head by head, and of the moving and the standing—through the whole dusky realm altogether.

16. That eye, fixed in place by the gods, blazing as it ascends, might we see for a hundred autumns. Might we live for a hundred autumns!
17. With your poetic arts, o undeceivable ones, travel here in brilliance, o Varuṇa
 and Mitra, in order to drink the soma.
18. From heaven through your domains, o Varuṇa and Mitra, you who are without deception—travel here.
 Drink the soma, thrusting yourselves toward it.

19. Travel here, Mitra and Varuṇa, enjoying our offering, o noble men.
 Drink the soma, o you who strengthen through the truth.

VII.67 (583) Aśvins

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
10 verses: triṣṭubh

The opening verses of this hymn describe the early morning advent of the Aśvins, when the sacrificial fire is kindled and the dawn becomes visible (vs. 2). They also present problems of translation and interpretation that turn on the identity of the Aśvins' chariot. Elsewhere the Aśvins' chariot can be the sacrifice or the hymns of the sacrifice that bring the Aśvins to the rite. Therefore, the chariot in verse 1a is the vehicle bringing the Aśvins. In 1c "that which" the poet recites and "that which" serves as a messenger to awaken the Aśvins is the praise song, now become the Aśvins' chariot carrying the Aśvins to the rite. In verse 4 there is no explicit mention of the chariot, but there is a complex ellipsis in 4a, which lacks both subject and verb. The gapped subject may be the chariot, but again the chariot as the hymn that seeks the Aśvins.

The hymn itself continues to be the focus of the poet in verses 5–6. In verse 5 he calls upon the Aśvins to advance his insight so that it will win gain for the sacrificers. While the poet previously mentioned the chariotry directly, here he refers to the hymn using the language of competition and prizewinning appropriate for a chariot. In verse 7 the poet also speaks of the "treasure," the soma, which is offered to the Aśvins along with his hymn, and he shifts attention from his "thought," which he offers to the Aśvins in the form of his hymn (vs. 1), to the Aśvins' thought, which he hopes will not be hostile to the sacrificers. In the final two verses the poet appeals to the Aśvins to support his patrons, whose generosity and bounty he celebrates.

Structurally, the hymn forms a ring, since the infinitive jarádhyai "to awaken" and the verb ájīgar "he has awakened" in the first verse are answered in the last verse by the imperative járatam "awaken!" However, while the translation of the ájīgar is secure, the interpretation of neither the infinitive nor the imperative is certain. The form jarádhyai is a hapax in the R̥gveda, and it is not clear whether it is transitive or intransitive and, if transitive, who is being "awakened." In the last verse, járatam might be from same root, although it also might be from a different root and mean "make old!"

1. To become awake in response to your chariot, o you two lords of men, with a thought worthy of the sacrifice accompanying offerings,
   I recite (to you) here, like a child to his parents, that which, like a messenger, has awakened you two, o holy ones.
2. Agni has blazed up, being kindled among us, and the very borders of darkness have become visible.
   In the east Dawn's beacon has come into view—(the beacon) of Heaven's daughter, which is being born for glory.
3. Now the good Hotar attends upon you with his praise songs as he recites, o Aśvins, Nāsatyas.
   Journey this way along many pathways with your sun-finding,
   goods-bearing chariot.
4. Now, seeking you, o honey-bearing Aśvins, your (chariot carries) you, when, seeking good things, I call upon you two at the soma-pressing.
   Let your stout horses carry you here. You will drink the well-pressed honey drinks among us.
5. O gods, Aśvins, bring forward my insight—not falling short, seeking good things—to win gain.
   Help all the forms of plenty here in the competition for the prize. Do as you are able for us with your abilities, o you lords of abilities.
6. Help us in these insights, Aśvins. Let our child-producing seed be abundant.
   Propagating ourselves in kith and kin, possessing good riches, we would go to our godly pursuit of you two.
7. This very treasure, like a promissory portion for a companion, is set down here for you, o honey-bearing ones, and given by us.
   With thought free of anger, journey this way, to eat our oblation among the clans of Manu's sons.
8. In your single, joint trek, o energetic ones, your chariot encompasses the seven flowing streams.
   They do not become exhausted—these your surpassing (horses) of powerful presence, which, yoked by the gods on their yoke-poles, carry you two.

9. Be unfailing for the bounteous ones, who speed their gift of bounty with wealth, who extend their relationships by their liberal gifts, mingling their bounties of cattle and of horses.
10. Now, hear my call, youthful ones. Journey the course that brings refreshment, Aśvins.
   Grant riches and awaken our patrons! – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.68 (584) Aśvins

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
9 verses: virāj 1–7, triṣṭubh 8–9

In its first four verses the hymn opens with an invitation to the Aśvins to come to the sacrifice in the early morning and to receive the soma offerings being made to them. In verse 3 the Aśvins come with the daughter of the Sun, Sūryā, which marks this as a morning hymn (cf. also vs. 9). In verse 4c the vípra "inspired poet" is likely the reciter of the hymn, but in 4ab the pressing stone also sounds as it crushes the soma stalks, and therefore it too could be the poet in the latter half of the verse. The stone prepares the soma offerings, so the reference to the oblations in 4c would also be appropriate to it.

Then in the second set of four verses (vss. 5–8) the poet briefly describes great deeds of the Aśvins and four of the past figures whom they helped. In verses 6 and 8 the poet mentions the offerings of Cyavāna havirdā́ "the giver of offerings" and their summons (hūyámāna) by Śayu, words that echo the present offerings (havís, 2b) and the calls to the Aśvins (hávana, 2c).

Verse 5 alludes to the story of Atri, who was rescued from the heat of a pit oven by the Aśvins and who received sustenance from them. That is to say, the Aśvins rescued him with food and from becoming treated like food. In this verse the poet refers to the "sustenance" (bhójana) and the "relief" (omán) Atri receives. Similarly, in I.116.8 the Aśvins give Atri "nourishment together with solid food" (pitumátīm ū́rjam) and in 118.7 they give "nourishment" and "relief" (ū́rjam omā́nam). Geldner suggests that Atri receives from the Aśvins an elixir that restores him to life, but these descriptions suggest more mundane gifts of food and drink that saved Atri from starvation.

In verse 7 Bhujyu's evil-intentioned companions include his father, Tugra, who left him behind (I.116.3, 119.8). But somehow the Aśvins changed Tugra's mind and rescued Bhujyu through Tugra, who, as the description yuvā́ku "seeking you" implies, was a worshiper of the Aśvins (cf. I.117.14). In verse 8 the poet refers to the Aśvins' willingness to come to the rescue even of a "wolf," of a bad person, who is "starving" (jásamāna). This applies to Śayu, since he was once

"starving" (jásuri, I.116.22), but the Aśvins rescued him by making his sterile cow give milk.

In the final verse (vs. 9), which is reminiscent of the first verse of the previous hymn, the poet alludes to the cow that the Aśvins swell in verse 8. Geldner understands the cow to represent the gifts that the poet receives from the sacrificer, but more likely it is the poem itself, which will yield good things for the poet. Note that the poem is the focus of 9ab, which refers to "good hymns" and "good thoughts." The verb jarate, translated here as "awakens," can also mean "sings," and the hymn's audience would surely have been aware of the double sense.

1. Beautiful Aśvins, wondrous ones, journey here with your good horses, enjoying the songs of him seeking you and the oblations brought before you. Pursue our (offerings).
2. The exhilarating soma stalks have come forth for you. As is right, come to pursue my offering across the calls of the stranger. Hear our (calls).
3. O Aśvins, your chariot swift as thought rises forth across the airy spaces, bringing hundredfold help,
   speeding to us, o you who bring Sūryā as goods.
4. When this stone—seeking the gods, pressing the soma—speaks aloft to you two,
   the inspired poet should turn you enchanting ones here by the oblations.
5. Since you now have brilliant sustenance (for him), you two keep away the intense (heat) for Atri, who will receive relief from you, since he is dear to you.
6. And again, Aśvins, this is your recompense to Cyavāna, the giver of offerings, who was growing old:
   that you two lay an ageless appearance on (him).
7. And again, Aśvins, his companions of evil intent abandoned this Bhujyu in the middle of the sea.
   His enemy [=Tugra], who seeks you, will rescue him.
8. Do as you are able, even on behalf of a wolf that is worn out, and listen to Śayu as you are called—you who have swelled the fertile cow like waters—even the barren cow—by your able power, Aśvins, by your abilities.
9. This praise-poet here awakens with good hymns, rousing himself at the beginning of the dawns, bringing good thoughts.
   The fertile cow makes him grow strong with her refreshing drink, with her milk. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.69 (585) Aśvins

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
8 verses: triṣṭubh

The hymn is dominated by the chariot of the Aśvins and the theme of the journey of the Aśvins. The poet opens with the chariot (rátha) and refers to it, often explicitly, in every verse. In verse 1 the poet describes their "golden chariot," whose brilliance reflects the morning light that accompanies its advent. The final pāda of the verse takes an interesting turn. The chariot is first called voḷhár "conveyor," a term that ordinarily refers to the chariot driver (as in I.144.3d, VI.64.3d, VII.2.35c) or the horse that pulls a chariot (IX.81.2b, 96.15d, 112.4a). But here and in the similar pāda VII.71.4a, it describes the chariot itself, attributing agency to it. But then the poet also calls—or appears to call—the chariot nŕ̥pati "lord of men," which should describe the Aśvins themselves, as it does in VII.71.4. Geldner suggests that it could be a luptopamā, a comparison in which the particle of comparison has been omitted: "(wie) ein Fürst." Renou (EVP XVI: 48) describes the figure as a sort of hypallage caused by the juxtaposition rátho nr̥patī in VII.71.4. Renou is likely right that the pāda responds to VII.71.4, but it rather appears to be a semantic expansion of the chariot so that it includes or rather becomes the horses that pull it and the drivers who direct it. Also in verse 3 the chariot again takes the role of a groom, "clasping the bride," who is being carried on the chariot to her marriage. Behind this semantic expansion of the chariot, if that is what is occurring, may be the image of the Aśvins' chariot as the sacrifice itself. Note that the chariot is described as "having tracks of ghee" (vs. 1c) and "three chariot-boxes" (vs. 2b), corresponding to the three soma-pressings. The chariot is not just the sacrifice, however. As usual, it remains the chariot that brings the Aśvins to the sacrifice, as well as being the sacrifice, at least in these opening verses.

The theme of the journey of the Aśvins is marked by verbal derivatives of √yā "journey," which appear in every verse except verses 4 and 7. These two verses refer to the great deeds of the Aśvins: how they brought the daughter of the Sun to her marriage, how they rescued Atri from the heat of a pit oven, and how they saved Bhujyu from the sea. The Aśvins' chariot and thereby the theme of journeying are involved in all of these rescues.

1. Let your golden chariot, ever pressing upon the two world-halves, journey here with those bulls, your horses—the (chariot) with tracks of ghee, gleaming at its wheel-rims, the driver of refreshments, the lord of men with prizewinning mares.
2. Spreading over the five lands, yoked by thought, let it with its three chariot-boxes journey here—(the chariot) by which you two go to the clans serving the gods, as you set your journey toward any direction, Aśvins.

3. You two glorious ones possessing good horses—journey this way. O wondrous ones, you will drink the honeyed treasure.
   Clasping the bride to itself, your chariot presses upon the boundaries of heaven with its tracks.
4. The young woman—the daughter of the Sun—chose your glory at the decisive turn.
   When by your abilities you help him [=Atri], serving the gods, his vital force evades the heat by your relief.
5. O charioteers, this your chariot, which, having been harnessed at the dawning of the ruddy light, journeys around its course—by it convey to us luck and life at the breaking of dawn, at this sacrifice, Aśvins.
6. O you two fine men, like two thirsting buffaloes toward lightning, journey today toward our pressings, for in many places (people) call upon you two with their thoughts. Let not the others seeking the gods [=rival sacrificers] hold you down.
7. You two brought Bhujyu, struck down into the sea, up from the flood by your unfailing winged ones, which neither tire nor falter, when you were rescuing him by your wondrous powers, Aśvins.
8. Now, hear my call, youthful ones. Journey the course that brings refreshment, Aśvins.
   Grant riches and awaken our patrons! – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.70 (586) Aśvins

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
7 verses: jagatī

In the last verse the poet calls the attention of the Aśvins to his hymn, calling it "intricate" or "well-twisted" (suvr̥ktí). He is quite right: his hymn is complex, since it presents metaphors of unclear reference and ellipses of uncertain interpretation. Such intricacy is attractive to gods like the Aśvins, and the purpose of the poet is to get the attention of the Aśvins by means of the hymn and to cause them to take notice of the offerings and other elements of the sacrifice so that they will be present at it.

In verse 1 the poet summons the Aśvins to take their place at the sacrifice, but 1cd, in which he describes the coming of the Aśvins, can be variously interpreted. In 1c something "stood" when the Aśvins took their place. We have suggested that this is the sacrificial fire kindled in the early morning, but other interpreters have offered other reasonable possibilities: the hot milk offered to the Aśvins (Oldenberg, Renou [EVP XVI: 49]) or the liquid offerings more generally (Geldner), the vessel for the hot milk (Oldenberg), the "good favor" mentioned in verse 2a (Renou), or the place itself (Geldner, Velankar [1963]). Of these, the gharma or hot milk offering, which is mentioned in 2b, is the strongest possibility, and of course, the suppression of the subject in 1cd might have allowed hearers to recall several or all of these things that welcome the Aśvins.

In verse 3 the poet shifts attention to the rewards that the Aśvins will bring. The sacrificer hopes to find prosperity for the sacrificer from the rivers, plants, and clans, among which the Aśvins find a place, over which they sit "at the peak of the mountain"—in heaven perhaps? In verse 4a the "plants and the waters" recall the rivers, plants, and clans of verse 3 and verbally connect the two verses, even though the poet again shifts the theme back to the sacrifice being offered to the Aśvins. Here the waters and plants represent sacrificial libations and offerings. In 4b it is not clear what are the "harness cords" (yogyā́). They might be rites or offerings (especially the hot milk offering), or hymns. That is, they are elements of the sacrifice of one kind or another. Whatever these cords are, the image carries forward the description of the Aśvins in 2cd as "well-harnessed" horses and therefore should represent what attaches the Aśvins to the sacrifice. In 4cd the Aśvins reward the present sacrificers while keeping in mind the ancient ones. The present sacrifices are the equal to the ones of the past and therefore deserve the reward of the Aśvins.

In the last verses the poet becomes more straightforward in calling the Aśvins' attention to his hymn, his "formulations," which he has sent out in search of them (vs. 7), and to the sacrifice which stands ready for them (vs. 6).

1. Come to us, Aśvins, who grant all desires: this has been proclaimed as your place on earth.
   Having prosperity on its back like a prizewinning horse, it [=the fire?] stood up when you two sat down here as if (sitting) upon your womb to remain steadfast.
2. The most delightful favor clings to you two. In the house of Manu has been heated the hot milk that carries you, having been harnessed like a pair of well-harnessed swift steeds, across the seas and rivers,
3. (Across) the places that you two have taken for yourselves, Aśvins, among the exuberant (rivers) from heaven, among the plants, and among the clans—
   (you two) sitting down at the peak of the mountain, (you two) bringing refreshment to the pious man.
4. O gods, delight in the plants and waters when you will take on the harness cords [=the ritual acts?] of our seers.
   While granting many treasures to us, you two have kept in view the ancient generations.
5. Even though you have heard many, Aśvins, you look upon the formulations of our seers.

At your wish, journey forth according to our wish for the sake of our people. Let your most delightful favor be for us.

6. Our sacrifice, battle-ready with its offerings and (newly) created formulations, will become yours, Nāsatyas.
   Journey forth to Vasiṣṭha according to his wish. These formulations are being chanted for you two.
7. Here is the inspired thought, here the song, Aśvins—take pleasure in this intricate (hymn), o bulls.
   These formulations have gone, seeking you. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.71 (587) Aśvins

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
6 verses: triṣṭubh

In its final verse this hymn repeats the last verse of the previous hymn, and as that verse says, it too is an intricate one (suvr̥ktí). The first verse marks this as an early-morning hymn. Since the ruddy light of early dawn is elsewhere associated with the ruddy cattle, the poet echoes that connection by describing the horses and cattle that the Aśvins bring. There is also a second possible reading: the two compounds áśvāmaghā[ḥ] gómaghā[ḥ] "having bounties of horses, bounties of cattle" could be nominative plurals as well as duals and be taken as proleptic adjectives modifying the 1st-person "we." This grammatical ambiguity can imply that the horses and cattle that the Aśvins bring will become the horses and cattle that we will have.

In verses 1–2 the Aśvins are asked also for rescue from enemies, want, and disease. In verses 3–4 the poet then turns especially to the chariot of the Aśvins, and, as often, the chariot is linked to the sacrifice itself. In 3c its horses are "in the harness of truth," that is, joined to the hymns and even to the rites, which may also be expressions of truth. The chariot is also syū́magabhasti, an elusive hapax. Geldner among others connects gábhasti "hands" to the rays of the sun, but there is no clear instance of such a use elsewhere in the R̥gveda. We propose, therefore, that the hands, which normally hold reins, have themselves become the reins (syū́man) of the chariot because they are the hands of the priests, who control the ritual. In verse 4 the analysis and reference of viśvápsnya, perhaps "containing all milk," are obscure. Geldner wonders whether the word might describe the praise hymn or Agni. The gharma vessel suggested here is uncertain at best. Verse 5 then returns to the Aśvins' ability to save from danger by describing four great acts of rescue. The last, the rescue of Jāhuṣa, is the least familiar and can be only tentatively reconstructed. The best suggestion is that of Oldenberg, who says that by combining verse 5d and I.116.20cd we can get the following: Jāhuṣa was trapped by his enemies is a wild, rocky area, but the Aśvins brought him out and set him down on light, soft soil.

1. Night recedes from her sister Dawn. The dark leaves behind the path to the ruddy.
   We would call upon you, having bounties of horses, bounties of cattle. By day and during the night keep the arrow away from us.
2. Journey to the pious mortal, conveying what is desirable by your chariot, Aśvins.
   By day and during the night keep thirst and affliction from us, o you rich in honey. You two should deliver us.
3. Let your bulls [=horses], showing us favor, turn your chariot here at the nearest dawn.
   Convey here your (chariot) bearing good things, for which the hands (of the priests?) are its reins, with its horses in the harness of truth, Aśvins.
4. The chariot that is the conveyor for you, o lords of men, having three chariot-boxes, bearing good things, journeying at dawn—by this (chariot) journey here to us, Nāsatyas, when what contains all milk [=the hot-milk vessel?] goes to you.
5. You two released Cyavāna from old age. You brought a swift horse to Pedu.
   You recovered Atri from difficulty and darkness. You set Jāhuṣa down on soft (soil).
6. Here is the inspired thought, here the song, Aśvins—take pleasure in this intricate (hymn), o bulls.
   These formulations have gone, seeking you. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.72 (588) Aśvins

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
5 verses: triṣṭubh

The hymn is marked by the repeated invitations to the Aśvins to "journey here" (ā́… yātam, vss. 1, 2, and 5), which create a ring of the hymn's beginning and end. The urgent pleas that the Aśvins come here to this place, to this sacrifice and not to another, is reinforced by other words meaning "near" or "this way" (arvā́k, 2a) and "here" (áchā, 3d). Only verse 4 counters by opening with ví, here translated "forth," but more exactly signifying "away, apart." This verse shifts the attention to the spreading light of dawn (pādas a, c), which is matched in pāda d by the spreading light of the sacrificial fires and in b by the poetic formulations rising from the singers. The last verse joins the expansiveness of verse 4 to the invitation to the Aśvins by describing the four directions in which the Aśvins are present and from which they can come to the sacrifice at the center.

The four directions and the implicit center in verse 4 are reflected in the "wealth belonging to the five peoples" (vs. 5c), that is, the wealth belonging to all the Vedic clans and tribes. This wish also suggests that this hymn is recited on behalf of one who sees himself, his tribe, or his clan at the center of the Vedic peoples. The Vasiṣṭha poet is not shy about pointing to his family's connection to the center either, since he speaks of the familial formulations that "awaken" in order to bring the Aśvins (vs. 3ab).

1. Journey here, Nāsatyas, by your much gleaming chariot filled with cattle, filled with horses.
   All your teams accompany you, having beautified your bodies with your eagerly sought glory.
2. Journey here near to us by your chariot, Nāsatyas, along with the gods, for in you two are our ancestral companionships and common kinship. Be aware of this!
3. The praise songs of the Aśvins have awakened, also our family formulations and the Dawns, the goddesses.
   Seeking to gain these two world-halves, the inspired poet summons here the two holy Nāsatyas.
4. When the dawns break forth, Aśvins, the singers present to you their formulations.
   The god Savitar has fixed the radiant beam on high. The fires awaken aloft by kindling.
5. Journey here from the west or from the east, Nāsatyas, here from the south or from the north, Aśvins, here from everywhere with the wealth belonging to the five peoples. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.73 (589) Aśvins

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
5 verses: triṣṭubh

This short hymn is a summons to the Aśvins at the break of dawn, "the further shore of ... darkness." In verse 2 the poet calls the Aśvins' attention to Agni, the sacrificial fire and the Hotar of the sacrifice, who has been installed and stands ready to give the offerings to the Aśvins (2ab). All is ready for the Aśvins to consume the soma and the other offerings presented to them (2cd). In verse 3a the poet compares this sacrifice to a chariot speeding to the Aśvins. This image is answered in verse 4ab, which looks forward to the arrival of the váhnī, the "two chariot-horses." The term can refer to the horses of the Aśvins, but it might also refer to the Aśvins themselves as chariot-horses (cf. VIII.8.12). But in either case the idea is that the fully prepared sacrifice races to the Aśvins, and the Aśvins, with or as fully equipped horses, race to the sacrifice. Again, in verse 4cd the poet draws attention to the ritual preparations made for the Aśvins and begs the Aśvins not to ignore his call and overlook his sacrifice. The last verse repeats the final verse of the preceding hymn. Here it is not so closely tied to the themes of the hymn, but it appropriately continues the plea to the Aśvins to travel from wherever they are to the sacrifice.

1. We have crossed to the further shore of this darkness, aiming our praise song as we seek the gods.
   My song calls to those having many wondrous powers, foremost among many, born in the distant past, to the immortal Aśvins.
2. Manu's own dear Hotar [=Agni] has been set down, he who sacrifices to the Nāsatyas and extols them.
   Eat of the honey [=soma], Aśvins, nearby to us. Bringing pleasing offerings, I call on you two at the ritual distributions.
3. We have sped the sacrifice, choosing among the paths. Take pleasure in this intricate (hymn), o bulls.
   Sent forth like an obedient servant, Vasiṣṭha has been roused for you two—(he) awakening in response to you with his praise songs.
4. These two chariot-horses—demon-smashing, fully equipped, having hard hooves—will come near our clan.
   The exhilarating (soma-)stalks have gathered together. Do not overlook us! Come with benevolence!
5. Journey here from the west or from the east, Nāsatyas, here from the south or from the north, Aśvins, here from everywhere with the wealth belonging to the five peoples. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.74 (590) Aśvins

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
6 verses: bṛhatī alternating with satobṛhatī, arranged in pragāthas

The metrical alternation of bṛhatī and satobṛhatī structures this hymn into three pragāthas. All three mention food, most often the soma (vss. 2d, 3b) or other nourishment (vs. 5b) that the Aśvins receive. But the poet also describes the nourishment that the Aśvins give (vs. 2a). The last two verses connect these two kinds of nourishment in the climax of the hymn. In verse 5 the poet pairs the nourishment that his patrons follow as they approach the Aśvins as a complement to the "glory," their prominence in the social order, that they receive from the Aśvins in exchange. As a result these patrons become godlike—able to keep away "the wolf," which represents danger (cf. I.174.10 of Indra), and swelling "with swelling strength" (śávasā śūśuvuḥ; cf. VII.93.2 of Indra and Agni, VI.19.2 of Indra, and I.167.9 of the Maruts). The ability of the Aśvins to go to every clan (vs. 1d) likewise parallels the "man-protectors" (nṛpātā́raḥ), or kings of the peoples, of the tribes consisting of clans.

1. Now the rituals of the day call upon you two, Aśvins, (at the dawning) of reddening dawn.
   Now have I called upon you for help, o you whose goods are powers, since you go to every clan.
2. You two have given brilliant sustenance, o you fine men. Hurry it to the liberal-minded one.
   You of one mind—stop your chariot nearby. Drink the soma-honey!

3. Journey here! Attend to us here! Drink of the honey, Aśvins!
   The milk has been milked out, o bulls whose goods are worth winning. Do not overlook us! Come here!
4. Your horses that fly to the home of the pious one, bringing you two—by these swift steeds journey here, o men, Aśvins, seeking us, o gods.

5. And then our patrons, going to the Aśvins, follow the nourishments.
   These two Nāsatyas will offer enduring glory to the generous ones and protection to us.
6. The man-protectors of the peoples, keeping the wolf away, who like chariots have journeyed forth—these men swell with their own swelling strength, and they dwell upon a good dwelling.

This group of seven Dawn hymns, VII.75–81, is the largest such collection devoted to this goddess in the Ṛgveda, though none of the hymns is very long (ranging from eight verses to three). The hymns share and recycle much of the same vocabulary and phraseology, and there are striking phonologically driven lexical responsions across hymns, which can unfortunately not be rendered in translation. What distinguishes the hymns from each other is their structure, which can be quite tightly organized and reinforced by verbal and grammatical markers. See, for example, VII.76.

VII.75 (591) Dawn

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
8 verses: triṣṭubh

This Dawn hymn contains most of the usual Dawn themes: her immediate arrival, which awakens the world, her beauty and brightness, her daily journey, and, especially, her bestowal of riches on her praisers. The second half of verse 7 alludes to the Vala myth and the release of the dawn cows (see also the Aṅgiras reference in 1d); otherwise there are no mythological elements and no mention of other gods.

Although there are no particularly vivid images or striking phrases, the hymn is pleasingly composed and contains some well-crafted phonological figures that are unfortunately untranslatable.

1. Dawn, born in heaven, has dawned widely with her truth; revealing her own greatness, she has come here.
   She has uncovered the deceits, the disagreeable darkness; best of the Aṅgirases, she has awakened the paths.
2. For our great good faring take note of us today; o Dawn, for our great good fortune provide (for us).
   Establish for us bright, glorious wealth that seeks fame—o goddess among mortals, belonging to the sons of Manu.
3. These are the very beams of Dawn, who is lovely to see, the bright immortal beams that have come here.
   Generating the heavenly commandments, filling the midspaces, they have spread out.
4. This is the very one who, hitching herself up out of the distance, circles around the five settlements in a single day, looking upon the patterns of the peoples—the Daughter of Heaven, mistress of the world.
5. Possessed of prize mares, the maiden of the Sun who brings bright bounties has dominion over wealth, over goods.
   Praised by seers, awakening (the world), bounteous Dawn dawns, being hymned by the conveyors (of songs/oblations).
6. The ruddy, bright horses have become visible opposite, conveying the flashing Dawn.
   She drives, the resplendent one, with a chariot entirely ornamented; she establishes treasure for the person who distributes it.
7. True along with the true ones, great with the great, goddess with the gods, worshipful with the worshipful—she broke the fastnesses, she will give of the dawn-red (cows): the cows keep bellowing in response to Dawn.
8. Now, o Dawn, establish for us a treasure consisting of cows, of heroes, and of horses, providing much nourishment to us.
   Do not put our ritual grass to scorn among men. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.76 (592) Dawn

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
7 verses: triṣṭubh

A tightly structured hymn: the verbally responsive verses 3–4 are set within an inner ring (vss. 2, 5) with exact repetition in their final pādas (ámardhanto vásubhiḥ . . .). This structure is reinforced by tense usage: the verbs in verses 1–2 are all augmented aorists referring to the immediate past of today's dawn; those in verses 5–7 are present indicatives and imperatives, stating general truths about the behavior of the dawns and the singers; while those in verses 3–4 are augmented imperfects (with one perfect) referring to the distant past, which gave rise to the present situation.

This structure defines verses 3–4 as an omphalos, and indeed these verses show clear omphalos features. Verse 3 contains the most intricate syntax in the hymn, while verse 4 concerns the Father's finding of "the hidden light" in the Vala cave, the primeval model for each new dawn. Verses 3 and 4 are in reverse chronological order: the Fathers find the hidden light of Dawn in verse 4, and verse 3 then describes the subsequent time with the periodic return of the Dawn, eagerly proceeding to the sacrifice as if to a lover, not moving slowly and reluctantly like a maiden leaving an assignation.

The exact repetition in the inner ring mentioned above is not a static feature. It participates in what we have termed "poetic repair" (Jamison 2006) and therefore provides forward movement by setting up a puzzle that is resolved later in the hymn. The adjective ámardhantaḥ "not negligent" modifies "paths" in verse 2. The combination seems discordant, although the hearer can construct a meaningful reading: paths that are not negligent are those, properly maintained and "set in order," that lead one where they are supposed to go. The application of "not negligent" to the priests in verse 5 is far easier to interpret: not negligent priests are those who properly perform the sacrifice every morning and therefore do not transgress the gods' commandments that regulate the proper functioning of the cosmos, since by ritual logic the sacrifice causes the new day to dawn. The phrase in verse 5 thus "repairs" the more jarring one in verse 2, but the jarring phrase in verse 2 also forced the hearers to formulate a more complex conception.

As so often, consideration of poetic structure gives depth to the apparently conventional expressions and images in this hymn, which recur in so many other descriptions of Dawn.

1. The immortal light belonging to all people—he who belongs to all men, god Savitar, has propped that up.
   In accordance with his will, the eye of the gods has been born. Dawn has revealed the whole world.
2. The paths leading to the gods have become visible to me—paths that are not negligent and are set in order by the good ones.
   The beacon of Dawn has appeared from the east. She has come here, facing west from her habitation.
3. Those were the days: the many days through which, at the rising of the sun,
   you became visible, o Dawn—faring forth thence toward the east-facing (sacrifice), like (a maiden) faring forth to her lover, not like one going (home) again.

4. Those were the feasting companions of the gods: the sage poets of old, provided with truth.
   The Fathers discovered the hidden light. With their mantras that come true, they generated the Dawn.
5. Come together in a common pen, they [=priests] act in unison; they do not marshal themselves in opposition.
   They do not transgress the commandments of the gods, they who are not negligent and are united with the good ones.
6. In response to you the Vasiṣṭhas reverently invoke you with praises, when, waking at dawn, they have praised you, well-portioned one.
   Leader of cows, mistress of prizes, dawn for us, o well-born Dawn. Be first awake.
7. She is the leader of largesse, of liberalities. Dawn, while dawning, is "squawked" to by the Vasiṣṭhas, as she establishes wealth of long fame in us. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.77 (593) Dawn

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
6 verses: triṣṭubh

Renou (EVP III: 95) calls this hymn a "pièce banale," a designation that seems hardly fair. Although it lacks the intricate patterning of the immediately preceding hymn, its simpler structure gives it a forward-moving urgency encoded in its deployment of verb forms. The first half of the hymn (vss. 1–3) opens with a perfect (ruruce "she has shone") but thereafter consists entirely of augmented aorists (like vss. 1–2 of VII.76), with aroci of 2d almost forming a ring with the opening perfect form, built to the same root (√ruc). There is an abrupt change of verbal mood in verse 4, with a cascade of imperatives in the next two verses (4–5). The grammatical person also changes: the constant 3rd person of verses 1–3 is succeeded by 2nd person in the rest of the hymn. Thus the first half of the hymn describes the immediate arrival of Dawn, and in the second the poet addresses a series of eager commands to Dawn, who has just appeared in front of him. Two features tie the hymn together grammatically: (1) the abundance of present participles modifying Dawn in both halves, though more common in the first; and (2) the constant use of Dawn as subject. Except for 1c and the first half of the final verse (6ab) Dawn is always the grammatical subject. A glance at other Dawn hymns in this series shows that this uniformity is unusual.

No doubt Renou's remark concerned the "content" of the hymn, and it is certainly true that there are no remarkable images or elaborate conceits. However, the familiar depiction of Dawn as a lovely and ardent maiden is pleasing here, as it is elsewhere.

1. She has shone—up close like a young maiden, impelling every living thing forth to activity.
   (The time) has just come for Agni to be kindled by the sons of Manu. She has made light, pressing away the dark shades.
2. Facing all, she has arisen in full extension; wearing a luminous, gleaming garment, she has brightened.
   Golden in color, a sight lovely to see, mother of cows, leader of days, she has shone.
3. Well-portioned, conveying the eye of the gods, leading the bright horse lovely to see,
   Dawn has just been seen, decorated with (the sun's) rays, bringing brilliant bounties, projecting through all (the world).
4. Bringing valuable things nearby, dawn the foe into the distance; create for us broad pastureland and fearlessness.
   Keep hatred away; bring goods here; impel largesse for the singer, you bounteous one.
5. Radiate widely to us with your fairest radiances, goddess Dawn, lengthening our lifetime, imparting to us both refreshment and largesse in cattle, horses, and chariots, you who bring all valuables.
6. You whom the Vasiṣṭhas strengthen with their thoughts, o Daughter of Heaven, well-born Dawn, as that one place in us wealth high and lofty. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.78 (594) Dawn

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
5 verses: triṣṭubh

This hymn is characterized by two "signature words": práti "in response to / opposite" (found in every verse but 4) and the present participle vibhā́tī "radiating widely" (vss. 3–5), words regularly found in other Dawn hymns. In fact, there is, until near the end, little novel about this hymn. The most noticeable feature until the end is that the middle verse (3) refers to the dawns in the plural, though they seem to be immediately present, while the other verses have singular Dawn.

But the most noteworthy aspect of the hymn is the striking hapax verb that opens the last half verse (5c): tilvilāyádhvam. This is a transparent denominative built to the adjective tílvila (V.62.7), but this only displaces the problem, as the meaning and derivation of this adjective are not at all clear, and its rhyming reduplicative formation (til-vil) deviates markedly from normal Vedic word formation patterns. The adjective is generally taken to mean "fruitful' or the like and may be connected with the word tilá "sesame." If so, the creation and abundant scattering of seed may be the intended meaning here, though this is only a guess. The English idiom used to translate this obscure word is meant to convey its special status in the diction of this otherwise unremarkable hymn.

1. The first beacons have been seen opposite; her unguents diffuse aloft.
   Dawn, with your lofty, light-filled chariot turned hither, convey to us a thing of value.
2. In response to her the kindled fire awakens; in response (to her awaken) the inspired poets hymning (her) with their thoughts.
   The goddess Dawn travels, while pressing away all shades of darkness, all difficulties with her light.
3. These very dawns have been seen opposite in the east, extending their light, radiating widely.
   They have generated the sun, the sacrifice, the fire. The disagreeable darkness has gone back behind.
4. She has appeared, the bounteous Daughter of Heaven. All look at Dawn radiating widely.
   She has mounted the chariot being yoked by her own power, which horses of good yoke convey hither.
5. In response to you those of good thought have awakened today—our bounteous (patrons) and we (ourselves).
   Be fruitful and multiply, Dawns, while radiating widely. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.79 (595) Dawn

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
5 verses: triṣṭubh

This little hymn is dense with phonetic figures and puns, and like the preceding hymn has signature words—in this case the preverb ví "apart, widely" and the phonologically similar verbal roots vas "dawn" and vr̥ (var) "(un)cover."

Like many Dawn hymns, this one gives the opening of the Vala cave and the release of the cows imprisoned therein as the mythic model for each new dawn (see esp. vs. 4). Dawn's association with the distribution of goods is also emphasized in the last three verses.

1. Dawn has dawned widely along the path of the peoples, awakening the five settlements stemming from Manu.
   Along with her bulls lovely to see she has propped up her radiance. The Sun has uncovered the two world-halves with his eye.

2. They anoint the glossy nights at the ends of heaven; like clans in (battle-) harness the dawns are marshaled.
   Your cows roll the darkness up altogether; they extend the light, like Savitar his arms.
3. Dawn has come to pass—a bounteous benefactor most like Indra; she has generated fame for good faring.
   The divine Daughter of Heaven, most like the Aṅgirases, apportions goods to the man of good action.
4. As much largesse grant to us, Dawn, as you excavated for the praisers when you were being hymned.
   (You) whom they brought forth with the bellowing of the bull, you opened up the doors of the firm-fixed stone.
5. Impelling every god to largesse, rousing liberalities in our direction, dawning widely, impart insights to us for our gain. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.80 (596) Dawn

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
3 verses: triṣṭubh

This very brief hymn, a mere three verses, sketches the main outlines of Dawn's activities, though it has no space to elaborate: her connection with poets and the morning ritual, her task of revealing the visible world and banishing darkness, and her connection with the distribution of goods.

1. With their praises, with their hymns, the Vasiṣṭhas, inspired poets, have awakened first in response to Dawn, as she unrolls the two adjoining realms, revealing all the beings.
2. And she has awakened, having taken on new life, having hidden the darkness with light—Dawn.
   She goes in front, youthful and unabashed. She has brought to light the sun, the sacrifice, the fire.
3. Let the Dawns, accompanied by horses, by cows, by heroes, dawn always auspicious for us, milking out ghee on all sides, teeming. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.81 (597) Dawn

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
6 verses: br̥hatī alternating with satobr̥hatī, arranged in pragāthas

This final hymn breaks the pattern of the other Dawn hymns in this series: it has too many verses for its position; it is composed of three pragāthas of bṛhatī alternating with satobṛhatī (as opposed to the triṣṭubh meter of the other hymns); and it lacks the Vasiṣṭha clan refrain. It is therefore likely to have been an addition to the collection, and the 1st-person plural subjunctive bhunájāmahai in verse 5 with the modernized -mahai ending supports this assumption. However, the themes and concerns of the hymn and the phraseology employed do not differ significantly from those that went before.

1. She has appeared opposite, as she comes here dawning, the Daughter of Heaven.
   She unwraps the great darkness for seeing; the spirited one creates light.
2. The sun sends the ruddy (cows) surging up all together, as that heavenly body itself goes up with his rays.
   O Dawn, just at your first flush and that of the sun, might we be united with what is apportioned.

3. In response to you, o Dawn, Daughter of Heaven, we lively ones have awakened—you who convey much to be coveted, you winner, (who convey) pleasure, like a treasure, to the pious one.
4. You who in dawning, through your magnanimity, o great goddess, make the sun to be visible for seeing—may we—we beseech you—have a share of your treasure, being to you like sons to their mother.

5. Bring here that brilliant bounty, Dawn, that has the longest fame.
   What of yours provides nourishment to men, o Daughter of Heaven, give us that. Let us be nourished!
6. (Bring) fame immortal and riches for our patrons, prizes in cows for us—
   The impeller of the bounteous one(s), possessing a liberal spirit, Dawn dawns away failures.

VII.82 (598) Indra and Varuṇa

10 verses: jagatī

This hymn is structured into two sections, with the second embedded in the first. The first is an invocation to Indra and Varuṇa to come to the rite and consists of verses 1 and 7–10. The second section and the heart of the hymn are verses 2–6, which describe the two sides of kingship that the two gods represent.

Indra represents the king ruling during times of migration and conflict; Varuṇa represents the king ruling during times of settlement, ideally times of peace. In the political structure of the Vedic period, different men may have been kings during these two times or, as we believe more likely, the same king may have exercised these complementary functions at different times of the year.

In verse 2 the poet calls one of the gods samrā́j "sovereign king" and the other svarā́j "independent king." While both terms can be used of both Indra and Varuṇa (cf. Schlerath 1960: 132–35), samrā́j is used especially frequently of Varuṇa and the Ādityas (cf. I.25.10; V.63.3, 85.1; VIII.25.7–8, 29.9, 42.1; X.63.5) and svarā́j frequently of Indra (cf. I.61.9; III.45.5; VIII.12.14, 46.28, 61.2, 69.17, 93.11). Therefore, despite Schlerath's doubts, the "sovereign king" here is likely Varuṇa and the "independent king" Indra. Further, at least in this verse, the contrasting titles likely reflect the distribution of kingly functions between the two gods. Since the samrā́j governed the peoples and their divisions, he might be connected with times of settlement. Since the svarā́j was independent of other authority, he might be associated with times of conflict between separate clans, peoples, and rulers.

However the relation between svarā́j and samrā́j is to be understood, the poet insists on the necessity of both kinds of king and both sides of kingship. Indeed, after contrasting the two gods in verse 2ab, the poet emphasizes their similarity (2cd) and their united action in ordering the world (3ab). In verse 3cd the actions of the ritual are blended with the gods' cosmic functions. The two gods share Soma—here both the ritual drink and the god—who inspires their action and who therefore metonymically possesses the transforming power, the "cunning" (māyā́), by which they made the waters swell. The image of swelling waters is then metaphorically carried over to the hymns, which should likewise swell.

In verse 4 the poet returns to the two periods associated with the two sides of kingship: in 4a the poet and his people are moving in chariots at the time of conflict and migration; in 4b they are seated at the beginning of the period of settlement. But here, unlike verse 2ab, the poet does not explicitly distinguish between the two gods. Both gods are summoned at both times. In verse 5cd, however, he reintroduces their opposition by connecting Varuṇa with settlement and Indra with movement. This alternation between conjunctions and disjunctions underscores the mutual dependence of the different sides of kingship and the poet's insistence that both gods are great.

Verse 6 continues the contrast between Indra and Varuṇa in a fashion similar to verse 2, although the actions of the gods in 6cd are not entirely clear. Assuming that 6c refers to the action of Indra and possibly to the destruction of Vr̥tra and similar "obstacles," then 6d describes the action of Varuṇa. As Renou (EVP VII: 83) notes, the verb prá √vr̥ in 6d is rare, but appears to mean "ward off" the attack of an enemy (cf. IX.21.2). Unlike the aggressive action of Indra in 6c, the action of Varuṇa is thus defensive. Perhaps he protects the individual settlements during times of peace from incursions from enemies who might threaten them. The two gods thus have complementary functions in their different contexts and the similarity between them is reflected in the singular ójas "power" (6b) that both possess.

In verse 1 the poet is especially aware that his is not the most elaborate sacrifice offered, but he asks the gods to ignore what he sees as the overly showy rites of his competitors and to come to his rite. While it may be plainer than other rites, it does not have the evil intent behind it that those rites have. Returning to this theme in the latter part of the hymn, verses 7–10, the poet pleads for the attention of Indra and Varuṇa. In verse 9 he recalls the competition for the gods' favor and again asks the gods to hear his words, for his sacrifice will please the gods more than the words and rites of others.

1. O Indra and Varuṇa, extend great protection to our rite, to our clan and people.
   In the contests might we conquer the one whose fore-offerings are long, who is overzealous—those of vile intent!
2. One of you two is called a sovereign king [=Varuṇa]; the other an independent king [=Indra]. Indra and Varuṇa are both great, both bearers of great goods.
   All the gods in the furthest heaven have united power and strength in you two, o bulls.
3. You two drilled holes for the waters by your power, and you two raised the preeminent sun in heaven.
   O Indra and Varuṇa, in the exhilaration of cunning (Soma) you made the depleted (waters) swell. Make our insights swell!
4. As chariot-drivers we call upon just you in conflicts and battles; (seated) with knees fixed, we call upon you at your instigation of peaceful settlement;
   we singers call upon you, easy to call, the masters of the good belonging to both (war and peace), o Indra and Varuṇa.
5. O Indra and Varuṇa, since you two created all these beings of the living world by your greatness, with peaceful settlement Mitra befriends Varuṇa; with the Maruts the other, powerful one [=Indra] speeds toward beauty.
6. For the sake of (displaying) the great exchange-gift (of Indra?) and the vibrant might of Varuṇa, the two show the measure of enduring power belonging to him [=to each one], which is his own:
   the one [=Indra] overcomes the piercing (enemy) [=Vṛtra?], who is no kin; with a few the other [=Varuṇa] wards off the greater.
7. Narrow straits do not (come) upon the mortal, nor do difficulties, nor does burning heat from anywhere, o Indra and Varuṇa, to whose rite you two come, o gods, (whose rite) you two pursue, nor does a mortal's crookedness reach him.
8. Come near with your divine help, o you fine men! Listen to (this) call, if you will find pleasure in my (call).
   Because there is companionship with you two or since there is friendship, extend compassion (to us), o Indra and Varuṇa.

9. For us, o Indra and Varuṇa, be our vanguard in every contest, o you who have power over the peoples, when in competition men of both sides then call upon you to win kith and kin.
10. Let Indra, Varuṇa, Mitra, and Aryaman extend to us their brilliance, their great, widespread protection, and the unassailable light of Aditi—they who grow strong through the truth. We will keep in mind the signal call of the god Savitar.

VII.83 (599) Indra and Varuṇa

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
10 verses: jagatī

This hymn looks back at the Battle of the Ten Kings described in VII.18, in which the Bharata king Sudās with the help of the Vasiṣṭhas triumphed over an alliance of ten rulers. This battle was a key moment in Vasiṣṭha history, and the poet recalls this historic victory in order to extend it into the present. Now warriors allied with the Vasiṣṭhas are going forth in their quest for cattle (vs. 1). Looking on Indra and Varuṇa, who are present at the sacrifice, with their minds if not with their eyes and thinking of their close association with the two gods, the poet and his allies call upon the gods to help them. The cry to help Sudās in 1d replicates the call to which the gods responded before and sets the stage for the poet's recollection of the Ten Kings' battle.

In verse 3 the poet re-enters the earlier battle and speaks as if he were part of it or speaks in the voice of those who were. In the person of the earlier Vasiṣṭha, he calls for help in the midst of the turmoil of battle. Then in verse 4ab he remembers that the gods did help Sudās, and in 4cd the poet returns to his present, calling on Indra and Varuṇa to hear him. Like the earlier Vasiṣṭha, the poet and his people confront enemies on every side (vs. 5ab), and therefore he calls upon Indra and Varuṇa to help at the critical time as they did before (5cd). The poet knows that others summon the gods as well (vs. 6ab), but in verses 6cd–8 he recalls that the gods chose to help Sudās and Vasiṣṭha and not the other kings and priests. In the end the sacrifices of these others were inadequate, and in the end the gods were present at the sacrifice of Vasiṣṭha (vss. 7–8). In verse 9 the poet distinguishes Indra and Varuṇa for the first and only time in this hymn. While the two gods may have different functions, both their divine functions apply to the poet's present situation. Indra can bring victory to the poet and his people and Varuṇa can defend them.

1. Looking upon you two and their friendship (with you), o you superior men, the broad-chested ones have gone forward in their quest for cattle.

Strike down the obstacles, both Dāsa and Ārya! Help Sudās with your help, Indra and Varuṇa!

2. Where superior men gather together with their banners set, in a contest where there is nothing at all to love, where living beings, seeing the sun, become afraid, there speak for us, Indra and Varuṇa!

3. "The ends of the earth have appeared covered in dust! O Indra and Varuṇa, the tumult has mounted to heaven!
The tribes' hostilities have come upon me: o you hearing my call, come near with help."

4. Indra and Varuṇa, conquering Bheda without opposition with your deadly weapons, you helped Sudās.
Hear the sacred formulations to summon you! The placement of the Tr̥tsus [=the Vasiṣṭhas] in front came to be their true (place).

5. Indra and Varuṇa, the evils of the stranger and the hostilities of the aggressive ones burn against me.
Because you two are kings of the good belonging to both (war and peace?), so once more help us on the decisive day.

6. Both (sides) call upon you two in the contests, upon Indra and upon Varuṇa, to win what is good,
(as) when you helped Sudās together with the Tr̥tsus, when he was hard pressed by the ten kings.

7. Gathered together but without a zeal to sacrifice, the ten kings gave no fight to Sudās, o Indra and Varuṇa.
The invitatory praise of the superior men [=priests] sitting down to the [sacrificial] meal came true: at the call of these to the gods, the gods became present.

8. Indra and Varuṇa, you did your best for Sudās, surrounded on every side in the battle with the ten kings, when they, the bright-faced ones with braided hair, through their reverence—the insightful Tr̥tsus through their insight—offered their service.

9. The one [=Indra] smashes obstacles in battles; the other [=Varuṇa] ever guards his commandments.
We summon you two, you bulls, with our intricate hymns. Extend your protection to us, Indra and Varuṇa.

10. Let Indra, Varuṇa, Mitra, and Aryaman extend to us their brilliance, their great, widespread protection, and the unassailable light of Aditi—they who grow strong through the truth. We will keep in mind the signal call of the god Savitar.

VII.84 (600) Indra and Varuṇa

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
5 verses: triṣṭubh

The theme of rapid and forward movement dominates this hymn. This movement is marked by the repetition of prá "forth" or "forward" in verses 1c, 3d, 4c, and 5b and by verbal forms such as invati "speeds" in 2a and -jūtaḥ "hastened" in 3c. The various kinds of movement involve the proffering of hymns and oblations and the answering progress of the sacrificers by means of the wealth and offspring they receive from the gods. There is also movement implied in the "speed" of the rule of Indra and Varuṇa (2a), which extends high and wide. In verse 2, verbally enclosed within this description of the extent of their rule (2a, 2d), are the "bonds" of the two gods (2b) and the anger of Varuṇa (2c), which show the menacing power of the gods to enforce their rule.

Another characteristic of this hymn is verbal sleight of hand in verses 1 and 4. In verse 1 the "ghee-rich one" (ghṛtā́cī) would normally described the sacrificial ladle, but, as Renou (EVP VII: 85) notes, it can also characterize the dhī́, the "insight" embodied in the hymn (I.2.7) or the "songs" (gíraḥ, VII.5.5). Because this "ghee-rich one" is held in the arms of the priests, hearers would think first of the ladle. But in 1d the "ghee-rich one" goes "by itself" and "in its varying appearance." These descriptions would fit the hymn, which flies to the gods with its varied sounds and words. The final line, therefore, creates for hearers an unexpected redefinition of the "ghee-rich one" and produces a double image of it as both ladle and hymn. As such, the "ghee-rich one" represents the "oblations and reverence" offered to the gods in 1b.

Neither the translation nor the interpretation of verse 4cd is secure. The relative clause in 4c surely describes Varuṇa, but śū́ra "champion" in 4d is more likely a description of Indra. So the normal relation between relative and main clauses suggests that the subject in 4d is Varuṇa (as Sāyaṇa understands it to be), but the content of 4d suggests that it is Indra. Moreover, there is a word play between minā́ti "confounds," which ends 4c, and ámitā "immeasurable," which opens 4d. They are not from the same root, although they sound as though they could be. The words thus create a verbal icon of simultaneous similarity and difference. These ambiguities accord with the representation of Varuṇa and Indra as embodying different sides of kingship, which are nonetheless complementary and necessary to one other. As we read the lines, therefore, the two gods are separately characterized, but their separation is undermined by formal features that efface it.

1. I would turn you two here to our rite with oblations and reverence, o kings Indra and Varuṇa.
   The ghee-rich one [=the ladle/hymn] (goes) forth to you two, being held (forth) in our arms. By itself it goes all around in its varying appearance.

2. Heaven speeds the lofty rule of you two, who bind with ropeless bonds.
   Might the anger of Varuṇa avoid us. Indra will make a wide, wide world for us.
3. Make our sacrifice cherished at the ritual distributions; make our sacred formulations acclaimed among patrons.
   Let wealth, hastened by the gods, come to us. Further us with the help we crave.
4. On us, o Indra and Varuṇa, bestow wealth granting every wish, rich in goods and many cattle.
   If the Āditya [=Varuṇa] confounds untruths, the champion [=Indra] apportions immeasurable goods.
5. This song of mine has reached Indra and Varuṇa. It helped (us) forward, multiplying us in kith and kin.
   Having good treasure, we would go in pursuit of the gods. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.85 (601) Indra and Varuṇa

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
5 verses: triṣṭubh

The poet announces his hymn in the first verse, implicitly comparing it to Agni, the sacrificial fire. Agni has a "face of ghee," that is, he is both bright like ghee and receives oblations of ghee (cf. I.143.7, III.1.18, V.11.1, X.21.7). This prepares for verse 4, in which the poet asks that Agni be the Hotar of this rite, who will bring the oblations to Indra and Varuṇa. The last verse is also found as VII.84.5 but is less thematically connected to this hymn than it is to the previous hymn.

1. While offering soma to Indra and Varuṇa, I will purify for you two an inspired thought free from anything demonic and with a face of ghee like the goddess Dawn. Let those two give us wide space at the moment of encounter on our journey.
2. Surely they contest with one another here in summoning the gods, where missiles fly amid the banners.
   O Indra and Varuṇa, with your arrow strike those enemies, that they be far away and dispersed.
3. Since even the waters of innate glory, goddesses (themselves) have set Indra and Varuṇa in their seats among the gods, the one [=Varuṇa] holds fast the agitated peoples; the other [=Indra] smashes the unopposable obstacles.
4. Let him [=Agni] of strong resolve, perceiving the truth, be our Hotar— the one who bringing homage (turns) you two (here) by his power, o Āditya.

Bringing oblations, he will turn you two here to help. Bringing pleasure (to you), he will indeed be the one present for our safe passage.

5. This song of mine has reached Indra and Varuṇa. It helped (us) forward, multiplying (us) in kith and kin.
   Having good treasure, we would go in pursuit of the gods. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.86 (602) Varuṇa

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
8 verses: triṣṭubh

This hymn and the following three hymns (VII.87–89) are justly famous because they have an unusually intimate tone and because the poet Vasiṣṭha as a literary creation of the poem emerges as a distinct personality. Jamison (2007: 91–118) offers a detailed study of the hymns in this group and of the creation of the poet's personality. Like the other hymns in this small collection, this poem centers on just two figures, the poet—Vasiṣṭha according to tradition—and the god Varuṇa, and Vasiṣṭha speaks personally, even confessionally with Varuṇa. Apparently Vasiṣṭha has been suffering from some kind of affliction, which, he has been told, is the punishment of King Varuṇa for an offense. He begs Varuṇa to accept his offerings and repentance, to forgive his transgressions, which he says were not intentional (vs. 6), and to restore him to prosperity and health.

The relationship between Vasiṣṭha and Varuṇa constantly shifts as the hymn unfolds. The literary strategy of the poem most clearly appears in its use of pronouns and other markers of person, as Jamison (2007: 96–100) shows in her analysis. Use of the 3rd person distances the speaker and the object, while addressing another as "you" is a token of closeness and presence to one another. The poet deploys these pronouns first to distance Vasiṣṭha and Varuṇa, then to bring them close, and finally to separate them once again. So in verse 1 Vasiṣṭha is absent because there is no reference to the speaker, and Varuṇa is distanced by the 3rd singular pronoun asya. His absence is mitigated only by fact that unaccented asya should be anaphoric and therefore might point to the previous presence of the god. Otherwise, the relationship between Vasiṣṭha and Varuṇa is completely broken. In verse 2 Vasiṣṭha is present (1st sg. in each of the four lines), and Varuṇa remains distanced. In verse 3 Vasiṣṭha is present once again (1st sg.) and Varuṇa is partly present: he is addressed in the vocative but he is also mentioned in the 3rd person. In verse 4 both Vasiṣṭha (1st sg.) and Varuṇa (2nd sg.) are present. Then there begins a retreat from their full presence to one another. In verse 5 Vasiṣṭha is less present (the 1st pl. generalizes rather than personalizes the speaker) and Varuṇa is present (through the vocative address and 2nd sg. imperative). This verse reverses 3, in which Vasiṣṭha was fully present but Varuṇa partly present. In verse 6 Vasiṣṭha is distanced (note especially svá "one's own," not "my own"), and Varuṇa is present (through the vocative address). Again this verse reverses 2, in which Vasiṣṭha was present and Varuṇa was distanced. In verse 7 Vasiṣṭha is present (1st sg.), but Varuṇa is distanced (3rd sg.). This partially reverses 1 insofar as Vasiṣṭha was absent there but is present here. Varuṇa remains distanced in both verses 1 and 7. The last verse (8), is a concluding, extra-hymnic verse, a coda that stands outside the main structure of the hymn.

This analysis also shows the omphalos structure of the hymn. Verse 1 corresponds to 7, verse 2 to 6, verse 3 to 5, and verse 4 is the center. It is the thematic heart of the hymn because it is in this verse that the poet and the god are both present and present to one another. It also signifies the determination of Vasiṣṭha, who anticipates the resolution of his conflict with Varuṇa. Varuṇa will—perhaps even in the sense of "must"—proclaim what Vasiṣṭha has done, and Vasiṣṭha promises to make amends to the god to receive the god's forgiveness. Although the hymn moves away from this encounter between Vasiṣṭha and Varuṇa, the last verse suggests that the problem has been resolved. Varuṇa has returned to the distance, but he and Vasiṣṭha now mutually support one another. Varuṇa has enlightened Vasiṣṭha (vs. 7c), and Vasiṣṭha ritually serves the god to his greater "wealth," his power and glory (7d).

In verse 2b the meaning of váruṇe "within Varuṇa" may play on the possible etymological relation of váruṇa and vratá "commandment." That is, "within Varuṇa" has the sense of "under, or in conformity with, the commandment of Varuṇa." The poet wants to be no longer at odds with Varuṇa. At the same time the hope for closeness to the god or even for envelopment by the god, which is suggested in the phrase, looks forward to the increasing intimacy of Vasiṣṭha and Varuṇa. The state is both parallel to and contrasts with the situation in verse 6c where the elder is "within the misdeed of the younger."

In verse 4d, we read áva . . . īyām, from ava + √yā "make recompense," instead of the transmitted but metrically faulty áva . . . iyām.

1. Insightful are the races (of gods and mortals) through the greatness of him who propped apart the two wide world-halves.
   He pushed forth the vault of heaven to be high and lofty, (also) the star [=the sun] once again, and he spread out the earth.
2. And together with my own self, I speak this: "When shall I be within Varuṇa?
   Might he take pleasure in my offering, becoming free of anger? When shall I, with good thoughts, look upon his mercy?"
3. I ask myself about this guilt, o Varuṇa, wanting to see; I approach those who understand in order to inquire.
   Even the sage poets say the very same thing to me: "Varuṇa now is angry with you."
4. Was the offense so very great, Varuṇa, that you wish to smash a praise singer and companion?
   You will declare this to me, o you hard to deceive, o you of independent will! With reverence I would swiftly *make recompense to you (to be) freed of guilt.

5. Release from us ancestral deceits and those that we ourselves have committed.
   O king, release Vasiṣṭha from his bond like a cattle-stealing thief, like a calf.
6. This was not one's own devising nor was it deception, o Varuṇa, (but rather) liquor, frenzy, dice, thoughtlessness.
   The elder exists within the misdeed of the younger. Not even sleep wards off untruth.
7. Like a servant, I will give satisfaction to the generous (master); freed from offense, I (will give satisfaction) to the ardent one.
   The civilizing god [=Varuṇa] made those without understanding to understand; the better sage poet [=Vasiṣṭha] speeds his clever (patron) [=Varuṇa] to riches.
8. This praise song is for you, Varuṇa, you who are of independent will: let it be set within your heart.
   Let there be good fortune in peaceful settlement for us and let there be good fortune in war for us. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.87 (603) Varuṇa

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
7 verses: triṣṭubh

On this hymn, see the introduction to the previous hymn and especially Jamison (2007: 101–3).

The name of Varuṇa occurs in each verse of the hymn, and in verse 4 Varuṇa himself speaks. Like the previous one, therefore, this hymn has an omphalos structure, organized around the central verse 4 and the words of the god himself. In hymns organized around a central verse, that verse is often the key to understanding a hymn or the dramatic climax of the hymn, as it is, for example, in the previous hymn. But sometimes, as here, it is the most enigmatic verse of all. In 4a, as implied in the translation below, does Varuṇa know that the poet is wise and therefore will understand his cryptic words? Or does médhira "wise" anticipate the wisdom that the poet will receive from Varuṇa's words? In that case, we might rather say that Varuṇa spoke "to me (to make me) wise"? As Jamison (2007: 102–3) argues, the ambiguous placement of ná in 4c allows it to be taken either as a particle of comparison ("like") or as a negation ("not"). As a result the pāda can mean either "he will speak (their names) like secrets," that is, he will speak the names but he will do so only in a cryptic manner, or "he will not speak their secret (names)," that is, he will keep the secrets hidden. But most of all, there are the obscure words of the god in 4b: "The inviolable cow bears three times seven names." As often, the "cow" in this verse is speech (e.g., Thompson 1995: 20), and it is speech, or more specifically this hymn, that carries within it twenty-one "names." These names may be similar to the three times seven "tracks" (padā́) in I.72.6, although these tracks too are also "secret" (gúhyāni) and therefore their reference unclear.

There is one possible clue to the twenty-one names in the following verse. Verse 5 mentions three heavens and three earths "arranged in six" or "arranged in sixes." That is, "six" could refer to the three heavens and three earths, and, if so, we should translate, "Three heavens are hidden within him, and below are three earths, forming an arrangement of six." On the other hand, if ṣáḍvidhānāḥ refers only to the three earths and if each of the three earths is arranged in six, then we would have eighteen earths and three heavens, which gives twenty-one, the number of "names." In that case, the "names" might be tokens of the extent of Varuṇa's rule.

Returning again to verse 4, its last mystery is the "later generation" in 4d, which may refer not to a future generation of human beings but to humans as the "generation" of beings later than the gods. If so, then Varuṇa strives to instruct humans despite their limited capacities, perhaps well illustrated in our attempts to understand him.

While verse 4 is the most enigmatic in the hymn, it is not the only mysterious one. We have already touched on the riddle of three heavens and three earths of verse 5ab. In verse 6a Varuṇa is like the sky, which drops to the horizon at the far distance where there is the river that surrounds the earth. Because he is like the sky that drops toward this river, he is called a wild animal (6b) that comes down to the water to drink and he is like the "bright drop," which, as Geldner points out, might be the setting moon or sun or even the soma as it sinks into the waters with which it is mixed. In 6c Varuṇa is "of deep recitation." The primary sense is probably that Varuṇa speaks profound words, but the compound is ambiguous and could also mean that Varuṇa inspires or receives profound praise-recitations. Verse 7 connects this hymn to the previous hymn and provides a persuasive reason to link the two hymns, as Jamison (2007: 103) has noted. In VII.86.2 the poet asks, "When shall I be within Varuṇa?" Here in verse 7 the poet gives an answer: when we are free of offense, then "we would be within Varuṇa." That is, we would be in conformity with the vratā́ny áditeḥ "the commandments of Aditi," the goddess representing offenselessness, whose commandments are mentioned in 7c.

1. Varuṇa dug the paths for the sun. Forward (went) the floods of rivers to the sea, (those) mares, like a surge sent surging, following the truth. He made great streambeds for the days.
2. Your breath, the wind, roars again and again through airy space, like an ardent animal [=stallion], victorious in its pasture.
   (Here are) all your own domains, Varuṇa, between these two great and lofty world-halves.

3. With united desire the spies of Varuṇa survey both well-supported world-halves, (as do) the sage poets, possessing the truth and insightful in the sacrifices, the discerning ones who send their thought.
4. Varuṇa said to me who am wise: "The inviolable cow bears three times seven names."
   Knowing of its track, he will speak (its names) like secrets—he, the inspired poet who strives on behalf of the later generation.
5. Three heavens are hidden within him, and below are three earths, arranged in sixes.
   The clever King Varuṇa created this, the golden swing in heaven [=the sun], for the sake of beauty.
6. Like heaven, Varuṇa has descended to the river—he, the powerful wild animal, like the bright drop;
   he of deep recitation, who takes the measure of the airy space; he the king of what is, whose lordship offers good passage.
7. Might we be without offense within Varuṇa, who will have mercy even on him who has committed an offense, as we obediently fulfill the commandments of Aditi. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.88 (604) Varuṇa

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
7 verses: triṣṭubh

This intricate and justly admired hymn has been widely anthologized and studied. See especially the treatment of the hymn in Jamison (2007: 103–8) and Lüders (1951: 315–21). It is closely related to the two preceding hymns and likewise concerns the relationship between Vasiṣṭha and Varuṇa, delineating it in perhaps the most intimate fashion of any of these hymns.

Vasiṣṭha speaks for himself in these verses, even though he begins in verse 1 by addressing himself in the vocative. Once again, the theme of the poem is the distance between Vasiṣṭha and Varuṇa that has been created by something that Vasiṣṭha has done. That Vasiṣṭha addresses himself in the 2nd person perhaps suggests not only his distance from the god but even, as a result, from himself. The meaning of this becomes clearer as the poem develops. In verse 2 Vasiṣṭha approaches the ritual fire during the night and in the face of fire sees the face of Varuṇa. This results in a vision of Vasiṣṭha and Varuṇa sailing together (vs. 3). Their goal is Varuṇa's "swing," which, as in VII.87.5, is probably the sun, which Vasiṣṭha hopes will dispel the darkness that surrounds him and his relationship with Varuṇa. This vision takes Vasiṣṭha back to the time when he and Varuṇa were close (vs. 4), when Varuṇa made Vasiṣṭha a seer (ṛ́ṣi) and praise singer (stotár). The light imagery is most intense in this verse, for the day Vasiṣṭha became a seer and praise singer was the "brightest day of days." This memory of a time of perfect harmony between Vasiṣṭha and Varuṇa is the dramatic and emotional climax of the hymn and not surprisingly occupies the central verse of the hymn, which like the two previous hymns has an omphalos structure.

In verse 5 Vasiṣṭha returns from his vision and memory of better times to the unhappy present, in which he is no longer in the household of Varuṇa. But in verse 6 he continues to hope that, despite what he has done, the god will not hold his offenses against him, and will again offer him the protection that he once enjoyed within the house of Varuṇa. The poet keeps these offenses distant from himself by talking about the offender in the 3rd person (in 6ab), but then he refers to those who bear the guilt of those offenses in the 1st person (in 6c). Finally, in verse 7 the poet more confidently looks to Varuṇa's forgiveness: he "will release his fetter" of punishment "from us." As Jamison (2007: 107) has pointed out, both pādas a and c have present participles for which there is no grammatically appropriate noun. Logically they should describe "us"—and that logic is reflected in the translation—but the absence of an explicit reference to us generalizes that happy result and the possibility of reconciliation with the god.

1. Present to generous Varuṇa a carefully preened, much-loved thought, o Vasiṣṭha, to him, the lofty bull who brings a thousand rewards—(you, Vasiṣṭha,) who will make near at hand the one worthy of the sacrifice.
2. Now then, when I came into sight of him, I thought the face of Agni to be that of Varuṇa.
   When the sun is in the rock and darkness is master, may he lead me to see his wondrous form.
3. When we two, Varuṇa and (I), will board the boat, when we two will raise the middle of the sea, when we two will voyage through the crests of the waters, we will swing on the swing for beauty.
4. Varuṇa placed Vasiṣṭha on the boat. Skillful in his work, he made him a seer through his great powers.
   The inspired poet (made him) a praise singer on that brightest day of days for so far as the heavens, for so long as the dawns will extend.
5. Where have these companionships of ours come to be, when previously we would have accompanied one another without wolfish hostility?
   O Varuṇa of independent will, I went into your lofty mansion, your house with its thousand doors.
6. Varuṇa, though one be your very own dear friend and your companion, if he will commit offenses against you, may we, burdened with guilt, not pay for (the transgression) against you, you uncanny one. As an inspired poet, ever offer protection to him praising you.

7. Dwelling in enduring peaceful dwellings, (we will win) you—Varuṇa will release his fetter from us—
   (we), winning help from the lap of Aditi. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.89 (605) Varuṇa

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
5 verses: gāyatrī 1–4, jagatī 5

As Oldenberg remarks, although this hymn does not break the sequence of verse numbers and meter, it appears to be an addition to this Varuṇa collection. It is in another meter, and Vasiṣṭha does not appear by name within it. Moreover, while the other three hymns of this collection refer to Vasiṣṭha's unhappy state, this hymn more explicitly concerns an illness afflicting the speaker. It is an illness so serious that it could bring the speaker to the mṛnmáyaṃ gṛhám "house of clay" (vs. 1), the earth, in which the dead are buried.

According to both indigenous commentators and contemporary scholars, the illness especially associated with Varuṇa is dropsy, on which see Zysk (1985: 59–61). The reference in verse 2 to the speaker as "inflated like a water-skin" could point to dropsy, as could prasphuránn iva, here translated "seeming to kick," if it is interpreted as stumbling or as describing the water-skin as quivering. But the evidence is not very firm.

The last verse, which is in a different meter, brings the hymn closer to the preceding three hymns, since it lays the blame for the speaker's condition on a violation of the commandments of Varuṇa, his dhármā "ordinances."

1. O King Varuṇa, let me not go to the house of clay!
   – Be merciful, o you whose dominion is great. Have mercy.
2. If I go, seeming to kick, inflated like a water-skin, o master of the pressing stones, be merciful, o you whose dominion is great. Have mercy!
3. By my weakness of will I have gone against the current in every way, o bright one.
   – Be merciful, o you whose dominion is great. Have mercy!
4. Though he is standing in the midst of waters, thirst has found the singer.
   – Be merciful, o you whose dominion is great. Have mercy!
5. Whatever this deceit that we humans practice against the divine race, o Varuṇa, if by inattention we have erased your ordinances, do not harm us because of that guilt, o god.

VII.90 (606) Vāyu (1–4), Indra and Vāyu (5–7)

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
7 verses: triṣṭubh

The split dedication to Vāyu, then Indra and Vāyu reflects the ritual fact noted often elsewhere, that the first offerings of soma at the Morning Pressing are made to Vāyu alone and then to Indra and Vāyu jointly. This ritual purpose is announced quite clearly in the first verse, and, as often in Vāyu hymns, the invitation is followed by the god's journey to the sacrifice. As often also in Vāyu hymns the poet makes productive use of the ambiguity between Vāyu's "teams," his wind-horses (see vs. 3), and ours, the poetic thought we deploy, and in verse 5 the priests and poets actually become the horses that pull the chariot of the two gods.

As befits the early morning setting of the ritual, Dawn is prominent in the hymn (vss. 3–4), with the latter verse alluding obliquely to the Vala myth associated with the primal dawn. The distribution of gifts and goods appropriate to the early morning ritual is also prominent. In the early verses 2 and 3 there is promise of benefits for the sacrificer from the gods, a promise that in the last two verses (6–7) is actually fulfilled by the gifts made by the human patrons of the sacrifice. Indeed the patrons seem to be partly assimilated to the gods: they have the power to confer not only goods but sunlight itself (see vs. 6), and they share with the gods the repeated participle īśāná "having dominion over," said of Vāyu in verse 2, of Indra and Vāyu in verse 5, and of the patrons in verse 6.

1. The clear, honeyed pressed (soma-drinks) have been presented to you two by the Adhvaryus with desire for heroes.
   Drive, Vāyu; travel to our teams [=poetic thoughts]. Drink of the pressed stalk, to euphoria.
2. Whoever has reached out the fore-offering to you who have dominion (over it), the clear soma for you, Vāyu, drinker of the clear, you make him acclaimed among mortals: each one born to him is a prizewinner.
3. The one whom these two world-halves begat for wealth, that god will the goddess, the Holy Place, position for wealth.
   Then his own teams accompany Vāyu and the gleaming white treasure-chamber [=Dawn] exclusively.
4. The dawns dawned, day-bright and stainless. (The men) have found broad light while reflecting.
   The fire-priests have opened up the cowpen. The waters have flowed for them from a distant day.
5. Reflecting with thinking that comes true, yoked by their own resolve, they draw the hero-bringing chariot of you two, o Indra and Vāyu. Strengthening nourishments escort (the chariot of you) who have dominion over (them).

6. They who, having dominion over (them), confer their sun(light) upon us, through cows, horses, and golden goods, o Indra and Vāyu, those patrons should prevail in battles through their whole lifetime with steeds and heroes.
7. Like steeds seeking their share of fame, we Vasiṣṭhas with our lovely praise hymns, seeking prizes, would call upon Indra and Vāyu for help. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.91 (607) Vāyu (1, 3), Indra and Vāyu (2, 4–7)

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
7 verses: triṣṭubh

The last half of this hymn (vss. 4cd through 7, the last verse being repeated from VII.90.7) is a straightforward invitation to Indra and Vāyu to journey to the sacrifice, bringing goods to distribute, and to drink the soma. The first half of the hymn is both more miscellaneous and more obscurely phrased. True, verse 2 also issues the invitation to the two gods, but it is sandwiched between two verses with which it seems to have little in common.

Verse 1 is variously interpreted, with its parts variously arranged in translation. In our interpretation it contains speculation about the prior existence of the gods and the beginning of ritual activity: the gods who now derive their strength from men's sacrifices must have existed before the sacrifice began, the proof being that these gods created the dawn and the sun for both Vāyu, a god of the midspace, and for Manu, the first man and first sacrificer, under trying conditions. (A somewhat similar situation is depicted in VI.49.13, where Viṣṇu measures out the realms for "hard-pressed Manu," another cosmogonic deed.) The creation of dawn would in turn allow the ritual process, the ritual day, to begin—and begin it does with the offering to Vāyu. Verse 3 is clearly a depiction of the sacrifice, but the referents of the various phrases are not entirely certain. Although most scholars consider Vāyu the subject of the first half-verse, on the basis of shared vocabulary we instead consider it a disguised reference to the soma and its usual accompaniment, cow's milk. The soma drops then offer themselves to Vāyu. The first half of verse 4 complements the concerns in verse 1: in the first verse the time before the creation of the sacrifice by the gods is the subject of speculation; in 4ab the unbounded continuance of the sacrifice is envisioned, for as long as men have the power to perform it. With these ends of the sacrifice demarcated, the offering to Indra and Vāyu in the here-and-now can proceed, and the simple invitation of the rest of the hymn is issued to them.

1. Surely the faultless gods, who (now) grow strong through reverence, existed previously?

(Yes, because) for Vāyu, for hard-pressed Manu they made the dawn shine, along with the sun.

2. Two willing messengers, cow-protectors not to be deceived, you who protect through the months and the many autumns [=years]—
   Indra and Vāyu, this lovely praise hymn, speeding to you two, reverently invokes you for grace and easy passage anew.
3. The very wise one [=Soma], gleaming white, the full glory of the teams, accompanies those whose food is fat [=cows], who are strong through wealth.
   The like-minded (drops) have extended themselves for Vāyu. The men have done all (ritual actions) bringing good descendants.
4. As long as there is endurance of the body, as long as there is strength, as long as men keep reflecting with their sight,
   (so long) drink the clear soma among us, you drinkers of the clear. Indra and Vāyu, sit down here on this ritual grass.
5. Having hitched up the teams bringing coveted heroes, o Indra and Vāyu, drive nearby on the same chariot, for here is the foremost of the honey, presented to you two. Now, being pleased, unharness (your teams) among us.
6. The hundred teams, the thousand that accompany you two, bringing all valuables, o Indra and Vāyu, with those, good to acquire, drive nearby. Drink, men, of the honey brought before you.
7. Like steeds seeking their share of fame, we Vasiṣṭhas with our lovely praise hymns, seeking prizes, would call upon Indra and Vāyu for help. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.92 (608) Vāyu (1, 3–5), Indra and Vāyu (2)

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
5 verses: triṣṭubh

The “teams” of Vāyu are the primary topic of this hymn. They are identified as thousandfold in the first and last verses of the hymn, forming a conceptual ring, and in the middle verse (3) the productive ambiguity of the word is exposed: the teams are not merely the wind-horses that bring Vāyu here, but also the many forms of wealth he brings to us in return for the sacrifice. The even verses (2 and 4) first make the invitation to the sacrifice clear and then express wishes for success both for the priests and poets and for the patrons.

1. O Vāyu, drinker of the clear (soma), attend upon us. A thousand are your teams, o you who bring all valuables.

The exhilarating stalk has been held out close to you, the first drinking of which you have as your own, o god.

2. The lively presser has set forth the soma at the ceremonies, for Indra and Vāyu to drink, as the Adhvaryus, seeking the gods with their (ritual) skills, present the foremost of the honey to you two.
3. With the teams that you drive forth to the pious one, Vāyu, for your quest in his house, hitch up (teams that are) well-nourishing wealth for us, (teams that are) hero(es) and bounty in cows and horses.
4. We who are the Indra-exhilarating ones, (exhilarating) to Vāyu, who are god-directed and lavishly overflowing for the (Ārya) stranger—may we, with our patrons, be (always) smashing obstacles; may we, with our superior men, be (always) victorious in battle over those without alliance (to us).
5. With your teams in the hundreds, in the thousands, drive here to our ceremony, right up to our sacrifice.
Vāyu, at this pressing exhilarate yourself. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.93 (609) Indra and Agni

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
8 verses: triṣṭubh

The first six verses of this hymn, though they contain numerous examples of dual address of and reference to Indra and Agni together, are strongly skewed toward Indra. The two gods are called "smiters of Vr̥tra" (vss. 1, 4) and "possessors of good maces" (Indra's weapon; vs. 4); they "smite" (Indra's activity) the enemy (vs. 5) and "drive" to the sacrifice (vs. 6; since Agni is kindled on the ritual ground, he has no need to drive to it). Moreover the theme is the winning of prizes (vā́ja) and their distribution, and the besting of opponents: this agonistic cast is more typical of Indra than of Agni. The last two verses (7–8) are addressed to Agni only, in his familiar ritual role, mediating between the sacrificer and the gods, including Indra. But even in these verses Agni's own character is overlaid with that of other gods: for instance, in verse 7 he seems to be assimilated to Varuṇa and the other Ādityas in forgiving offenses.

1. Enjoy a blazing praise, newborn today, o Indra and Agni, smiters of Vr̥tra, for I keep calling upon you both, good to call, the two who best set out the prize right away for him who wants it.

2. For you two, o swelling ones, grown in an instant, swollen in expanse, become winners.
   Holding sway over wealth, over abundant pasturage, give your fill of a prize, substantial but thrilling.
3. When the prize-seekers have come to the rite of distribution, the inspired poets with their visionary thoughts seeking your solicitude, like steeds reaching the finish line, the men ever calling on Indra and Agni—
4. With his hymns the inspired poet seeking your solicitude reverently invokes (you) for glorious wealth that provides the foremost portion.
   Indra and Agni, smiters of Vr̥tra, possessing good maces, further us with new gifts.
5. When the two great opposing (forces) mutually contending, shining with their own bodies, array themselves at the contest of champions, at the rite of distribution do you two smash utterly the man unallied to the gods with those allied to the gods, with the soma-pressing folk.
6. Drive right up to this soma-pressing of ours here, Indra and Agni, to (show) benevolence, for you never have disregarded us. Might I turn you two here with perpetual prizes.
7. Agni, kindled by this reverence, you should call Mitra, Varuṇa, and Indra here.
   Whatever offense we have committed, that forgive; that let (them and) Aryaman and Aditi unloose (from us).
8. Aspiring to these desires, Agni, might we attain prizes in company with you two.
   Let Indra, Viṣṇu, and the Maruts not overlook us. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.94 (610) Indra and Agni

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
12 verses: gāyatrī 1–11, anuṣṭubh 12, arranged in tr̥cas

This hymn consists of four sets of tr̥cas, and if each tr̥ca is considered originally a separate hymn, the principle of arrangement is not violated. There are two main themes, the varieties of poetic thought and its product, verbal praise, which the poets address to the two gods, and the hope that these gods will favor these poets over their rivals (see esp. vss. 3, 7, 8, 12). Despite the emphasis on poetic inspiration, there seems to be relatively little of it on display in this hymn, which is a bricolage of quotations from other hymns. The two gods, Indra and Agni, also lack traits, individually and collectively.

1. This foremost praise hymn of this conception is for you two, Indra and Agni.
   It has been born like rain from a cloud.
2. Hear the call of the singer; Indra and Agni, crave his hymns.
   Showing your mastery, swell his insights.
3. O Indra and Agni, you superior men—not to evil, nor to imprecation make us subject—nor to scorn.

4. To Indra, to Agni we raise lofty reverence, a (hymn) with a good twist, and nourishing streams (of truth?) with our visionary thought as we seek help.
5. For these two do the inspired poets, each and every one, reverently invoke in just this way, for aid, urgently, for the winning of prizes.
6. You two we invoke, expressing admiration with our hymns, dispensing ritual delight, seeking to win at the contest for wisdom.

7. Indra and Agni, come here to us with help, you who conquer the territories.
   Let a defamer not hold sway over us.
8. Don't let the malice of a nobody, an ungenerous mortal, reach us.
   Indra and Agni, extend (us) shelter.
9. The goods consisting of cows, of gold, of horses, which we beg you for,
   Indra and Agni, may we gain them.

10. When superior men kept calling Indra and Agni when the soma was pressed,
    (men) seeking to serve the two who possess teams—
11. The two best smiters of Vr̥tra who are just delighting in the solemn speeches, in the hymn, in the melodies of the one who seeks to win (them)—
12. Just you two—(strike) the evil-speaking, evil-knowing mortal of demonic power—strike the snake with a stroke; strike the water-(with)holder with a stroke.

VII.95 (611) Sarasvatī (1–2, 4–6), Sarasvant (3)

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
6 verses: triṣṭubh

The multitalented goddess of wisdom and patroness of arts and music familiar from classical Hindu sources is not the Sarasvatī of the R̥gveda: in this text she is first and foremost a river, and not the mythical river Sarasvatī of later times, but a real, physical river that flows "from the mountains to the sea" (see vs. 2). Her distinguishing characteristics are all associated with this physical nature: the power and beauty of her ever-flowing current, and the nourishment and riches it brings with it. She is often mentioned along with her sister rivers, as first among equals, and in this hymn (vs. 3) and the next (VII.96.4–6) also with her shadowy male counterpart Sarasvant.

1. She has flowed forth with her surge, with her nourishment—Sarasvatī is a buttress, a metal fortress.
   Thrusting forward all the other waters with her greatness, the river drives like a lady-charioteer.
2. Alone of the rivers, Sarasvatī shows clear, as she goes gleaming from the mountains all the way to the sea.
   Taking note of the abundant wealth of the world, she has milked out ghee and milk for the Nāhuṣa.
3. He has grown strong as a manly one among maidens, a bullish bull calf among the (river-maidens) worthy of the sacrifice.
   He provides a prizewinner to the benefactors. He should groom his body for winning.
4. And this Sarasvatī, the well-portioned, will harken to this sacrifice of ours, taking pleasure in it, being implored by reverential ones with their knees fixed. With wealth as her yokemate, she is even higher than her companions.
5. Here are (oblations) being poured all the way to you (rivers), along with reverences. Take pleasure in the praise, Sarasvatī.
   Being set in your dearest shelter, may we stand nearby it like a sheltering tree.
6. And this Vasiṣṭha here has opened up the doors of truth for you, well-portioned Sarasvatī.
   Strengthen (him?), resplendent one; grant prizes to the praiser. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.96 (612) Sarasvatī (1–3), Sarasvant (4–6)

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
6 verses: br̥hatī 1, satobr̥hatī 2, prastārapaṅkti 3, as extended pragātha; gāyatrī 4–6, as tr̥ca

This hymn is not metrically unified (see Oldenberg 1888: 200). The first three verses, dedicated to Sarasvatī, consist of a pragātha (vss. 1–2) of the usual type (br̥hatī alternating with satobr̥hatī), extended with a third verse in prastārapaṅkti (12 12 8 8). The other three verses form a conventional tṛca, dedicated to Sarasvant, whose character seems little different from his better-known counterpart Sarasvatī. It is perhaps the identity of the "bachelors" in verse 4 that suggests that prayer to a male divinity would be appropriate. But the attribution of a "swelling breast" to this same male in verse 6 is distinctly odd; a nourishing, wealth-giving breast (using the same word stána) for suckling is attributed in I.164.49 to Sarasvatī, a more suitable figure by her gender.

The phrase "both stalks" (ubhé… ándhasī) in verse 2 has occasioned much discussion, and in recent years some political and military conclusions have been drawn from one quite speculative interpretation of it—conclusions not justified by the evidence, in our opinion. Although most interpreters take the "two stalks" as referring to two different beverages, one of which is soma (the usual referent of singular ándhas is the soma stalk), either soma and surā or soma and milk, some, following Grassmann, interpret the word as referring metaphorically to the two banks of the river. From this interpretation it is inferred that the Pūrus crossed the Sarasvatī and conquered the territory on the other side—a conclusive leap based on a shaky interpretation of this word. By contrast, we interpret the term on the basis of the twinned hymn VII.95, whose corresponding verse 2 states that Sarasvatī "milked out ghee and milk," a liquid pairing that may well be referred to by the dual in verse 2 of this immediately following hymn.

1. I shall sing a lofty speech: she is the lordly one of the rivers.
   Magnify Sarasvatī with well-twisted (hymns); with praises (magnify) the two world-halves, o Vasiṣṭha.
2. Since by your might, resplendent lady, the Pūrus preside over both "stalks" [=honey and ghee? soma and surā? two banks of river?], become our helper, with the Maruts as companions. Stimulate the generosity of the benefactors.
3. Good Sarasvatī will do good. She shows brightly as the unstinting one, rich in prize mares, while she is being hymned as she was by Jamadagni and she is being praised as she was by Vasiṣṭha.

4. As bachelors in search of wives, in search of sons, possessing lovely gifts,
   we call upon Sarasvant.
5. Your waves, Sarasvant, which are rich in honey, dripping with ghee—with them become our helper.
6. The swelling breast of Sarasvant, which is lovely for all to see—we would share (in it and) in offspring and refreshment.

VII.97 (613) Indra (1), Bṛhaspati (2, 4–8), Indra and Brahmaṇaspati (3, 9), Indra and Bṛhaspati (10)

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
10 verses: triṣṭubh

According to the Anukramaṇī (whose identifications are reproduced here in the heading) there is a wide array of divine dedicands for the individual verses of this hymn: Indra alone, Bṛhaspati alone, Indra and Bṛhaspati, and Indra and the more transparently named Brahmaṇaspati ("Lord of the Sacred Formulation"). The hymn is more carefully structured than the random listing would suggest, however.

First, as has often been discussed above, Hanns-Peter Schmidt (1968) has shown that Bṛhaspati was originally an epithet of Indra in his priestly role and only gradually split off into a separate god. As in IV.50 this divine history is recapitulated in part in the progress of this hymn, though in a different way from the earlier hymn. For most of the hymn only one of the divine figures is on stage at a time: verse 1 has Indra, verse 2 Bṛhaspati, and Bṛhaspati holds sway in verses 4–8. Even in verse 3, supposedly dedicated to both Indra and Brahmaṇaspati, the two are not depicted together, and in fact the phraseology seems designed to identify Indra as Brahmaṇaspati: the two-word phrase bráhmaṇas pátim "lord of the sacred formulation" in pāda b is, it seems, paraphrased with the defining relative clause of d, referring to Indra: yó bráhmaṇaḥ… rā́jā "who is king of the sacred formulation," with "king" substituting for "lord," thus superimposing the one on the other. What we are claiming here, then, is that in verses 1–8 the divine names Indra and Bṛhaspati/ Brahmaṇaspati refer to a single divine figure, Indra.

But when the transparent designation Brahmaṇaspati recurs in verse 9, it is immediately preceded by the dual pronoun vām "you two"; there must therefore now be two divine addressees, and the split between Indra and his epithet has been effected. The last two verses (9–10) call upon them both, using dual verbs, pronouns, and vocatives quite insistently. It is because we consider bráhmaṇas páti- an epithet in verse 3 and a divine name in verse 9 that we have translated them differently in the two verses. Notice also that Brahmaṇaspati, as opposed to Bṛhaspati, is only found in verses also containing the noun bráhman "sacred formulation."

But the hymn has another divine presence, not named but clearly there, who complicates the identity problem even more. The entire hymn is set on the ritual ground; this scene is set at the very beginning, in verse 1, starting with the word yajñé "at the sacrifice" and continuing with a clear depiction of the locus of ritual offerings, where men and gods (including Indra) meet. But, in the middle verses mentioning only Bṛhaspati (4–8), that god is described in ways extremely suggestive of Agni, the ritual fire: he sits on the womb (vs. 4); he is both bright and roaring (vs. 5), bright, golden, and good to enter (vs. 7), and most clearly, in the image of verse 6 he is dark below but possessed of horses like ruddy clouds. All of this phraseology has clear counterparts in descriptions of Agni. Thus, the divine figure Indra/

Bṛhaspati is identified here in this ritual context with the ultimate ritually oriented god, Agni. This identification is found elsewhere; see especially V.43.12.

It is noteworthy, but not surprising, that the usual mythological association of Indra/Bṛhaspati with the Vala cave is entirely absent.

1. At the sacrifice, at the seat of men (coming) from heaven and from earth, where men seeking the gods become exhilarated, where pressings are pressed for Indra, he will come at first for exhilaration and to vitality.
2. We choose divine help. Bṛhaspati holds himself ready for us here, o comrades, so that we might become without offense to the one who grants rewards, who is a giver to us from afar, like a father.
3. Him, the preeminent, well-disposed Lord of the Sacred Formulation will I sing, with reverence, with oblations.
   Let his divine signal-call mightily accompany Indra, who is the king of the god-created sacred formulation.
4. Let him sit as the dearest in our womb here—Bṛhaspati who is all-desirable [/granting all wishes].
   Desire for wealth in good heroes—that will he give. He will carry us across the parched places unharmed.
5. The recitation enjoyable to the immortal one—these immortals here, born of old, have imparted it to us.
   We would invoke the brightly roaring one, worthy of the sacrifice of the dwelling places, unassailing Bṛhaspati.
6. The capable, ruddy horses who pull together are pulling Bṛhaspati, who is simply strength itself, whose seat has darkness while (the horses) like a cloud clothe themselves in ruddy form.
7. He certainly is flame-bright; he is a preening (bird) with a hundred feathers; having a golden axe, he is vigorous, sun-winning—Bṛhaspati—good (for libations) to enter, lofty, the best at making the pressed drink in abundance for his comrades.
8. The two goddesses, the world-halves, begetters of the god, strengthened Bṛhaspati with their greatness.
   Comrades, exert your skill for the one whose skill is to be besought. He will make good fords, easy to cross, for the sacred formulation.
9. Here is a well-twisted (hymn) for you two, o Brahmaṇaspati. A sacred formulation has been made for Indra, the mace-bearer.
   Aid our insightful thoughts; awaken plentiful gifts. Exhaust the hostilities of the stranger, of the rapacious ones.
10. Bṛhaspati and Indra, you two hold sway over heavenly and earthly goods.
    Establish wealth for your praiser, even a weak one. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.98 (614) Indra (1–6), Indra and Bṛhaspati (7)

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
7 verses: triṣṭubh

This is really an Indra hymn; the final verse dedicated to Indra and Bṛhaspati (vs. 7) is simply repeated from the previous hymn (VII.97.10). The theme of the rest of the hymn is Indra's close affinity with and unslakable desire for soma. Not only is it the regular ritual offering that he seeks daily (vss. 1–2), but it belonged to him from birth (vs. 3) and became his special substance after his first victories (vs. 5). The deeds and power of Indra are also celebrated. Intriguingly, his mother first proclaims his greatness (vs. 3): the mention of Indra's mother, especially in connection with soma, always tantalizingly alludes to apparently fraught family dynamics associated with Indra's birth (see III.48 and IV.18). Verse 5, near the end of the hymn, repeats the proclamation of his deeds, using the formula sometimes found and expected at the beginning of a hymn (see, e.g., I.32.1, I.154.1), though not rare later in the unfolding of the poem.

The poet, of course, wishes to profit from the battle-might soma inspires in Indra (vs. 4) and receive some of the spoils of his victories (vs. 6).

1. Adhvaryus, offer the ruddy, milked plant to the bull of the settled domains.
   Better at finding a drinking hole than a buffalo, Indra travels everywhere, seeking a man who has pressed the soma.
2. What you made your own dear food on a distant day, every day you desire the drinking just of that.
   Taking pleasure with heart and with mind, being eager, drink the soma drinks set out, Indra.
3. On being born, you drank the soma for strength. Your mother proclaimed your greatness.
   Indra, you filled the wide midspace; through combat you made a wide realm for the gods.
4. When you will set to fighting those who think themselves great, we shall overcome them, though they are exulting in their arms.
   Or when, Indra, with your superior men you will attack the defensive forces, with you may we win the contest that brings good fame.
5. I proclaim the first deeds of Indra, proclaim the present ones that he has performed.
   When he overcame the godless magic powers, then soma became his alone.
6. Yours is all this (wealth in) livestock all around, which you see with the eye of the sun.
   You alone are the cowherd of cows, Indra. Might we share in your proffered goods.

7. Bṛhaspati and Indra, you two hold sway over heavenly and earthly goods.
   Establish wealth for the praiser, even a weak one. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.99 (615) Viṣṇu (1–3, 7), Indra and Viṣṇu (4–6)

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
7 verses: triṣṭubh

As has been discussed previously, Viṣṇu, one of the great gods of classical Hinduism, is a marginal figure in the Ṛgveda, generally associated with Indra. Viṣṇu's primary mythic exploit in Vedic is the "three strides" he made across the cosmos, measuring out, enlarging, and mapping the cosmic spaces. In middle Vedic literature and later, Viṣṇu takes the form of a dwarf when making these vast strides, but there is no trace of this notion in the Ṛgveda.

The first three verses of this hymn are addressed solely to Viṣṇu and allude to his establishment and fixation of the cosmic spaces, though without directly mentioning his three strides. The first verse does sketch (in the second half) the three separate realms with which Viṣṇu is associated, an indirect reference to the three strides; but in verses 2 and 3 the action that creates the spaces is "propping," an action more characteristic of Indra. However, in verse 3 Viṣṇu fastens the earth down with "loom pegs," a homely device in a way. The word (mayū́kha) is found only one other time in the Ṛgveda, in verse 2 of the late hymn X.130, where the creation of the sacrifice is likened to weaving. This verse is also noteworthy for Viṣṇu's direct address to Heaven and Earth as he props them apart.

The second three verses (4–6) are dedicated to Indra and Viṣṇu together, and though heroic deeds are attributed to both of them, the deeds themselves are ones assigned only to Indra elsewhere (e.g., the destruction of Śambara and of Varcin in vs. 5). It is not unusual in hymns addressed to dual divinities for the more dynamic mythology of one to be credited to both.

The final verse is dedicated to Viṣṇu alone (Śipiviṣṭa being an enigmatic epithet of Viṣṇu found in the Ṛgveda only in this and the following hymn), though the sentiments of the verse are conventional. For further on the epithet, see the next hymn.

1. O you who have grown with your body beyond measure, they do not attain to your greatness.
   We (only) know both your dusky realms of the earth; god Viṣṇu, you yourself know the farthest one.
2. No one now born, no one previously born has reached the far end of your greatness, god Viṣṇu.
   You propped up the vault, lofty and high; you fixed fast the eastern peak of the earth.

3. "Since you two are full of refreshment, rich in milk-cows, become ones affording good pasture for Manu through your favor"—
   (So saying,) you propped apart these two world-halves, Viṣṇu; you fixed the earth fast all around with loom-pegs.
4. You two made a wide place for the sacrifice, while you were generating the sun, the dawn, the fire.
   The magical wiles even of the Dāsa Vṛṣaśipra did you smite in the battle drives, you two superior men.
5. O Indra and Viṣṇu, you pierced the nine and ninety fortified strongholds of Śambara.
   At one blow you smite the hundred and thousand heroes of the lord Varcin without opposition.
6. Here is a lofty inspired thought that strengthens the two lofty, wide-striding, powerful ones.
   I have granted you two praise at the rites of distribution, o Viṣṇu; you two, swell the nourishments in the ritual enclosures, o Indra.
7. I make the vaṣaṭ-cry to you from my mouth, Viṣṇu. Enjoy this oblation of mine, Śipiviṣṭa.
   Let my lovely praises, my hymns strengthen you. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.100 (616) Viṣṇu

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
7 verses: triṣṭubh

The hymn begins conventionally enough, with a mortal offering sacrifice to the god (vs. 1) and a request for gifts in return (vs. 2). Viṣṇu's three strides are the subject of the following two, responsive verses (3–4). Verse 3d also introduces the theme of Viṣṇu's name, which is the subject of the last two real verses of the hymn (5–6, since vs. 7 is merely a repetition of the final verse of VII.99). The enigmatic epithet śipiviṣṭá found in the last verse of the last hymn (VII.99.7) is, as it were, interrogated in these verses. In verse 6 the poet, who boasts that he knows the hidden patterns, sets out to proclaim the god's name, while addressing him as Śipiviṣṭa, and then asks in the next verse whether the god's own proclamation of himself as Śipiviṣṭa was meant to be ignored or passed over. The poet then mysteriously alludes to two different forms of the god, which may (or may not) correspond to two different names. The hymn does not resolve these questions, perhaps leaving the shadowy figure of Viṣṇu to be fully developed in the ensuing centuries.

1. Now the mortal desiring to gain gets his share, if he does pious service to wide-ranging Viṣṇu, will set the sacrifice in motion with fully focused mind, and will seek to attract here such a one, favorable to men.

2. You, Viṣṇu, traveling your ways—give benevolent thought destined for all people, concentrated thought, so that you will give us our fill of abundant welfare, of greatly glittering wealth in horses.
3. Three times did the quick god stride with his greatness across this earth worth a hundred verses.
Let Viṣṇu be preeminent, stronger than the strong, for vibrant is the name of this stalwart one.
4. Quick Viṣṇu strode across this earth for a dwelling place for Manu, showing his favor.
Firmly fixed are his peoples, (even) the weak. He, affording good birth, has made (them) wide dwelling.
5. This name of yours, o Śipiviṣṭa, of you the stranger do I proclaim today, I who know the (hidden) patterns.
I hymn you, the strong—I, less strong—you who rule over this dusky realm in the distance.
6. Was (this speech) of yours to be disregarded, when you proclaimed of yourself: "I am Śipiviṣṭa"?
Do not hide away this shape from us, when you have appeared in another form in the clash.
7. I make the vaṣaṭ-cry to you from my mouth, Viṣṇu. Enjoy this oblation of mine, Śipiviṣṭa.
Let my lovely praises, my hymns strengthen you. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.101 (617) Parjanya

Kumāra Āgneya or Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
6 verses: triṣṭubh

Dedicated to Parjanya, the god of thunder, this hymn celebrates the fructifying rain in sometimes cryptic and riddling terms, which probably involve simultaneous natural and ritual reference. The number three is a recurrent theme: the "three speeches" of verse 1; the "triply layered" shelter and "triply turned" light of verse 2; the three heavens, three stages of flowing water, and three buckets of verse 4. There is also, as often with Ṛgvedic atmospheric phenomena, gender ambiguity and gender shifting. The bull of verse 1 creates a calf as his embryo. In verse 3 an unidentified subject (though surely Parjanya) is sometimes a barren cow and sometimes gives birth. (The "he" of the translation is a necessary English compromise: the Sanskrit has no pronominal subject and therefore no gender identifier.) Later in that verse the father provides milk to the mother. As is often the case with Ṛgvedic enigmas, it is likely that there is no one correct answer to the riddles, which are instead meant to stimulate creative speculation.

1. Speak forth the three speeches with light at their front, which milk this udder milking out honey.
   Creating the calf, the embryo of the plants [=Agni], as soon as he is born the bull sets to bellowing.
2. The one who is the increaser of plants, who of the waters, who, as god, holds sway over the whole moving world, he will extend triply layered sheltering shelter, triply turned very superior light to us.
3. Sometimes he becomes a barren cow, sometimes he gives birth; he has fashioned his own body as he wished.
   The mother accepts the milk of the father. With it the father grows strong, with it the son.
4. In whom all the creatures abide, (in whom) the three heavens; (in whom) the waters have flowed in three stages—
   (his) three buckets for pouring drip an abundance of honey all around.
5. Here is a speech for Parjanya the self-ruling: let it be the intimate of his heart. He will enjoy it.
   Let there be joy-bringing rain for us; let the plants whose protectors are the gods be well-berried.
6. "The bull is the inseminator of each and every (plant). In him is the life-breath of the moving (world) and of the still."
   Let this truth be protective of me for a hundred autumns. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

VII.102 (618) Parjanya

Kumāra Āgneya or Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
3 verses: gāyatrī

As simple and straightforward an address to Parjanya as the preceding hymn was cryptic and complex.

1. To Parjanya sing forth—to the son of heaven who grants rewards.
   Let him seek pasturage for us.
2. Who creates the embryo of the plants, of the cows, of the steeds, of human women—Parjanya—
3. Just to him, in his mouth, pour a most honeyed oblation.
   He will make lasting refreshment for us.

VII.103 (619) Frogs

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
10 verses: triṣṭubh, except anuṣṭubh 1

A rain charm, which cleverly matches accurate description of frogs noisily emerging from estivation and mating at the beginning of the rainy season with the behavior of priests at a particular ritual, the Pravargya (see esp. vss. 7–9). Although there has been much debate about whether this hymn satirizes priests by comparing them to frogs or instead is to be taken with deadly seriousness, the truth no doubt lies somewhere in between. The poet obviously took great delight in his skill at matching frog behavior with ritual behavior and is unlikely to have been unaware of the potentially comic aspects of the comparison; however, the explosive fertility of the frogs provides a model for similar increase in the human sphere, and therefore the comparison has a serious purpose.

Attention to modern studies of animal behavior allows us to see just how much careful observation of frogs lies behind the depiction of the frogs here, and understanding anuran mating habits deepens our understanding of the poem. (See Jamison 1993.) For example, the frog lying "like a dried-out leather bag" is a counterintuitively accurate representation of a frog in estivation: some really do go dormant and dry up during the dry season, and "adding water" plumps them up and revives them. Once revived, the chorus of frogs begins, the purpose of which is to draw female frogs to the males, who are vocalizing, for mating. This antiphonal chorus is described in verses 2–6. Since the calls of different species are quite distinctive (as sketched in vs. 6), the different cries serve to attract conspecific females to the appropriate male. The actual mating posture of frogs is described in verse 4: it involves the male approaching the female from behind and grasping her firmly for as long as it takes—which for some species can be quite awhile (days or weeks).

Another important aspect of the hymn is its comparison of the frog chorus to a pedagogical situation (see esp. vss. 3, 5), in which the father/teacher speaks and the pupils exactly repeat his utterance. This is the clearest and earliest depiction of pedagogy in ancient India and is an example of how our knowledge of everyday life at that time must be obliquely won. The most famous word in this hymn is found in verse 3, the phonologically aberrant akhkhala (underlying the so-called cvi-formation, akhkhalī-[kṛ́tya]). On the one hand, it would take a very austere interpreter, and a killjoy, not to recognize this as an onomatopoetic imitation of a froggy sound; on the other hand, in the inspired analysis of Paul Thieme (1954), this is, in Middle Indic guise, a representation of the word akṣara "syllable." What the frog pupils are doing is "making syllables," that is, repeating the utterance of the teacher verbatim, as sound, not meaning. This is a pedagogical technique that endures to this day in traditional Vedic learning. It is also telling that the word akhkhala is in Middle Indic form, as the everyday language of the Ṛgvedic poets, and especially of their wives and children, had most likely already undergone many of the phonological and morphological changes characteristic of Middle Indic, but only found in preserved texts from a much later period. Instruction of the young, as well as most ordinary conversation, was no doubt carried out in this language rather than in the high Vedic Sanskrit of the hymns.

As for the ritual application, the Pravargya rite occurs after a year-long consecration, like that referred to in verse 1 and brought to an end in verses 7–9. The most salient feature of the Pravargya is the offering of the gharma drink, referred to specifically in verses 8–9, the heated milk-offering that boils until it overflows. The last, and most important, implicit comparison between frogs and priests turns on this ritual offering: the prodigious discharge of eggs after anuran mating, especially by many pairs simultaneously, must have reminded the poet of the frothy bubbling overflow of the boiling milk. And since the thousands of eggs released are a tangible sign of fertility and increase, the frogs are seen as assuring increase for us as well, in the final verse (10), culminating in the "Pressing of Thousands."

Oldenberg suggests that that this hymn was added at this point in the Maṇḍala, just after the two Parjanya hymns (VII.101–2), because of the presence of Parjanya in the first verse. It is certainly appropriate for the rainy season.

1. Having lain still for a year, (like) brahmins following their commandment, the frogs have spoken forth a speech quickened by Parjanya.
2. When the heavenly waters have come to him, lying like a dried leather bag in the pond, like the bellow of cows with their calves, the call of the frogs comes together here.
3. When it has rained on them, who are yearning and thirsting, when the rainy season has come, saying "akhkhala" [/repeating syllables] like a son to a father (at lessons), one goes up close to the other who is speaking.
4. One of the two grasps the other from behind, when they have become exhilarated in the discharge of the waters, when the frog, rained upon, has hopped and hopped, and the speckled one mixes his speech with the green one.
5. Once one of them speaks the speech of the other, like a pupil that of his teacher, (then) a whole section of them speaks as if in unison, when you of good speech speak amid the waters.
6. One of them has a cow's bellow, one a goat's bleat; one is speckled, one green.
   Bearing the same name but different forms, they ornament their voice in many ways as they speak.
7. Like brahmins at an "Overnight" soma ritual, speaking around (a soma vessel) full like a pond, you cycle around to that day of the year, which, o frogs, is the one marking the rainy season.

8. The brahmins, having soma, have made speech, creating their yearly sacred formulation.
   The Adhvaryus, having the hot ritual milk-drink (at the Pravargya ritual), sweating, become visible; none are hidden.
9. They guarded the godly establishment of the twelve(-month); these men do not confound the season.
   In a year, when the rainy season has come, the heated ritual milk-drinks obtain their own release.
10. The one with a cow's bellow has given, the one with a goat's bleat has given, the speckled one has given, the green one (has given) us goods.
    The frogs, giving hundred of cows, lengthened (their/our) life at a "Pressing of Thousands."

VII.104 (620) Destroying Demons, Using Imprecations and Curses. Indra and Soma (1–7, 15, 25), Indra (8, 16, 19–22, 24), Soma (9, 12–13), Agni (10, 14), Gods (11), Pressing Stones (17), Maruts (18), Vasiṣṭha's Hopes for Himself (23ab), Earth and Midspace (23cd)

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
25 verses: triṣṭubh, except jagatī 1–6, 18, 21, 23; anuṣṭubh 25; jagatī or triṣṭubh 7

This long and rambling hymn coming at the very end of the VIIth Maṇḍala is obviously an addition to the original collection, not only on formal grounds but on those of content. Not a praise hymn, it calls upon a series of gods and other powers to destroy all manner of threats to us, in all manner of creatively bloodthirsty ways. It therefore has more in common with what we might term the "instrumental" hymns of the Atharvaveda than with the R̥gvedic manner, and it is in fact found in almost identical form as Atharvaveda Śaunaka VIII.4 and in Atharvaveda Paippalāda XVI. The relentless focus on the elimination of evildoers and the changes rung on the methods of destroying them can give an impression of homogeneity, despite the number of different gods called on (mostly Indra and Soma, but with a number of others interspersed: see the Anukramaṇī ascriptions above).

Nonetheless smaller divisions can be discerned within the hymn as a whole. The mood is set by verse 1, with no fewer than eight violent imperatives addressed to Indra and Soma, urging action against the wicked. The first five verses follow the same pattern: an initial vocative índrāsomā "o Indra and Soma," followed by imperatives addressed to those gods. The sixth verse starts the same, with the vocative, but continues somewhat differently: rather than ordering the gods to unleash their powers in yet another way, the poet expresses the hope that his own thought (and its verbal expression) will envelop the gods like horse-tackle. This prayer-offering and the sacred formulations (bráhman) that Indra and Soma are urged to quicken in pāda d brings the brutal first section to a more benign and R̥gvedic conclusion.

Verse 7 is also addressed to Indra and Soma, also in the vocative, but with the vocative postponed till the beginning of the second half of the verse. This slight change in structure allows this verse to serve as a transition to the next subsection, which continues, in our opinion, through verse 11 and is defined by a ring provided by the preverb práti "against, in response to," opening 7a and 11c. Though the demands for action continue in this section, they take a more personal turn. In the first section, the gods were simply ordered to destroy evildoers; in this section the target is evildoers who act against us (as the práti signals). These verses all posit an innocent victim (usually 1st person) of the malefactor who is to be destroyed by the gods. Moreover, the avengers are no longer just Indra and Soma in tandem; each verse has a different designated hitter: just Indra in 8, Soma in 9, Agni in 10, and the gods in general in 11. The nature of the offenses has also become more sharply defined, in that the transgressions involve evil or false speech (even the "cheat" of vss. 10–11 means literally "desire to deceive"). Although evil speech and hostility to sacred speech were already found in verse 2, these linguistic offenses were only some of the condemned activities in the first section; they are the only ones here.

In the two next verses (12–13), speech, true and false, is foregrounded, and the punishment of the speaker of falsehood is reassuringly affirmed. But the mood changes abruptly in verse 14: the speaker seems to stand accused of the very offenses he called upon the gods to punish; the innocent 1st persons of verses 7–11 are the objects of Agni's anger. The aborted conditional clause of 14ab seems to convey the speaker's distress. In verses 15–16 the speaker swears a dramatic oath concerning the truth of his denial and calls down further destruction on the man who falsely accused him. The accusation is that he is a yātu(dhā́na), a "sorcerer." The speaker's ringing assertion of his innocence and his powerful curse against his accuser brings this section of the hymn to a resounding conclusion.

Indeed, we are of the opinion that the rest of the hymn was simply tacked onto what precedes because it concerns sorcerers, using the same word yātu, and similar demonic beings. The tone of the remainder (vss. 17–25) is very different, with the theme of true and false speech recessive. The enemies are sorcerers in various animal forms, and the sense of personal menace and of human evildoing is almost entirely absent. Nonetheless, even if we are correct that these nine verses were originally independent, the fact that the full hymn was transmitted independently in the R̥gveda and both recensions of the Atharvaveda would indicate that the join was made early.

The Indian tradition (and many Western commentators, including Geldner) reads Vasiṣṭha's biography into the dramatic middle of the hymn, interpreting the accusation and denial in verses 15–16 as evidence for the hostility between Vasiṣṭha and Viśvāmitra found in much later texts. In this interpretation Viśvāmitra is the accuser, and Vasiṣṭha the outraged 1st-person speaker. Needless to say, there is absolutely no evidence for this in the hymn itself, and no evidence for the Vasiṣṭha–Viśvāmitra feud elsewhere in the R̥gveda. It is always necessary to be wary about "reading backward" into the R̥gveda and other Vedic texts.

1. Indra and Soma, scorch the demonic force, crush it! Pin down those who grow strong in darkness, you bulls.
   Pound aside the unobservant ones, burn them down. Smite, shove, grind down the voracious.
2. Indra and Soma, like a pot on the fire let your evil heat seethe against the one who speaks evil.
   Set forth unrelenting hatred against the hater of the sacred formulation, the eater of raw flesh, the one with a terrible glance—against the worm-eater.
3. Indra and Soma, spear the evil-doers within their hole out into darkness that offers nothing to hold onto, so that no one at all will come up from there again. Let this power of yours, full of battle fury, be for vanquishing.
4. Indra and Soma, make the crushing weapon of death roll from heaven and from earth toward the one who speaks evil.
   Fashion a reverberating (weapon) up out of the mountains, with which you grind down the demonic force that has been growing strong.
5. Indra and Soma, make it roll from heaven. With fire-heated (weapons) that smite like stones, with unaging (weapons) whose murderous force is searing heat, spear the voracious ones down into a deep place. Let them go to silence.
6. Indra and Soma, let this thought here encircle you on all sides, like a girth-band two prizewinning horses—the thought that, as ritual offering [/invocation], I impel around you, with wisdom (as the goad). Like lords of men, quicken these sacred formulations.
7. Keep (this) in mind! With your thrusting ways smite the deceits of the demon with his wreckage.
   Indra and Soma, let there be no good passage for the evildoer who with his deceit ever shows hostility against us.
8. Whoever bears witness against me with untruthful words, as I behave with guileless mind, like waters grabbed in a fist, let the speaker of nothing come to nothing, Indra.
9. Those who distort (my) guileless speech in their (usual) ways, or who spoil an auspicious one according to their wont, let Soma give them over to the serpent or set them in the lap of Dissolution.
10. Whoever wishes to cheat us of the essence of food, o Agni, or of our horses, of our cows, of our bodies, let the swindling thief who does the theft go to insignificance. Let him be bent double, along with his life and lineage.

11. Let him be far in the distance, along with his life and lineage; let him be beneath all three earths.
    Let his glory dry up, o gods—whoever wishes to cheat us by day and whoever by night.
12. Good discrimination is (easy) for the perceptive man: the two (types of) speech, true and untrue, contend with each other.
    Which of the two is true, whichever is straighter, just that Soma aids—he smites the untrue.
13. Truly, Soma does not promote the crooked man, nor one who sustains his rule perversely.
    He smites demonic force; he smites one who speaks what is untrue. Both lie in the toils of Indra.
14. If I were a man with false gods, or if I call upon the gods wrongly, o Agni. . . .
    Why are you angry at us, Jātavedas? Let those whose speech is deceitful to you attend upon dissolution.
15. Let me die today if I am a sorcerer, or if I have scorched the lifespan of a man.
    And he should be separated from ten (generations of?) heroes, whoever says falsely to me: "you sorcerer."
16. Who says to me, who am without sorcery, "you sorcerer," or who, (though) a demon, says "I am pure," let Indra smite him with a great weapon of death. Let him fall lowest of all creation.
17. She who goes forth by night like a nightjar [?], concealing her own body by deceit, she should fall down into holes without end. Let the pressing stones smash the demons with their tramplings.
18. Spread out among the clans, Maruts. Seek, grab, crush together the demons—the ones who, having become birds, fly through the nights, or those who have deployed their swindles at the divine ceremony.
19. Roll the stone forth from heaven, Indra; hone the soma-honed one entirely, bounteous one.
    From in front, from behind, from below, from above, strike at the demons with the mountain.
20. These very dog-sorcerers are flying. Those inclined to deceit desire to deceive Indra, the undeceivable.
    The able one is honing his weapon of death for the slanderers. Now he discharges the missile toward the sorcerers.

21. Indra has become the one who pounds aside the sorcerers, the oblation-stealers, those who seek to ambush.
 The able one, splitting them like an axe a tree, breaking them like pots, advances against those who are really demons.
22. The owl-sorcerer, the owlet-sorcerer—smash them, and the dog-sorcerer and the wolf-sorcerer, the eagle-sorcerer and the vulture-sorcerer. As if with a mill-stone, pulverize the demonic power, Indra.
23. Don't let the demonic power of the sorcerers reach us. Let (Dawn) banish with her dawning the pair that are worm-eaters.
 Let Earth protect us from earthly constraint; let the Midspace protect us from heavenly (constraint).
24. Indra, smash the male sorcerer and the female exulting in her magic power.
 Let the no-necks with feckless gods shake to pieces. Let them not look upon the sun as it rises.
25. Look on; look out: Indra and Soma, be vigilant.
 Hurl the weapon of death at the demonic forces, the missile at the sorcerers.

VIII

Maṇḍala VIII

Maṇḍala VIII is organized into small groups of hymns attributed to a single poet or a set of closely related poets. Within each group, the hymns are organized by divinity and meter and length of hymn. As noted in the general introduction, two poetic lineages predominate, that of the Kāṇvas, especially in the first two-thirds of the maṇḍala, and that of the Āṅgirases in the last third, although the Anukramaṇī attributes some hymns to poets belonging to neither lineage and in addition Kāṇva hymns appear in the Āṅgirasa section and vice versa. The Kāṇva/Āṅgirasa identification links Maṇḍala VIII with Maṇḍala I, where poets of these families are prominent. Inserted in the middle of the maṇḍala are the apocryphal or "half-apocryphal" Vālakhilya hymns (VIII.49–59), appearing between the sixth and seventh anuvākas of the maṇḍala. Although these were supplements to the R̥gveda collection, they were transmitted with it and transmitted with accents, unlike the other khilāni, the other appendices to the saṃhitā text. For further on the structure and affiliations of VIII, see especially Oldenberg (1888: 209–19) and Hopkins (1896).

Many of the hymns in VIII are made up of strophes consisting of two or three verses (pragāthas and tr̥cas respectively), in various meters. Quite long hymns can be thus assembled, and there is often more coherence within the strophes than between the strophes. These strophic structures were especially associated with the sung portions of the ritual, whose principal priest in the classic śrauta ritual was the Udgātar, the priest of the Sāmaveda, into which many of the verses of Maṇḍala VIII were borrowed. Thus the VIIIth Maṇḍala seems to have a liturgical function somewhat separate from the rest of the saṃhitā.

Unlike the rigid divinity order in the Family Books, where Agni hymns always precede Indra hymns, the ordering within the hymn groups is more various, with Indra often leading off. Indeed Indra is the dominant god of the maṇḍala: of the ninety-two non-Vālakhilya hymns, exactly half, forty-six, are dedicated to him alone, with a further two to Indra and Agni jointly. Moreover, six of the eleven Vālakhilya hymns are Indra's, in addition to a joint Indra-Varuṇa hymn. Agni is, by contrast, rather muted in the book: only fourteen hymns belong to him alone. The Aśvins are relatively well represented, with eleven hymns and parts of several others. The Ādityas also have a presence, with three hymns to them as a group, one to Mitra and Varuṇa, and one to Varuṇa alone, as well as a substantial part of the composite hymns VIII.42 and 101 and of the All God hymns VIII.27 and 83. The Maruts receive three hymns, Soma two (of the few Soma hymns outside of IX), but the minor gods are almost invisible in this maṇḍala except in incidental mentions in All God hymns.

There are many high points and striking features in this sprawling maṇḍala, of which we can mention only a few. From a ritual point of view, VIII.31, which treats the household pair, provides the only clear R̥gvedic mention of the Sacrificer's Wife, whom we consider a ritual innovation in late R̥gveda. Another likely sociocultural innovation, the explicit organization of the three Ārya varṇas, the social classes of brahmin, kṣatriya, and vaiśya, is obliquely referred to in the trio of hymns VIII.35–37. On the mythological side, the story of Indra, Viṣṇu, and the Emuṣa boar, found in later brāhmaṇa texts, is mentioned several times in this maṇḍala, with a fairly coherent account of it given in VIII.77. Perhaps the single most striking hymn in VIII is the Apālā sūkta, VIII.91, in which a barely pubescent girl conducts a private soma sacrifice for Indra. A particularly beautifully structured hymn is the All God riddle hymn, VIII.29. Finally, one of the most salient features of the maṇḍala is the number of dānastutis, including some of the most notable in the R̥gveda.

Although the first five hymns of VIII (VIII.1–5) are attributed to a variety of poets, as Oldenberg discusses (1888: 214) they appear to belong together because of the similarity of the names of the poets assigned by the Anukramaṇī, the regular appearance of a dānastuti, and the connection of the names of the Kaṇvas and Priyamedhas.

VIII.1 (621) Indra (1–29), Dānastuti of Āsaṅga (30–33), Āsaṅga (34)

Pragātha Kāṇva (formerly Pragātha Ghaura, brother and adoptive son of Kaṇva) (1–2), Medātithi Kāṇva and Medhyātithi (3–29), Āsaṅga Plāyogi (30–33), Śaśvatī Āṅgirasī, wife of Āsaṅga (34)
34 verses: br̥hatī, except satobr̥hatī 2–4, triṣṭubh 33–34

The structure of this hymn is metrically complex; indeed Oldenberg despairs of it. It begins with two pragāthas (vss. 1–4, br̥hatī alternating with satobr̥hatī) and ends with two triṣṭubhs (vss. 33–34). In between are twenty-eight br̥hatī verses, whose organization is unclear. Oldenberg is inclined to assume an overall tr̥ca structure, which has been disturbed—and indeed some of whose verses have been lost, as he believes. Geldner, on the other hand, sees paired verses (continuing the pragāthas of 1–4) in verses 5–20, tr̥cas in verses 21–29 and the dānastuti (vss. 30–33), with the final verse (34) falling outside these structures. It is also important to note that this hymn violates one of the principles of arrangement in the VIIIth Maṇḍala, whereby within each poet's collection all hymns to the same deity are grouped together in order of descending number of verses: our VIII.1 has thirty-four verses, whereas

VIII.2, also to Indra, has forty-two. This discrepancy is one of the pieces of evidence that led Oldenberg to suggest that some verses had been lost in VIII.1.

In any case the metrical particulars do not help in discerning the thematic structure. The one indisputable fact is that the last four verses (30–34) stand apart from the rest of the hymn: verses 30–33 form a dānastuti, and the striking final verse (34) belongs to the same level of colloquial discourse as the three immediately preceding verses and may in fact be part of the dānastuti (see below). The rest of the hymn is devoted to Indra, but there is very little sustained praise of the god and almost no mythology (apart from a few glancing references in vss. 11 and 28). Most of the Indra portion falls roughly into the genres of "journey" hymn and invitation to the soma sacrifice, but as often in Indra hymns there is concern that Indra will go elsewhere for his soma. The first ten verses develop this theme, but with somewhat slangy language (e.g., "having it both ways," vs. 2; "keep crisscrossing," vs. 4) and with an intimate and almost teasing approach to the god, as when the poet in verse 5 promises that he won't "hand over" Indra even in return for a great sum. But the anxiety that Indra will pass by his sacrifice is clear, especially in verses 3–4, 7; this theme recurs in verses 13–16, and, even in the following verses devoted to the soma preparation and the god's response (17–22), in verse 20 the poet expresses his fear that he might anger Indra with his importunings. The themes of the journey and the invitation to soma are repeated once more in verses 23–27, and verse 27 ends with a strong affirmation that Indra will come to our sacrifice, thus ending the repeated doubts expressed earlier in the hymn. Two more verses (28–29), paired by their repeated fronted pronouns, bring the Indra part of the hymn to a close.

Thus the hymn keeps circling around certain topics, while other common features of Indra hymns such as mythological references are absent; nonetheless, there is little in the way of formal structure or organized presentation. Moreover, the striking turns of phrase found in the earlier parts of the hymn are less frequent in the later parts, with one exception: verse 12. This baffling verse is found also in the Atharvaveda in the wedding hymn (AVŚ XIV.2.47). It seems to depict Indra as a wondrous physician, in most interpretations: without even touching it he sticks together a breach, perhaps a wound, which was perhaps made by a missile, before the missile, if that's what it is, pierces through to the collarbones. The translation given here is provisional, and it is not at all clear to us why the verse is found in this hymn or what it really refers to.

The dānastuti (vss. 30–33) is notable for a number of reasons, not least that it mentions several different patrons. The "praises of the gift" are characteristically obliquely expressed. But the oddest verse in the hymn, and indeed one of the oddest verses in the R̥gveda, is the final one, verse 34. In it a woman (identified as Śaśvatī by the Anukramaṇī, but we prefer to take that word as an attributive adjective) expresses happy surprise at the sight of the penis of an unidentified man. There is no context for this vignette of sexual encounter with its snatch of provocative direct speech. The later tradition (Śāṅkhāyana Śrauta Sūtra XVI.11.17, Br̥haddevatā VI.41) considers the female to be the wife of Āsaṅga, the patron mentioned in the immediately preceding verse (33), who had become a woman but was turned back into a man thanks (according to the Bṛhaddevatā) to the poet Medhyātithi. But this explanation seems a desperate makeshift and the complex gender switching entirely invented. It seems more likely that the verse belongs to the dānastuti, and in an even more oblique expression than those that precede it, it "praises the gift" of a woman to the poet (women are often mentioned as part of the poet's spoils: see the final verse of the next hymn, VIII.2.42) by alluding to the enthusiastic response of his new prize to his sexual advances. (The poet thereby also obliquely praises his own equipment.)

1. Don't praise anything else! Comrades, don't do yourselves harm.
   Praise only Indra the bull when (the soma) is pressed, and right now pronounce your solemn recitations—
2. Him, rumbling loudly like a bull, unaging, conquering territory as if (conquering) cow(s); making both: division by hate and unions by love—having it both ways, the most munificent one.

3. For even though these peoples now, every man for himself, call upon you for help, let it be our sacred formulation, Indra, that becomes your strengthening now and throughout all days.
4. O bounteous one, the poetic inspirations, those attentive to poetic inspiration—the ones belonging to the stranger (and those belonging) to (our) peoples—keep crisscrossing each other.
   Hop to! Bring here (to be) nearest a prize of many forms, for help.

5. Not even for a great exchange gift would I hand you over, you possessor of the stone, not for a thousand, not for ten thousand, you possessor of the mace, not for a hundred, you of a hundred rewards.
6. You are better for me, Indra, than a father and than a brother who benefits not.
   You and a mother seem to me to be alike, o you who are good for goods and largesse.
7. Where have you gone? Where are you? For surely your mind is in many places.
   Are you on the rise?—you fighter, creator of tumult, cleaver of strongholds. They have sung forth their songs.
8. Chant forth a song to him who cleaves strongholds for his favorite—
   (it is songs) because of which the mace-wielder will travel to sit upon the ritual grass of Kāṇva and split fortresses.
9. Those of yours which bring ten cows, which bring a hundred, a thousand, those horses of yours which are swift-running bulls, with these come swiftly to us.

10. Today I summon the juice-yielding (cow), pulsing with excitement from the songs, Indra, the good milker, the lead milk-cow, the broad-streamed refreshment, who gets it right.
11. When he gave a push to Etaśa, (the steed) of the Sun, and to the two far-wandering winged (steeds) of the Wind, he of a hundred resolves conveyed Kutsa, the son of Arjuna. He crept up on the Gandharva, who was not to be laid low.
12. He [=Indra] who, even without a bandage, before (the missile) drills into the collarbones, joins together the join—he, the bounteous one with many goods: he makes what has gone awry right again.
13. May we not be like outsiders, like foreigners to you, Indra.
    Like trees left behind (by woodcutters), we have considered ourselves poor at burning, you possessor of the stone.
14. Indeed we have considered ourselves neither swift nor strong, you Vr̥tra-smasher.
    But in an instant, through your great generosity, o champion, we could (again) take delight in your praise.
15. If he will listen to my praise, let our (soma-)drops invigorate Indra, when they have run swift across the filter, they that strengthen the son of Tugra [=Bhujyu].
16. Come here today to the joint praise from your favorite and comrade.
    Let the invitatory praise of the bounteous ones help you forward. Then I am eager for good praise for you.
17. Once you (priests) have pressed the soma with the stones, rinse it in the waters.
    The superior men, garbing (it) in cows [=milk] as if in garments, will milk (it) out from the belly.
18. (Coming) then from earth or then from heaven, from the lofty realm of light, by this my song become strong in your own body. Bring created things to fullness, o you of strong resolve.
19. For Indra press well the most invigorating soma worthy to be chosen.
    The potent one [=Indra] will swell him who is spurred on, like a prize-seeking (horse), by every insight.
20. I, always begging you with my song—with the gush [?] of soma let me not anger you, frenzied like a wild beast, at the soma-pressings. Who will not beg his master?
21. (Begging) the mighty one with his mighty power for his exhilaration roused by the exhilarating drink, the one triumphant over all when roused to exhilaration—for in his exhilaration he always gives to us.

22. In his treasury are many desirable things. The god (will grant them) to the pious mortal;
    he will grant to him who presses and to him who praises—(the god) who is welcomed by all, praised by the stranger.
23. Drive here, Indra—find your invigoration (here)—together with your bright bounty, o god.
    Fill your belly, like a lake, broad and fat with soma juices drunk in common.
24. Here let a thousand, here let a hundred, yoked to a golden chariot—the long-maned fallow bays, yoked by a sacred formulation—convey you to drink the soma, o Indra.
25. Here let the two fallow bays (yoked) to the golden chariot, those with peacock tails and white backs, convey you to drink of the honey, of the strengthening stalk.
26. Drink of this pressed (soma), you who long for songs, like the first drinker [=Vāyu].
    This pressed drink of the juicy, thoroughly prepared (soma), cherished for invigoration, acts the lord.
27. He who is unique through his wondrous skill, the great and mighty one is dominant through his commandments.
    The fair-lipped one will come—he will not stay away, he will come here. He will not avoid our call.
28. You crushed completely the roving fortress of Śuṣṇa with your deadly weapons.
    You followed the light, (and shall) once again, when, Indra, you will become the one to be summoned.
29. Mine are the praises when the sun has risen, mine at the day's midday, mine in the evening at the border of night, that have turned you here, o good one.

30. Praise (them)! Just praise (them)! They are the most bounteous of bounty among your bounteous ones:
    Ninditāśva, Prapathin, and Paramajyā, o Medhyātithi.
31. When with trust in the winning horses I mount on the chariot, of the valuable goods what will stand out is the livestock coming from Yadu.
32. Who has bounteously given two silvery (horses) to me, together with a golden hide, let him be dominant over all auspicious things—Svanadratha, (son of) Āsaṅga.
33. Then Āsaṅga, the son of Playoga, will give more than others, o Agni, by ten thousand.
    Then for me ten gleaming bullocks emerged, like reeds from a pond.

34. His thick (member) has become visible in front along its length—a boneless thigh hanging down.
 His woman, ever ready, having caught sight of it, says, "My lord, you're bringing (me) an excellent treat!"

VIII.2 (622) Indra (1–40), Vibhindu's Dānastuti (41–42)

Medhātithi Kāṇva and Priyamedha Āṅgirasa (1–40), Medhātithi Kāṇva (41–42)
42 verses: gāyatrī, except anuṣṭubh 28, arranged in tr̥cas.

As noted above, this hymn has considerably more verses than the preceding one, and is therefore apparently out of sequence. The discrepancy in length between the two hymns is one reason Oldenberg suggests that VIII.1 may have lost verses in transmission. (See the introduction to the preceding hymn.)

As indicated by the Anukramaṇī, the majority of the hymn is devoted to Indra, with the final verses a dānastuti; however, despite the Anukramaṇī's division, the dānastuti must begin with verse 40, not 41, both because of the tr̥ca division and on grounds of content and tone. In the Indra portion the focus remains almost exclusively on the preparation of soma in its various forms, and the hope that Indra will come to our sacrifice, drink of our soma, and reward us. As often in such hymns, there is a journey component (esp. vss. 19, 26–28), and underlying the calls to Indra to journey to our sacrifice is the worry that Indra will stay away from our sacrifice because of anger or the appeals of other sacrificers (vss. 5–6, 19–20). There are also some slight indications that the hymn is concerned with a ritual innovation being introduced in some of the R̥gvedic clans, the Third Pressing, which takes place in the evening and involves soma mixed with milk. There are two occurrences of the word ā́śir "milk-mixture" (vss. 10, 11; see also 9b [ā́śir is also found twice in VIII.31, which also seems to contain references to Third Pressing]), and verse 18 seems to imply that the gods themselves are not satisfied with a soma sacrifice that ends with the Midday Pressing. The emphasis on the number three (esp. vss. 7–9, 21) may also support this interpretation, as may the hope expressed that Indra will not spend his evening away from us (vs. 20).

Aside from the thematic unity of some of the tr̥cas (e.g., vss. 7–9 on the three types of soma), this long first section of the hymn has little apparent structure, and it is also notable for its lack of mythological reference (beyond a few token mentions of Vr̥tra, vss. 26, 31, 36). But throughout this section there are unusual similes (e.g., vss. 6, 12, 17, 19, 20) and turns of phrase, including some untranslatable grammatical and lexical puns (as in vs. 3). The loose texture and the lightness and transparency of the meter also help to make it an appealing piece.

The dānastuti (vss. 40–42) is, as often, hard to interpret. In verse 40 the actor seems still to be Indra, who in the guise of a ram had some sort of interaction with Medhyātithi: the language here is unclear, and although there are various treatments of Medhātithi (sic) and Indra as ram in the Brāhmaṇa literature, these seem desperate attempts to make sense of the fleeting and mysterious reference here. Though it appears to be Indra who is addressed in a subordinate clause in the 2nd person in verse 40, the 2nd person reference has shifted in verse 41 to Vibindhu, apparently the human patron. Perhaps Indra's generosity is being superimposed on this human patron. The final verse, 42, like the final verse of the dānastuti in VIII.1 (vs. 34), concludes the hymn with a sexual innuendo: two "daughters of joy" (a phrase that goes neatly into French as filles de joie "prostitutes") have also been given to the poet. These may indeed be two women, but since they are called "milk-strong," it is quite possible that the poet is referring to the two breasts of one woman. If so, this verse responds directly to VIII.1.34, where the woman of the poet praises his member, and recalls IV.32.22-24, with a likewise disguised reference to the breasts of a woman given to the poet in payment for his verse.

1. This pressed stalk, o good one—drink your belly well full—have we given to you, o you who bring no threat.
2. Rinsed by men, pressed by stones, purified by the sheep's fleece, washed like a horse in the rivers—
3. Preparing it with cows [=milk], we have made it sweet for you, like barley (enjoyed) by cows.
   Indra, (we have made) you (to be) at this joint revelry.

4. It's just Indra who is the lone drinker of soma, Indra the lifelong drinker of the pressings
   among gods and mortals,
5. Whom neither the clear [=unmixed] nor the poorly mixed nor the (juices) that are sharp keep away—him of broad extent whose heart is good—
6. When those other than us go hunting him with cows, like (self-)choosing women hunting (husbands), and creep up on him with their milk-cows.

7. Let the three somas be pressed for the god Indra, for the soma-drinker in (our) own dwelling.
8. Three buckets drip and three cups are well filled at the same presentation.
9. You are clear, outstanding among many; (and you are) mixed with milk in the middle;
   and (you, mixed) with curd, (are) the most invigorating for the champion.

10. These soma-drinks are yours, Indra, the sharp ones pressed among us.
    The clear ones beg for the milk mixture.
11. Prepare these: the milk mixture, the offering cake, and this soma here, o Indra,
    for I hear that you are endowed with riches.
12. When they have been drunk, they fight each other within the heart, like those badly intoxicated on liquor.
    Like the naked in the cold they stay awake.

13. Rich indeed should be the praiser of a rich benefactor like you, and far(-famed) indeed (the praiser) of a famous one, o possessor of the fallow bays.
14. Never does the stranger pay attention to a solemn speech being recited if it comes from a man without cattle, nor to a song being sung.
15. Don't hand us over to a taunter, Indra, nor to one who vaunts himself.
 Do your best (for us), able one, with your abilities.

16. We have just this aim: as comrades devoted to you, Indra, the Kaṇvas sing to you with their solemn words.
17. I express admiration at nothing else, mace-bearer. Like workmen at their labor, it's just your praise song to which I pay attention.
18. The gods seek a presser. They are not eager for sleep.
 Tireless, they go to exhilaration.

19. Drive forth here with prizes. Stop being angry at us, like a great man with a young wife.
20. Let him not (be) filled with evil rage. Will he spend his evening at a distance from us like a son-in-law down on his luck?
21. For we know the much-giving benevolence of him,
 the hero,
 and the thoughts of him who was born in the three.

22. Pour here the Kaṇvas' (soma). We know no one more glorious than him swelling with strength, than him who has a hundred forms of help.
23. With the most superior (might), o presser, bring the soma to Indra, to the able hero.
 He will drink for manly strength—
24. He who among the unwavering is the best at finding the prize that brings horses for the singers, that brings cattle for the praisers.

25. Pressers, rinse the soma that is ever to be admired for the one to be exhilarated, for the hero, the champion.
26. The Vr̥tra-smasher, the drinker of the pressed (soma) will come. Not far from us will he stop, the one with a hundred forms of help.
27. Here, just here will his two capable fallow bays, yoked by the sacred formulation, carry our comrade, famed through songs, longing for songs.

28. The soma juices are sweet: drive here! The soma juices are prepared: drive here—o you with (lovely) lips, accompanied by the seers, possessed of ability—on your own to the landing site, to the joint revelry.
29. The praises that strengthen you for great generosity and manly action, o Indra, strengthening (you) as the decisive victor, 30. And the songs for you, o you whose vehicle is song, and the solemn words—these are for you—those which have in every way deployed their powers.

31. Just so the powerfully ranging one with mace in hand is the only one to distribute the prizes of victory—indestructible from of old.
32. He is the smasher of Vr̥tra with his right (hand)—the many times much-called-upon Indra, the great one with great powers,
33. In whom are all the settled domains and both exploits and expanses.
The (soma) invigorating for the bounteous (Indra) (follows) along.

34. He has done these things—Indra, who is famed beyond all things as the giver of prizes to the bounteous (patrons).
35. Even from behind he brings to the fore the cattle-seeking chariot that he helps, for he is the powerful conveyor of goods.
36. He is the winner as inspired poet and with his steeds, the smasher of Vr̥tra, the champion with his superior men, the real helper of him who does honor.

37. Sacrifice to him, o Priyamedhas, with fully focused mind—to Indra, whose exhilaration becomes real through the soma juices.
38. To the lord of the settlement whose fame is from song, whose desire is fame, who has much in himself, to the prize-winner—sing, Kaṇvas!
39. Who as able comrade gave the cows, even though (they were) without tracks, to the superior men who fixed their desire in him.

40. O possessor of the stone—him whose insights are to the point, Medhyātithi Kāṇva, since you, having become a ram, led (him) to (goods)—
41. Do your best for him, o Vibhindu, giving him four ten thousands and eight thousands beyond.
42. And these two dear little ones of mine, the milk-strong daughters of joy, has he bounteously given to become my wives.

VIII.3 (623) Indra (1–20), Pākasthāman Kaurayāṇa's Dānastuti (21–24)

Medhyātithi Kāṇva
24 verses: bṛhatī alternating with satobṛhatī, 1–20, arranged in pragāthas, anuṣṭubh 12, gāyatrī 22–23, bṛhatī 24

Like the previous two hymns, this one consists of a long praise of Indra (vss. 1–20) followed by a short dānastuti (21–24). The Indra portion is arranged in standard pragāthas, while the dānastuti is metrically more varied. The verse pairs of the pragāthas are for the most part internally unified, but like many of the longer hymns in VIII there is not much apparent structure in the hymn as a whole. There are, however, several recurrent themes: the greatness (mahimán) and vast power (śávas) of Indra (e.g., vss. 4, 6); the gods and poets who have previously celebrated Indra and have been helped by him (e.g., vss. 7–9, 16); and the sheer noise made by Indra's praisers (e.g., vss. 3, 7, 16, 18). In the context of all this previous poetic activity, verses 13 and 14 raise anxious questions about what constitutes the proper topic of praise poetry and how to configure these praises anew, the perennial problem of the Ṛgvedic bard.

The dānastuti is far easier to interpret than those of the previous two hymns: the patron Pākasthāman is celebrated for his gift of a particularly fine sorrel horse, given also by Indra and the Maruts. The first half of the last verse (24) seems to contain an adage, or adapted piece of folk wisdom, as a foil to further praise of the patron in the second half of the verse. The verse itself has a slight Pindaric ring.

1. Drink of the sap-filled pressed (soma). Reach exhilaration from our (soma) accompanied by cows, Indra.
   Become a friend, a feasting companion, for our strengthening. Let your insights help us.
2. We would be in the good favor of you, the prizewinner. Do not lay us low before hostility.
   Help us with your conspicuous powers to prevail. Keep us in your good thoughts.

3. Let these make you strong, you of many goods—the songs which are mine.
   Pure-colored, gleaming, attentive to poetic inspiration, they have cried out to (you) with their praises.
4. This one, created with might by a thousand seers, spreads wide like the sea.
   (When) realized, his greatness, his vast power is sung at sacrifices in the realm of the inspired poet.

5. It is just Indra for the sake of the divine assemblage, Indra as the ceremony advances, Indra whom we call upon when we are winning at the encounter—Indra, in order to gain the stake.
6. Indra by his greatness spread the two worlds and his vast power; Indra made the sun shine.
   Within Indra are all beings held and within Indra the pressed drops.

7. To you, for you to drink first, o Indra, with their praises the Āyus and the Ṛbhus united sounded together, and the Rudras sang (to you) as the foremost.
8. Indra increased his own bullish vast power in the exhilaration of the pressed (soma) in the company of Viṣṇu.
   Today the Āyus praise his greatness as in the earlier way.

9. I beg you for a mass of good heroes and for the sacred formulation to be first in your thought.
   That with which, when the stake was set, (you were there) for the Yatis and for Bhṛgu, with which you helped Praskaṇva,
10. With which you sent the great waters surging to the sea, that is your bullish vast power, Indra.
   In a single day that greatness of his cannot be fully attained, toward which the battle-cry has roared.

11. Muster your ability for us, Indra, when I beg you for wealth and a mass of good heroes.
   Muster your ability for the one striving to first win the prize. Muster your ability for the praise song, foremost one.
12. Muster your ability for us since you helped Paura (and help) the insights of this one striving to win, Indra.
   Muster your ability just as you furthered Ruśama, Śyāvaka, and Kṛpa possessing solar glory, Indra.

13. What among the unshakable things should a powerful mortal sing anew?
   For, (even though) singing the sun, they have not reached his greatness, his Indrian power.
14. Praising what will they be acting according to truth among the gods? Which inspired poet will be lauded as a seer?
   When will you come to the call of the man who presses, o bounteous Indra, when (to that) of the man who praises?

15. These most honeyed songs and praises rise up—entirely victorious, gaining the stake, possessing imperishable help, competing for the prize like chariots.

16. The Kaṇvas—like the Bhr̥gus, (themselves) like suns—have attained everything conceivable.
    Magnifying Indra with praises, the Āyus and Priyamedhas sounded.

17. Yoke up your pair of fallow bays, o Indra, best smiter of obstacles, from out of the far distance, (then,) o bounteous one, turned our way, come here, a mighty one with lofty (horses), to drink the soma.
18. For these bards, inspired poets, have bellowed for you for the winning of wisdom with their insight.
    You, o bounteous Indra longing for songs—like a tracker listen to our call.

19. You kicked Vr̥tra out from the lofty steppes, Indra.
    You drove (the cows) of Arbuda and the tricky Mr̥gaya out, out the cows of Parvata.
20. The fires shone out, out the sun, out the soma, the Indrian sap.
    You blew the great serpent out from the midspace: that manly act did you perform, Indra.

21. The one that Indra and the Maruts, that Pākasthāman, the son of Kurayāṇa, gave me—the most beautiful of all in body, like the one that runs in heaven [=sun]— 22. (That) sorrel has Pākasthāman given me, —good at the yoke-pole, filling his girthband, an awakener of wealth, 23. Alongside which the other ten draft-horses draw the yoke-pole home, like birds the son of Tugra.
24. Food is the lifebreath, garments the body, and anointment is the giver of strength.
    But as the fourth I have proclaimed Pākasthāman, the nurturing giver of the sorrel.

VIII.4 (624) Indra (1–14), Indra or Pūṣan (15–18), Kuruṅga's Dānastuti (19–21)

Devātithi Kāṇva
21 verses: br̥hatī alternating with satobr̥hatī, arranged in pragāthas, except puraüṣṇih 21.

Like the previous hymn, this one is arranged in pragāthas. However, there is less internal cohesion in the verse pairs, but more discernible structure in their arrangement in the hymn. As noted in the Anukramaṇī the hymn falls into three major sections: the longest (vss. 1–14) devoted to Indra, the next (vss. 15–18) to Pūṣan, and the last (vss. 19–21) a dānastuti. The Indra portion opens with a pragātha (vss. 1–2) listing many possible sacrificers that Indra might visit, and urging him to come to the Kaṇvas here. The next four pragāthas (vss. 3–10) form a ring composition, with verses 3/4 and 9/10 matched to each other: Indra as a thirsty animal coming to drink (3a, 10a) and his assumption of supreme power (4d, 10d). The remaining two pragāthas in this section (vss. 11–14) command the Adhvaryus to press soma for Indra. The actual content of the Indra section is conventional: praise of his powers and his help for mortals, invitations to journey here and drink the soma, with the invitation becoming more insistent toward the end. There are almost no mythological references (though the enigmatic first pāda of 8 seems to refer to the same event as III.32.11, where Indra wears the earth on his hip), and the usual pleas for gifts are essentially absent, replaced by indirection: descriptions of pious men who benefit from Indra.

The Pūṣan section (though the Anukramaṇī offers a choice of Indra or Pūṣan as the deity, it is clearly Pūṣan) makes the requests for gifts overt, and it serves as a transition to the dānastuti proper. The penultimate verse of the Pūṣan section (17) in fact seems to refer to a different Kaṇva poet, Pajra Sāman (see VIII.6.47), who has his own gifts to praise—as our poet turns to his own in verse 18, apparently sequestering his share of the cattle in a different pasture. The dānastuti (vss. 19–21) is fairly straightforward in its first two verses, but the final verse (21) is entirely opaque, at least to these translators.

1. When, Indra, you are being called forward or back, up or down, by men, you yourself, propelled by men, are many times in the company of the descendants of Anu, are in the company of Turvaśa, you vaunter.
2. Or when, Indra, in the company of Ruma, Ruśama, Syāvaka, or Kṛpa, you bring yourself to exhilaration, the Kaṇvas, whose vehicle is praise, guide you here with their sacred formulations, Indra. Come here!

3. As a thirsty buffalo goes down to a salt-pocket made by water, come swiftly here to us in friendship [/in the morning], in the evening. In the company of the Kaṇvas, drink up!
4. Let the drops exhilarate you, bounteous Indra, to give largesse to the presser.
   Having stolen the pressed soma, you drank it in a cup. (Then) you assumed this most superior might.

5. He put forward his might with might; he shattered battle fury with his power.
   All who seek battle, vigorous Indra, hold themselves down, like trees, before you.
6. He is accompanied by an ever-battling warrior as if by a thousand—whoever has achieved a praise-invocation for you.
   He puts his own son forward with a good twist amid an abundance of good heroes—(whoever) ritually serves with words of reverence.

7. Might we not fear, might we not grow weary in comradeship with you, the powerful one.
   A great deed of you the bull should be witnessed. Might we see Turvaśa and Yadu.
8. The bull wears (it [=the earth]) on his left hip. His giving is not resentful.
   The milk-cows are infused with the honey of the bees. Come here swiftly! Run! Drink!

9. Your comrade, o Indra, certainly has a horse and chariot, is lovely in form and rich in cows.
   He is always accompanied by the vigor of a swelling portion. Glittering, he drives to the assembly.
10. Like a thirsting antelope, come to the drinking hole. Drink the soma as you will.
   Pissing down day after day, o bounteous one, you have assumed the most powerful might.

11. Adhvaryu, make the soma run: Indra wants to drink.
   Now he has yoked his two bullish fallow bays and has come here, the Vr̥tra-smasher.
12. Even he himself considers himself a pious man at whose place you become sated on soma.
   Here is your food, ready for yoking, fully sprinkled: of it—come! run!—drink.

13. Adhvaryus, press the soma for Indra who stands on the chariot.
   The stones gaze out upon (the upper surface) of the coppery (soma) as they press the one belonging to pious ceremonies.
14. His two favorites, the bullish fallow bays, will convey Indra to the coppery (soma) among the industrious (priests).
   Let your team, the glory of the ceremony, convey you, facing our way, right here to our pressings.

15. We choose Pūṣan of many goods for yoking.
   You able one, invoked by many, you releaser—do your best because of our insight to thrust out wealth for us.
16. Sharpen us like a razor in your hands. Bestow riches, you releaser.
   In you is that ruddy good [=cattle] easy to find for us (and for) the mortal whom you urge on.

17. I pursue you, Pūṣan, to aim (toward you). I pursue you to praise (you), glowing one.
   I do not pursue (anything) of his—for that is alien, o good one, (and it is) for Pajra Sāman to praise.

18. Away (be) the cows toward some (other) pasture, o glowing, immortal one, (to be) our own legacy.
    Become our kindly helper, Pūṣan, most munificent for the winning of prizes.

19. Substantial is the bounty that brings a hundred horses at Kuruṅga's rituals of day(break).
    At the gifts of the vibrant king, bestowing good fortune, we thought ourselves to be among the Turvaśas.
20. Won through the insights of the prizewinning descendant of Kaṇva, (won) by the heaven-bound Priyamedhas, sixty thousand flawless [?] (cows) I drive along, (drive) forth herds of cows—I the seer.
21. Even the trees have found pleasure at my supper-time.
    They share in the cow in its profusion; they share in the horse in its profusion.

VIII.5 (625) Aśvins

Brahmātithi Kāṇva
39 verses: gāyatrī, except bṛhatī 37–38, anuṣṭubh 39, all arranged in tṛcas

This long hymn (at 39 verses the longest hymn to the Aśvins in the Ṛgveda) presents few difficulties and, correspondingly, few particular pleasures. Many pādas in the hymn have exact or near counterparts elsewhere.

The hymn begins not with the Aśvins but with the appearance of the (unnamed) Dawn (vs. 1), as a lead-in to the Aśvins' early morning journey. Throughout the hymn the two gods are urged to drive here to our sacrifice, with occasional mentions of the sacrifices they should pass over on their way to ours (esp. vss. 13, 15). They are also begged for the usual assortment of wealth in goods and livestock; their "refreshments" (íṣ) are especially insistently hoped for (see vss. 5, 9, 10, 20, 21, 31, 34, 36). There is almost no mythological material, little mention of the miraculous rescues that are the Aśvins' stock in trade. Brief allusions to two of these exploits are found in verses 22–23, and the bare names of a number of their clients are listed in verses 25–26.

The last three verses (37–39) are a dānastuti praising the gift of one Kaśu, lord of the Cedis. His previous, fairly modest, gift is mentioned in verse 38, with the hope that the Aśvins will have the opportunity to see a more magnificent version in verse 37. And in verse 39 Kaśu is implicitly challenged to make an unparalleled gift, so that other men will not win greater praise for their generosity.

1. When, though being at a distance, she of ruddy breath has brightened as if right here, she has stretched out her radiance in all directions.

2. Manfully, o wondrous ones, with your mind-yoked chariot of broad dimensions you accompany Dawn, o Aśvins.
3. O you rich in prizewinning mares, praise songs have appeared facing you two.
   Like a messenger I shall solemnly proclaim my speech.

4. *O Kaṇvas, for us shall I praise the two dear to many, delightful to many, who bring many good things, the Aśvins—for their help—
5. The most munificent, the best prizewinners, the two lords of beauty bringing refreshments who go to the house of the pious man.
6. To the pious man who has the gods well on his side (give) good wisdom that doesn't doublecross him;
   sprinkle his pasture-land with ghee.

7. Here to our praise song drive quickly at speed with your swift falcons, your horses,
8. With which you fly around the three far distances, all the luminous realms of heaven, and the three nights.
9. And refreshments along with cattle and winnings, too, o finders of the days—unfasten the paths for us to win (them).

10. Convey here to us, o Aśvins, wealth in cattle, in good heroes and good chariots, and refreshments along with horses.
11. Having grown strong, o lords of beauty, you wondrous ones whose tracks are golden, drink the somian honey.
12. O you rich in prizewinning mares, to us and to our bounteous (patrons) hold out extensive shelter that cannot be cheated.

13. Team up the formulations of the people and come quickly here.
    Do not go to the others.
14. You, o Aśvins—drink of this dear exhilarating drink, of the honey bestowed, o holy ones.
15. Bring here to us wealth in hundreds and thousands, consisting of much livestock, nourishing all.

16. Even though in many places men of inspired thought vie with (other) cantors in invoking you two—o men, o Aśvins, come here.

17. The people, provided with twisted ritual grass and oblations, making fit preparations, call upon you two, o Aśvins.
18. Today let this praise song of ours, which best conveys you nearest, be for you two, o Aśvins.

19. The skin-bag of honey that was set here in your chariot-rut, drink from it, o Aśvins.
20. O you rich in prizewinning mares, with it bring weal for our livestock, our offspring, and our cow, and refreshments rich in fat.
21. And heavenly refreshments and rivers, o finders of the days—like two doors, you will open (these) up for us.

22. When did the son of Tugra, abandoned in the sea, do reverence to you, o men, so that your chariot would fly with its birds?
23. O Nāsatyas, to Kaṇva, (his eyes) pasted shut and in a locked house, over and over you offer your help.
24. Drive here with this help, when with our newer good lauds
I call upon you, o you with bullish goods.

25. Just as you helped Kaṇva, Priyamedha, Upastuta, Atri, and Śr̥ñjāra, o Aśvins,
26. And just as you (helped) Aṃśu when the stake was to be decided and Agastya when (it was) cows, and Sobhari when (it was) victory-prizes, 27. For so much favor, or more than that, do we singers beg you, o Aśvins with bullish goods.

28. O Aśvins, the chariot with golden chariot-box and golden reins that touches heaven—since you will mount it—29. Golden your chariot-shaft, golden your chariot-pole and your axle; golden both your wheels—
30. With it [=chariot] come here to us even from afar, o you rich in prize mares, to this good praise of mine.

31. From far away you convey here the many refreshments of the Dāsa, while consuming them, o immortal Aśvins.
32. Drive here to us with brilliance, here with fame, here with wealth, Aśvins, you much-gleaming Nāsatyas.
33. Let your feathered birds [=horses], frothing at the mouth, convey you here to the man who performs the ceremony well.

34. Your chariot pursuing our song—the (chariot) that rolls along, along with its refreshment—its wheel does not ram against it.
35. (Drive here) with your golden chariot, with your horses with speedy forefeet, o Nāsatyas, who spur on insights.
36. You sweeten, as it were, the wakeful wild animal [=soma?], o you of bullish goods.
Infuse wealth with refreshment for us.

37. O Aśvins, may you know of my new winnings—how Kaśu, the lord of the Cedi, will give a hundred camels, ten thousand cows.
38. He who (previously) bestowed on me a king's ten (horses?) of golden appearance—beneath the feet of the lord of the Cedis are (all) the communities, the "hide-tanning" men all around.
39. Let no one go by this path by which these Cedis go, lest another man be lauded as a patron who's a better giver of abundance.

The following hymn initiates the second group of hymns in VIII, those in which the seer Vatsa is mentioned (VIII.6–11); see Oldenberg (1888: 211–14).

VIII.6 (626) Indra (1–45), Tirindira Pārśavya's Dānastuti (46–48)

Vatsa Kāṇva
48 verses: gāyatrī, arranged in tr̥cas

The Vatsa group contains only one hymn to Indra, but at forty-eight verses it is one of the longest hymns in the entire R̥gveda. It is thus not surprising that the hymn is not a tightly structured creation, but a fairly loose collection of three-verse units treating various aspects of Indra. Nonetheless, certain themes are threaded through the hymn, in particular the Kaṇvas' role in strengthening Indra through their poetry. This is strongly articulated in the first tr̥ca (vss. 1–3), in which the poet Vatsa himself claims this role in verse 1, alongside his ancestral family in verses 2–3. This last verse contains the striking assertion that the Kaṇvas' praise is their "familial weapon," which they "speak"—an image developed in verses 7–8, where the Kaṇvas' insights are blazing missiles. In the next tr̥ca (vss. 10–12) the poetic "I" (presumably Vatsa) speaks of his poetic heritage. The tr̥ca consisting of verses 19–21 implicitly identifies the verbal products of the Kaṇvas with the physical oblations of the sacrifice. (And pāda 20c contains a particularly opaque simile, whose meaning we are uncertain of.) Once again, in two adjacent tr̥cas (31–33, 34–36) the Kaṇvas' power to strengthen Indra by poetry is celebrated in straightforward terms. The last tr̥ca before the dānastuti (43–45) begins with another mention of the Kaṇvas' activity.

Interspersed among the Kaṇvas' self-glorifications are tr̥cas of straight praise for Indra. Tr̥cas 2 (vss. 4–6) and 5–6 (vss. 13–18) celebrate Indra's might and his victories, especially over Vr̥tra, and could be taken as examples of the Indra-strengthening praise-poetry that the Kaṇvas attribute to themselves. The later Indra-oriented tr̥cas (22–24, 25–27, 37–39, 40–42) are more concerned with the sacrifice, the invitation and journey to the soma, and the goods and help the sacrificers hope to obtain from Indra. In the midst of these is an enigmatic tr̥ca (vss. 28–30), which seems to suggest a connection between the primordial birth of the god (Indra? Soma?) and the origins of poetic inspiration.

The hymn ends with a three-verse dānastuti, which, for a change, is far easier to interpret than the hymn to which it is appended.

1. Great Indra, who is like rain-bearing Parjanya in might, has grown strong through the praises of Vatsa.
2. They (are) guiding the offspring of truth [=poem] safely across, when they bring it forward—the conveyors, the inspired poets, by the conveyance of truth.
3. The Kaṇvas—when by their praises they have made Indra the one who assures success to their sacrifice, they are speaking their own familial weapon.

4. To his battle fury the clans and all the communities bend down together,
 like the rivers to the sea.
5. That might of his flared when Indra rolled up both worlds together like a hide.
6. With his mace of a hundred joints, with the ram, he split apart the head of raging Vr̥tra.

7. These insights (bellow out)—we bellow out—again and again toward
 (you) at the forefront of the inspired words,
 (the insights that are) missiles, like the blazing of fire—
8. Since, though they are hidden, the insights blaze forth by themselves—the Kaṇvas (blaze forth)—in a stream of truth.
9. Might we attain to this, Indra: to wealth in cows and horses, and to a sacred formulation to be first in your thought.

10. Because it is just I who have acquired the wisdom of truth from my father,
 I have been (re)born like the sun.

11. I, like Kaṇva, beautify my songs with an age-old thought—just the one with which Indra acquired his unbridled force.
12. (There are those) who have not praised you, Indra, and seers who have praised you, but grow strong just (by) my (praise), as one well praised.

13. When his battle fury smoked, he, breaking Vr̥tra apart joint by joint, sent the waters to the sea.
14. You, Indra, struck your steadfast mace down upon Śuṣṇa the Dasyu, for you, mighty one, are famed as a bull.
15. Neither the heavens, nor the midspaces will encompass mace-bearing Indra with his might, nor will the earths.

16. The one who lay upon the great waters, standing fast against you, Indra, that one you jabbed down into their footsteps.
17. Who held together in his grasp these two great conjoined worlds, that one, o Indra, you hid with shades of darkness.
18. (There are) those Yatis and those Bhr̥gus who have praised you, Indra—but hear just my call, mighty one.

19. These dappled ones milk out ghee and the milk mixture for you, Indra, they being swollen full of truth in this way.
20. The fecund ones who have made you their infant-by-mouth [=nursling] sur(round you), as the supports (of heaven do) the sun [?].
21. It is just you, lord of power, that the Kaṇvas have strengthened with their recitation, you that the pressed drops (have strengthened).

22. Just under your leadership, o Indra, master of the stones, is the encomium and the sacrifice worth tussling over.
23. Break out great refreshment for us, like a fortress filled with cattle, Indra, and also offspring and abundance of heroes, 24. And this abundance of swift horses, Indra, which will shine forth here at the forefront among the Nāhuṣa clans.

25. You extend your control over the one whose eye is near to the sun [=Agni? gold?], as if over a cattle-pen.
 When, Indra, you will be gracious to us,
26. When, indeed, you display your power and rule over the settled peoples, o Indra, great and unbounded in your might,

27. Upon you the clans, offering oblations, call for help,
    (you who are) of broad expanse through the drops.

28. In a remote place of the mountains and at the conjunction of the rivers the inspired poet was born with insight.
29. From here, from the heights, watchful, he looks down upon the sea, from where, quivering, he stirs.
30. Just after that they see the dawning light of the age-old semen, when it is kindled far beyond heaven.

31. The Kaṇvas all strengthen their thought for you, Indra, and your manliness and your bullishness, most powerful one.
32. Enjoy this good praise of mine, Indra. Promote me, and strengthen my thought.
33. And in seeking a sacred formulation for you, you fully grown mace-bearer, as inspired poets we have fashioned (it) in order to live.

34. The Kaṇvas have roared, like waters going along a slope; their winning thought (has roared) to Indra.
35. Their recitations have increased Indra, like the rivers the sea, (Indra,) the unaging one to whom the battle fury has been conceded.
36. Drive here to us from afar, with your two beloved fallow bays.
    Drink this pressed soma, Indra.

37. Just you, best smasher of obstacles, do the peoples, when they have twisted their ritual grass, call on for the winning of prizes.
38. After you (roll) both worlds, as the wheel rolls (after) Etaśa; after (you roll) the drops being pressed [/sounding].
39. Reach exhilaration in the presence of Svarṇara and, o Indra, in the reed-filled (place).
    Become exhilarated by the thought of Vivasvant.

40. Having grown all the way to heaven, the mace-bearing bull roared again and again, the smasher of obstacles, the best drinker of soma.
41. Because you are the first-born seer, being the only master by your might, o Indra, you keep poking out goods.
42. Up to our pressings and toward your delight, let the hundred straight-backed fallow bays carry you.

43. This earlier insight, swollen full of honey and ghee, have the Kaṇvas increased through their recitation.

44. Of the great ones it is just Indra whom the mortal should choose at the ritual offering, Indra whom the one striving to win (should choose) for his help.
45. The fallow bays, praised by Priyamedha, will convey you near,
 o much praised one, for soma-drinking.

46. At Tirindira's I received a hundred and at Parśu's a thousand as the bounties of the Yāduvas.
47. Three hundred chargers, ten thousand cows did they give to Pajra Sāman.
48. The prominent one has reached up to heaven, giving camels yoked in fours, and by his fame (has reached) the Yāduva people.

VIII.7 (627) Maruts

Punarvatsa Kāṇva
36 verses: gāyatrī

Although a tr̥ca division is possible for this hymn, it does not impose itself. This is one of only three Marut hymns in VIII (with VIII.20 and VIII.94). As with most Marut hymns, this one contains considerable description of the effects on the cosmos of these embodiments of storm and of their journey through the midspace: the bowing of the mountains, the violent winds and rain, the roaring. These descriptions are found primarily in the first part of the hymn (e.g., vss. 2–5, 7–8) and toward the end (see esp. vs. 34, with its bowing mountains forming a ring with vss. 2 and 5). The middle portion of the hymn (approximately vss. 11–21) expresses our desires for their presence at our sacrifice and for their gifts, with the last two verses (20–21) posing anxious questions concerning the whereabouts of the Maruts and the loss of their attention. This anxiety returns in two further question verses, 30–31, which preface the Maruts' final journey to the place of sacrifice, where they are praised together with Agni (vss. 32–26).

Verses 22–26 present various fragments of mythology; particularly striking, and baffling, is verse 26 with its mention of the poet Uśanā and the "loins of the ox," which may be a glancing reference to the Vala cave.

Like other long hymns in VIII the structure of this one is quite loose. However, it does have at least a sketchy ring: in addition to verses 2/5 and 34 mentioned above, note the references to meter in the first and last verses (1 and 36). It is characterized also by recycling of vocabulary, by rhetorical repetition (see, e.g., vss. 6, 9, 17, 22–24), and by frequent phonetic figures (a particularly nice one is found in 28ab: . . . pŕ̥ṣatī ráthe / práṣṭir . . . róhitaḥ).

1. In that the inspired poet has let flow the triṣṭubh refreshment to you, o Maruts, you rule [/shine] throughout the mountains.
2. In that you have certainly set your attention on your course, you resplendent ones displaying your power, the mountains have bent down.
3. They raise themselves upward with the winds—the bellowing ones whose mother is Pṛśni.
   They have milked out swelling refreshment.
4. The Maruts scatter mist; they make the mountains tremble, when they drive their course with the winds,
5. When the mountain peak (holds itself) down for your coursing, and the rivers hold themselves down for your expansion and for your great gusting.
6. You at night we invoke for help, you by day, you when the ceremony is proceeding.
7. Up they rise, bright with ruddy breath, along their courses, bellowing on the back of heaven.
8. They release the rein [/ray] with strength, for the sun to travel its path;
   they have extended themselves with its radiant beams.
9. This hymn of mine, o Maruts, this praise, o masters of the Ṛbhus, this invocation of mine—long for it.
10. Three lakes did the dappled ones milk out as honey for the mace-bearer, a wellspring, a cask full of water.
11. Maruts, when seeking your benevolence we call you from heaven, then come here to us.
12. For—o Rudras, masters of the Ṛbhus, possessing good drops—in our house and also in exhilaration you are provident.
13. Wealth, arousing exhilaration, consisting of much livestock, all-nourishing—impel it here to us from heaven, o Maruts.
14. When, as if on (the byways) of the peaks, you have set your attention on your course, resplendent ones, you become exhilarated with the drops being pressed [/sounding].
15. A mortal might beg benevolence of them, even of such an undeceivable (flock), with his prayers.
16. They who, like droplets, blow their blast through the two world-halves along with their rains, milking the unfailing wellspring,
17. Up they rise with their sounds [/with (the drops) being pressed], up with their chariots, and up with the winds; up with praises—they whose mother is Pṛśni.

18. With which (aid) you aided Turvaśa and Yadu, with which (you aided) Kaṇva, who gained the stakes, may we receive (a portion) of this for wealth.
19. O you of good drops, these refreshments here swelling like ghee will strengthen you, along with the prayers of the descendant of Kaṇva.
20. Where now do you become exhilarated, you of good drops, you for whom the ritual grass has been twisted?
Who is the formulator who serves you?
21. For it is not (now) as it was before, when in return for our praises of you you used to animate the troops of truth, o you for whom the ritual grass has been twisted.
22. They put together the great waters, together the two "opponents" [=heaven and earth], together the sun, together the mace, joint by joint.
23. They drove Vr̥tra apart, joint by joint, apart the mountains lacking rules [/radiance], performing a bullish manly deed.
24. They stood by the unbridled force and the resolve of Trita, while he was fighting, (stood) by Indra at the overcoming of Vr̥tra.
25. With lightning in their hands, heaven-bound—golden (helmet-)lips (stretched out) on their head—the resplendent ones anointed themselves for beauty.
26. When you drove with Uśanā from afar to the "loins of the ox" [=Vala cave?], like heaven it [=cave] roared with fear.
27. (Come) here to us, for the giving of bounty, with horses whose forefeet are golden—come near, o gods.
28. When the chestnut side-horse guides the dappled (mares yoked) to their chariot, the resplendent ones drive; they let flow the waters.
29. In (a place) of good soma, reed-filled, foamy, providing (soma's) dwelling, the men drove in (their chariot) with down-turned wheels.
30. When will you come, o Maruts, to the inspired poet invoking (you) in just this way, (come) with merciful (aid) to the one needing assistance?
31. What is this now, you fair-weather friends?!—since you have deserted Indra, who vaunts himself on partnership with you?
32. O Kaṇvas, for us I will praise Agni along with the Maruts, who have maces in their hands, who have golden axes.

33. I (would turn) hither the bulls, worshiped first at the sacrifice, hither for newer good progress, would turn them who bring glittering prizes.
34. Even the peaks bend down, thinking themselves depths;
even the mountains hold themselves down.
35. Traveling crosswise the birds guide (the Maruts) here, as they [=Maruts] fly through the midspace.
(The Maruts) establish vital energy for their praiser.
36. Since age-old Agni has (just) been born, like a metrical verse, with the ray of the sun, they [=Maruts] have extended themselves with its radiant beams.

VIII.8 (628) Aśvins

Sadhvaṃsa Kāṇva
23 verses: anuṣṭubh

Despite the Anukramaṇī ascription, the poet of this hymn repeatedly identifies himself as Vatsa (vss. 7, 8, 11, 15, 19), the Kaṇva. His composition is monotonously one-note: "Come/drive here to us" is found, with few variations, in the first seven verses and in a number of later ones (10, 11, 14, 17, 19); the Aśvins are urged to leave wherever in the cosmos they find themselves (e.g., vss. 3–4, 7, 14), in order to come to our sacrifice, and the usual anxieties about competing sacrificers who might tempt the gods to pass us by are on view (vs. 8). The poet's uncertainty about the location of the Aśvins and his desire to lure the gods to his sacrifice and away from his competitors are summed up in the final verse (23), with its paradoxical presentation of the "three footsteps" of the Aśvins, which are both visible and hidden. The evocation of Viṣṇu's three strides is probably deliberate, but the reasons for it unclear.

There is little other content in the hymn beyond the urged journey, the offered sacrifice, and the expressed hopes for bounties in exchange. Verse 10 briefly and obliquely alludes to the maiden Sūryā's mounting of the Aśvins' chariot, from the well-known myth about Sūryā's marriage, and the names of some successful clients of the Aśvins are listed in verses 20–21.

1. Come here to us, o Aśvins, with all forms of help; you wondrous ones whose track is golden—drink the somian honey.
2. Now drive here with your sun-skinned chariot, o Aśvins, you benefactors decorated in gold, you poets of deep perception.
3. Drive here from Nahus, here from the midspace by reason of our well-twisted hymns.
You will drink the honey pressed at the pressing of the Kaṇvas, o Aśvins.
4. Drive here to us from heaven, here from the midspace, o you (invoked with) "then, friends."

The son of Kaṇva has pressed the somian honey for you here.

5. Drive here to us for soma-drinking upon hearing
 "Svāhā!" and the praise song—o strengthening Aśvins; (drive) forth by reason of our insightful thoughts, you poets and superior men.
6. Even as seers previously called upon you for help, o men, drive here, o Aśvins; come right up to this good praise of mine here.
7. Come here to us even from the luminous realm of heaven, o finders of the sun, you who are attentive to Vatsa by reason of his insights and listen to our summons by reason of our praise songs.
8. Do those other than us sit around (you) with their praise songs, Aśvins?
 The son of Kaṇva, the seer Vatsa, has strengthened you with his hymns!
9. The inspired poet has called you here for help, o Aśvins, stainless ones, best smashers of obstacles: become joy itself for us.
10. When the maiden [=Sūryā] mounted your chariot, you set forth to all conceivable things, you Aśvins whose goods are prizewinning mares.
11. From there drive here with your chariot with its thousandfold raiment, o Aśvins.
 Vatsa has recited for you his honeyed speech—he a poet, son of a poet.
12. The two delightful to many who bring many good things, the two minders of riches, the Aśvins, as draft-animals, have bellowed out to this praise song of mine.
13. Provide to us here all bounties that won't shame us, o Aśvins; make us follow proper sequence: don't make us subject to scorn!
14. When, Nāsatyas, you are in the far distance or when upon the circumference [?], from there drive here with your chariot with its thousandfold raiment, o Aśvins.
15. O Nāsatyas, the seer Vatsa, who has strengthened you with his hymns, for him provide refreshment with thousandfold raiment, dripping with ghee.
16. O Aśvins, offer nourishment dripping with ghee to him who will praise you for your favor and will seek goods from you, o lords of the drop.
17. Come here to this praise song of ours, o you who care for the stranger and provide many benefits.
 Make us very splendid, you superior men. Grant these things for us to prevail.
18. The Priyamedhas have called you here with all your forms of help—you who rule over the rites, o Aśvins—(who listen) to their calls on your journey.

19. Come here to us as joy and luck itself, o Aśvins,
 (to him), Vatsa, who has strengthened you with his insightful thoughts and hymns, o you who seek admiration.
20. With (those forms of help) with which you helped Kaṇva and Medhātithi, with which Vaśa Daśavraja, with which Gośarya, with those help us, o men;
21. With which you helped Trasadasyu when the stake was to be decided, o men, with those help us, to win the prize, o Aśvins.
22. Let the well-twisted praise songs and hymns strengthen you, o Aśvins, found in many places, best smashers of obstacles: become the ones who provide many desired things to us.
23. There are three footsteps of the Aśvins—though being visible they are hidden far away.
 (Let) the two poets (drive) nearby along the flights of truth, away from (other) living beings.

VIII.9 (629) Aśvins

Śaśakarṇa Kāṇva
21 verses: br̥hatī 1, 4, 6, 14, 15; gāyatrī 2, 3, 20, 21; kakubh 5; anuṣṭubh 7–9, 13, 16–19; triṣṭubh 10; virāj 11; jagatī 12, all arranged in tr̥cas

As is clear from the display above, a dizzying variety of meters is found in this hymn. However, as Oldenberg points out (1888: 151), save for the tr̥ca composed of verses 10–12, all these differently named meters are composed of combinations of eight- and twelve-syllable pādas, which combine easily and without confusion, and several tr̥cas consist of a single meter (anuṣṭubh vss. 7–9, 16–18).

As in the previous hymn, the poet identifies himself several times as Vatsa (vss. 1, 6, 15); the Anukramaṇī's ascription to Śaśakarṇa ("Hare-eared") may be taken as a nickname or simply a fanciful invention, as it has no verbal support in the hymn.

The contents of the hymn are both as various as its meters and, underlyingly, as harmonious. Certain expressions recur throughout the hymn (half-verse initial ā́ nūnám "here and now," alternating with simple ā́ "here"; repeated yád and yád vā "when"/"or when"; repeated prá). The poet focuses on asking the Aśvins for aid and protection, and offers sacrificial service in return. A tr̥ca late in the hymn (vss. 16–18) is addressed to Dawn in her relation to the Aśvins, a connection that fixes the ritual time of at least that part of the hymn as the Morning Pressing.

1. Here and now, o Aśvins, come to the aid of Vatsa.
 Hold out to him broad shelter that keeps the wolf at bay; keep away whatever hostilities there are.

2. What (manly power) is in the midspace, what in heaven, what through the five peoples of Manu, confer that manly power (on us), o Aśvins.
3. (There are) inspired poets who have fondled your wondrous powers all over, o Aśvins—even so, take note only of the son of Kaṇva.

4. Here is the hot milk poured around for you, o Aśvins, together with a praise song, here the honeyed soma with which you will attend to Vr̥tra [/the obstacle], o you who bring prize mares as goods.
5. What (healing remedy) you made in the waters, what in the tree, what in plants, o you of many wondrous powers, with that help me, o Aśvins.
6. (Even) when you are bustling about, Nāsatyas, or when you are engaged in healing, o gods, this Vatsa does not get enough of his poetic thoughts for you—for you go to the man with an offering.

7. Here and now the seer attends to the praise song for the Aśvins in exchange for a thing of value.
   Here he will pour the most honeyed soma and the hot milk in the presence of the fire-priest.
8. Here and now you two will mount the swift-tracked chariot, o Aśvins.
   Here should these praise songs of mine move you, like a cloud.
9. If today we would move you with our hymns, o Nāsatyas, or with our voices, o Aśvins, even so, take note only of the son of Kaṇva.

10. As when Kakṣīvant (called) you, as when Vyaśva, as when the seer Dīrghatamas called you, as when Pr̥thi Vainya (called) you to the ritual seats, even so, take cognizance just of this.
11. Drive to us as protectors of our shelter and protectors from afar; become protectors of our moving (possessions [=livestock]) and protectors of our bodies.
    Drive your circuit for our progeny and posterity (to prosper), 12. When you drive with Indra on the same chariot or when you come to share the same home with Vāyu, o Aśvins, when you are joined in fellowship with the Ādityas and R̥bhus or when you stand in the strides of Viṣṇu.

13. If today I should call on you in order to to win the prize, o Aśvins—the might that is for victory in battles: that is the best help of the Aśvins.

14. Here and now, o Aśvins, drive here. Here are oblations set out for you; here are soma-drinks for you at Turvaśa's and Yadu's (sacrifice) and here also among the Kaṇvas.
15. The healing remedy that is in the distance and (the one) nearby, o Nāsatyas,
    with that now extend shelter to Vimada and to Vatsa, o attentive ones.

16. I have woken up with the goddess [=Dawn], simultaneously with my speech for the Aśvins:
    o goddess, you have uncovered my (poetic) thought here, uncovered the gift for mortals.
17. Wake up the Aśvins, o Dawn—(wake them) up, o goddess, liberal and great,
    (wake them) up in due order, o Hotar of the sacrifice [=Agni]. (Wake) up lofty fame for our exhilaration.
18. When, o Dawn, you drive with your radiant beam, you shine together with the sun.
    This chariot of the Aśvins drives here along the circuit protective of men.

19. When the swollen shoots, like cows, yield their milk with their udders, or when their voices have bellowed, those seeking the gods (wake) up the Aśvins.
20. Up for brilliance, up for swelling might, up for victory over men and for shelter,
    up for ritual skill, you attentive ones—
21. Now when by reason of our insights you sit down at the womb of the father, o Aśvins,
    or when by reason of your favors, you praiseworthy ones.

VIII.10 (630) Aśvins

Pragātha Kāṇva
6 verses: bṛhatī 1, 5, madhyejyotis 2, anuṣṭubh 3, āstārapaṅkti 4, satobṛhatī 6, arranged in pragāthas

Like the previous hymn, this one contains a number of different meters, though all fall into the twelve- and eight-syllable pādas that combine easily into mixed lyric hymns. Unlike the tṛca structure of the last hymn, this one is arranged in pragāthas, the first two of which (vss. 1–4) are irregular, while the last (5–6) has the familiar bṛhatī/satobṛhatī alternation.

The hymn is a distillation of one of the key themes in the much longer Aśvin hymns that precede it (VIII.8–9). The last pādas of the first and last verses are identical: "from there drive here, o Aśvins," and most of the rest of the hymn (vss. 1–2, 5–6) consists of speculation on where "there" might be, with an array of cosmic locations suggested. The middle two verses (3–4) invoke the Aśvins and remind them of their devotion to us and to our sacrifice.

1. If you are at (the place) providing a long seat [=earth/ritual ground], or if you are yonder in the luminous realm of heaven, or if on the sea or in a house made ready, from there drive here, o Aśvins.
2. Or if you two have mixed the sacrifice for Manu, even so, take note only of the son of Kaṇva.
   I call upon Br̥haspati and all the gods, upon Indra and Viṣṇu and the Aśvins with swift missiles.

3. Now I call upon these Aśvins of very wondrous powers, the two made for grasping, whose comradeship for us is preeminent and their friendship among the gods,
4. For whom (our) sacrifices and patrons are preeminent (even?) at the sunless time.
   They are attentive to our sacrifice and ceremony—those who drink the somian honey after their wont.

5. If today you are in the west, if in the east, o Aśvins whose goods are prizewinning mares, if with Druhyu, Anu, Turvaśa or Yadu, I call upon you—so come to me.
6. If you are flying in the midspace or if along these two world-halves, o you who provide many benefits, or if, after your wont, you are standing upon your chariot, from there drive here, o Aśvins.

VIII.11 (631) Agni

Vatsa Kāṇva
10 verses: gāyatrī, except pratiṣṭhā 1, vardhamāna 2, triṣṭubh 10, arranged in tr̥cas, with a final verse

This is the last hymn in the Vatsa group and the only one dedicated to Agni. Compared to earlier hymns in the cycle it is both brief and, as Renou points out (EVP 13: 147), elementary. Nonetheless it is a pleasing composition, with adroit deployment of contrastive terms, such as "mortal/god," and of parallel structures, such as "to be X-ed at Y" (vss. 1, 2, 10—the last also providing a simple ring).

1. You, Agni, are the protector of commandments, a god here among mortals here; you are to be reverently invoked at the sacrifices.

2. You are to be proclaimed at the rites,
   o overpowering Agni, as the charioteer of the ceremonies.
3. Keep away hatreds from us, o Jātavedas, and ungodly hostilities, o Agni.

4. The sacrifice of the cheating mortal, even though it be nearby—you do not seek it out.
5. Of you the immortal we mortals revere the many names—
   (we) inspired poets (revere the names) of Jātavedas.
6. We inspired poets call upon the inspired one for help, we mortals upon the god for aid, upon Agni with our hymns.

7. Vatsa will guide your mind here, even from your most distant seat, o Agni, with a hymn whose desire is you.
8. Because you are of the same aspect in many places, preeminent throughout all the clans, in combats we call upon you.
9. In combats we call upon Agni for help as we seek the prize, upon him who provides brilliant bounties when prizes (are at stake).

10. For as the ancient one to be invoked at the ceremonies, the Hotar both from of old and also anew, take your seat.
    Give pleasure to your own body, o Agni, and win good fortune for us through sacrifice.

Hymns 12–18 form the third group of hymns in Maṇḍala VIII, which, as Oldenberg notes in his Prolegomena (1888: 214), clearly belong together, despite the internal absence of poets' names and the varying attributions of the Anukramaṇī. All but the last of these hymns (VIII.18 [Ādityas]) are dedicated to Indra and arranged properly by descending numbers of verses.

VIII.12 (632) Indra

Parvata Kāṇva
33 verses: uṣṇih, arranged in tr̥cas.

R̥gveda VIII.12 is tightly structured: the meter is uṣṇih (8 8 12), and in each tr̥ca the last four syllables of the final pāda form a refrain, which is, however, syntactically integrated into the verse. The last two tr̥cas before the final one (vss. 25–27, 28–30) expand the four-syllable refrain to full pāda length (that is, the final twelve syllables), which retards the verbal progress and hints at the end to come. The long refrain of verses 25–27, "just after that your two beloved fallow bays waxed strong," echoes the short refrain of the second tr̥ca (vss. 4–6), "you have waxed strong," and thus hints at a ring composition as well.

The verb form shared by those two refrains ("waxed strong," root vakṣ) is found elsewhere in the hymn, as are synonyms (root vr̥dh: "grow strong, make strong, increase") and near synonyms ("spread," "swell"), and this verbal material provides the thematic spine of the hymn. Otherwise there is a mixture of mythological material, especially toward the end, and invitations to and descriptions of the sacrifice. In the final tr̥ca (vss. 31–33) the poet announces the launch of his own hymn, that is, the hymn to which this tr̥ca forms the end, and asks for the usual bounties from Indra.

1. Most powerful Indra, your exhilaration that is conspicuous as the best drinker of soma, with which you strike down the devourer—for that we beg.
2. That with which (you helped) Daśagva and Adhrigu possessing solar glory, who sets atremble, with which you helped the sea—for that we beg.
3. (That) by which you impel the great waters forth to the Sindhu like chariots to travel the path of truth—for that we beg.

4. This praise song for dominance, purified like ghee, o master of the stones, by which now in a single day with might you have waxed strong—
5. This one enjoy, o you who yearn for songs—it swells like the sea.
   O Indra, with all your forms of help you have waxed strong.
6. The god from afar who has become ready for partnership with us—spreading like the one who spreads the rain from heaven [=Parjanya], you have waxed strong.

7. His beacons waxed strong and the mace in his two hands, when, like the sun, he made the two worlds grow.
8. When, o full-grown master of settlements, you devoured a thousand buffaloes, just after that your great Indrian power grew forth.
9. With the rays of the sun Indra burns down Arśasāna; victorious like fire over the woods, he grew forth.

10. This newer visionary thought goes to you, conforming to her season [/to the ritual sequence].
    Rendering service, dear to many—she is (well-)measured indeed.
11. As embryo of the sacrifice, seeking the gods, (the thought?) purifies its intention following the proper order.
    By praises of Indra it has grown—it is (well-)measured indeed.

12. Indra, who is the gain from our alliance, spreads himself out for soma-drinking.
    (The thought) advancing like an axe for the presser—it is (well-) measured indeed.

13. Whom [=Indra] the inspired Āyus, whose conveyance is solemn speech, have brought to exhilaration—like ghee, it swells in his mouth—(the speech) that belongs to truth.
14. And Aditi gave birth to the praise song for Indra, the sovereign king, (the song) proclaimed by many for his help—(the song) that belongs to truth.
15. The draft-horses have roared to (him) for help and for his glorification.
    Your two fallow bays, o god, do not follow a commandment separate (from the one) that belongs to truth.

16. When (you drink) soma in company with Viṣṇu or when with Trita Āptya, or when in company with the Maruts you reach exhilaration with the drops—17. Or when, able one, you reach exhilaration at a distance, upon the sea, take pleasure just in our pressing with its drops—
18. Or when you are the strengthener of the presser, of the sacrificer, o lord of settlements, or in whose solemn speech you take pleasure—together with the drops.

19. Upon hymning the god time after time, for (him) to help you, upon hymning Indra time after time, then they came through to victory for the sacrifice.
20. With sacrifices (they strengthened) him whose vehicle is the sacrifice, with soma-drinks the best soma-drinker; with libations they strengthened Indra—they came through.
21. Great is his guidance and many are the encomia for him.
    All good things are for the pious man—they came through.

22. Indra did the gods set in front to smash Vr̥tra.
    To Indra did their voices roar—entirely for his might.
23. To him, great through his greatness, to him hearing the summons through our praise songs and chants do we keep roaring—entirely for his might.
24. The mace-bearer whom the two worlds do not encompass, nor the midspaces, just from his own onslaught he has flared up—entirely from his might.

25. When, o Indra, at the battle-charge the gods set you in front, just after that your two beloved fallow bays waxed strong.

26. When, o mace-bearer, with your vast power you smashed Vr̥tra who was blocking the rivers, just after that your two beloved fallow bays waxed strong.
27. When Viṣṇu strode his three steps by your might,
just after that your two beloved fallow bays waxed strong.

28. When your two beloved fallow bays grew strong from day to day, just after that all these worlds held themselves in submission to you.
29. When the Marutian clans held themselves down for you, just after that all these worlds held themselves in submission to you.
30. When you fixed yonder sun, the blazing light, fast in heaven, just after that all these worlds held themselves in submission to you.

31. The inspired poet, through his insights, raises this good praise to you, Indra, which guides its kin safely across, like footsteps, while the ceremony is pro(ceeding).
32. When they have sounded in unison in his own dear domain, in the navel of the sacrifice, along with the milking, while the ceremony is pro(ceeding), 33. Indra, give to us the possession of good heroes, of good horses, of good cows, like a Hotar, (for us) to be first in your thought, while the ceremony is pro(ceeding).

VIII.13 (633) Indra

Nārada Kāṇva
33 verses: uṣṇih, arranged in tr̥cas

Though, like the previous hymn (VIII.12), this one is in uṣṇih meter and arranged in tr̥cas, the tight structuring of VIII.12 is absent here, save in the final tr̥ca (vss. 31–33) with its four-syllable refrain and repeated identifications with the "bull," and most of the tr̥cas lack clear unity. The theme of growing and making strong found in VIII.12 is continued here, however—notably in the first tr̥ca (vss. 1–3) and that formed by verses 16–18, but also generally throughout the hymn. There are also less insistent links between different parts of the hymn (e.g., the tree branches of vss. 6, 17), and some pleasing turns of phrase, like the "sea of the stalk" (vs. 15) referring to a particular large vessel of soma.

Mythological material is mostly lacking in the hymn, and what is found is given perfunctory treatment (see the allusions to the Maruts in vss. 20 and 28–29). The focus instead is the usual give-and-take of the ritual compact. Although the hymn has no spectacularly memorable features, it does not seem to deserve Geldner's scornful dismissal as "ein recht nichtssagendes ['trivial' or 'vacuous'] Lied."

1. When the soma juices have been pressed, Indra purifies his resolve, which is worthy of hymns.
He knows his own strengthening skill, for he is great.
2. In the first highest heaven, in the seat of the gods, he is the strengthening one, affording good passage, foremost in fame, entirely victorious amid the waters.
3. I call on him, on Indra the tempestuous, for the winning of prizes, for plunder.
Become, for us in your favor, our closest comrade, for strengthening.

4. This gift here, o Indra who yearns for songs, streams for you from the one who presses.
Becoming exhilarated, you rule over this ritual grass.
5. Now, o Indra, give us that which we pressers beg of you.
Bring here to us the shimmering wealth that finds the sun.
6. When the boundless praiser makes bold his songs for you, your *vitality grows afterward as branches do, when they take pleasure.

7. As of old, I will give birth to the songs: hear the call of the singer.
At every revel you have waxed strong for the one who performs (rituals) well.
8. Like waters going along a downward slope, they play—the liberal gifts of him who is called the lord of heaven by this visionary thought.
9. And who is called lord of the separate peoples—he alone exerts his will—by those strengthening (him) through reverence, seeking help. Rejoice in the pressed (soma).

10. Praise the famous one who is attentive to poetic inspiration, to whom belong the two overpowering fallow bays that go to the house of the pious and reverential man.
11. You of great thought, ramming through with your horses frothing at the mouth, with the swift ones, drive here to the sacrifice—for it is surely weal for you.
12. O Indra, most powerful lord of settlements, fix wealth fast in the singers, and immortal fame and goods for our patrons.

13. I call upon you when the sun has risen; I call upon (you) at the day's midday.
Rejoicing, Indra, come here to us with your teams.

14. Come here! Run forth! Take the exhilaration of the pressed (soma) accompanied by cows.
    Stretch the ancient thread in the way that is known.
15. Whether, able one, you are in the far distance, whether nearby, Vṛtra-smiter, or whether at the sea of the stalk, it is just you who are our helper.

16. Let our songs increase Indra, let our pressed drops (increase) Indra; in Indra have the oblation-bearing clans found joy.
17. Just him did the inspired poets, seeking aid, (increase) with downward coursing help.
    The battle cries made Indra increase, as tree-branches do.
18. The gods stretched for themselves a noteworthy sacrifice among the Trikadrukas.
    Just him [=Indra] let our hymns increase—him who ever increases.

19. When the praiser, following his own commandment, has set out his recitations for you in proper sequence, he is called gleaming, pure, and unerring.
20. He perceives just that youthful (troop) of Rudra [=Maruts] in the ancient domains, where the discerning ones [=Maruts?] have distributed that thought.
21. If you will choose my companionship, drink of this stalk, by which we have crossed beyond all hatreds.

22. O Indra who longs for songs, when will your praiser become most wealful for you?
    When will you place us amid bovine and equine goods?
23. And your two well-praised bullish fallow bays pull your chariot to (the soma) most exhilarating to (you) who do not age—for whom we beg.
24. For him do we beg, him praised by many, the youthful one with his ancient forms of help.
    He will sit down upon the dear ritual grass once again.

25. Become increased, o you who are praised by many, with your forms of help that are praised by the seers.
    Milk out swelling refreshment, and help us.
26. O Indra, it is only you who are the helper of him who praises just so, o master of the stones.
    From out of the truth I raise to you my insight yoked by mind.
27. Yoking here your two feasting companions, for soma-drinking, cry out to the fallow bays that bring the "forth to that" wealth, Indra.

28. Let them cry out—those who are yours: the Rudras accompany your splendor, as do the clans of Maruts, to your satisfaction.
29. These (clans), his advance (troops), find pleasure in the track that is in heaven.
In the navel of the sacrifice they have joined together, as is (well-) known.
30. This one—to take the long view while the rite is going forth toward the east—measures the sacrifice in proper order, having surveyed it.

31. A bull is this chariot of yours, Indra, and your fallow bays are also bulls.
A bull are you, o you of a hundred resolves, and our call is a bull.
32. A bull is the pressing stone, a bull the exhilarating drink, and a bull this pressed soma here.
A bull is the sacrifice that you urge onward, and our call is a bull.
33. As a bull, I call upon you, the bull, o mace-bearer, together with your brilliant help, for you cherish a responsive praise, and our call is a bull.

VIII.14 (634) Indra

Goṣūktin Kāṇvāyana and Aśvasūktin Kāṇvāyana
15 verses: gāyatrī, arranged in tr̥cas

This hymn begins with a pleasing playfulness: the poet teases Indra by declaring that, if their places were switched, he (the poet as Indra) would be far more generous than Indra is now being (vss. 1–3), with the argument made in the next tr̥ca (vss. 4–6; see also 10–12) that the strength Indra acquires from the sacrifice gives him the power to be generous. Two tr̥cas in the hymn are devoted to Indra's great deeds: verses 7–9 to the splitting of the Vala cave and the supporting of the heavenly realms, verses 13–15 to several different exploits, most notably the decapitation of the demon Namuci (vs. 13). Though Namuci is mentioned several other times in the text, this is the only place in the R̥gveda that refers to the later story of Indra's trickery directed against Namuci: pledging not to slay him with anything dry or wet, he used seafoam as his weapon. (The earliest clear version of this tale is probably that in Maitrāyaṇī Saṃhitā IV.3.4, but it is recounted in several other Brāhmaṇa texts and into epic and Classical Sanskrit. See M. Bloomfield [1893: 143–63]. For a possible indirect reference in the R̥gveda, see I.104.3.)

The gāyatrī meter and tr̥ca structure, combined with the conversational tone of the opening verses, give this hymn a light texture and informal style that contrast nicely with the more ponderous Indra hymns in the early parts of Maṇḍala VIII.

1. Indra, if I, like you, were, all alone, lord over goods, my praiser would have cows as his companions.
2. I would do my best for him. I would want to give to him who possesses inspired thought, o lord of power—if I were master of cattle.
3. Your liberal spirit is a milk-cow for the sacrificer, for the presser:
   swelling, she gives the cow and horse as her milk.

4. There exists no one to obstruct your generosity, Indra, neither god nor mortal, when, praised, you want to give bounty.
5. The sacrifice made Indra strong, when he unrolled the earth, creating for himself a headdress in heaven.
6. You who have grown strong and won all the stakes—we choose your help, Indra.

7. In the exhilaration of soma he spread out the midspace and the luminous realms—Indra did, when he split Vala.
8. He drove up the cattle for the Aṅgirases, making visible those that were hidden.
   He shoved Vala nearby.
9. Through Indra the luminous realms of heaven are firm and made firm, stable and not to be shoved aside.

10. Like the waters' wave that brings exhilaration, the praise song hastens rapidly (to you), Indra.
    The exhilarating drinks have shone forth for you.
11. For you are the strengthener of praise songs, Indra, the strengthener of recitations, and the creator of good fortune for your praisers.
12. Just Indra will the hairy(-maned) fallow bays carry for the soma-drinking right up to the sacrifice—him who is very generous.

13. With the foam of the waters you made the head of Namuci roll, Indra, when you conquered all contenders.
14. They who, through their wiles, were trying to creep up and mount to heaven, Indra, those Dasyus did you send tumbling down.
15. Indra, you made the community that performs no (soma-)pressing vanish away in all directions—you as the soma-drinker getting the upper hand.

VIII.15 (635) Indra

Goṣūktin Kāṇvāyana and Aśvasūktin Kāṇvāyana
13 verses: uṣṇih, arranged in tṛcas, with a final verse

Attributed to the same poets as the preceding VIII.14, this hymn is a more conventional praise hymn. It asserts the dominance of Indra over all the cosmos (esp. vss. 2–6), and conversely the contribution the cosmic entities and the various other gods make to Indra's power (vss. 7–10). The final tṛca (10–12), with its coda apparently addressed to Soma (vs. 13), seeks to harness all Indra's powers for victory for our side, and thus echoes the poet's opening charge to his comrades (vs. 1). The return to the beginning is also signaled by a ring-compositional device: the first two pādas of verse 11 are almost identical to those of verse 3 in the Sanskrit, though their translations diverge somewhat.

Both the language and the structure of this hymn are straightforward, but its relatively simplicity avoids the banal by the deft balancing of the powers in the two contrastive sections of the hymn and the unembellished grandeur of the rhetoric.

1. Sing forth to him, much invoked and much praised.
   Seek to entice mighty Indra here with hymns,
2. Him, the doubly lofty, whose lofty power holds fast the two world-halves, the mountains and plains, the waters and sun, through his bullishness.
3. You, o much praised one, are the ruler; you alone keep smashing obstacles, o Indra, to extend victories and (deeds) worthy of fame.

4. We hymn your exhilaration, an overpowering bull in battles, creating wide space, bringing the splendor of fallow bays, o master of the stone—
5. By which you found the lights for Āyu and Manu.
   Becoming exhilarated, you rule over this ritual grass.
6. Even today do the reciters praise this (deed) of yours, as in the earlier way:
   you shall win the waters, whose husband is a bull, day after day.

7. This lofty Indrian power of yours, your unbridled force and resolve, and the mace worthy to be chosen—these does the Holy Place sharpen.
8. Heaven increases your manliness, Indra, earth your fame;
   the waters and mountains spur you on.
9. Viṣṇu, the lofty dwelling place, hymns you, as do Mitra and Varuṇa.
   The Marut troop cheers you on.

10. You are the bull of the peoples; you were born as the most munificent, Indra.
    In every way you have acquired all things that bring good descendants.

11. In every way, o much-praised one, you alone stream over obstacles.
 None other than Indra spurs more action.
12. When, o Indra, they call upon you for help, every man for himself, according to his own thought,
 with our superior men win the sun now.

13. Fit (to be) a great dwelling for us, entering into all forms, (o Soma,) excite Indra, the lord of power, to victory.

VIII.16 (636) Indra

Irimbiṭhi Kāṇva
12 verses: gāyatrī, arranged in tṛcas

This is, in some ways, a meta–praise hymn, that is, a hymn about praising Indra. Although the hymn is certainly full of actual praise of the deity, it also repeatedly refers to invoking, praising, singing to, and giving recognition to Indra and his powers and deeds—in other words, to the delivery of the praise itself. Perhaps related to this feature is the noteworthy fact that Indra is in the 3rd person throughout the hymn, until the direct address and requests of the final verse (12). The constant 3rd-person reference is emphasized by regular fronting and incantatory repetition of 3rd-person pronouns referring to Indra (see, e.g., vss. 5–6, 8–9) and of his name (see, e.g., vss. 7, 9, 11).

As for the content of the praise, it focuses on Indra's power in warfare, where separate peoples vie for his aid. Yet, despite the battle theme, the descriptions are surprisingly devoid of violence, and it is Indra as maker of space (from constriction, vs. 6) and light (from darkness, vs. 10) and as the verbal advocate for his clients (vs. 5) who stands out.

1. Start up the praise anew with songs to the sovereign king of the separate peoples, Indra,
 the man who overpowers men, the most munificent,
2. In whom recitations find their joy, and all (deeds) worthy of fame, as the aid of the waters does in the sea.
3. With my good praise I seek to entice him, the preeminent king, effective at raiding,
 the prizewinner, for the gains of the great (prize?).

4. To whom belong the exhilarating drinks—unfailing, deep, wide, overwhelming—
 that produce his excitement at the contest of champions…
5. Just upon him do they call for intercession when the stakes are set.
 Whoever has Indra—they win.

6. It's just him that the separate peoples recognize by his exploits, him by his deeds:
"That's Indra, who creates wide space!"

7. Indra is the formulator, Indra the seer, Indra the many times much-invoked great one with great powers.
8. He is to be praised, he to be invoked—the real "real thing," powerfully ranging.
Even though alone, he is overwhelming.
9. Him with chants, him with melodies, him with songs do the separate peoples, the settlements make strong: Indra—

10. The leader to a better state, the creator of light in combats, conquering foes in battle.
11. He, our deliverer, much invoked, will deliver us to the far shore by boat, beyond all hatreds, with well-being: Indra.
12. You, o Indra—with prizes of victory do honor to us, and provide us a way, and lead us to your favor.

VIII.17 (637) Indra

Irimbiṭhi Kāṇva
15 verses: gāyatrī 1–13, br̥hatī 14, satobr̥hatī 15

Coming at the end of the Indra collection in this self-contained group (VIII.12–18), this hymn consists of fifteen verses and is thus longer than the two previous hymns. This over-length, combined with its metrical disunity and the varying use of the verses in later Vedic ritual, suggests that the "hymn" is actually a composite of three: verses 1–10, consisting of three tr̥cas plus a final verse; another independent tr̥ca, verses 11–13; and a final pragātha, verses 14–15. (For details, see Oldenberg 1888: 139 n. 1 and 214 n. 2.)

The first and longest of the three hymns (vss. 1–10) is a straightforward invitation to soma, urging Indra to make the journey to our sacrifice and promising an ecstatic immersion in the liquid. There are several striking images toward the end, especially that of the soma mixed with milk as a woman in disguise going to a rendezvous (if our interpretation is correct) (vs. 7), and a vivid picture of Indra in the grip of soma-exhilaration (vs. 8). Only the last verse (10), tacked onto the final tr̥ca, asks for something in return.

The other two hymns, or hymn fragments, are more opaque. The first (vss. 11–13) begins with a conventional invitation to Indra, but the following two verses address otherwise unknown men involved in some way in the soma sacrifice. The final pragātha (vss. 14–15) first gives a praiseful description of the soma drop in verse 14, but ends with yet another unknown man also engaged in the soma sacrifice, who seems to have some success in getting Indra to drink it.

1. Drive here—for we have pressed soma for you, Indra. Drink this!
   Sit here upon this ritual grass of mine.
2. Let your hairy(-maned) fallow bays, yoked by sacred formulations, convey you here, Indra.
   Listen to our formulations.
3. We formulators, with you as our yokemate, call upon you, Indra—provided with soma, possessing pressings, we call upon the soma-drinker.

4. Drive here to us, who have the pressings, here to our good praises.
   Drink of the stalk, (fair-)lipped one.
5. I pour (it) into your two cheeks. Let it run along and across your limbs.
   Grasp the honey with your tongue.
6. Let it be sweet for you sweetening; (let it be) honeyed for your body.
   Let the soma be weal for your heart.

7. Let this soma, completely covered (with milk), slink forth to you, like (covered) women (to a rendezvous), o boundless Indra.
8. Strong-necked, bulging-bellied, mighty-armed Indra in the exhilaration of the stalk
   keeps smashing obstacles.
9. Indra, go forth in front, holding sway over all with your might.
   Smash obstacles, o smasher of obstacles [/Vr̥tra].

10. Let your hook be long by which you hold out goods to the sacrificer who presses (soma).

11. Here is your soma, Indra, purified down onto the ritual grass.
    Come here to it! Run, drink of it!
12. Śācigu, Śācipūjana, this has been pressed for your joy.
    Ākhaṇḍala, you are called forth.
13. O grandson, great-grandson of Śr̥ṅgavr̥s—your (soma) to-be-drunk-from-a-jar:
    upon that has (Indra) fixed his mind.

14. O Lord of the Dwelling Place, a steadfast pillar, armor for comrades in soma is the drop, a splitter of strongholds, one after the other. Indra is the comrade of ecstatics.
15. Pr̥dākusanu, worthy of the sacrifice, seeking cattle—even though he is one, he sur(rounds) the many.
    He leads forward, by thrust and grasp, the ardent horse that is Indra, to drink of the soma.

VIII.18 (638) Ādityas

Irimbiṭhi Kāṇva
22 verses: uṣṇih, arranged in tr̥cas, with a final verse

Like the other hymns to the Ādityas in VIII (47, 67), this hymn is fairly elementary and rarely strays far from its theme—the hope that the Ādityas (and, toward the end [vss. 16, 20, 21], other gods) will provide protection from various dangers and enemies and long life for us and our offspring. There is a fair amount of coherence within tr̥cas—for example, the dominance of Aditi in verses 4–6, the repetition of śám "weal" and the four-syllable tag refrain in verses 7–9.

1. Here and now a mortal should seek a share of their favor, the unprecedented (favor) of the Ādityas, at the impulsion (of Savitar),
2. For the paths of these Ādityas are without assault, and undeceivable are the protectors who provide strength on an easy road.
3. Let Savitar, Bhaga, Varuṇa, Mitra, and Aryaman extend to us that broad shelter for which we beg.

4. O goddess Aditi, you whose burden [=fetus(es)] cannot be harmed—come here with the gods, along with patrons who provide good shelter, o you dear to many,
5. For these sons of Aditi know how to keep away hostilities—the faultless ones who make wide (space) even out of narrow straits.
6. Let Aditi (protect) our livestock by day, let Aditi the unduplicitous (do so) by night;
   let ever-strengthening Aditi protect us from narrow straits.

7. And this Aditi, (like) a *banner by day, will come with her help;
   she will make wealfulness and joy. – Failures away!
8. And those two heavenly healers, the Aśvins, will make weal for us.
   They should keep defect away from here. – Failures away!
9. Agni will make weal with his fires; let the sun blaze weal for us.
   Let wind, without defect, blow weal. – Failures away!

10. Away affliction, away failure—drive away bad thought.
    O Ādityas, keep us from narrow straits.
11. Keep the arrow from us, Ādityas, and thoughtlessness.
    Set hostility aside, o you possessed of all possessions.
12. O Ādityas, extend to us the shelter that will free even the sinful from his sin, o you of good gifts.

13. Whatever mortal seeks to harm us with demonry, that man should harm his own lifetime by his own devices.

14. Evil will get the defaming, cheating mortal who, full of evil rage, is double-dealing right here in our midst.
15. You are in the midst of simple folk, o gods: you know the mortal in their hearts—both the one who is double-dealing right here and the one who isn't, o good ones.

16. We would choose the shelter of the mountains and of the waters.
    O Heaven and Earth, put defect at a distance from us.
17. You, o good ones—with your beneficial shelter as a boat carry us to the far shore, beyond all difficulties.
18. For the sake of progeny and posterity make for us a longer lifetime to live, o very great Ādityas.

19. There is a sacrifice closer to you than your anger, Ādityas. Have mercy!
    Only in you do we abide—in your kinship.
20. The Maruts' lofty defense, the god Rescuer, the Aśvins, Mitra and Varuṇa—(all of them) do we beg for our well-being.
21. O Mitra, Aryaman, and Varuṇa, o Maruts—your faultless, manly, praiseworthy protection providing threefold defense—extend that to us.

22. For even though we are men, whose kinsman is death, o Ādityas, extend our lifetime for us to live.

The next four hymns (VIII.19–22) are attributed to Sobhari Kāṇva by the Anukramaṇī and are dedicated to Agni (VIII.19, 37 verses), the Maruts (VIII.20, 26 verses), Indra (VIII.21, 18 verses), and the Aśvins (VIII.22, 18 verses). Sobhari addresses himself in every hymn but VIII.21.

VIII.19 (639) Agni (1–33), Ādityas (34–35), Trasadasyu's Dānastuti (36–37)

Sobhari Kāṇva
37 verses: 1–26, 28–33 pragātha strophes of kakubh (8 12 8) and satobr̥hatī (12 8 12 8), except dvipadā virāj 27, uṣṇih 34, satobr̥hatī 35, kakubh 36, paṅkti 37

Save for VI.16 with its 48 verses, this is the longest hymn dedicated to Agni in the R̥gveda, but unlike the composite VI.16, this hymn shows clear signs of unity. This unity is evident (though more clearly in the Sanskrit) in the constant recycling and recombination of vocabulary, especially the lexicon related to sacrifice. Thematically the hymn focuses on Agni's role in the sacrifice and on mortals' tasks in helping him fulfill that role. Numerous verses promise the favor and aid of Agni to the mortal who properly serves the fire (see, e.g., vss. 5–6, 9–14).

This reciprocal relationship between the god Agni and mortal men and Agni's mediating position between gods and men provide other themes in the hymn. The first verses (1–4) emphasize Agni's divine nature even while sketching his role as the Hotar parallel to mortal priests and chosen by them (esp. vs. 3ab), but this equivocal position of Agni is explored differently later in the hymn. Verse 24 again puts heavy emphasis on the fact that Agni is a god and immortal and also the Hotar acting for and established by men, but here he seems to be acting almost like a mortal himself—seeking the rewards of the sacrifice like a human priest. This subtle role shift leads to a more explicit and otherwise unthinkable one in the next verses (25–27), where the poet imagines himself as the god and Agni as his mortal server and claims that he, the poet, would act beneficently. (For a similar role reversal but with Indra and his mortal worshiper, see nearby VIII.14.) This flight of fancy ends quickly, and the proper relations between man and god are restored in verse 28.

The hymn also has a political agenda, coming to a climax in verses 32–33, but foreshadowed at various places earlier in the hymn. In verse 32 the poet announces that he and his fellows have come to the fire belonging to the great king Trasadasyu, the fire on which all other fires are dependent (vs. 33). As Proferes convincingly argues (2007: 33–34 and passim), the fire represents the king's sovereignty and is depicted as being made up of the fires of the individual peoples who give allegiance to the king, the brilliance belonging to each of these peoples being brought together in a team. Agni is thus not only the mediator positioned between men and gods, but also among different groups of men, and in both cases he is chosen for the role, put in that position, by men acting voluntarily.

The model of the sacrifice as reciprocal action and responsibility provides an implicit model for the state. As noted above, earlier parts of the hymn hint at what is to come. In verse 7 the poet hopes that his group can use their fires to provide good fire for an unidentified plural "you"—quite possibly the larger polity. The plural "fires" is significant: though in ritual context it can easily be taken as referring to the three fires on the ritual ground, in a political reading it can represent the dependent fires of verse 33. The next verse (8) refers to Agni as "a guest associated with alliance" (átithiḥ . . . mitríyaḥ). Again in ritual context this refers to the god's presence as guest in the house of a mortal and the alliance between gods and men thus effected, but in a political reading the alliance is the banding together of the peoples under Trasadasyu represented by Trasadasyu's fire. In verse 14 we find the curious and syntactically unusual expression "who will piously offer boundlessness throughout the domains." The word "boundlessness" is áditi, usually used as the name of the goddess Aditi, mother of the Ādityas, but more easily interpreted as a common noun here. Again, in a ritual context it may mean that the ritual ground is equivalent to the whole world and thus unbounded, but in a political context it may refer to the erasure of boundaries among the peoples who give allegiance to Trasadasyu and his fire. It may also indirectly promise the favor of the Ādityas, the gods who oversee the relationships among men, to the men who subscribe to this allegiance. The principal Ādityas, Varuṇa, Mitra, and Aryaman (as well as Bhaga), show up in verse 16, and already Agni was said to be Mitraic (/associated with alliance) in verse 8 (see also vs. 25). It is surely significant that the two verses following the climactic declaration about Trasadasyu's sovereign fire (vss. 34–35) are dedicated to the Ādityas, specifically Varuṇa, Mitra, and Aryaman. The final two verses (36–37) are a brief and uncomplex dānastuti of Trasadasyu.

It is hoped that this introduction gives some sense of the richness and intricate interconnections of this hymn; much more could be said.

1. Praise him who possesses solar glory. The gods have run to the god, the spoked wheel (of the sacrifice).
   They have conducted the oblation among the gods.
2. Reverently invoke him of extensive generosity, o inspired poet—Agni of brilliant flame, the guider of this ritual offering of soma, o Sobhari. (Bring him) forth as the foremost for the ceremony.

3. We have chosen you, the best sacrificer, a god, an immortal, as Hotar among the gods—
   (you,) very effective for this sacrifice,
4. The child of nourishment, providing good fortune and good light, Agni of fairest flame.
   He will win for us by sacrifice in heaven the favor of Mitra and Varuṇa and that of the waters in heaven.

5. The mortal who by kindling, who by pouring, who by knowledge performs pious service to Agni, and who conducts good ceremonies with reverence,
6. It is his steeds that speed swiftly, his glory that is most brilliant, and no anxiety, whether god-made or mortal-made, will reach him from anywhere.

7. With our fires might we provide good fire to (all of) you [=assembled peoples]. O son of strength, o lord of nourishment, kindly disposed toward us, you provide good heroes.
8. Being lauded like a guest associated with our alliance, Agni is worth acquiring like a chariot.
   Peaceful ways that bring success abide in you: you are king of riches.

9. The mortal who conducts pious ceremonies in the stipulated way, he is to be lauded, o Agni, you who provide good fortune.
   Let him be a winner with his insights—

10. The one for whose ceremony you stand erect, he, controlling heroes, achieves success—and (let) him (be) a winner with his steeds, and with his extollers; a winner of the stake with his champions.

11. The one in whose house the wondrous form Agni, possessing all desirable things, should take delight in the praise song or in the oblations, while he [=Agni] keeps laboring at his labors, 12. Or in the gifts of the inspired praiser who is quickest, o youthful (son) of strength.
    make his speech, when he has found it, one that brings the gods below and is above (that of) mortals, o good one.

13. Who seeks to attract Agni here with the giving of oblations, or (seeks to attract) the very skillful one with acts of reverence, or him of nimble flame with song,
14. Who with kindling and with sharpening (of it [=fire]) piously offers boundlessness throughout his [=Agni's] domains, that mortal, provided with good fortune, will cross over all things and (all) peoples with his insights and his brilliance, as if through the water.

15. O Agni, bring here the brilliance that will overpower any devourer in his seat and the battle fury of the ill-intentioned man.
16. (The brilliance) by which Varuṇa, Mitra, and Aryaman see, by which the Nāsatyas and Bhaga, in that (brilliance) of yours might we receive ritual shares, (becoming) the best pathfinders by your power, helped (also) by you, Indra.

17. It is those of good intention who have installed you who provide the sight for men, o Agni, o inspired one—the inspired priests (have installed you) as the very effective one, o god.
18. Just those (have made) the altar, o you of good fortune, they the poured offering; they have made the soma-pressing (to be) in heaven.
    Just those have won the great stake along with its prizes who set their desire down in you.

19. Auspicious is Agni when he is bepoured; auspicious is our gift, auspicious our ceremony, o you who provide good fortune, and auspicious our lauds.
20. Set your auspicious mind on the overcoming of obstacles, the mind with which you will be overpowering in battles.
    Loosen the sturdy (bows) of those that are greatly defiant. Might we win with your superior powers.

21. With my hymn I reverently invoke the one established by Manu, the circle of spokes whom the gods have set down as their messenger, the best sacrificer, who carries the oblations.
22. To the sharp-fanged one, the ruler of tender age—to Agni do you sing delight, Agni who adorns his mass of heroes with his liberal gifts, when he is bepoured with ghee.

23. When, bepoured with ghee, Agni bears his axe up and down, like a (rich) lord (he bears [=wears]) his cloak [=ghee].
24. Who, the god established by Manu [/man], set the oblations in motion with his sweet-smelling mouth—he seeks to win desirable things for himself as the Hotar who conducts ceremonies well, (though he is also) an immortal god.

25. If, Agni, you were mortal and I were immortal—o you with the might of Mitra, o son of strength bepoured (with ghee)—
26. I would not give you over to the curse, o good one, nor to evil, o my companion.
My praiser would not be in want nor ill-established, Agni, nor in an evil way,
27. But well kept here in my dwelling, like a son in that of his father. Let our oblation go forth to the gods!

28. Might I always keep company with your help that is so very nearby, o Agni, at your pleasure, o good one—
I a mortal, (with that) of a god.
29. With your will may I win, with your gifts, with your lauds, o Agni.
They say that just you are solicitude for me, o good one. O Agni, be aroused to give.

30. He advances himself through your help well provided with heroes and bringing prizes—
(the man) whose companionship you will choose.
31. Your drop [=spark], accompanied by dark [=smoke], bellowing as it is kindled at the right ritual moment, has taken, o you who desire to win.
You are dear to the great dawns; you rule [/shine] through the nights and at the dawns.

32. We, the Sobhari, have come to the one possessing a thousand testicles, well provided with superior power, for his help, the sovereign king, (the fire) belonging to Trasadasyu—

33. You, o Agni, on whom the other fire are dependent, like branches (on a tree).
    I team up the brilliant glories of the peoples as (poets team up) inspired poems, while I strengthen your powers to rule.

34. O you Ādityas without deceit—the mortal whom you lead to the far shore—you who are the best givers among all the generous—35. Any (man) holding power throughout the sons of Manu—you kings who conquer territories—might we be those to you, o Varuṇa, Mitra, and Aryaman; might we alone be the charioteers of truth.

36. Trasadasyu, the son of Purukutsa, has given me five hundred brides—the lord of settlements who is most munificent to his compatriot.
37. And, at the source of the (River) Suvāstu, the dusky (horse) of Prayiyu, of Vayiyu, became the leader of thrice seventy (cows) for me. Good is the lord of gifts.

VIII.20 (640) Maruts

Sobharī Kāṇva
26 verses: kakubh alternating with satobr̥hatī, arranged in pragāthas

The typical Marut themes are deftly woven together in this hymn. After inviting them to the sacrifice (vss. 1–2), the poet first describes the effects in nature of the storm they embody (vss. 3–6) and then their flashy beauty and that of their chariot (vss. 7–12), ending this section with two verses (13–14) on their lack of individuality (see also vs. 21). The remainder of the hymn concerns the generosity of the Maruts and begs them to display it in response to Sobhari's hymn: the poet addresses himself in verses 19–20. Unlike the generic gifts generally asked for in R̥gvedic hymns, the final verses make it clear that the poet has a specific request: Marut medicine to heal the afflicted (vss. 23–26). Their association with healing comes through their father Rudra.

The hymn exhibits a light touch and has a number of neat turns of phrase—for instance, verse 8, where "the music of the Sobharis is anointed with cows" indicates that their hymn reaps a bovine reward from the patron, or verse 19, with its pun on the participle cárkr̥ṣat meaning both "plowing" and "celebrating."

1. Come here; don't mean harm. Setting out, don't stay away, o you of equal spirit, who are able to bow even the fixed things.

2. With your (chariots) whose wheel-rims are firm, with your very bright lights—o Maruts, masters of the R̥bhus, o Rudras—with refreshment come here to us today, here to the sacrifice, seeking the Sobharis, o you who are craved by many.

3. For we know the mighty forcefulness of the Rudrian Maruts, the strenuous ones, of quick Viṣṇu, of the ones who grant rewards.
4. The islands keep flying further apart; misfortune stands still; they [=Maruts] yoke both world-halves.
The wasteplaces rise forth, when you stir (them), o you self-radiant ones with beautiful bangles.

5. (When you stir) even the unshakeable things on your drive, the mountains and the lord of the forest keep resounding.
The earth trembles at your journeys.
6. To allow your onslaught to drive by, o Maruts, heaven raises itself higher aloft, when the men, strong in arm, keep putting their energies on display on their own bodies.

7. According to their nature, following their beauty, the men—greatly vibrant, impetuous, bullish in breath, unobstructed in breath—drive themselves.
8. The music of the Sobharis is anointed with cows. Onto the chariot, into the golden (chariot) cask (come) those well-born (Maruts), akin to a cow [=Pr̥śni], (for us) to enjoy nourishment; the great ones (come here) now for us to gain.

9. O you who rain unguents, present oblations to your own bullish Marutian troop whose leader is a bull [=Indra].
10. O Maruts, with your chariot with its bullish horses, bullish breath, bullish wheel-naves, come here at will, like winged falcons, to pursue our oblations, o men.

11. Common to them (all) is their unguent; their brilliants glint on their arms.
Their spears keep flashing.
12. These mighty bulls with mighty arms do not arrange (such things just) on their bodies:
taut bows and weapons are on your chariots, beauties on your faces.

13. Of them whose name is vibrant and widespread like a flood, there is just one (name) for each and every one of them to enjoy.
Their might is like the life force of their fathers.

14. Extol these Maruts; praise them. For of these boisterous ones, as of wheel-spokes, there is no last one. This is so as to their giving; as to their greatness is this so.

15. Very fortunate is he who was amid your forms of help at earlier dawnings, o Maruts, or who will be also now.
16. Or the prize-seeker whose oblations you come here to pursue, o men.
He will attain to your favors, you shakers, along with brilliant things and the winning of prizes.

17. Just as they wish, so shall it be—they,
the sons of Rudra, lord of heaven, the ritual adepts, the youths,
18. The Maruts of good drops who deserve (the soma-drink) and who go about practicing generosity all together.
With a better heart even than this [=usual generosity], o youths, turn yourselves hither toward us.

19. To the youths, to the bulls, the pure ones, sing with your newest hymn, o Sobhari, like a plowman to his cows [/celebrating (the Maruts) like cows].
20. Those who are victorious like a fist-fighter, to be invoked in all contests, among (all) Hotars, those, like lustrous bulls, receiving the most praises—extol them with a hymn: the Maruts, yes!

21. Cows also, likewise akin through common birth, o Maruts of equal spirit, lick each other's humps.
22. The mortal also will draw near to brotherhood with you, you dancers with brilliants on your breasts.
Take note of us, Maruts, for your firmly founded friendship exists always.

23. O Maruts of good drops, convey here to us (some) of your Marut medicine, you comrades in the span.
24. Those with which you aid the Sindhu, with which you triumph, with which you favor Krivi, with those kindly forms of help be a joy to us, you who are joy itself, you who do not partner hatred.

25. O Maruts possessing good ritual grass—what medicine is in the Sindhu, what in the Asiknī, what in the seas, what in the mountains,

26. Seeing it, you carry it all on your bodies. With it intercede for us.
 To ground (should go) the malady of the afflicted; make what has gone awry right again.

VIII.21 (641) Indra (1–16), Citra's Dānastuti (17–18)

Sobhari Kāṇva
18 verses: kakubh alternating with satobr̥hatī, arranged in pragāthas

This hymn ends with a brief dānastuti to king Citra (vss. 17–18) and begins with a pun on his name: in verse 1 Indra is described as citrá "brilliant." In between the poet ponders the various different relationships that he and his people might have with Indra, deploying a surprising range of terminology: "comrade" (vss. 2, 8, 14, 15), "kin" (vs. 4), "rival" (vs. 13), "friend" (vs. 13), and "father" (vs. 14). Amid the standard invitations to the soma sacrifice (e.g., vss. 3, 5) and praise of Indra's qualities (e.g., vs. 10), the poet depicts himself and his people as previously deprived of Indra (vs. 7), but as possessing hopes and visions of the god's entering into relationship with them (see esp. vs. 6), and he imagines what they could achieve if this relationship were activated (vss. 11–12). The stress on the 1st plural "we" (including Indra along with the mortals) and on "our" states of mind is highly unusual in R̥gvedic poetry.

The poet's conception of possible relationships develops in even more unpredictable ways toward the end of the hymn. The pragātha strophe consisting of verses 13–14 begins strikingly by calling Indra friendless, and continues in verse 14 with a brief and idiosyncratic characterization of some who don't have relationships with Indra. The following pragātha (vss. 15–16) urges "us" not to miss our own chance with Indra, with a noteworthy comparison of "our" potentially damaging lack of activity to that of aging spinsters.

Thus, though much of the hymn contains conventional Indra-hymn material, there is a distinct "psychological" tinge to the poet's depiction of the interaction of his group with Indra. This depiction of an emotional bond between the worshipers and the deity makes the abrupt transition to the dānastuti all the more surprising, especially because the dānastuti seems to belittle Indra's giving in comparison to King Citra's.

1. O you without precedent—we, seeking help like people carrying something massive,
 call upon you, the brilliant, in the prize contest.
2. That powerful youth of ours—in his daring—strode right up to you for help in action, for it is just you that we, your comrades, have chosen as the helper who brings gain, o Indra.

3. Drive here. Here are the drops, o lord of horses, lord of cows, lord of fields.
   Drink the soma, soma-lord.
4. Because we inspired poets without (such) kin hold fast to you who have (those [=horses, etc.] as kin, o Indra, come here with all of them, which are your deposits, to drink the soma, o bull.

5. Like birds (in a tree), sitting by your exhilarating, strengthening honey prepared with cows, we keep bellowing to you, o Indra.
6. When we address you with this homage, will you hesitate even for a moment?
   Here are desires, and you are the giver, o possessor of the fallow bays. Here are we; here are our visions.

7. Only recently have we come together with your help, Indra, for previously, o master of the stones, we have not known your abundance.
8. We (now) know your comradeship and sustenance, o champion. We beg these of you, o wielder of the mace.
   And so make us sharp, good one, whenever a prize of cattle is (at stake), o you of beautiful lips.

9. Who previously led us to this better state right here, him shall I praise on your behalf, o comrades, for his help—Indra,
10. Possessor of the fallow bays, lord of settlements, conquering territories. Because as ever it is he who has reached exhilaration, the bounteous one will pursue for us, his praisers, a hundred in cattle and horses.

11. Surely with you as our yokemate, o bull, we could talk back to the snorter at the concourse of the people possessing cattle.
12. As decisive actors, we could be victorious in the decisive action, o much-invoked one; we could stand up to those of evil vision.
    With our superior men we could smash the obstacle [/Vr̥tra] and swell with strength. O Indra, you have pursued our visions.

13. You are without rival, but by the same token, without friend, Indra, by birth and from of old.
    Only in battle do you seek friendship.
14. You never take on a rich man for companionship. The booze-fueled revile you.
    When you make your roar, you just shove (them all) together. It is because of that that you are called on like a father.

15. When we are in companionship with one such as you, Indra, let us not, like foolish (spinsters) who grow old at home, (just) sit still when (the soma) has been pressed.
16. Let us not miss out on your largesse, you whose gift is cattle. Indra, let us not complain about you.
    Seize hold of even the firmly fixed (goods) of the stranger and bring them here. Those who receive your gifts are not to be swindled.

17. Is it Indra (who gives) so great a bounty, or well-portioned Sarasvatī who gives the goods?
    Or is it you, o Citra, (who give) to the pious man?
18. Citra is the only king; the other petty little ones who (live) along the Sarasvatī are only kinglets—for like Parjanya with rain, he will thunder [/stretch forth] as he gives a thousand ten thousands.

VIII.22 (642) Aśvins

Sobhari Kāṇva
18 verses: bṛhatī alternating with satobṛhatī 1–7; anuṣṭubh 8; kakubh alternating with satobṛhatī 9–10, 13–18; kakubh 11; madhyejyotis 12, all arranged in pragāthas.

The metrical complexity of this hymn is not matched by corresponding complexity of content. The hymn focuses especially on the chariot of the Aśvins, as well as on their journey to us, the sacrifice with which we will welcome them, and the multiform aid we hope for in return.

Nonetheless there are a few striking images and turns of phrase, particularly in verse 6 where the Aśvins "plow barley with a wolf," an expression that cannot be separated from the similar one in I.117.21, likewise an Aśvin hymn, where they "scatter barley with a wolf." Starting with Yaska (6.26), the "wolf" has regularly been identified as a type of plow, though this recourse to agricultural technology could be taken as a reductive attempt to explain away the wondrous nature of the Aśvins' feats—here perhaps their ability to harness the power of a dangerous and semi-wild beast for a civilizing task. On the wolf as a cross-category in the Vedic conceptual universe, situated between the wild and the civilized and partaking of both, see Jamison (2008b).

1. I have called here this most wondrous chariot for help today, the one that you mounted for Sūryā, o Aśvins easy to call, you who follow the course of the Rudras [=Maruts]—
2. (The chariot) that is first to bring prosperity [?], that is easy to call, eagerly sought by many, enjoyable, first in the prize-contests, accompanied by favors, free of hatred, and without fault, o Sobhari.

3. These two gods who most often appear in many places, the Aśvins—with our acts of reverence may we bring them here nearby for help: they go to the house of the pious man.
4. One wheel of your chariot speeds around; the other, (though) at rest, drives you onward.
   Let your favor run to us here, like a cow (to its calf), o lords of beauty.

5. Your chariot with its three chariot-boxes and golden reins, o Aśvins, the famous one that busily circles around heaven and earth—with that, come here, o Nāsatyas.
6. Rendering service to Manu, early in the day you plow barley with a wolf.
   O Aśvins, lords of beauty, today we would praise you together with your favors.

7. O you whose goods are prizewinning mares, drive right up to us along the paths of truth, along which you spur Tr̥kṣi, son of Trasadasyu, for great sovereignty, o bulls.
8. Here is the soma pressed for you with stones, o you men with bullish goods.
   Drive here to drink the soma; drink it in the house of the pious man.

9. Ascend onto the chariot, into the golden (chariot-)cask, o Aśvins with bullish goods, and so hitch up refreshments rich in fat.
10. With those (forms of help) with which you help Paktha, with which Adhrigu, with which Babhru deprived of pleasure, with these come to us right away and swiftly, o Aśvins. Heal what is ailing.

11. When we Adhrigus call upon the Aśvins, the two Adhrigu [/who are not poor], at this very time of day—we expressing admiration with our hymns—
12. With those (forms of help) drive here, o bulls, right to my call, which brings all good things and all that is worth desiring—(drive here) with refreshment, as the most bounteous ones who most often appear in many places—with those (forms of help) with which they [=the Maruts?] strengthened Krivi, with those come here.

13. To these two at this very time of the days, to these Aśvins do I appeal, celebrating them, and these two do we beseech with our acts of reverence—
14. Just these two in the evening, these two lords of beauty at dawn, and these two who follow the course of the Rudras [=Maruts] on their journey.

Don't look over and beyond us to a cheating mortal, o Rudras whose goods are prizewinning mares.

15. In the early morning I call their easily moving (chariot) to move easily here, or (rather I call) the overpowering Aśvins along with their chariot—
I, Śobharī, like a father.
16. With (your chariot) swift as thought, o bulls roused to exuberance, with your forms of help that come quickly, even from far away come to be here for our help with your many (forms of help), you who bring many benefits.

17. O Aśvins, you superior men who are first to drink the honey, to us here drive your course providing horses, cattle, and gold, o wondrous ones.
18. An abundance of good heroes, of good standing and well in advance, desirable, unassailable by the demonic, and all things of value might we acquire at this journey of yours, o you whose goods are prize mares.

The next small collection of hymns (VIII.23–26) is attributed to Viśvamanas Vaiyaśva, with hymns to Agni (VIII.23), Indra (VIII.24), Mitra and Varuṇa (VIII.25), and the Aśvins and Vāyu (VIII.26). The names Vyaśva and its patronymic Vaiyaśva occur several times in these hymns, as does the name of the patron (Varo) Suṣāman, and the hymns are also characterized by the almost exclusive use of the uṣṇih meter (8 8 12). See Oldenberg (1888: 211–13).

VIII.23 (643) Agni

Viśvamanas Vaiyaśva
30 verses: uṣṇih, arranged in tṛcas

The poet begins the hymn by urging himself to perform his sacrificial tasks (vss. 1–2ab), ending this little section with vocatives addressed to himself but seemingly designed to identify himself with his divine target Agni: "belonging to all domains" is often an epithet of Agni (as well as of Indra) and "having all in mind" (viśvámanas) could be a divine descriptor. However, at least according to the Anukramaṇī, it is the poet's own name, and he then (vs. 2c) speaks in his own 1st-person voice. This interactive quality is prominent throughout the hymn. The poet's self-address returns in verse 24, and in between he also addresses in the 2nd-person plural the assembled priests and worshipers, on whose behalf he is working (vss. 7–9; see esp. 9a, where he calls them "seekers of the truth"). (On poetic self-address see Jamison 2009a.) Agni's role in this social context, as clanlord of clans, is also emphasized (vss. 10, 13–14, 20). Manu, the mythical founder of the larger Ārya sacrificial community known as the "descendants of Manu," is also duly remembered (vss. 13, 17, 25–26), as are the mythical seer Uśanā Kāvya (vs. 17) and the poet's immediate ancestor, the seer Vyaśva (vss. 16, 23), whose devotion to Agni and lucrative relationship with his patron, Ukṣan, merit mention and provide a model for Vaiyaśva's own gentle hint to his patron Varo Suṣāman (vs. 28). Thus the poet situates his praise of the god and his requests to him in a web of social relations and mutual dependency pertaining both in the current time and in the long history of the descendants of Manu.

Both the praise and the requests follow the common tropes of the genre, though often nicely executed. The focus is on Agni as the messenger of the gods and as the carrier of our oblations to them. Some of the tr̥cas show thematic or syntactic unity (e.g., vss. 13–15 against demons and cheats), but the tr̥ca structure is not prominent, and there are bridges across tr̥cas (e.g., the messenger theme in vss. 18–19).

1. Reverently invoke him to receive (our offerings); sacrifice to Jātavedas, possessing curling smoke and flames that cannot be grasped,
2. To Agni the giver, with your hymn, o you common to all domains, who have all in mind [/Viśvamanas (=the poet)].
   And I shall praise the competitors [=flames], (drivers) of chariots, 3. Whose onward thrust, worthy of verses, (aims) to seize refreshments and nourishments.
   By close searching the driver [=Agni] finds the goods.

4. His flame has stood up and outward, the unaging flame of the shining one,
   of the very bright one of scorching fang, the glory of a warrior band.
5. Stand up with your divine body while you are being praised, o you who conduct good ceremonies, with your gaze (on us), blazing with your lofty radiance.
6. O Agni, drive (to the gods) with our good lauds, pouring oblations in yourself in the proper sequence, as you have become our oblation-carrying messenger.

7. I call upon Agni on your behalf, the foremost Hotar of the settled domains.
   I shall hymn him with this speech, and I shall praise him for you all,
8. Him of unerring will, whom, together with his body, they sweeten with their sacrifices, him, like an ally, well established among the people who abide in truth.
9. O you (people) who seek truth—in him abiding in truth, bringing success to the sacrifice with our hymn, in him do they [=the gods] take pleasure, in the footprint of our homage.

10. Let our sacrifices come in unbroken sequence here to the best of the Aṅgirases, who is the most glorious Hotar here among the clans.
11. O unaging Agni, these (flames) of yours, being kindled as lofty light, are displaying their power like bullish horses.
12. O lord of nourishments, give us wealth with an abundance of heroes.
Further us in combats when progeny and posterity are at stake.

13. When the clanlord, whetted, is well pleased in the clan of Manu, Agni repels all demonic powers.
14. O Agni, in harkening to my new praise song, you clanlord and hero, with your searing heat burn down the wily demons.
15. Not by any wile should a cheating mortal be master of him who offers ritual service to Agni with gifts of oblations.

16. The seer Vyaśva, seeking bulls [/Ukṣan (=his patron)], pleased you, the finder of goods.
For great wealth might we kindle you.
17. Uśanā Kāvya set you down as Hotar—you to win (goods) by sacrifice for Manu as Jātavedas.
18. Because all the gods, altogether, made you their messenger, by harkening (to them), o god, you became the first one worthy of the sacrifice.

19. This same immortal should the mortal, the hero, make his messenger—the pure one of extensive power whose course is black.
20. With ladles extended, we would call upon him of good radiance and blazing flame, the unaging and ancient Agni, to be invoked by the clans.
21. The mortal who has dedicated a poured offering with gifts of oblations to him receives abundant prosperity and glory in heroes.

22. (It goes) first toward Agni Jātavedas, foremost at the sacrifices—the ladle full of the oblation goes with homage.
23. Like Vyaśva, we would do honor to Agni with these most distinguished (thoughts), to him of blazing flame with most munificent thoughts.
24. Now chant to him of extensive power with praise songs like sturdy posts [/like Sthūrayūpa], o seer, son of Vyaśva—to the Agni of the household.

25. Him, the guest of the descendants of Manu, the son of the forest-lords [=trees], ancient Agni do the inspired priests reverently invoke for help.

26. Because he, the great one, is superior to all, (let) the oblations of the descendants of Manu (also be) superior.
    O Agni, sit down on the ritual grass with homage.
27. Win for us many desirable things. Win of the wealth eagerly sought by many—accompanied by good heroes, offspring, and glory.

28. O Agni, give the impetus to generosity to Varo Suṣāman and to his people, each and every one, always—o youngest good one.
29. For you are the furtherer. Uncover for us refreshments consisting of cows and the winning of great wealth, o Agni.
30. Agni, you are glorious. Convey Mitra and Varuṇa here, the sovereign kings possessing the truth and of refined skill.

VIII.24 (644) Indra

Viśvamanas Vaiyaśva
30 verses: uṣṇih (except anuṣṭubh 30), arranged in tr̥cas

The first twenty-seven verses of this hymn are dedicated to Indra, while the final tr̥ca (vss. 28–30) is a dānastuti of the patron Varo Suṣāman, with Dawn the divinity addressed because of her association with the distribution of the priestly gift. The first two verses of the dānastuti are unexceptional in diction and tone, but the last verse (30) contains puns and neologisms, as often in dānastutis.

The rest of the hymn contains fairly standard praise of Indra, with special emphasis on his generosity—rā́dhas "generosity" is something of a signature word in the hymn, occurring six times—though his powers do not go unmentioned. The need to praise Indra to stimulate his giving is also a recurrent motif in the hymn, and the poet calls upon both himself (sometimes by name) and his companions to provide that praise (see, e.g., vss. 1, 14, 19, 22–23). Such interactivity was also characteristic of the preceding hymn (VIII.23) to Agni.

The hymn consists of tr̥cas, but there is little unity within most of these triplets; instead, there are a number of instances of cross-tr̥ca transitions (see, e.g., vss. 3/4, 6/7, 9/10). The poet also makes considerable use of alliteration and, especially, of pairing derivationally related words. Verse 10 provides a particularly fine example of the latter practice.

1. Comrades, we direct our formulation to Indra who bears the mace—
   I shall praise him on your behalf—to the most manly, bold one.
2. For you are famed because of your swelling might and, as Vr̥tra-smasher, because of your Vr̥tra-smashing [/obstacle-smashing].
   With your bounties you outdo the bounteous ones in piety, o champion.

3. Being praised, bring here to us wealth that offers most brilliant fame—you who are exclusively the good giver, o master of the fallow bays.

4. Tear out what is exclusive and dear to the peoples, Indra.
Being praised, bring it here boldly, bold one.
5. Hindrances obstruct neither your left nor your right hand, nor do repulsions, o master of the fallow bays, in your quests for cattle.
6. I fit you out with my songs, as a pen with cows, o master of the stones.
Fulfill the desire and the mind of the singer.

7. All these things of the one who has all in mind [/Viśvamanas (=poet)]—o best Vṛtra-smasher—study them well though our insight, o forceful leader, o good one.
8. O Vṛtra-smasher, o champion, might we know of this newer, eagerly sought generosity of yours, o good one, much-invoked.
9. For, Indra, just as for you there exists a swelling might that cannot be encompassed, o dancer, your giving to the pious man cannot be impaired, o much-invoked one.

10. Rain yourself down, o you who are greater than great, o best of men, for great generosity.
Being yourself steadfast, stand fast, bounteous one, for bounteous giving.
11. Never have our hopes gone to any other place than you, o master of the stones.
Bounteous one, exert your ability for us with your help.
12. For surely I do not find any other than you, for generosity, o dancer, for wealth, for brilliance, and for swelling might, o you who long for songs.

13. Pour here the drop for Indra: he will drink the somian honey.
He will spur himself on in his generosity and greatness.
14. I have addressed the lord of the fallow bays as he engorges his skill.
Now listen to the son of Aśva as he praises.
15. For surely never before has a greater hero than you been born, neither in wealth—not in just such a way (as you are)—nor in favor.

16. (Pour) right here what is more invigorating than honey, or pour, Adhvaryu, (what is more invigorating) than the stalk, for in this way the ever-strengthening hero is praised.
17. O Indra, mounter of the fallow bays, none has reached up to your foremost praise hymn in swelling strength nor in favor.

18. Seeking fame, we have called upon the lord of prizes on your behalf, (comrades,) upon him who is to be strengthened by unremitting sacrifices.

19. Come now! Comrades, let us praise Indra, the superior man worthy of praise, who all alone surmounts all the separate peoples.

20. For the heaven-ruling one who does not withhold cattle, who seeks cattle, speak a wondrous speech, sweeter than ghee and honey,

21. For him whose heroic deeds are immeasurable, whose generosity is not to be circumscribed, whose priestly gift surmounts everything, like light.

22. Like Vyaśva, praise Indra, who controls the prizewinning (horse) that rides the wave, liberally apportioning the property of the stranger to the pious man.

23. In just this way now, o Vaiyaśva, praise him anew [/to the nines, and then] a tenth time—the one who knows well, worthy to be celebrated by those who roam.

24. For you know how to avoid calamities day after day, o you with mace in hand, as a preener [=water bird] does snares.

25. Bring that help here, Indra, with which, o most wondrous one, (you are there) for the (ritually) active man.
Once again pierce (Śuṣṇa?) for Kutsa and force (him) down.

26. We beg you now for a new (life?) for an older (man), o most wondrous one.
You are victorious over all our antagonists—

27. (You, the one) who releases (us) from the bear and from constraint or who (releases constraint) from the Ārya amid the seven rivers.
You have made the Dāsa's weapon bow, o you of powerful manliness.

28. Just as you conveyed wealth to Varo Suṣāman for his gain and to the Vyaśvas, o well-portioned (Dawn) rich in prizewinning mares,

29. (Even so) let the priestly gift of Nārya come to the Vyaśvas, who provide soma, as well as substantial generosity in hundreds and thousands.

30. When the sacrificer will ask you: "Where (is he), you where-actor?"
(you will answer:) "This 'Vala' [=the patron Varo Suṣāman], who is set apart, is descending toward the Gomatī (River) [/pen full of cows]."

VIII.25 (645) Mitra and Varuṇa (1–9, 13–24) and the All Gods (10–12)

Viśvamanas Vaiyaśva
24 verses: uṣṇih, arranged in tr̥cas

The only hymn in Maṇḍala VIII ostensibly devoted to Mitra and Varuṇa, it keeps its focus on these two gods only during the first part of the hymn (vss. 1–9), which celebrates them as sovereign kings possessing the truth. Starting in verse 10 other gods join the group besought for help and protection. In particular the Sun, as a representative of the Ādityas, is the main subject of two tr̥cas (vss. 16–21). The final verses of the hymn (starting with vs. 19) turn their attention to the sacrificial setting. A simile concerning the ritual fire in verse 19 serves as a transition to this scene, and an address to the Sun in verse 21, which introduces the poet's "benefactors," likewise produces a transition to the final tr̥ca (vss. 22–24), a dānastuti praising the gift of several horses and a chariot.

Although the thematic structure of the hymn roughly tracks the arrangement in tr̥cas, the tr̥cas do not have strong internal cohesion, and there is relatively little verbal unity within them.

1. To you two, the herdsmen of all, the gods worthy of the sacrifice among the gods, truth-possessing and of refined skill, shall I sacrifice.
2. They are like two charioteers along the (home) stretch (of a racecourse), the two allies [=mitras], Mitra and Varuṇa, who is of strong will, both well-born descendants from of old, whose commandments are upheld.
3. Their mother, great truth-possessing Aditi, gave birth to the two who possess all possessions, whose greatness (goes) forward to lordship.

4. Great Mitra and Varuṇa, sovereign kings, gods and lords [/devas and asuras], truth-possessing, loudly sound their lofty truth.
5. The two grandsons of great strength, the sons of skill, strong-willed, possessing fat drops, dwell in the house of refreshment.
6. You two who control the drops, the earthly and heavenly refreshments—let your cloud-accompanied rains drift here.

7. The two who from lofty heaven look down upon (us) as if upon your herds, the truth-possessing ones were installed as sovereign kings for reverence.

8. Truth-possessing, strong-willed, the two took their place for sovereign kingship.
   Their commandments upheld, the rulers attained their rule.
9. Better even than the eye at finding the way, by means of eyesight without motes, even when blinking, the two attentive ones remain attentive.

10. And let the goddess Aditi, let the two Nāsatyas [=Aśvins] give us room;
    let the Maruts, whose strength has increased, give room.
11. You (all) of good drops—give room to our roar by day and by night.
    Not suffering harm, might we be accompanied by protectors.
12. Not suffering harm, we (sing) to Viṣṇu of good drops who does not smite.
    Listen, o River traveling your own course, (for us) to be first in your thought.

13. We choose what is worth choosing, the best choice, worthy of protection, which Mitra, Varuṇa, and Aryaman protect.
14. And that (let) the River among the waters (grant) to us, that (grant) the Maruts, that the Aśvins, and Indra and Viṣṇu—the generous ones of one accord.
15. For these superior men strike against the hostility of any zealot, like roiling (rivers) their sharp surge.

16. This (Sun) here, as clanlord, gazes widely—the one (gazing) over the many.
    We proceed according to his commandments and yours [=Ādityas'].
17. We follow the ancient accustomed ways of the one [=the Sun] associated with the sovereign kings [=Ādityas], the long-heard commandments of Mitra and of Varuṇa.
18. He who measured on every side the ends of heaven and of earth with his ray, he filled both world-halves with his greatness.

19. This Sun held up his light under the shelter of heaven, blazing like fire when it has been kindled and bepoured.
20. The speech at (the place) providing a long seat [=ritual ground] gains control over a prize rich in cattle;
    it gains control over non-poisonous food for giving.
21. I speak this to the Sun and to both world-halves, at evening and at dawn:
    "Always rise up to us among our benefactors."

22. A silvery (horse) at Ukṣaṇyāyana's (sacrifice), a silver one at Harayāṇa's, and a yoked chariot at Suṣāman's—these have we gained.

23. These two are overflowing with (bounties) of horses, with fallow bays, for me; and the two (horses) that carry men (are overflowing) with those that get results.
24. With my newest inspired thought I have gained two altogether, along with their reins and with their whips, two chargers great at the winning of prizes.

VIII.26 (646) Aśvins (1–19), Vāyu (20–25)

Viśvamanas Vaiyaśva or Vyaśva Āṅgirasa
25 verses: uṣṇih, except gāyatrī 16–19, 21, 25 and anuṣṭubh 20, arranged in tṛcas, with an extra verse, 19, at the end of the Aśvin sequence

A long and rather repetitive hymn. The first nineteen verses are dedicated to the Aśvins and, as usual, urge them to drive their chariot to our sacrifice and to give us goods in return. There is little novel to capture the audience; the most striking image is found in verse 13: the unnamed god Agni, dressed in sacrifices like a bride in her wedding finery.

The final six verses belong to Vāyu, deified Wind, another god associated with the early-morning sacrifice, who receives the first soma drink there. He too is called to make the journey to our sacrifice and reward us for our offerings. He is twice (vss. 21, 22) designated as the son-in-law of Tvaṣṭar, the fashioner god—a somewhat surprising identification, given the tangled marital situation of Tvaṣṭar's daughter as tantalizingly sketched in X.17.1–2—where Vāyu is not in the picture.

1. I call your chariot for joint praise among our patrons, o you of invincible skill, you bulls who bring bullish goods.
2. O Nāsatyas, to Varo Suṣāman for his great extension do you drive with your help, you bulls who bring bullish goods.
3. We call you today with our oblations, you who bring prizewinning mares as goods, as you become refreshed on the many refreshments beyond the nights.

4. Let your famed chariot, the best conveyor, drive here, o Aśvins, superior men.
   (Then) you shall look closely at the praise songs of the powerful one for splendor.
5. Even as you follow your meandering course, you should turn your mind here, o Aśvins, who bring bullish goods, for (then) you two, o Rudras, shall deliver (us) beyond hatreds.
6. For you two wondrous ones fly around the whole (world) in proper sequence with your prompt (horses), as those who quicken our insight, as the honey-colored lords of beauty.

7. Drive right up to us, o Aśvins, together with all-prospering wealth, as unbudgeable bounteous ones, bringing good heroes.
8. You two—come here to receive this (offering) of mine, Indra and Nāsatyas—as two gods joined in greatest delight with the gods today.
9. Because we call upon you, (we) seeking bulls like Vyaśva seeking Ukṣan (his patron), come here with your favors, o inspired poets.

10. Praise the Aśvins, o seer. Surely they will listen to your call and burn up the niggards very nearby?
11. Listen to the son of Vyaśva, you two superior men, and you will know of this (offering) of mine, as two of one accord, (you and) Varuṇa, Mitra, and Aryaman.
12. O holy ones, out of what is given by you and what is brought by you, do your best for me along with my patrons day after day, o bulls.

13. The one who is swathed in sacrifices for you, like a bride in her (wedding) dress—serving (him [=Agni]), the Aśvins have made (him) to be beautiful—14. (Agni,) who will watch over your (circuit) of broadest extent, protective of men.
Drive around your circuit, seeking us.
15. For us drive your circuit protective of men, you who bring bullish goods.
As if mounting (a chariot) facing many directions, you have conveyed the sacrifice with our hymn.

16. Our praise song, best of calls at conveying, calls you as our messenger, o men.
Let it be for you, o Aśvins.
17. Whether you find exhilaration yonder in the flood of heaven or in the house of refreshment, listen just to me, immortal ones.
18. And this one, driving brightly, best of rivers at conveying, the Sindhu River with her golden track—
19. Together with this good praise and bright insight do you travel, o Aśvins driving beautifully.

20. Yoke the two that power the chariot; team up the two flourishing (horses), o good one.
After that, drink our honey, o Vāyu; come to our pressings.
21. O Vāyu, unerring lord of truth, son-in-law of Tvaṣṭar—yours are the forms of help we choose.

22. The son-in-law of Tvaṣṭar, the lord of wealth, do we beseech for wealth—as the people who provide the pressed soma (we beseech) Vāyu for brilliant things.

23. Kindly Vāyu, journey here from heaven. Drive your good horse-flesh; drive from great (heaven) the two broad-winged (horses) at the chariot.
24. For we call you to the seats of men (to be) the first to attain delight (as we call) the horse-backed pressing stone—(call you) along with your munificence.
25. O god Vāyu, as the first to find exhilaration with your mind, make prizes, waters, and insights for us.

The next group of hymns (27–31) is attributed to Manu Vaivasvata and consists of four hymns to the All Gods, followed by a very interesting praise of the Sacrificer and his Wife, the only direct mention of this latter figure in the Ṛgveda. On the group see Oldenberg (1888: 215).

VIII.27 (647) All Gods

Manu Vaivasvata
22 verses: bṛhatī alternating with satobṛhatī, arranged in pragāthas

This hymn to the All Gods falls roughly into three parts on the basis of the gods addressed. The first eight verses contain a number of named gods, whose associations seem random, rather than ordered into the usual functional groups—with, for example, the Maruts mentioned next to the Ādityas, singly or jointly, or to Agni. In contrast to this jumble of divine names, the middle section (vss. 9–14) mentions no gods except Savitar (vs. 12), and he is in service of the unnamed plural "you" used of the gods as a corporate entity. The unity and superimposability of the various gods in this section is made clear in verses 13–14. The final section (vss. 15–22) mentions only the Ādityas, though in fact they appear only in verses 15, 17, and 22.

Despite these differences in divine address, the hymn is unified by its concerns, especially the desire for protection and shelter offered by the gods (see, e.g., vss. 4, 9, 20), and by its vocabulary—in particular the epithet viśvá-vedas "affording all possessions" (vss. 2, 4, 11, 19, 20, 21) or, according to others, "having all knowledge, which is a near phonological match to víśve devā́ḥ "All Gods," to whom the hymn is dedicated. The ritual context is also very much present in the hymn.

On the basis of verse 12 and the sketch of Savitar's functions there, Geldner suggests that this is an evening hymn. But later in the hymn the poet insistently mentions various times of day (vss. 19–21), and so it seems rather that he is seeking the aid and protection of the gods round-the-clock, as it were.

The language of the hymn is fairly simple and straightforward, and the lexicon often repetitive. But the effect is pleasing, and the poem hardly deserves Renou's judgment (EVP IV: 106) that it is "banal" and "facile."

1. Agni has been set in front while the solemn speech (is being recited), as have the pressing stones and the ritual grass while the ceremony (is going forth).
   With a verse I implore the Maruts, Brahmaṇaspati, and the gods for help worthy to be chosen.
2. Here I have sung the (sacrificial) animal, the earth, the trees, Dawn and Night, the plants.
   And do you all, good ones affording all possessions, become furtherers of our poetic insights.

3. Let our ceremony go forth first to Agni among the gods, forth to the Ādityas, to Varuṇa of firm commandments, to the all-radiant Maruts,
4. For they all, affording all possessions, caring for the stranger, will be there for Manu, to increase him.
   With invulnerable protectors, you who afford all possessions—hold out to us shelter that keeps the wolf away.

5. Come to us here today, all of like mind and like delight—
   o Maruts, goddess Aditi, great House-Goddess—at our verse and our song to our seat.
6. Dear are those equine (gifts) of yours and dear to you the oblations to which you drive, o Maruts and Mitra.
   Let Indra, Varuṇa, the powerful men [=Maruts?], (and?) the Ādityas sit on this ritual grass of ours.

7. We who have ritual grass twisted for you and pleasurable offerings set out in due order, who have soma pressed and the fire kindled, like Manu, invoke (you), o Varuṇa.
8. Drive forth hither, o Maruts, Viṣṇu, Aśvins, Pūṣan, by reason of the poetic insight belonging to me.
   Let Indra drive here first, with those desirous of gain—he who is sung as the Vṛtra-smashing bull.

9. O gods without deceit, hold out to us unbroken shelter, a defense that neither from afar, nor even from nearby will (anyone) venture against, o good ones.
10. For there exists for you a common birth (with us), you gods who care for the stranger; there exists friendship.
    Commend us for previous good faring; right away (re)commend (us) for newer favor.

11. Because just now (I have dispatched) a praise invocation to you, just now for the distribution of desirable goods—to you who afford all possessions have I, doing homage, dispatched (it) like a lead(-cow).
12. O you of good guidance, for you has this Savitar, worthy to be chosen, stood up, erect.
Down have settled the busy two-footed and four-footed, and those that fly about.

13. Every god among you for help, every god for dominance, every god for prizewinning would we invoke, singing with poetic insight (as our) goddess.
14. For the gods, all as one, are of like fervor for Manu, of like generosity.
Let them be for us now, let them be in the future for our progeny, the finders of a wide realm.

15. I recite to you, o you without deceit, at the concourse of praise invocations.
No injury (comes) to that mortal who has done honor to your ordinances, o Varuṇa, Mitra, (and Aryaman).
16. He furthers his dwelling place, ex(tends) his great refreshments, who does ritual service to your liking.
He is propagated through progeny forth from his foundation. Unharmed and whole, he thrives.

17. That one acquires without fighting; along (paths) easy to go on he travels his routes, whom Mitra, Varuṇa, and Aryaman protect—they of like generosity and like delight.
18. Even in the flat plain you make a niche for him; even in difficult going (you make for him) smooth flowing.
Also this missile—it is now far from him—let it go unfaltering to destruction.

19. Since today as the sun was rising you established truth, o you of dear dominion, since at (sun)set, at awakening, or since at midday of the day, you affording all possessions, 20. Or since at evening, o lords, you held out shelter to the pious man who pursues truth, so might we stay nearby you, you good ones affording all possessions, in your midst.

21. Since today when the sun rose, since at midday, since at the (time of) covering [=evening?], you establish a thing of value for Manu the discerning oblator, o you affording all possessions,

22. We would choose this much-protecting (shelter) of yours, o sovereign kings, as a son would (his father's shelter).
    May we, pouring the oblation, reach that by which we shall reach a better (state), o Ādityas.

VIII.28 (648) All Gods

Manu Vaivasvata
5 verses: gāyatrī, except puraüṣṇih 4

A curious little fragment with no apparent unity, unlike the immediately following hymn. The common canonical number of gods, thirty-three, is mentioned in verse 1, and these undifferentiated gods are apparently our global protectors in verse 3 and able to attain all their desires in verse 4. Verse 2 mentions an oddly assorted set of gods: the three principal Ādityas, but also multiple Agnis, and two fairly marginal groups of divinities, the Wives of the Gods and the Gift Escorts. Though verse 2 names the divinities, in contrast to verses 1 and 3–4, it shares the ritual context of verse 1, which is lacking in the two following verses concerning the gods in general.

The final verse (5) is in the same riddling style as the following hymn (VIII.29), though in a different meter, and its vocabulary invites the identification of the "seven" as the Maruts (called thrice seven in I.133.6), especially since they are not found in the following hymn.

1. The gods, three beyond thirty, who sat down on the ritual grass, they found and once again they gained.
2. Varuṇa, Mitra, Aryaman, the Agnis with the Gift Escorts, along with the Wives (of the Gods), are those to whom the vaṣaṭ-cry is made.
3. These are our herdsmen to the west, these to the north, these likewise to the south, to the east—through their whole clan.
4. As the gods desire, just so will it be. No one will confound this (desire) of theirs, not even a hostile mortal.
5. Of the seven there are seven spears; seven brilliancies are theirs;
   seven beauties did they put on.

VIII.29 (649) All Gods

Manu Vaivasvata or Kaśyapa Mārīca
10 verses: dvipadā virāj (so Anukramaṇī), but really dvipadā satobr̥hatī

A very tightly and intricately structured riddle hymn. (See discussion in Jamison 2007: 75–77.) Each short verse (dvipāda satobr̥hatī verses contain only twenty syllables apiece) identifies a god (or pair of gods) by attributes or behavior, but not by name—though the referents would be clear to the audience. It is thus, in the first instance, a list hymn. However, the poet has devised a method to endow the list template with both internal structure and forward momentum. In second position of each of the verses is a numeral. In the first seven verses it is ékaḥ "one," but verses 8 and 9 have dvā́ "two" and the last verse plural éke "some" or, literally, "the ones," so that the verse structure builds through the categories of grammatical number, culminating in the only plural—though since éke belongs to the same stem as ékaḥ, there is also a sense of symmetry and return.

There is further structure within the subsections of the hymn. The éka verses, the first seven in the hymn, show an omphalos structure, with the three middle verses (3–5) having the identical sequence . . . éko bibharti háste "the one bears in his hand." The poet plays with number in other ways in this hymn: verse 7, the final verse containing "one," begins trī́ṇi ékaḥ "three the one. . . . " The referent is Viṣṇu and his three strides, so the poet, by introducing a new number, prepares us for our departure from the singular. Similarly, the next verse, the first with "two," also contains "one": VIII.29.8a víbhir dvā́ carata ékayā sahá "With the birds the two wander along with the one" [=the two Aśvins plus Sūryā], with the feminine instrumental ékayā providing a transition between the "one" verses and the "two" verses.

If we are correct, the lone and climactic plural éke in verse 10 also has a different status from the apparently parallel numerals in the previous verses. As previously noted, each riddling verse defines a god, but in this last verse the identity of the éke is not entirely clear: the Aṅgirases or Atri(s) have been suggested (see Geldner's note ad loc.). I would suggest instead that this verse now turns to the world of men by presenting the poets' self-identification. The poets themselves (or their ancestors) are the solution to this final riddle. They draw attention to their own creative activity (or that of their ancestors), and as often in final verses they make a sort of meta-reference to the rest of the hymn that precedes this announcement: it is this same hymn that they are chanting now. At the same time the rigid poetic parallel structure implicitly claims for the mortal poets the same status as the gods they have just celebrated, since they are numerically identified in the same type of riddle as the gods of verses 1–9. In favor of the view that human poets/ritualists are the subject of verse 10 is the presence of the words árcanta(ḥ). . . sā́ma "chanting . . . melody." Joining these two words in the same clause seems intended to evoke the technical terms ŕ̥c "verse" (of the R̥gveda) and the sā́man "melody" (of the Sāmaveda) to which it is set, major components of Vedic ritual utterance, and therefore to mark the event depicted as a contemporary ritual of the present Vedic community. "Causing the sun to shine" may ascribe a cosmogonic act to the original performance of the ritual, or (more likely in our view) simply suggest that the hymns uttered at the daily dawn ritual actually ensure the rising and shining of the sun, rather than simply celebrating it.

Thus the poem skillfully combines and balances architectonic structures with forward, developing movement, and does so in a remarkably economical package. The development is not only formal, for the order in which the gods are presented takes us from the here-and-now of the ritual ground (Soma and Agni), through the mythical space where gods perform deeds that have effects on men (Tvaṣṭar, Indra, Rudra, Pūṣan), to the airy and heavenly spaces (Viṣṇu, Aśvins and Sūryā, Mitra and Varuṇa), ending specifically "in heaven" (divi). Yet, despite all this clever machinery, the hymn wears its structure lightly, and the mechanisms that provide so much pleasure are essentially invisible to the audience.

1. Brown, this one is changeable, a spirited youth; he smears golden unguent on himself. [=Soma]
2. In the womb this one has sat down flashing, the wise one among the gods. [=Agni]
3. An axe this one bears in his hand—a metal one—he firmly founded among the gods. [=Tvaṣṭar]
4. A mace this one bears in his hand, set there; with it he keeps smashing obstacles. [=Indra]
5. A sharp thing this one bears in his hand, a weapon—he blazing, strong, with healing [?] remedies. [=Rudra]
6. The paths this one swells; like a thief he knows of hidden treasures. [=Pūṣan]
7. Three (strides) this one, wide-going, has stridden, to where the gods become exhilarated. [=Viṣṇu]
8. With the birds these two wander, along with the one (woman). They go abroad like exiles. [=Aśvins and Sūryā]
9. A seat these two made for themselves, the two highest in heaven, sovereign kings, whose potion is melted butter. [=Mitra and Varuṇa]
10. Chanting, these ones thought up a great melody. With it they caused the sun to shine. [=human poets]

VIII.30 (650) All Gods

Manu Vaivasvata
4 verses: gāyatrī 1, puraüṣṇih 2, bṛhatī 3, anuṣṭubh 4

The final hymn in this Viśve Devāḥ series consists of four verses in four different meters, though since they are all different combinations involving eight- and twelve-syllable pādas, the difference in meters is not jarring. Much more jarring—and, in our opinion, deliberately so—is the contrast between the slangy and popular register in verse 1 and the solemn, almost stilted rhetoric of the second verse, which explicitly represents itself as quoting the first one. The remaining two verses express conventional prayers for aid and protection, in much the same style as verse 2.

1. "Since there isn't a little runt among you, gods, nor a little kid, (you are) all just entirely great."
2. Thus shall you be praised, you who care for the stranger, who are the three and thirty, you gods who deserve the sacrifice of Manu.
3. Protect us; help us; speak on our behalf.
   Do not lead us far away from the path of the fathers, of the sons of Manu, into the distance.
4. O gods, all of you who are here and belonging to all men—to us hold out extensive shelter, and to our cattle and horse.

VIII.31 (651) Yajamāna + Patnī [Praise of Offering and Laud of the Sacrificer 1–4; Household 5–9; Blessings for the Household Pair 10–18]

Manu Vaivasvata
18 verses: gāyatrī 1–8, 10–13; anuṣṭubh 9, 14; paṅkti 15–18

This last hymn of the small Manu Vaivasvata collection shows its composite nature by its length, its mixture of meters, and, especially, by its themes. The first nine verses contain two parallel treatments of the same subject; verses 10–14 seem unconnected both with what precedes and what follows, and resemble some of the disordered All God sequences in earlier Manu Vaivasvata hymns (VIII.27.1–8 and VIII.28) in calling on an odd assortment of gods for protection; the final four verses (15–18) return to the topic of the beginning of the hymn, the benefits accruing to the punctilious sacrificer, though in rather general terms.

The beginning of the hymn, especially verses 5–9, are of extraordinary ritual interest, for they contain the only clear reference to the participation of the Sacrificer's Wife in R̥gvedic ritual—participation which is, in our view, a ritual innovation in the late R̥gveda. (For indirect references to her presence in R̥gvedic ritual, see Jamison 2011 and forthcoming a and b, and discussion ad VIII.33.) As the Anukramaṇī states, verses 5–9 are dedicated to the "household pair" (dámpatī), who are depicted as jointly participating in soma preparation (vs. 5). Their rewards are great and appropriately domestic (see esp. vs. 8). Indeed, the mention of the "milk-mixture" (āśír, vs. 5) makes it quite likely that the ritual depicted is the Third Pressing, itself likely a ritual innovation, found only among certain R̥gvedic clans, the pressing in which the participation of the Sacrificer's Wife is particularly prominent in later śrauta ritual (see Jamison 1996a: 126–46). The first four verses of the hymn mention only the Sacrificer, with no mention of the Wife, but a reference to the milk-mixture in verse 2 and to the benefits to his house (vs. 4) makes it likely that these four verses treat the same topic, though without the radical overt mention of the Wife.

The Anukramaṇī considers the final four verses (15–18) to be blessings for the same household pair (dampatyor āśiṣaḥ), but again there is no overt mention of the Wife, and, in contrast to verses 1–4 with its reference to the milk-mixture, the ritual that the successful sacrificer performed is left unclear.

1. Whoever will sacrifice for another and will also sacrifice for himself, who will press (soma) and will cook (the oblation), just that formulator will find pleasure of Indra.
2. Whoever will give the offering cake to him and the soma with its milk-mixture, able (Indra) will protect just him from difficult straits.
3. His chariot will be brilliant; god-sped, he will swell up, winning all (the things) of the enemy.
4. In his house inexhaustible Refreshment, possessed of offspring and milk-cows, gives milk day after day.
5. The household couple who with one mind press and rinse (the soma) with its own proper milk-mixture, o gods,
6. Those two go up against the puffed-up (rival pressers?); united they attain to the ritual grass.
   They do not fade out when prizes (are at stake).
7. Those two do not spurn the favor of the gods, nor seek to conceal it;
   they seek to win lofty fame.
8. Possessing sons, possessing children they attain a complete lifespan, both decorated with gold.
9. The two whose oblations are worth pursuing, divvying up goods, doing honor, for the sake of immortality, they slam together the hairy udder; they perform friendly service to the gods.

10. We would choose the shelter of the mountains, of the rivers, of Viṣṇu, who stays by.
11. Let Pūṣan come here, let Wealth, let Fortune, best establishing well-being and whole(ness), a broad road toward well-being.
12. (Let) Aramati [/Devotion] (come), (let) every unassailing one with the mind of a god, the faultless (gift?) of the Ādityas.
13. Just as Mitra, Aryaman, and Varuṇa are our protectors, (so) are the paths of truth, which are easy to travel.
14. Agni, the foremost god of the good ones do I invoke for you all with a hymn—
    (I and you all) serving him, dear to many, like an ally who brings success to the cultivated lands.

15. Quick is the chariot of the one with god on his side, or a champion in battles of every sort.
    – Just he who, as sacrificer, seeks to attain the mind of the gods will surpass non-sacrificers.
16. You suffer no harm, o sacrificer, nor do you, o presser, nor you, o seeker of the gods.
    – Just he who, as sacrificer, seeks to attain the mind of the gods will surpass non-sacrificers.
17. Because of his (ritual) work no one can catch up to him, nor send him away, nor keep him away.
    – Just he who, as sacrificer, seeks to attain the mind of the gods will surpass non-sacrificers.
18. There will be (a mass) of good heroes here and also (a mass) of swift horses.
    – Just he who, as sacrificer, seeks to attain the mind of the gods will surpass non-sacrificers.

Hymns 32–34 form a small collection, with all three hymns devoted to Indra, and frequently mentioning the Kaṇvas internally (and attributed by the Anukramaṇī to three different Kāṇva poets). See Oldenberg (1888: 215).

VIII.32 (652) Indra

Medhātithi Kāṇva
30 verses: gāyatrī, arranged for the most part in tṛ̥cas

The hymn begins with a call to the Kaṇva poets to praise Indra's great deeds, and the next two verses (2–3) provide a quick catalogue of Indra's victories over several of his lesser known opponents. This theme, with some of the same names/epithets, returns at the end of the hymn (esp. vss. 25–27). In between we find the usual twin exhortations to Indra—to come to our soma sacrifice (rather than that of others; see esp. vss. 21–22) and to give us wealth and aid. The reciprocal obligation of the sacrificers and the recipient of sacrifice is nicely expressed in verse 16, where Indra's debt to (other) sacrificers has been discharged by his countergift.

There is nothing of particular note in this hymn, though it is nicely executed. It also contains several hapaxes and words with apparently non-Indo-Aryan phonology, especially toward the beginning, that give it a slightly exotic air.

The internal structure of the hymn is not entirely clear. We follow Oldenberg's analysis, whereby the hymn consists of tṛ̥cas plus a final verse (30) save for verses 19–20, which form an incomplete tṛ̥ca with perhaps a verse missing. However, the tṛ̥cas thus identified show little internal unity.

1. O Kaṇvas, with a song proclaim (the deeds) of Indra of the silvery drink done in the exhilaration of soma,
2. Who smashed Sr̥binda (so he became) harmless, smashed Pipru the Dāsa puffed up like a snake [/Ahīśuva]— he the strong one letting flow the waters.
3. Undermine the topside of Arbuda, the height of the lofty one.
   You have done this manly deed, Indra.

4. To the famed one (bring) your (soma) boldly, like a torrent [?] from the mountain.
   I invoke him of good lips for help.
5. Having become exhilarated, you will split apart the enclosure of the cow, of the horse like a stronghold for your comrades in soma, o champion.
6. If you will take pleasure in my pressed (soma) or you will find delight in my solemn speech, from afar come near through your own power.

7. We praisers abide in you, o Indra with your longing for hymns.
   You drinker of the soma—quicken us.
8. And bring us food, granting it inexhaustible—many are your goods, liberal one—
9. And make us possessed of cows, of gold, of horses.
   Might we be clasped by refreshments.

10. We invoke him of stammering speech, of stout forearms, for help;
    (we invoke) him who creates success, for aid.
11. Who as "hundred-intentioned one" then carries them out in the concourse as Vr̥tra-smasher, while providing many goods for the singers, 12. He as "able one" will be able for us, he who has gifts and brings them near—Indra, with all his help.

13. He who is the great streambed of wealth, easy to cross, the partner of the presser—sing to that Indra,
14. The guider, the very steadfast one who wins fame in battles, lord over much by his strength.
15. No one can restrain his powers, his liberalities; no one can say, "he does not give."

16. There exists no debt to the formulators, nor to the puffed-up pressers now:

no soma has been drunk without a counter(gift).

17. Sing just to the admirable one, to the admirable one recite solemn words;
 perform sacred formulations just for the admirable one.
18. The admirable one will tear out hundreds, thousands (of goods)—he the unobstructable prizewinner,
 Indra, who is the strengthener of him who offers sacrifice.

19. Wander widely following your own power, following the invocations of the communities.
 Indra, drink of the pressings.
20. Drink of (the pressings) that have their own milk-cows, both (the pressing) at the son of Tugra's [=Bhujyu] and this one right here, which is yours, Indra.

21. Pass over him who presses with rage, the one who has pressed in violation.
 This one here—drink this pressed gift.
22. Pass through the three distant realms; pass over the five peoples, keeping watch over the nourishing streams, o Indra.
23. Like the sun its ray, let loose your rein. Let my hymns guide you here
 like waters, converging, to the deep.

24. Adhvaryu! Pour out the soma for the belipped hero.
 Bring of the pressing (for him) to drink.
25. Who split the bolt of the water and released the rivers downward,
 who fixed the cooked (milk) fast in the cows,
26. He who is equal to song smashed Vr̥tra, (smashed) the spider's son [/Aurṇavābha] and the one puffed up like a snake [/Ahīśuva].
 With snow [/an icicle?] he pierced Arbuda.

27. To the strong one who lays low, the invincible victor, sing your god-given formulation—
28. Who in the exhilaration of the soma stalk oversees all commandments among the gods—Indra.
29. Hither let these two feasting companions, the pair of fallow bays with golden manes,
 convey (you) to the pleasure set out (for you).

30. The fallow bays, praised by Priyamedha, will convey you near, much praised one, for soma-drinking.

VIII.33 (653) Indra

Medhyātithi Kāṇva
19 verses: br̥hatī arranged in tr̥cas 1–15, gāyatrī 16–18, anuṣṭubh 19

For most of its length (through vs. 15), this is an unremarkable hymn to Indra, with the usual invitations to him to attend our soma sacrifice along with praise of his overwhelming strength and requests for his bounty. Indra's "resolve" (-krátu) is frequently mentioned (vss. 5, 6, 11, 13, 14).

The last four verses (16–19), in a different meter, are also entirely different in tone and intent and have given rise to multiple interpretations—especially the final taunt (19d): "You, a brahmin, have become a woman." Our view of this tantalizingly opaque sequence is that it concerns the introduction of the Sacrificer's Wife into the performance of solemn ritual, an introduction celebrated in the nearby hymn VIII.31 (see remarks there). But, unlike the situation in VIII.31, the poet of VIII.33 displays a conservative opposition to this ritual innovation, an innovation that he nonetheless ascribes to Indra's leadership. In verse 16 the poet complains that an unnamed ritualist no longer listens to the instructions of his fellow ritualists but only to Indra's. In verses 17 and 18 Indra speaks, and though he at first disparages women's intellect (vs. 17), he asserts that a sacrifice directed by a complementary pair (mithunā́, a word often used explicitly of a sexual couple) is especially successful (with implicit contrast to the older model without female participation)—while at the same time suggesting that the husband should keep the upper hand (or upper chariot-pole: the common metaphor of sacrifice as chariot is in play). The final verse is, in our view, spoken by the jaundiced poet himself. In the first three pādas he mocks his ritually innovative colleague by pretending to be a mother inculcating proper feminine behavior into her little daughter. The language is both slangy and heavily diminutivized, and the crucial noun in pāda c, the dual kaśaplakaú, is a hapax and unclear, though it may well refer to female genitalia. He then announces his reasons for this mockery: the innovative colleague, by favoring women's ritual participation, risks being tainted by the female presence and becoming a woman himself. (Such charges have frequently been directed at men who favor women's rights, at least since the time of John Stuart Mill.) For more detailed discussion, see Jamison (forthcoming a and 2011).

It is not entirely clear why this curious sequence is found tacked onto an otherwise ordinary Indra hymn. It occupies the position often taken by a dānastuti, and of course dānastutis often display a linguistic register similar to what is found here, slangy and colloquial vocabulary, syntactically informal direct speech, and sexual innuendo. It has been suggested that it is a sort of anti-dānastuti, a "satire" in the technical sense. This is an appealing explanation for its position in the hymn, but with the proviso that, at least in our interpretation, the target of the satire is clearly not the poet's patron (stingy or not), but a fellow ritualist.

1. We who are provided with pressings, with the twisted ritual grass, like waters

at the outpourings of the strainer, take our seats around you, Vṛtra-smasher, as praisers.

2. The men provided with hymns cry out to you exclusively when (soma) is pressed, o good one.
When will you come thirsting here to our house, to our pressed (soma), Indra, like a buffalo following its own track?

3. With the Kaṇvas, bold one, you will boldly tear out a prize worth a thousand.
We beg for a tawny-formed (prize) consisting of cattle—right away, o unbounded bounteous one.

4. "Drink!"—sing (thus) to Indra, at the exhilaration of the stalk, o Medhyātithi, to the mace-wielder, who is linked with the two fallow bays, who, when (soma) is pressed, is a golden chariot,

5. Who has a good left (horse) and a good right one, the strong one, who is hymned as the one of good resolve, who distributes thousands, who has a hundred bounties, Indra, who is acknowledged as the stronghold-splitter,

6. Who is audacious, who is unobstructable, who is embedded within his beard, possessing extensive brilliance, rouser, much praised, in his resolve strong like an ox.

7. Who recognizes him when he drinks when (the soma) is pressed? What vigor has he assumed?
This is the one who splits strongholds with strength, the belipped one getting exhilarated from the stalk.

8. Like a wild elephant he has established his wandering [=his territory] in many places, through his giving.
No one will restrain you; you will come here to the pressed (soma); great, you wander about in your strength.

9. Though being strong, unprostratable, steadfast, perfected for battle, if the bounteous one will hear the call of a praiser, Indra will not stay away. He will come here.

10. This is truly so: you alone are the bull for us, with the speed of a bull, unobstructable—for as a bull, strong one, you are famed in the distance, as a bull famed nearby.

11. Bullish are your reins, bullish your golden whip; bullish is your chariot, bounteous one, bullish your two fallow bays; a bull are you of a hundred resolves.

12. Let the bullish presser press for you; o bull, flying straight—bring (prizes) here.

The bull has run to the bull in the waters. It [=soma] is for you, o mounter of the fallow bays.

13. Drive here, most powerful Indra, to drink the somian honey;
as bounteous one, (drive) on your own to the landing site. He of good resolve will listen to the songs, the sacred formulations, and the hymns.
14. You who bestride the chariot—let the fallow bays, yoked to the chariot, convey you hither, even across what belongs to the stranger, across the pressings that belong to others, you Vṛtra-smasher of a hundred resolves.
15. Set our praise today nearest to yourself, you greatly great one;
let our pressings be most availing to you for exhilaration, you heaven-ruling soma-drinker.

16. [Poet:] He finds no pleasure in the instruction of you or me, (but only in that) of the other one [=Indra], the hero who led us hither.
17. Indra said just this, "the mind of woman is not to be instructed, and her will is fickle.
18. [Indra, cont'd:] "(Nonetheless,) it's the twin span, the complementary pair [/married couple], aroused to exuberance, that draws the chariot [=sacrifice]; but even so the chariot-pole of the bull [=husband] is higher."
19. [Poet:] " 'Keep your eyes to yourself: look below, not above. Bring your two little feet closer together:
don't let them see your two little "lips" [?].' For you, a brahmin, have turned into a woman!"

VIII.34 (654) Indra

Nīpātithi Kāṇva (1–15), the thousand ṛṣis of Vasurocis Āṅgirasa (16–18)
18 verses: anuṣṭubh 1–15, gāyatrī 16–18, arranged in tṛcas

The first fifteen verses of this hymn show a rigid formal structure that is awkward to convey in translation. The second half of each verse consists of a refrain, which implicitly contrasts with the first half of each verse. The refrain addresses an unidentified plural "you," who have driven to heaven and command heaven; we consider the "you" to refer to the other gods, as contrasted with Indra, or perhaps specifically to the Maruts. Most of the first half-verses begin with the preverb ā́ "here" and generally call upon Indra to drive here (using the same verb as in the refrain) and participate in the sacrifice. Thus Indra's desired presence "here" is the constant counterweight to the removal of the other gods to heaven.

The other part of the refrain is a curious vocative, clearly addressed to Indra, divā-vasu "you who (bring) goods by day," found only here and of odd formation. The motivation for this form becomes clear in the dānastuti (vss. 16–18), where the patron's name is given as Vasu-rocis (vs. 16) "whose light is goods": Indra's epithet divā-vasu is a pun on and a metathesis of this name, with the vásu "goods" element reversed and rocís "light" replaced by dívā "by day." The similarity between this name and the relentlessly repeated epithet of Indra establishes an implicit identification between the human patron and Indra; even more strikingly, verse 16 asserts that the poet and the god Indra have jointly received rich goods from Vasurocis, so that even Indra is presented as a beneficiary of the largesse of Vasurocis.

The formal structure of the hymn continues to its very end: the final word of the hymn is the signature ā́ "here," which also began it.

1. Here—Indra, drive here with your fallow bays, up to the lovely praise of Kaṇva,
   o you who bring goods by day—(though) you (other gods), who impose order over yonder heaven, have driven off to heaven.
2. Here—let the soma-possessing pressing stone as it speaks hold you here with its cry,
   o you who bring goods by day—(though) you (other gods), who impose order over yonder heaven, have driven off to heaven.
3. In this place their felly shakes itself, as a wolf does a lamb,
   o you who bring goods by day—(though) you (other gods), who impose order over yonder heaven, have driven off to heaven.

4. Here—the Kaṇvas call you here for help, for prizewinning,
   o you who bring goods by day—(though) you (other gods), who impose order over yonder heaven, have driven off to heaven.
5. I set out the first drinking of the pressings for you, as if for a bull,
   o you who bring goods by day—(though) you (other gods), who impose order over yonder heaven, have driven off to heaven.
6. Along with Plenitude come here to us, as one whose vision is everywhere, for our help,
   o you who bring goods by day—(though) you (other gods), who impose order over yonder heaven, have driven off to heaven.

7. Here—drive here to us, you of great thought, of a thousand forms of help, a hundred bounties,
   o you who bring goods by day—(though) you (other gods), who impose order over yonder heaven, have driven off to heaven.
8. Here will the Hotar convey you—he installed by Manu, to be invoked among the gods [=Agni],
   o you who bring goods by day—(though) you (other gods), who impose order over yonder heaven, have driven off to heaven.

9. Here will the pair of fallow bays, aroused to exuberance, convey you, as its two wings convey a falcon,
o you who bring goods by day—(though) you (other gods), who impose order over yonder heaven, have driven off to heaven.

10. Here—drive here, away from the stranger—hail!—to drink of the soma,
o you who bring goods by day—(though) you (other gods), who impose order over yonder heaven, have driven off to heaven.
11. Here—drive here to us to listen; take pleasure in the hymns here,
o you who bring goods by day—(though) you (other gods), who impose order over yonder heaven, have driven off to heaven.
12. Come here to us with your fully equipped (horses) of like form, o you who possess fully equipped horses,
o you who bring goods by day—(though) you (other gods), who impose order over yonder heaven, have driven off to heaven.

13. Here—drive here from the mountains, from the surface of the sea,
o you who bring goods by day—(though) you (other gods), who impose order over yonder heaven, have driven off to heaven.
14. Here—keep breaking out for us bovine and equine (wealth) in thousands, o champion,
o you who bring goods by day—(though) you (other gods), who impose order over yonder heaven, have driven off to heaven.
15. Here—bring (it) here to us in thousands, bring ten thousands and hundreds,
o you who bring goods by day—(though) you (other gods), who impose order over yonder heaven, have driven off to heaven.

16. Here—when Indra and I took from Vasurocis [/him whose light is goods] a thousand strongest equine livestock, 17. The silvery ones whose speed is the wind's, the reddish ones, quick-streaming, which shine like suns,
18. Amid the gifts of Pārāvata [/the one from afar (=Indra?)], amid the swift (chariots) with speeding wheels,
I mounted on the middle of the wood(en chariot?) here.

The next four hymns (VIII.35–38) are attributed to Śyāvāśva Ātreya, whose Marut cycle in Maṇḍala V (52–61) is one of the glories of that dazzling book, and who is also the composer of a single hymn in the Soma Maṇḍala (IX.32).

VIII.35 (655) Aśvins

Śyāvāśva Ātreya
24 verses: pariṣṭājjyotis, except paṅkti 22, 24 and mahābṛhatī 24, arranged in tṛcas.

The Anukramaṇī's attribution of this hymn to Śyāvāśva is supported by his self-reference in verses 19–21 and his reference to his ancestor Atri in verse 19, but the virtuosity so characteristic of Śyāvāśva's Marut hymns in Maṇḍala V is not on display here. This long hymn may be one of the most repetitive in the Ṛgveda. In the first twenty-one verses the c-pāda is identical, and the tṛcas making up the hymn all have refrains encompassing at least the second half-verse (pādas cd: vss. 1–3; pādas cde: vss. 22–24) and usually the second (b) pāda as well (bcd: vss. 4–6, 7–9, 10–12, 13–15, 16–18, 19–21). This leaves the first (a) pāda as the only locus of variation in each tṛca, and even that variation is patterned and under strict control. Moreover, the contents and phraseology of the individual tṛcas do not differ significantly one from another—urging the Aśvins to come to the sacrifice with numerous other gods and to partake of our offerings while providing us with gifts and aid in return. The repetitive structure has an incantatory effect, but it does not challenge the decoding skills of the audience.

The most interesting tṛca consists of verses 16–18. As a number of others have pointed out, these three verses, asking the Aśvins to "quicken" or "animate" various things for us, are appropriate to the three varṇas in turn: verse 16 to the brahmin, 17 to the kṣatriya, and 18 to the vaiśya. In fact, verse 16 begins with the word bráhma, while 17 begins with kṣatrám. In 16 we ask for the Aśvins' aid for ritual and priestly elements, in 17 for elements related to kingly and martial power, and in 18 for our livestock and people. As is well known, the varṇa system is not a prominent feature of the Ṛgveda and may well only be taking shape in this period, but this small collection of Śyāvāśva hymns displays it clearly—not only in this tṛca, but in the next two twinned hymns (36 and 37) with their reference to bráhman and kṣatrá respectively.

1. With Agni, Indra, Varuṇa, and Viṣṇu, with the Ādityas, the Rudras, and the Vasus,

18. Quicken our cows and quicken our clans. – Smite demons; keep away diseases.
In concert with Dawn and the Sun, (drink) the soma of the presser, o Aśvins.

19. As if to Atri's, listen to the first praise hymn of the presser Śyāvāśva, o you roused to exuberance.
– In concert with Dawn and the Sun, o Aśvins, (drink) the (soma) aged overnight.
20. Like gushes (of water), send gushing the good praise hymns of the presser Śyāvāśva, o you roused to exuberance.
– In concert with Dawn and the Sun, o Aśvins, (drink) the (soma) aged overnight.
21. Control the rites of the presser Śyāvāśva like reins, o you roused to exuberance.
– In concert with Dawn and the Sun, o Aśvins, (drink) the (soma) aged overnight.

22. Stop your chariot nearby. Drink the somian honey.
– Drive here, o Aśvins; come here. Seeking help, I call to you: provide riches for the pious man.
23. When the speech of reverence is set forth and the rite set forth, o men, in order to drink of the strengthening (soma), drive here, o Aśvins; come here. Seeking help, I call to you: provide riches for the pious man.
24. Satiate yourselves on the pressed plant prepared with the svāhā-call, o gods.
– Drive here, o Aśvins; come here. Seeking help, I call to you: provide riches for the pious man.

VIII.36 (656) Indra

Śyāvāśva Ātreya
7 verses: śakvarī, except mahāpaṅkti 7

Despite the length and elaboration of the meter—a śakvarī verse consists of fifty-six syllables arranged in at least six pādas (for Oldenberg seven)—most of each of the first six verses in this hymn consists of refrain; only the first pāda, of twelve syllables, varies in each verse. This structure is almost identical to that of the preceding hymn (VIII.35).

This hymn and the following one, VIII.37, although in different (but related) meters, are twinned conceptions. Both are seven verses long; both devote most of the first six verses to refrain, reserving only the first pāda of each verse for new material. The final verses of both hymns are almost identical save for a few lexical variants, the most important of which is the correspondence between bráhmāṇi "priestly formulations" in VIII.36.7 and kṣatrā́ṇi "lordly powers" in VIII.37.7. This correspondence suggests that the hymns were designed as appropriate to brahmins and kṣatriyas respectively, and though the formalized doctrine of the three twice-born varṇas seems to be taking shape only in the late R̥gveda (see especially the Puruṣasūkta, X.90.11–12), it is surely no accident, as Oldenberg points out (Noten ad loc.), that this same group of Śyāvāśva hymns contains a tripartite blessing clearly referring to the three upper varṇas (VIII.35.16–18). Nonetheless in this hymn there seems little that is specifically applicable to the brahmin and only to him, and indeed the strong emphasis on victory in the refrain would seem more a warrior than a priestly preoccupation.

Since Śyāvāśva is best known for his Marut cycle in the Vth Maṇḍala (V.52–61), it is entirely appropriate that Indra is "accompanied by the Maruts" in this refrain. Śyāvāśva's ancestors the Atris (note his patronymic Ātreya) are also glorified in this hymn (vss. 6–7); the Atris are, of course, more at home in their own family maṇḍala, V, than in VIII.

1. You are the helper of the one who presses (soma) and twists the ritual grass.
   – O you of a hundred resolves, for exhilaration drink the soma that they fixed as your portion—
   you winning all battles, (winning) the broad expanse, entirely victorious amid the waters, accompanied by the Maruts, o Indra, master of settlements.
2. Help the praiser further, bounteous one; help yourself.
   – O you of a hundred resolves, for exhilaration drink the soma that they fixed as your portion—
   you winning all battles, (winning) the broad expanse, entirely victorious amid the waters, accompanied by the Maruts, o Indra, master of settlements.
3. With nourishment you help the gods, with strength you help yourself.
   – O you of a hundred resolves, for exhilaration drink the soma that they fixed as your portion—
   you winning all battles, (winning) the broad expanse, entirely victorious amid the waters, accompanied by the Maruts, o Indra, master of settlements.

4. Begetter of heaven, begetter of earth—
   – o you of a hundred resolves, for exhilaration drink the soma that they fixed as your portion—
   you winning all battles, (winning) the broad expanse, entirely victorious amid the waters, accompanied by the Maruts, o Indra, master of settlements.
5. Begetter of horses, begetter of cows are you.
   – O you of a hundred resolves, for exhilaration drink the soma that they fixed as your portion—
   you winning all battles, (winning) the broad expanse, entirely victorious amid the waters, accompanied by the Maruts, o Indra, master of settlements.
6. Make the praise of the Atris great, o you of the (pressing) stone.
   – O you of a hundred resolves, for exhilaration drink the soma that they fixed as your portion—
   you winning all battles, (winning) the broad expanse, entirely victorious amid the waters, accompanied by the Maruts, o Indra, master of settlements.
7. Listen to Śyāvāśva as he presses (soma), just as you listened to Atri as he performed (ritual) acts.
   Alone, you helped Trasadasyu in the conquering of men, Indra, strengthening the priestly formulations.

VIII.37 (657) Indra

Śyāvāśva Ātreya
7 verses: mahāpaṅkti, except atijagatī 1

For the relationship between this hymn and its twin, VIII.36, see the introduction to the previous hymn. As discussed there, the final verse (7) of this hymn with its reference to kṣatrā́ṇi "lordly powers" (as opposed to the "priestly formulations" of VIII.36.7) puts the hymn in the domain of the kṣatriya varṇa. Unlike the previous hymn, where the brahmanical aspect is muted at best, this hymn does present a kingly and martial profile in the variant material in the first pādas of verses 2–6.

1. You furthered this priestly formulation at the overcoming of obstacles, furthered (the formulation) of the presser—
   – you lord of power, Indra, with all help—at the Midday Pressing, irreproachable Vr̥tra-smasher, drink of the soma, possessor of the mace.
2. Winning battles against deceits, strong one—
   – you lord of power, Indra, with all help—at the Midday Pressing, irreproachable Vr̥tra-smasher, drink of the soma, possessor of the mace.

3. As lone king do you rule over this creation—
   – you lord of power, Indra, with all help—at the Midday Pressing, irreproachable Vṛtra-smasher, drink of the soma, possessor of the mace.
4. You, just alone, keep apart the two (hosts) in confrontation—
   – you lord of power, Indra, with all help—at the Midday Pressing, irreproachable Vṛtra-smasher, drink of the soma, possessor of the mace.
5. Over both peace and hitching up (for war) you are master—
   – you lord of power, Indra, with all help—at the Midday Pressing, irreproachable Vṛtra-smasher, drink of the soma, possessor of the mace.
6. You help one to lordly power, you did not help another—
   – you lord of power, Indra, with all help—at the Midday Pressing, irreproachable Vṛtra-smasher, drink of the soma, possessor of the mace.
7. Listen to Śyāvāśva as he "rasps," just as you listened to Atri as he performed (ritual) acts.
   Alone, you helped Trasadasyu in the conquering of men, Indra, strengthening the lordly powers.

VIII.38 (658) Indra and Agni

Śyāvāśva Ātreya
10 verses: gāyatrī, arranged in tṛcas

This simple hymn is defined by its structure. Each of the three tṛcas has a different refrain, though each of the refrains begins with the vocative dual dvandva índrāgnī "o Indra and Agni." The final verse (10) breaks the pattern, though the same dvandva is found, pāda-initial, in the genitive. In content the hymn is entirely devoted to the soma sacrifice and the poet's invitation to the two gods to come and enjoy it. The poet names himself in verse 9 and summarizes his poetic activity in the past tense. Such a summary is ordinarily found in the absolute final verse of hymns, but here it is capped by the pattern-breaking verse 10.

As often in hymns dedicated jointly to these two gods, who share little in terms of activities and attributes, they are either described in general terms or with epithets related to one or the other—for example, in verse 1 it is technically only Agni who is a "regular offerer of sacrifice" (ṛtvíj), while Indra is more appropriately the victor in prize contests (vā́jeṣu) than Agni. The third term in that verse, kármasu "in acts/deeds," is ambiguous, however, since kárman is regularly used both of the types of heroic deeds associated with Indra and with ritual acts more commonly ascribed to Agni.

1. Because you two are regular offerers of the sacrifice, winners in prize-contests and in (cultic/heroic) acts,
   – Indra and Agni, take note of this.
2. Streaming, driving on the same chariot, Vṛtra-smashing, invincible—
   – Indra and Agni, take note of this.
3. Here is the exhilarating honey for you two—the men have milked it out with stones.
   – Indra and Agni, take note of this.

4. Enjoy this sacrifice to your liking, (enjoy) the pressed soma, you jointly praised ones.
   – Indra and Agni, come here, men.
5. Enjoy these pressings here, because of which you conveyed the oblations.
   – Indra and Agni, come here, men.
6. This "turn" of song enjoy, my lovely praise.
   – Indra and Agni, come here, men.

7. Along with the early-traveling gods come here, you two of noble goods,
   – Indra and Agni, for soma-drinking.
8. Listen to (soma-)pressing Śyāvāśva, (as you did) to the call of the Atris—
   – Indra and Agni, for soma-drinking.
9. Thus did I call upon you two for help, just as the wise ones called—
   – Indra and Agni, for soma-drinking.

10. Here do I choose the help of Indra and Agni in company with Sarasvatī,
    the two for whom the song is recited.

The following group of hymns, VIII.39–42, is attributed to Nābhāka Kāṇva, who names himself several times in VIII.40 and 41. The group is characterized by the slangy refrain that puns on his name, nábhantām anyaké same "let all the other squirts burst!" The poet is also partial to the mahāpaṅkti meter, found in VIII.39–41.

VIII.39 (659) Agni

Nābhāka Kāṇva
10 verses: mahāpaṅkti

Agni's role as messenger between heaven and earth and as mediator between gods and men is particularly emphasized in this hymn. And, in addition to his usual ritual role, his identity as poet is also mentioned several times (see esp. vss. 1, 7, 9). The hymn contains an example of the well-known trope of "pouring prayers" (vs. 3), and in the middle of the hymn we find a pun on one of Agni's standard epithets Jāta-vedas, in verse 6 where it is said that he "knows" (veda) the "races" (jātā́) of gods and men.

The hymn in general has a benign tone and high discourse level, and so the flippantly bloodthirsty refrain rests oddly in it. Only in verse 2 does it fit the contents, and even there the linguistic register is quite distinct between the verse proper and the refrain.

The poet handles the six-pāda structure of the mahāpaṅkti flexibly. The last pāda of each verse is the Nabhāka refrain. Otherwise the first two pādas (ab) and the fourth and fifth (de) pādas each group together, while the third pāda (c) belongs sometimes with ab (generally in the first part of the hymn) and sometimes with de (toward the end, vss. 7–9).

1. Agni have I praised, worthy of verses, Agni to be worshiped with invocation. Let Agni anoint the gods for us, for the sage poet acts as messenger between both (cosmic) divisions [=heaven and earth].
   – Let all the other squirts burst!
2. O Agni, (set) down on their [=gods'] bodies a laud with our newer speech. (Put) down the hostilities of the hostile ones.
   Let all the hostilities of the stranger, the hindrances keep away from here.
   – Let all the other squirts burst!
3. O Agni, prayers to you I pour like ghee into your mouth. Be the discerning one among the gods, for you are the foremost gracious messenger of Vivasvant.
   – Let all the other squirts burst!
4. Every kind of vigor does Agni acquire, even as (soon as) he longs for it—his oblation is the nourishment of the good ones—he acquires luck and lifetime, acquires joy, for every invocation of the gods.
   – Let all the other squirts burst!
5. Agni shows brightly through his very mighty, bright (ritual) action. He is Hotar of each and every (clan).
   He is decked out with gift-cows, and he impels (them) to the (gift-) reception.
   – Let all the other squirts burst!
6. Agni knows the races of the gods, Agni (those) of mortals: (this is his) secret name [=Jātavedas]. Agni is the giver of treasure.
   Agni opens the doors, when well bepoured with a newer (speech).
   – Let all the other squirts burst!
7. Agni is joined with goods among the gods, among the clans devoted to sacrifice.
   With delight he fosters the many poetic arts, as the earth (fosters) everything—the god devoted to sacrifice among the gods.
   – Let all the other squirts burst!

8. Agni, who, belonging to the seven human (divisions), is fixed amid all the rivers—to him have we come—the one with three dwellings, the best smasher of Dasyus for Mandhātar, Agni foremost in the sacrifices.
   – Let all the other squirts burst!
9. Agni inhabits the three (cosmic) divisions with their three parts, as sage poet.
   He will sacrifice to the thrice eleven (gods) here and please them for us, as inspired poet and messenger, when he has been prepared.
   –Let all the other squirts burst!
10. You, foremost Agni, among the Āyus, among the gods, alone have control over goods for us.
    Around you do the swirling waters circle, which are their own bridges.
    – Let all the other squirts burst!

VIII.40 (660) Indra and Agni

Nābhāka Kāṇva
12 verses: mahāpaṅkti, except śakvarī 2 and triṣṭubh 12

Unlike many Indra and Agni hymns, in this one the two divinities achieve some measure of independence, with the more significant role falling to Indra, who is mentioned alone in several verses, in part or wholly (2, 5, 6, 9, 10). Much of the content is martial, appropriate to Indra, and also more appropriate to the Nābhāka refrain than any other of the Nābhāka hymns. The freeing and winning of the waters is celebrated several times (vss. 5, 8, 10/11). There are several paired verses: 4 and 5 where Nābhāka is mentioned by name, and 10/11, the first to Indra, the second, almost identical, to Agni. The hymn ends with a verse in a different meter, without the refrain, that summarizes the hymn that precedes, as is often the case.

1. O Indra and Agni, victorious ones—you two will give us wealth, by which we might become victorious over the strongholds, even the firm ones, in the combats, as Agni (is victorious) over the woods especially when there is wind.
   – Let all the other squirts burst!
2. For we do not stick you two together in a hole. But we sacrifice to Indra especially as strongest man among men.
   He will come here to us sometime with his steed to win the prize; he will come here to win wisdom.
   – Let all the other squirts burst!
3. For these two, Indra and Agni, preside amid battle-raids.
   You two, sage poets through your poetic skill, on being asked, realize the visionary thought for the one seeking your companionship, o men.
   – Let all the other squirts burst!

4. Like Nabhāka recite to Indra and Agni with a worshipful song, the two to whom this whole moving world belongs, whose goods this heaven and the great earth bear in their lap.
– Let all the other squirts burst!
5. Like Nabhāka, direct sacred formulations to Indra and Agni, the two who opened up the flood with its seven (stream)beds, with its sloping banks—Indra, showing mastery through his strength.
– Let all the other squirts burst!
6. Hew (him) apart in the age-old way, like the tangle of a vine; weaken the strength of the Dāsa.
Might we then take a share in his goods, brought together by Indra.
– Let all the other squirts burst!
7. When these peoples here vie in invoking Indra and Agni with song at length, with our men might we overcome those doing battle, might we win against those eager to win.
– Let all the other squirts burst!
8. The two bright ones [=sun and moon], who (come) down from heaven and will proceed upward every day,
(they do so) following the commandment of Indra and Agni; following the commandment of Indra and Agni the rivers go driving, those which the two [=Indra and Agni] freed from bondage.
– Let all the other squirts burst!
9. Many are your distributions (of goods to us), Indra, and many our encomia to you, o son of impulsion, possessor of fallow bays—(many) the infusions of goods of the hero [=Indra], (and many) our visionary thoughts, which now reach their goal.
– Let all the other squirts burst!
10. Hone him [=Indra] with well-twisted (hymns)—the turbulent one, the "real thing," worthy of verses.
And he who even now will split the "eggs" of Śuṣṇa with his strength, he will conquer the waters along with the sun.
– Let all the other squirts burst!
11. Hone him [=Agni] affording good ceremonies, the "real thing" really there at the proper season.
And he who even now is solemnly proclaimed (as the one) who will split the "eggs" of Śuṣṇa, he has conquered the waters along with the sun.
– Let all the other squirts burst!
12. Thus to Indra and Agni, in the manner of the ancestors, of Mandhātar, of Aṅgiras, a newer (speech) has just been spoken.
With tripartite shelter protect us; may we be lords of riches.

VIII.41 (661) Varuṇa

Nābhāka Kāṇva
10 verses: mahāpaṅkti

A mystical hymn dedicated to Varuṇa alone, celebrating the god as cosmogonic creator and shaper of the world—both spatially, by measuring out the primordial cosmic domains and holding down and apart the cosmic realms (esp. vss. 4, 10), and temporally, by regulating the nights and days (vss. 3, 10). The sun and moon as his deputies function at the intersection of the spatial and temporal (vs. 9). The god is also presented as holding both human and natural phenomena within his encompassing physical protection (vss. 1cd, 3ac, 4de, 7abc).

The hymn seems to have a loose omphalos structure. Verbal correspondences in verses 2/9 (especially the "seven") and 3/8 (ní √dhā "deposit" and feminine plurals) provide a weak ring (see also the "three" in vss. 3/9 and "embrace" [pári √svaj] and "envelop" [pári √mr̥ś] 3/7). And the two middle verses, 5–6, the omphalos proper, point to the hymn's cryptic message—the creative power of poetry and of the knowledge and control of words, especially names.

Varuṇa's later association with the waters is evident in several hints in the hymn: his closeness to the rivers in 2d, who are also his seven sisters in 2e and the seven over which he has control in 9e, and his identification as "a secret sea" in 8a. The waters may well be the referents of the unidentified feminine plurals in 7a and 8c.

Much remains unclear in this hymn, however, and we do not claim to have penetrated all its many mysteries. One of the most obvious, but perhaps least interesting, puzzles is the relevance of the jaunty and bloodthirsty Nābhāka refrain to the high-minded and solemn contents of the hymn.

1. Chant to this one for him to prevail—to Varuṇa, and to the Maruts, the very wise ones—(Varuṇa,) who guards the insights of the sons of Manu like the cows of a herd.
   – Let all the other squirts burst!
2. (Chant to) him in the same way with a hymn, with the composed thoughts of our forefathers, and with the panegyrics of Nābhāka—(him,) who is nearby at the rising of the rivers, having seven sisters he is in the middle (of them).
   – Let all the other squirts burst!
3. He holds the nights in his embrace; by his magic art he deposited the ruddy (dawns). He (holds) everything in his embrace—the one lovely to see.
   Following his commandment, his trackers [=nights?] increased the three dawns.
   – Let all the other squirts burst!

4. Who is the one who fastened the peaks down upon the earth—the one lovely to see—he was the measurer of the primordial place.
   That is the leadership of Varuṇa, for he is like an energetic herdsman.
   – Let all the other squirts burst!
5. Who is the upholder of the worlds, who knows the secret names of the ruddy (dawns), their hidden names, he is a poet who fosters the many poetic arts, as heaven does its (concrete) form [=sun].
   – Let all the other squirts burst!
6. In whom are fixed all poetic arts—(he is) like the nave in a wheel. Do honor to Trita [/the third one] with alacrity.
   Like oxen in a pen to be yoked together, they have yoked the horses for yoking.
   – Let all the other squirts burst!
7. Who lies on these [fem. =the waters?] (like) a cloak, while enveloping all the created things of these [masc. =the gods?] and their domains—in Varuṇa's household, in front (of him), are all the gods, following his commandment.
   – Let all the other squirts burst!
8. A secret sea, powerful, he mounts as if to heaven, when he has deposited the ritual formula in them [=waters?].
   He scattered the magic arts with his ray as his foot, as he mounted to the celestial vault.
   – Let all the other squirts burst!
9. Whose two bright, wide-gazing ones [=sun and moon] preside over the three earths, and three times have filled the higher (seats)— steadfast is the seat of Varuṇa. He has control over the seven (rivers?).
   – Let all the other squirts burst!
10. Who made the bright (days) and black (nights) becloaked following his commandments, he measured out the primordial domain—he who with his prop held apart the two world-halves, as Aja (Ekapad) held up heaven.
    – Let all the other squirts burst!

VIII.42 (662) Varuṇa (1–3), the Aśvins (4–6)

Arcanānas or Nābhāka Kāṇva
6 verses: triṣṭubh 1–3, anuṣṭubh 4–6

This last hymn of the Nābhāka series is actually two hymns, on the grounds both of meter and of subject matter, as Oldenberg clearly states (1888: 213 n. 2). The first three verses, in triṣṭubh, are dedicated to Varuṇa. They continue the solemn tone and the cosmic focus of the previous hymn to Varuṇa (VIII.41), but with none of the complexities. The Aśvins are the target of the second three verses (4–6), in a simple invitation to soma-drinking. The Nābhāka refrain is found only in this second hymnlet.

1. He propped up heaven—the lord who possesses all possessions—he measured out the expanse of the earth;
   the sovereign king made all the living worlds his seat. All these are the commandments of Varuṇa.
2. Extol lofty Varuṇa thus: offer reverence to the insightful herdsman of the immortal.
   He will extend to us shelter providing threefold defense. Protect us in your lap, o Heaven and Earth.
3. Sharpen the will and skill of the man who puts his best into this insightful thought, o god Varuṇa.
   Might we board a boat that provides a good crossing, by which we might cross beyond all difficulties.

4. The pressing stones, inspired poets, have roused you two, o Aśvins, with their insightful thoughts, for you to drink the soma, o Nāsatyas.
   – Let all the other squirts burst!
5. Just as the inspired Atri kept calling to you two, Aśvins, with his hymns, for you to drink the soma, o Nāsatyas.
   – Let all the other squirts burst!
6. In just this way have I called to you two for help, just as the wise have called,
   for you to drink the soma, o Nāsatyas.
   – Let all the other squirts burst!

As Oldenberg remarks (1888: 216), on the basis of agreements in lexicon, phraseology, and style it is likely that VIII.43–48 form a group, though they are not all attributed to the same poet.

VIII.43 (663) Agni

Virūpa Āṅgirasa
33 verses: gāyatrī, most likely arranged in tr̥cas

Though it is likely that this hymn is constructed of tr̥cas, there is little overt unity within the tr̥cas. On the surface the hymn is a pleasant but generally unremarkable praise of Agni. His ritual functions are showcased throughout, and toward the end the "we" of the poet and his fellow sacrificers invoke him more and more insistently in this role. But earlier in the hymn there is some nice naturalistic description of fire and fires (vss. 3–10). In verses 14 and 16 the poet emphasizes the kinship between himself and Agni as poet.

Another thematic strain evident in the hymn and asserting itself more and more toward the end is the role of Agni as a unifying focus of various clans and settlements in the larger Ārya community. In several early verses multiple fires are kindled at once (vss. 4–5). In light of later parts of the hymn, these can be interpreted as the separate family or clan fires, which are later joined conceptually in the single fire to which all the separate groups give allegiance (see esp. vs. 18, also 27, 29). This single fire, found in multiple places but shared by all the clans, is invoked for help in combat in verse 21. Agni's competitive (vss. 20, 25), martial (vss. 21, 23, 26, 32), and ruling (vs. 24) aspects become more prominent in the second half of the hymn; the sacrificers clearly wish to harness these powers for the good of the whole community. Though not insistent, this theme is pervasive and provides a subtle unity to this superficially rambling thirty-three-verse composition.

1. For the inspired poet, the ritual adept, the indestructible sacrificer, for Agni—these hymns, these praises arise right here.
2. For you right here, yearning for it, o unbounded Jātavedas, o Agni, I generate a lovely praise hymn.
3. Like brilliants, certainly, are your sharp scintillations, Agni.
   With their teeth they snap at the woods.

4. The fallow bays with smoke as their beacon, sped by the wind up toward heaven,
   take up opposing positions—the fires.
5. These fires kindled here in opposing (places) have come to sight all at once,
   like the beacons of the dawns.
6. Black are the realms at the feet of Jātavedas on his advance, when Agni grows on the earth.

7. Making the plants his wellspring (of nourishment), snapping (at them), Agni does not become extinguished, as he comes once again to the tender ones.
8. Bending back and forth with his tongues, flickering here and there with his flame,
   Agni shines brightly in the woods.
9. In the waters is your seat, Agni. You grow through the plants.
   While (still) being in their womb, you are born again.

10. This flame of yours, Agni, when bepoured, blazes up from the ghee, kissing the offering spoons on the mouth.

11. To him whose food is oxen, whose food is barren cows, to the ritual adept with soma on his back—to Agni we would do honor with praises.
12. And you, o Hotar whose resolve is worthy to be chosen, with homage and with kindling sticks do we beseech, o Agni.

13. And you, o Agni blazing when bepoured, like Bhr̥gu, like Manu, like Aṅgiras, do we invoke.
14. For you—o Fire by fire, a poet by a poet, the real (thing) by a real (man), a comrade by a comrade—are kindled.
15. You—to the pious poet grant wealth in thousands,
    o Agni, and refreshment abounding in heroes.

16. O Brother Agni, made by might, having ruddy horses, of blazing commandment—enjoy this praise of mine.
17. And you, Agni, have my praises reached—(the praises generated) for the bellowing one who yearns for (them)— like cows their cow-stall.
18. For you, best of the Aṅgirases, all these lovely settlements have separately yielded themselves to your desire, Agni.

19. With their insightful thoughts the inspired wise ones who are attentive to poetic inspiration have spurred Agni to join their meal.
20. You, Agni, prizewinner on the drives, do those who stretch out their ceremony reverently invoke as draft-horse (of the sacrifice), as Hotar.
21. Because you are of the same aspect in many places, preeminent throughout all the clans, in combats we call upon you.

22. Reverently invoke him, Agni who flashes forth when bepoured with (streams of) ghee.
    He will listen to this call of ours.
23. It is you we call upon, the listening Jātavedas, who smash away hatreds, o Agni.
24. The infallible ruler of the clans, this overseer here of the (ritual) statutes—
    Agni do I reverently invoke: he will listen.

25. Agni pulsing with excitement all his life—like a young blood spurred on to seek the prize, like a (prize-seeking) team do we incite him.

26. Smashing away insults and hatreds, burning demonic forces everywhere, Agni, shine with your sharp (flame).
27. You whom the peoples kindle, as Manu did, o best of the Aṅgirases, Agni, take cognizance of my speech.

28. O might-made Agni, whether you are born in heaven or born in the waters, we call upon you with hymns.
29. To you do these peoples here, all the lovely settlements separately, impel the wellspring (of nourishment) to be eaten.
30. O Agni, may we be very attentive and with manly gaze, crossing over difficult depths through all the days.

31. Agni, the gladdening one dear to many, sharp, pure-flamed, do we implore with gladdening hearts.
32. You, Agni, with far-radiant goods, dispatching (darkness) like the sun with its rays, vaunting yourself, you keep smashing the dark shades.
33. This we implore of you, mighty one—that your giving does not give out.
    From you, Agni, (comes) the good thing worthy to be chosen.

VIII.44 (664) Agni

Virūpa Āṅgirasa
30 verses: gāyatrī, arranged in tr̥cas

Like the last hymn, this one, though apparently divided into tr̥cas, shows little unity within the tr̥cas. Indeed, this hymn does appear to ramble, unlike the last one, in which several persistent themes provided structure. There are several signature words, especially forms of the root śuc "flame, blaze" and of the nominal vásu "good/goods." Agni's ritual function is the dominant topic, and his twin and contrasting roles as vípra "inspired poet" (vss. 10, 12, 21, 29) and kaví "sage poet" (vss. 7, 12, 21, 26, 30) are regularly mentioned. But there is no clear development in the hymn, and most of the verses contain standard descriptions and addresses to the god.

1. With a kindling stick do friendly service to Agni; with (streams of) ghee awaken the guest.
   Into him pour oblations.
2. Agni, enjoy my praise. Grow strong through this thought.
   Take delight in our hymns.

3. Agni I place in front as messenger; I appeal to him as the conveyor of the oblation:
he will make the gods sit down here.

4. Your lofty beams rise upward as you are kindled, upward the flaming ones, shining Agni.

5. Let my ghee-filled offering spoons come near to you, delightful one.
Agni, enjoy our oblations.

6. Gladdening Hotar, seasonable offerer, of bright radiance, with far-radiant goods,
Agni do I reverently invoke—he will listen—

7. The age-old Hotar to be reverently invoked, enjoyable Agni, who has a poet's purpose, the full glory of the ceremonies.

8. O best of the Aṅgirases, enjoying these oblations here in due order, Agni, conduct the sacrifice at the proper season.

9. When you have been kindled, o comrade with flaming flame, convey here the divine race, as the attentive one.

10. The inspired poet, Hotar without deceit, whose beacon is smoke, with far-radiant goods, the beacon of the sacrifices do we implore:

11. "Agni, protect us. (Burn), god, against those who do harm.
Split hatred, o might-made one."

12. Agni beautifying his own body with an age-old thought, the sage poet is strengthened by the inspired poet.

13. I call the child of nourishment, pure-flamed Agni, here to this sacrifice of good ceremony.

14. You who have the might of Mitra, o Agni, with your flaming flame sit here on our ritual grass along with the gods.

15. The mortal who serves god Agni in his own house, just for that man will he bring goods to light.

16. Agni is the head, the peak of heaven; this (Agni) here is lord of the earth.
He quickens the spawn of the waters.

17. Your flaming flames rise up as they flash, Agni, your lights, your beams.

18. Because you hold sway over a choice gift, Agni, as lord of the sun, might I, your praiser, be in your shelter.

19. You, Agni, do those of inspired thought, you do they spur on with their insights.
Let our hymns strengthen you.

20. Of the undeceivable, self-empowered messenger who is always crackling—of Agni would we choose the comradeship.
21. Agni, best possessor of flaming commandments, flaming inspired poet, flaming sage poet, flaming he shines when he is bepoured.

22. And let my visionary thoughts, let my hymns strengthen you at all times.
Agni, take cognizance of our comradeship.
23. If I were you, Agni, or you were me, your hopes would come true here.
24. Because you are surely the good lord of goods, Agni, with far-radiant goods, may we be in your benevolence.

25. Agni, like rivers to the sea, to you of steadfast commandments do our hymns go bellowing.
26. The youthful clanlord, the sage poet, omnivorous, pulsing with much excitement—
Agni do I beautify with my thoughts.
27. To the charioteer of the sacrifices, sharp-fanged, staunch, would we make haste with praises—to Agni.

28. Let this singer here abide in you, comrade Agni.
To him be merciful, o pure one.
29. For you are a clever companion at table, always wakeful like an inspired poet.
Agni, you will give light (all the way up) to heaven.
30. Agni, in the face of difficult passages, in the face of insults, o sage poet, lengthen our lifetime, o good one.

VIII.45 (665) Indra (except 1: Agni and Indra)

Triśoka Kāṇva
42 verses: gāyatrī, arranged in tr̥cas

The hymn begins and ends with a tr̥ca marked by a refrain (vss. 1–3 and 40–42). The tr̥ca division can otherwise be faint, and in several instances seems to contravene groupings of verse by content (see esp. vss. 36–39). The Anukramaṇī attributes the hymn to a certain Triśoka, but this name has probably been plucked from verse 30.

The first two verses establish a ritual mise-en-scène, but we quickly move into the martial and competitive mode that prevails in most of the rest of this long hymn.

Familiar chords are struck: Indra is exhorted to destroy enemies in various ferocious ways (e.g., vs. 8) and to parcel out their goods to us (e.g., vs. 15), to drink our soma and aid our efforts (e.g., vs. 14), and to give us rich gifts (e.g., vs. 12), and he is praised for his past deeds (see esp. vss. 25–30).

But the hymn also has several unusual features. The poet expresses a remarkable degree of apprehension about the exercise of Indra's powers and fear that they may be turned against him and his comrades. Although a certain amount of such sentiment (as in the beginning of vs. 10) is not rare in Indra hymns, the sequence of verses 31–35, which begins with a plea to Indra not to do what he has in mind and seeks to accomplish, a sharp reversal of the usual request, depicts men in fear of being Indra's targets—or perhaps even just of witnessing his terrifying hyper-power (see vss. 32, 35)—and begging for his mercy. Already in verse 19 they expressed worry about their shaky relationship with Indra, and the poet speaks of their "offenses" in verse 34, a term more at home in an Ādityan context.

Even more striking are two snatches of dialogue, which bookend the hymn: the first two verses of the second tr̥ca (vss. 4–5) and the first two verses of the penultimate tr̥ca (vss. 37–38). In the first pair the just-born Indra takes up a bow and asks his mother about potential enemies, and she replies with what appears to be a proverbial expression assuring him of his ultimate victory. (This scene has a close parallel in VIII.77.1–2.) In verses 37–38 it seems (the verses are quite obscure and uncontextualized) that Indra and the Maruts exchange slangy insults: in 37 Indra reproaches the Maruts (not named but identified by one of their epithets) for not honoring their partnership by even thinking of abandoning him, while they reply in 38 by suggesting that he should have thought of that before, when he was hogging the soma. The unspoken context is the well-known episode when all the gods but the Maruts abandon Indra before the Vr̥tra battle (see, e.g., VIII.96.7, using some of the same vocabulary), and the Maruts later demand from Indra a share in the soma sacrifice because they stood by him (see especially the dialogue hymn I.165). This intriguingly deracinated exchange seems to have been suggested to the poet by verse 36, in which he himself hopes not to be deprived of a comrade. If Indra himself could find himself deserted by his friends, how much more conceivable such a situation is for a mere mortal. This theme of comradeship was announced in the refrain to the first tr̥ca (vss. 1–3) and arises several times elsewhere in the hymn (vss. 16, 18).

Though the hymn does not have a clear structure—and its length would have made such a structure difficult to apprehend in a performance situation—the themes and concerns that keep surfacing give some sense of unity, and the two little dialogues at the two ends of the hymn grab the attention.

1. Those who kindle the fire and strew the ritual grass in due order, of whom Indra is the youthful comrade,
2. Lofty is their kindling wood, abundant their recitation, broad their sacrificial post,
   of whom Indra is the youthful comrade.

3. Unembattled himself, in battle the champion drives the troop along with his warriors, of whom Indra is the youthful comrade.

4. The Vr̥tra-smiter took the Bunda-bow; just born, he asked his mother:
"Which ones are powerful; which ones are famed?"
5. She, the strong one [/Śavasī], replied to you: "Like a wasp at a mountain he will fight, who desires rivalry with you."
6. And you, o bounteous one—listen: "Who wishes (something) of you, for that you exert your will.
What you will make firm, that is firm."

7. When the setter of contests drives to the contest in search of good horses, Indra is the best charioteer of charioteers.
8. Rip apart all attackers, mace-bearer, as if into (a million) pieces.
Become the one who most receives our praises.
9. Let Indra set our chariot in front to win, he whom injuries do not injure.

10. May we avoid your hatred (and be) fit for you to give to, able one.
May we go to (prizes) consisting of cattle, Indra—
11. O possessor of the (pressing) stone, (the soma drops), though they move deliberately, are bringing horses and hundreds of cattle, are strengthening and faultless.
12. For day after day your upright liberal spirit is ready to give thousands, hundreds to the singers.

13. For we know you as winner of spoils, Indra, bursting even into the fastnesses, like one breaking into a household.
14. Let the drops exhilarate you, as lead horse, o sage poet, audacious one, when we beg you for a niggard:
15. The impious rich man who has neglected to give to you bounteously, bring his possessions here to us.

16. These comrades here, possessing the soma, watch out for you, Indra, as those who have flourishing (cattle) watch out for their livestock.
17. And you, who are not deaf but have listening ears, do we call here from afar for help.
18. When you should hear this call here, you should do (a deed) difficult to forget, and then you would become our most intimate friend.

19. For even though we've thought that we've been going a wayward course to you, still become for us a giver of cows, Indra.
20. As elderly men grasp a staff, we have grasped hold of you, lord of strength.
We want you in our seat.
21. Sing a praise song to Indra, the warrior of much manliness, whom none obstruct in battle.

22. When it has been pressed, I set you loose on the pressed (soma) to drink it, o bull.
Become satiated; come through to exhilaration.
23. Let not the greedy dolts, let not the deriders deceive you.
Do not cherish those who hate the sacred formulation.
24. Here let the (soma drinks) with their profusion of cows [=milk] exhilarate you to generosity.
Drink a lake, as a buffalo does.

25. Those (deeds) that the Vr̥tra-smiter set in motion afar, both the old ones and the new, proclaim these at the assemblies:
26. Indra drank the pressed (soma) of Kadrū for that which possesses a thousand-arms [=battle?].
Then he displayed his own masculine power.
27. This is real: having obtained at Turvaśa's and Yadu's what is not to be spurned [=soma], he came through to victory by his labor.

28. I laud him to you as the surpassing one, as driller of the bovine prize for the peoples, and as one common (to all)— 29. As the master of the R̥bhus, not to be obstructed, as the strengthener of the son of Tugra [=Bhujyu] (do I laud him) in solemn words when the soma is pressed—Indra!
30. Who cut apart the broad, womblike mountain for Triśoka, as a way for the cows to go forth.

31. What you take on, have in mind, and, becoming exhilarated, set out to accomplish, don't do that, Indra. Have mercy!
32. For even a paltry deed of one such as you is famed on earth.
Let your mind go (to us?), Indra.
33. Just yours will be these glorifications and encomia, when, Indra, you will be merciful to us.

34. Don't smite us at a single offense, nor at two or three, nor at many, o champion.
35. For I am afraid of one such as you—powerful, shattering, wondrous, vanquishing with his attack.
36. Let me not find the lack of a comrade, nor of a son, o you of outstanding goods.
    Let your mind be turned here.

37. [Indra to Maruts:] "You young bucks—who, (as if) unpaired, has said, as comrade to comrade,
    'I will leave (you)'? Who retreats from us?"
38. [Maruts to Indra:] "Hey bull. So—when (the soma) was pressed, being insatiable you consumed a lot, sashaying around the lower depths like a guy with 'the dog-killer' [=the winning throw at dice]."
39. I hold onto these two fallow bays of yours, yoked by speech, along with their chariot,
    so that you will give to the formulators.

40. Split off all hatreds; parry oppressions. Smite the slighters.
    The craved good thing—bring that here.
41. What is in a firm place, what in a solid place, Indra, what has been borne away into a deep place—
    the craved good thing—bring that here.
42. The abundance given by you that the whole people of Manu will know—
    the craved good thing—bring that here.

VIII.46 (666) Indra (1–20), Dānastuti (21–24), Vāyu (25–28), Dānastuti (29–33)

Vaśa Aśvya
33 verses: a variety of lyric meters combining 8- and 12- and 4-syllable pādas

This hymn has been called the most metrically varied hymn in the R̥gveda: it contains verses of nearly twenty different meters, although all the verses that allow analysis appear to be made up of the standard building blocks of eight-, twelve-, and four-syllable pādas in various combinations. (Some irresolvable irregularities remain.) For the most part, the verses are grouped into two-verse pairs (anomalous pragāthas), but the hymn begins with a tr̥ca (vss. 1–3), and the metrically messy verses 14–16 also appear to form a tr̥ca. The two dānastuti sections (vss. 21–24 and 29–33), broken by two pragāthas to Vāyu, show no internal metrical structure. The meter is discussed by Oldenberg with his characteristic acuity both in the Prolegomena (1888: 109–10) and in the Noten.

The hymn is miscellaneous in content as well. It begins and continues for some time as a fairly standard Indra hymn, insistently focused on begging Indra for gifts of all sorts. The Indra section continues through verse 20, but becomes more and more problematic, with metrical and syntactic difficulties reinforcing each other. Verses 14–16 are metrically almost unanalyzable, and they consist in great part of syntactic fragments the relationships among which are difficult to construct. Verse 17 (paired in a pragātha with 18) equally resists metrical and exegetical certainty, but introduces the Maruts as a counterweight to Indra; in verse 18 we return to more rational metrical structure and, to some degree, analyzable syntax. The last two verses of the Indra section (19–20) are fairly straightforward and bring the praise of Indra to a conclusion with an explosion of adjectives (the first hemistich of 20 is also made entirely of vocatives).

The remaining thirteen verses of the hymn consist of three almost equal parts: two dānastutis (vss. 21–24, 29–33), interrupted by a dānastuti-tinged section addressed to the wind god Vāyu, who participates in the Morning Pressing, when the priestly gifts are distributed. Both dānastutis mention extravagant numbers of livestock. In the first the poet Vaśa Aśvya mentions himself (vs. 21) and his patron Pr̥thuśravas Kānita (vss. 21, 24); the final verse (24) of this first dānastuti has a distinctly summary tone and clearly spells out the cause-and-effect relation between gifts and fame. The second dānastuti mentions a more various set of patrons, and the poet names himself in the final verse (33), as a "great maiden," clearly his favorite gift, is brought toward him. The diction and style of both dānastutis is straightforward; they lack the sly puns and clever insult-as-praise and praise-as-insult that characterize many dānastutis and seem intent only on counting up the spoils. The four intervening verses (25–28) describes Vāyu's dawn journey to the sacrifice, but it is made clear that his purpose there is to give, or (vs. 27) to motivate the patron to give, to the poet.

1. To such a one as you, Indra, you leader with many goods, do we belong, you mounter of the fallow bays.
2. For we know you, possessor of the stone, as real, as giver of refreshments;
   we know you as giver of riches—
3. You, of a hundred forms of help and a hundred resolves, whose greatness
   the bards hymn with hymns.

4. That mortal has good guidance whom the Maruts, whom Aryaman and Mitra protect—those without deceit.
5. Acquiring (wealth) in cows and horses and an abundance of heroes, impelled by the Ādityas, he flares up with much craved wealth always.

6. We beseech this Indra for a gift, him swelling with strength, fearless—we beseech the lord of wealth for wealth.

7. For in him exist all fearless forms of help altogether.
 Let the spans convey him hither, who has many goods; let the fallow bays convey him to the pressed (soma) for exhilaration.

8. Your exhilaration, which is worthy to be chosen, which is the most Vṛtra-smiting, o Indra, which with superior men takes the sun, which is difficult to surpass in battles—
9. Which, difficult to surpass, worthy of fame, is the overcomer in the prize-contests, o you who grant all wishes—you, o strongest good one—come here to our pressings. May we go to a pen full of cows.

10. At our desire for cows, for horses, and for chariots, (now) just as before, create wide space for us, you greatly great one.
11. For I do not find a limit to your generosity in any way, o champion.
 Show favor to us, bounteous possessor of the stone, even now. You have aided our poetic insights with your prizes.

12. The lofty one who makes his comrade famous, he, praised by many, knows all the races.
 Through the human lifespans they all call on him, on Indra the powerful, with their offering ladles extended.
13. He will become our helper in the prize-contests—he of many goods, the one who stands in front, the bounteous Vṛtra-smiter.

14. Sing to the hero amid the raptures of the stalk; with a great hymn (sing) to the discriminating one,
 Indra by name, worthy of fame, capable like speech.
15. (You are by nature) one who gives a legacy to the body [=a son], who gives goods, who gives a prizewinner in the prize-contests, o much invoked one—now then (do so)!
16. (Sing to him) who has control of all goods, who also, when he is victorious, has control of this form (of his?),
 (and has control) over those who yearn (for him). Now then!

17. We shall praise you great ones [=Maruts] for the rewarder fit for nourishment, who comes fittingly, who comes regularly [=Indra].
 Through the sacrifices and the hymns of all the peoples of Manu, you [=Indra] are likely to attain (the favor) of the Maruts.
 I sing to you reverently with a hymn.
18. Those who launch themselves in flight on their drives along the backs of the mountains—the sacrifice of those greatly noisy ones, the favor of those powerfully noisy ones (you are likely to attain) while the ceremony is pro(ceeding).

19. O strongest Indra, bring here the shatterer of bad thoughts, (namely) wealth to be harnessed for us, o you who stir thought—preeminent (wealth), o you who stir thought.
20. O winner, good winner, powerful, brilliant, most brilliant, liberal-spirited, sovereign king, (bring wealth) victorious through victory, victory-winning, enjoyable, foremost at the prize-contests.

21. Let him come here—any non-god who has taken as great a gift as Vaśa Aśvya has taken from Pr̥thuśravas Kānita at the dawning of this (dawn) here.
22. I have won sixty thousands in equine property, myriads, twenty hundreds of camels, ten hundreds of dusky mares, ten of those with three red spots, ten thousands of cows.
23. Ten dusky (stallions), following wealth to fulfillment, straight-tailed, swift,
    skittish, have turned the felly homeward.
24. These are the gifts of Pr̥thuśravas Kānita, the very generous.
    In giving a golden chariot, he has become the most bounteous patron.
    He has made his fame the highest.

25. Vāyu, drive here to us for the extension and the spread (of our line) to be great and for bounty.
    For we have performed (a sacrifice) for you, for you to give much, to give greatly all at once.
26. As the one who drives here with his horses at the breaking of the day—with the thrice seven seventies—(invigorated) with these soma drinks by the soma-pressers, (be ready) to give, you soma-drinker, drinker of the clear purified (soma).

27. The one of good resolve who by his breath invigorated just this man here, to give something brilliant to me in the axle made of araṭu wood, in the presence of Nahuṣa, who is a good performer (of rituals) for (a god) who performs even better, 28. You who are an independent king, in a wondrous form worthy of praise and bathed in ghee, o Vāyu—this drive (of yours), horse-impelled, dust-impelled, dog-impelled, pro(ceeds). Here it is now!

29. Now then, I have won something dear to the vigorous one, sixty thousand (geldings, which are) just like stallions.
30. Like cattle to their herd, the geldings approach, the geldings approach me.
31. Then when in a roving band [=caravan] a hundred camels roared, then (I took) twenty hundreds from the Śvitnas.

32. I, the inspired poet, took a hundred from Balbūtha Tarukṣa the Dāsa.
    These are your peoples here, Vāyu. With Indra as protector they become exhilarated; with the gods as protectors they become exhilarated.
33. And now this great maiden, facing Vaśa Aśvya, with bright ornaments upon her, is led forth.

VIII.47 (667) Ādityas

Trita Āptya
18 verses: mahāpaṅkti

The first two-thirds of this hymn (through vs. 12) beg the Ādityas for general help and protection from generic evils—the nonspecific nature of what is requested underlined by the rather redundantly phrased refrain. The refrain continues through the last third of the hymn (vss. 13–18), but in the non-refrain portions the focus narrows—to the elimination of the "bad dream," which is sent far away to the shadowy figure called Trita Āptya. Nothing else in the scraps of mythology we know about Trita Āptya explains why he should be the scapegoated recipient of our nightmares, much less why he would make them into body ornaments (vs. 15) or use them as food and work (vs. 16). The agent who removes the bad dream to Trita is Dawn (vss. 14–16, 18), whose participation is easier to understand—as anyone knows who has experienced the relief of waking in the morning to discover that the nightmares just experienced were not real.

1. Great is the help, of (all of) you who are great, for the pious man, o Varuṇa and Mitra.
   Whomever you protect from deceit, o Ādityas, evil will not reach him.
   – Your help is faultless; very helpful is your help.
2. You know how to make evils stay away, o gods, o Ādityas.
   Like birds their wings, spread your shelter out above us.
   – Your help is faultless; very helpful is your help.
3. Spread that shelter out over us, like birds their wings.
   We revere all things providing defense, o you who possess all possessions.
   – Your help is faultless; very helpful is your help.
4. Mankind—to which the attentive ones gave peaceful dwelling and livelihood—over all its wealth do these Ādityas hold sway.
   – Your help is faultless; very helpful is your help.
5. Evils will avoid us, as charioteers avoid hard places.
   Might we be in the shelter of Indra and the help of the Ādityas.
   – Your help is faultless; very helpful is your help.

6. It is only by a crooked course that in such a way a man becomes lost to what is given by you.
   O gods, o Ādityas, it's not a trifle that he obtained from you—the man whom you spurred on.
   – Your help is faultless; very helpful is your help.
7. Negligence, sharp or weighty, will never beset him to whom you, Ādityas, have given broad shelter.
   – Your help is faultless; very helpful is your help.
8. We abide in you, o gods, like fighters in armor.
   You—deliver us from a great offense; you—from a small one.
   – Your help is faultless; very helpful is your help.
9. Let Aditi deliver us; let Aditi spread her shelter—the mother of rich Mitra, of Aryaman and Varuṇa.
   –Your help is faultless; very helpful is your help.
10. That sheltering shelter, o gods, beneficial and without damage, providing threefold defense—spread that out over us.
    – Your help is faultless; very helpful is your help.
11. For you, o Ādityas, gaze down (on us), like spies from a hillside.
    You will lead us along an easy way like steeds to an easy ford.
    – Your help is faultless; very helpful is your help.
12. There is no benefit for the demonic here, for him to descend and to come near.
    There is benefit for the milk-giving cow and for the hero seeking fame.
    – Your help is faultless; very helpful is your help.
13. Whatever is ill-done in the open, whatever in secret, o gods, all that set on Trita Āptya, far away from us.
    – Your help is faultless; very helpful is your help.
14. The bad dream in the cattle and the one in us, o Daughter of Heaven—carry it away to Trita Āptya, o far-radiant one.
    – Your help is faultless; very helpful is your help.
15. He will make (it) his neck ornament or his garland, o Daughter of Heaven—the whole bad dream we consign to Trita Āptya.
    – Your help is faultless; very helpful is your help.
16. To the one who has it as his food and as his work, to the one reverently approaching it as his portion—to Trita and to Dvita, o Dawn, carry the bad dream.
    – Your help is faultless; very helpful is your help.
17. Just as we bring back a sixteenth, then an eighth, then the (whole) debt, even so we bring the whole bad dream to Āptya.
    – Your help is faultless; very helpful is your help.

18. We have conquered today and we have won; we have become free of blame.
    O Dawn, the bad dream which we have feared, let (dawn) dawn it away.
    – Your help is faultless; very helpful is your help.

VIII.48 (668) Soma

Pragātha Kaṇva
15 verses: triṣṭubh, except jagatī 5

This well-known and frequently translated hymn is one of the very few dedicated to Soma outside of the IXth Maṇḍala, and as such does not concern "self-purifying" Soma (Soma Pavamāna), the subject of that maṇḍala. The preparation of soma is not treated here, save for a single reference (vs. 7) to it as "pressed." Instead the emphasis is on soma's effects, "when drunk" (pītá vss. 4, 5, 10, 12), on the drinker. The immediate effect is euphoria; as in the famous exultant boast in verse 3 "we have drunk the soma; we have become immortal; we have gone to the light; we have found the gods." The soma produces a sense of space and boundlessness (vss. 1, 2, 5) while, paradoxically, being confined in the drinker's body (vss. 2, 9, 10) and holding this body together (vs. 5). The temporal equivalent of this spatial expansion is the wish constantly expressed to "lengthen our lifetime" (vss. 4, 7, 10, 11). Soma is thus characterized by vitality, or life force, which he also confers on the drinker: the first and last verses of the hymn contain this signature word váyas.

The mood in the second half of the hymn darkens slightly. Though the poet still sees Soma as his protector and kindly comrade, he senses the threats that cause him to need that protection—threats from outside (vs. 8), from his own imperfect actions (vs. 9), and even from soma itself (vs. 10). Though he ultimately pronounces the threats vanquished (vs. 11), the mood of sheer exuberance has been broken.

The final few verses (12–14) take a more ritual turn, with our ceremonial dedication of an oblation to soma, in his connection with the forefathers (who themselves receive soma, as is made clear elsewhere). The ancestor cult thus briefly surfaces here, and the emphasis throughout the hymn on lengthening our lifetimes (on earth) may provide a counterpoint to the ritually shaped afterlife inhabited by our ancestors.

1. I of good wisdom have partaken of the vitality of the sweet drink, which is rich in purpose and excellent at finding wide space, which all the gods and mortals, calling it honey, converge upon.
2. When you have gone within, you will become Aditi [/boundlessness], appeaser of divine wrath.
   Drop, enjoying the comradeship of Indra, like an obedient mare following the chariot-pole, you should follow riches to fulfillment.

3. We have drunk the soma; we have become immortal; we have gone to the light; we have found the gods.
   What can hostility do to us now, and what the malice of a mortal, o immortal one?
4. Become weal for our heart when drunk, o drop, very kindly, like a father to a son, like a comrade to a comrade, you who are widely proclaimed as insightful. Lengthen our lifetime, for us to live, Soma.
5. These glorious (drops), when drunk, seek wide space. As cows [=leather straps] do a chariot, it [=soma] knots (me) together in my joints.
   Let the drops guard me from my foot slipping, and let them keep me away from lameness.
6. You have enflamed me like a churned fire. Make us conspicuous; make us better off, for now in the exhilaration of you, Soma, I think of myself as a rich man. I shall advance to prosperity.
7. With a vigorous mind we would take a share of you when pressed, as of ancestral wealth.
   King Soma, lengthen our lifetimes, like the sun the dawning days.
8. King Soma, be merciful to us with well-being. We are under your commandment: know this.
   Potency and battle fervor are on the rise, o drop. Don't hand us over (to the battle fervor) of the stranger, at his wish.
9. For as protector of our body, Soma, you have settled down in every limb, having your eyes on men.
   If we will confound your commandments, be merciful to us, as our good comrade, all the more, o god.
10. Might I be accompanied by a tender-hearted comrade, who would not harm me when it has been drunk, o possessor of fallow bay horses.
    This soma here that has been deposited in us—for it I go to Indra to lengthen our lifetime.
11. These famines and diseases have gone off. Those allied to darkness have shied away; they have become afraid.
    Soma has mounted us to his full extent. We have gone to where they lengthen lifetime.
12. O forefathers, the drop that, once drunk, entered into our hearts, the immortal into the mortals, to this Soma we would do ceremonial honor with an oblation. May we be in his mercy and good grace.
13. You, Soma, coming to agreement with the forefathers, extend through heaven and earth.
    To you, drop, we would do ceremonial honor with an oblation. May we be lords of riches.

14. Protector Gods, speak on our behalf. Let sleep not master us, nor mumbling.
    May we, always dear to Soma, possessed of good heroes, announce the ceremonial honor.
15. You, o Soma, confer vitality on us on all sides; you, as finder of the sun, possessing the eye of men—enter us.
    You, o drop, along with your help—protect us from behind and also from in front.

Vālakhilya Hymns

The following eleven hymns (VIII.49–59) are known as the Vālakhilya hymns. These are apocryphal or, in Geldner's felicitous description, "half-apocryphal" (halbapokryph). A number of khilāni or apocrypha were transmitted in the R̥gvedic tradition, but only these eleven (or, in some other reported recensions, somewhat fewer) were inserted into and transmitted within the R̥gveda Saṃhitā itself, as well as in the khilāni collections. Moreover, these eleven were transmitted with accents and were treated in the Padapāṭha, the Anukramaṇī (save for the tenth, VIII.58), and so forth, though they were not commented on by Sāyaṇa in his R̥gvedic commentary. In our R̥gveda recension, the Śākalya, they were inserted between the sixth and seventh anuvākas of VIII, though they are reported to appear elsewhere in other recensions, not always in a single group. The Grassmann numbers, 1018–1028, reflect the status of these hymns as additions to the original saṃhitā.

The text of these hymns is in general less well transmitted than the rest of the R̥gveda, and the hymns themselves sometimes have the air of a school exercise. Notable in this connection is the fact that the first eight hymns proceed in pairs, each pair dedicated to the same divinity (except for a few verses in the third pair, VIII.53–54) and containing the same number of verses in the same meter (except for a few verses in the last pair, VIII.55–56). Moreover, the first pair (VIII.49–50) and, to a much lesser extent, the second pair (VIII.51–52) follow the same model, verse by verse, often using identical or near identical vocabulary but varying grammar, or else employing transparent lexical substitution but keeping the grammar the same, and one can imagine that the two hymns represent separate realizations of a set pedagogical task. However, whatever the reason for their coupling, the pairs afford us interesting insights into the composition of R̥gvedic hymns. For this reason, as well as the fact that puzzles in one hymn of the pair are sometimes illuminated by the parallel passages in the other, we will comment on the first two sets of paired hymns together.

VIII.49 (1018) Indra

Praskaṇva Kāṇva
10 verses: br̥hatī alternating with satobr̥hatī, arranged in pragāthas. Parallel to 50.

This pair of hymns follows a standard trajectory: the poet exhorts himself to praise Indra for his generosity and his power, and then invites Indra to partake of the soma at his sacrifice, traveling with his fallow bays from wherever he might be. The final pragātha asks Indra to provide the same help and largesse as he has on other occasions at the sacrifices of other, named individuals.

The interest in these two hymns lies in the interplay between the quite strict parallelism in parts of each verse and the freedom with which the poet treats the variable portions. There is no space here for a full catalogue of the correspondences, but a few telling patterns will be noted. First, despite the pervasive parallelism there are no repeated pādas between the hymns. The initial verses of the two hymns (49.1, 50.1) are perhaps the most fully parallel, and in subsequent verses the beginnings and ends of pādas and half lines are more likely to be parallel than the middles, not surprisingly given the salience of these positions. Responsion can take a number of different forms. Frequently there is exact responsion, as in 49/50.6c udrī́va vajrinn avatáḥ… "Like a well-spring full of water, o mace-bearer…." Single-word repetitions will ordinarily take the same metrical position, as in the pāda-final surā́dhasam of 49/50.1a. Derivationally different synonyms can correspond, as in 49.5c svadáyanti / 50.5c svádanti, both "they sweeten"; similarly, to stems belonging to the same root but with different nuances, 49.10c ásanoḥ "you won" versus 50.10c ásiṣāsaḥ "you sought to win." Or an expanded phrase can take the place of a single word, as in 49.8b vā́tā iva "like the winds" versus 50.8b ójo vā́tasya "the power of the wind." Synonyms or functionally identical words can respond, as in 49.5b (d)hiyānó áśvo ná "being spurred on like a horse" and 50.5b iyānó átyo ná "being sped like a steed," where the morphology and word order are identical, but the lexical realization entirely different. Phonological correspondence is not neglected, as in the adjectives in the parallel phrases 49.8a ajirā́so hárayaḥ "nimble fallow bays" and 50.8a rathirā́so hárayaḥ "fallow bays fit for the chariot." And of course there is rough semantic parallelism throughout the two hymns, even when there is no lexical, morphological, syntactic, or phonological identity. It is also the case that one of the pair can provide the answer to an obscurity in the other, as in 49.2a where śatānīkeva "like (something) with a hundred facets" responds to 50.2a śatānīkā hetáyaḥ "missiles with a hundred facets," where the comparandum is explicit.

1. Chant forth to Indra, the very generous, in the way that is known—who as a bounteous one possessing many goods—by the thousands, as it were—exerts himself for you singers.
2. Like (a missile) with a hundred facets he advances boldly. He smashes obstacles for the pious man.

Like the juices [=streams] of a much-nourishing mountain his gifts swell forth.

3. The pressed drops that are your exhilarating drinks, o Indra who longs for songs, fill you, o mace-bearer, like waters a pond, following the accustomed way, for your generosity, o champion.
4. Faultless, (life-)extending, strengthening—the sweetest of honey—drink it, so that becoming exhilarated, you will by yourself boldly scatter forth (goods) to us like specks (of dust).

5. Being spurred on like a horse by the pressers, (come) at a run to our praise, which the milk-cows and the gifts sweeten for you, autonomous Indra, among the Kaṇvas.
6. With homage we reverently approach (you) like a powerful hero, the distinguished one dispensing imperishable goods.
Like a wellspring full of water for the one who pours it out, the poetic thoughts flow (for you), Indra, bearer of the mace.

7. Whether now (you are) either at (another's) sacrifice or (elsewhere) on the earth, from there come here to our sacrifice with your swift (horses), you of great thought, powerful with your powerful (ones).
8. Nimble are your fallow bays, which are swift and overpowering like the winds, with which you speed around the progeny of Manu, with which (you speed around) the whole (world), (for it) to see the sun.

9. We beg for such great cattle-bringing benevolence of yours, Indra, as when you helped Medhyātithi, o bounteous one, as when (you helped) Nīpātithi to spoils—10. Just as at Kaṇva's, at Trasadasyu's, o bounteous one, as at Paktha Daśavraja's, just as at Gośarya R̥jiśvan's, Indra, you won (wealth) in cattle and gold.

VIII.50 (1019) Indra

Puṣṭigu Kāṇva
10 verses: br̥hatī alternating with satobr̥hatī, arranged in pragāthas. Parallel to 49.

1. Chant forth to the famed, very generous, able one for his dominance, who grants to the presser and to the praiser desirable goods, by the thousands as it were.

2. His missiles with a hundred facets are difficult to overcome, the great projectiles of Indra.
   Like a beneficial mountain he swells among the bounteous ones when the pressed (soma drinks) have exhilarated him.

3. When the pressed drops have exhilarated the dear one, like waters my pressing has been deposited (in you), good one, (and it will be) like milking cows for the pious.
4. Your [=poets'] thoughts of honey flow to the faultless (soma), which is calling for help.
   The drops, calling on you [=Indra], good one, have been set among the praisers.

5. Being sped like a steed, he [=Indra] streams to our soma, good at the ceremony, which our greetings sweeten for you, self-giving one. At Paura's you take pleasure in the invocation.
6. (Chant) forth to the powerful hero, the discriminating one who gains the stakes, the distinguished one of great generosity.
   Like a wellspring full of water, mace-bearer, you always swell goods for the pious man.

7. Whether now (you are) at a distance either on earth or in heaven, hitching up with your fallow bays, o Indra of great thought, come here, lofty with your lofty (horses)—
8. Fit for the chariot are your fallow bays, which, unfailing, cross over the power of the wind, with which you made the Dasyu heed because of Manu, with which you speed around the sun.

9. Might we know such help of yours anew, o champion, as when you helped Etaśa when the stake was to be decided, as (you helped) Vaśa at Daśavraja's.
10. Just as at Kaṇva's, o bounteous one, at the ritual offering, at the ceremony, beside (Agni), the domestic leader of long counsel, just as at Gośarya's you sought winnings, you possessor of the stone, at my side (win) a cowpen splendid with fallow bays.

VIII.51 (1020) Indra

Śruṣṭigu Kāṇva
10 verses: bṛhatī alternating with satobṛhatī, arranged in pragāthas. Parallel to 52.

By contrast to VIII.49–50, the parallelism of these two hymns is quite muted and surfaces only occasionally. Not only are strict responsions rare, but the development of the thought in each hymn is quite distinct, though both focus on Indra as generous giver. The correspondence between the two hymns is clearest at the beginning: both hymns have almost identical initial verses, save for the personal names of the human hosts. These verses also have the same structure as the final verses of VIII.49–50.10. There is also some verbal responsion in the beginning of verses 3 and 5, throughout much of verse 6, and at the beginning of verse 7, and there are also correspondences that cross verse lines, for instance, 51.6c=52.4c táṃ tvā vayám… "we you…," with the continuation of that pāda (51.6c) maghavann indra girvaṇaḥ "o bounteous Indra who longs for songs" matched in 52.8a.

As just noted, both hymns are primarily concerned to stimulate Indra to generosity. In VIII.51 are interspersed several obscure references to unknown sagas: verse 2 with the old, prone Praskaṇva set upright (Praskaṇva figures also in nearby VIII.54.8, but only as beneficiary of Indra's largesse, and he is the poet to whom I.44–50 as well as VIII.49, the first Vālakhilya hymn, are attributed) and Indra's defeat of Krivi (vs. 8). And in verses 4 and 8, in identical language, an apparently miraculous birth follows ritual and cosmogonic activity. One of these acts is the chanting of a "seven-headed, threefold chant in the highest footstep" (vs. 4), and a stripped-down version of the same phrase, "they chanted the chant" is found in the final verse (10), with the current poets as subject, thus implicitly attributing cosmogonic powers to the poets of today.

The construction of VIII.52 is far less orderly than that of 51. It is characterized by subordinate clauses that lack main clauses (e.g., vss. 2, 3), lack of grammatical agreement between apparently coreferential entities (e.g., sg. "whose" picked up by "we" in vs. 4; similar disharmony in vs. 8), and a general looseness of structure especially in the verses that lack all responsion to 51. If this was a school exercise, perhaps it was an unsuccessful one.

1. Just as at Manu Sāṃvaraṇi's you drank pressed soma, Indra, and at Nīpātithi's, at Medhyātithi's, (do so) at Puṣṭigu's, at Śruṣṭigu's, bounteous one.
2. Pārṣadvāṇa made old Praskaṇva, who was lying down, sit upright together (with him, at a sacrificial session?).
   The seer sought to win thousands of cattle; Dasyave Vṛka was aided by you.

3. He who cannot get enough of hymns, who is the observant stimulator of seers, to this Indra speak with a newer thought, to give sustenance to him like a man greedy for food.
4. He for whom they chanted the seven-headed, threefold chant in the highest footstep, that one made all these worlds cry out. Right after that his masculine nature was born.

5. He who is the giver of goods to us, that Indra we invoke, for we know his ever newer favor. Might we go to a pen full of cattle.

6. He to whom you exert yourself to give, o good one, that one achieves the thriving of wealth.
   We, who have pressed (the soma), invoke you, o bounteous Indra who longs for songs.

7. Never are you a barren cow, nor, Indra, do you go dry for the pious man.
   Over and over, more and more, the gift coming from you, the god, becomes engorged.
8. He who attained Krivi by his strength, while making Śuṣṇa heed with his murderous weapons, just when he propped up yonder heaven as he spread it out, right after that the earth dweller was born.

9. You to whom every Ārya here belongs, every Dāsa, every treasure-guarding stranger, even across (all these) (come) to the Arya Ruśama Parīru. There there is wealth anointed just for you.
10. The eager inspired poets have chanted a honeyed, ghee-dripping chant.
   Among us wealth spreads out and bullish power; among us are the drops being pressed.

VIII.52 (1021) Indra

Āyu Kāṇva
10 verses: br̥hatī alternating with satobr̥hatī, arranged in pragāthas. Parallel to 51.

1. Just as at Manu Vivasvant's you drank pressed soma, able one, just as at Trita's you will enjoy the poem, Indra, (even so) at Āyu's you bring yourself to exhilaration—
2. (Just as) at Pr̥ṣadhra's, at Medhya's, at Mātariśvan's, Indra, you became exhilarated on the (soma) being pressed, just as at Daśasipra's, at Daśoṇya's, at Syūmaraśmi's, at R̥jūnas' (you drank) the soma.

3. He who took as his own the hymns, who boldly drank the soma, for whom Viṣṇu strode his three steps, according to the institutes of their alliance…
4. In whose praises, Indra, you will take pleasure when the prize (is set), you prizewinner of a hundred resolves…
   Eager for fame, we call to you, as milkers call on a cow who gives good milk.

5. Who is a giver to us, he is our father—great, powerful, performing the master's part.
   Even without our begging, let the powerful bounteous one who possesses many goods give to us of cow and horse.
6. He to whom you are ready to give, o good one, that one spurs the thriving of wealth.
   Seeking goods, with praises we call on the lord of goods possessing a hundred resolves: Indra.

7. Never do you stay away; you protect both breeds [=gods and men].
   O fourth Āditya, the invocation destined for you, for Indra, has mounted to the immortal (world?) in heaven.
8. For whatever pious one, o bounteous Indra who long for songs, you muster your abilities, able one—listen to our songs and lovely praise, o good one, to our call, like that of the Kaṇvas.

9. The age-old thought has been expressed as praise. Speak the sacred formulation to Indra.
   Many lofty (songs) of truth have roared; the wise thoughts of the praiser have been released.
10. Indra shook together lofty riches, together the two opponents [=Heaven and Earth], together the sun.
    Together the gleaming pure soma-drinks, together those mixed with milk, have exhilarated Indra.

VIII.53 (1022) Indra

Medhya Kāṇva
8 verses: bṛhatī alternating with satobṛhatī, arranged in pragāthas.

A fairly conventional Indra hymn, which begins with a string of superlatives applied to Indra and praise for his previous deeds (vss. 1–2) and then proceeds to the invitation to the soma sacrifice (vss. 3–4). The poet asks Indra for the usual benefits: wealth and aid, but he is especially concerned with winning in prize-contests and battle raids. See especially verses 6–8.

1. You, the best of bounteous ones and most preeminent of bulls, best stronghold-splitter, o bounteous Indra, finder of cows, lord of wealth do we beseech for wealth.
2. You who set Āyu, Kutsa, Atithigva to shaking, while growing stronger every day, you do we invoke, seeking prizes—you of the fallow bay horses, possessing a hundred resolves.

3. Let the stones pour out the honey's juice of all of us—the drops that have been pressed in the distance among (other) peoples, and those that have been pressed nearby.
4. Smash all hatreds and bring them low. Let all (of us) win goods.
   Even among the Śīṣṭas there are invigorating shoots for you, where you become sated on soma.

5. Indra, come closer here with your help that provides secure wisdom—here, most wealful one with your most wealful superior powers, here, friendly one with your friendly powers.
6. Make the lord of the settlements surpassing in the contest, governing all domains, sharer in offspring.
   With your powers lengthen (the lifetime of those) who, equipped with solemn words, purify your resolve following the proper order,

7. (Your resolve) to help which best brings success. Might we be yours in the bouts.
   May we consider ourselves winners through our libations and invocations to the gods.
8. For I, seeking the prize, enter the contest for the sacred formulation always with your help, you of the fallow bays.
   Seeking horses, seeking cows, I pledge myself just to you, at the beginning of raids.

VIII.54 (1023) Indra (1–2, 5–8), All Gods (3–4)

Mātariśvan Kāṇva
8 verses: bṛhatī alternating with satobṛhatī, arranged in pragāthas

Despite being technically twinned with VIII.53, this hymn has little in common with its predecessor. However, verse 6 not only shares the concern for winning that characterized the previous hymn, but also shares some of its phraseology: it begins with a compound of ājí "contest" and two compounds with -pati "lord," closely paralleling VIII.53.6a, and much of the second half of the verse matches the second half of VIII.53.7.

The three pragāthas dedicated to Indra (vss. 1–2, 5–6, 7–8) are interrupted by one to the All Gods, an elementary listing of various groups of gods (vs. 3) and individual gods and natural forces (vs. 4). The verses to Indra beg him to display his generosity.

1. This heroic deed of yours, Indra, the bards sing with songs.
   Beating time they furthered the nourishment dripping with ghee. The Pauras approach with their visionary thoughts.

2. With their good (ritual) work they approach Indra for help—they at whose pressings you reach exhilaration.
   Just as you became exhilarated at Saṃvarta's, at Kr̥śa's, just so become exhilarated among us.

3. All you gods joined in revelry, come here to us.
   The Vasus, the Rudras will come here to help us. Let the Maruts hear our call.
4. Let Pūṣan, Viṣṇu, Sarasvatī aid my calling, let the Seven Streams.
   Let the Waters, the Wind, the Mountains, the Lord of the Forest, let Earth hear my call.

5. What bounteous generosity is yours, most bounteous Indra, with that become a feasting companion for our strengthening, become Bhaga for giving, o Vr̥tra-smasher.
6. Because just you are lord of contests, lord of men, convey us to the prize, o you of good resolve.
   By their (ritual) pursuit, by their oblations and by their pursuits of the gods, they have become far famed as winners.

7. For the hopes of the stranger come true: in Indra is the lifetime of the peoples.
   Approach us, to help, bounteous one. Milk out swelling refreshment.
8. Might we do honor to you, Indra, with praises. You are ours, you of a hundred resolves.
   Great, sturdy, enduring, unabashed generosity—make it spill down for Praskaṇva.

VIII.55 (1024) Dānastuti of Praskaṇva

Kr̥śa Kāṇva
5 verses: gāyatrī 1–2, 4, anuṣṭubh 3, 5

Although the Anukramaṇī identifies this hymn as a dānastuti of Praskaṇva by Kr̥śa Kāṇva, as Geldner points out, it is more likely a dānastuti by Praskaṇva (mentioned in the last verse of the previous hymn, VIII.54.8) to Dasyave Vr̥ka, mentioned in the first verse of this one.

This little hymn begins almost like a parody of the great proclamations of great deeds such as I.32: the poet briskly announces that he's finished with his catalogue of Indra's heroic deeds and can now turn to the praise of his patron's generosity. The following two verses (2–3) list a miscellany of gifts, including some odd ones. He then praises the Kaṇvas in general (vs. 4) and returns to the gift in the final verse

(5). Its sevenfold nature (if that's what the word means here: it's disputed) is not achieved until the end: the items listed in verses 2–3 add up to six groups, but with the mares of 5ab we reach seven.

1. Since I have just abundantly surveyed the heroism of Indra, your generosity will now follow, Dasyave Vr̥ka.
2. A hundred gleaming white oxen shine like the stars in heaven;
   with their might they seem to prop up heaven itself.
3. A hundred bamboo stalks, a hundred dogs, a hundred tanned hides, a hundred ewes with tufts like balbaja-grass, four hundred ruddy (cows) (did you give me).
4. You have the gods well on your side, you descendants of Kaṇva. Passing from strength to strength like horses they keep pace.
5. From here on they will keep paying tribute to the sevenfold (gift). Great is the praise of (the gift) that lacks nothing.
   When the dusky (mares) dust over the paths, they are not to be encompassed by the eye.

VIII.56 (1025) Dānastuti of Praskaṇva (1–4), Agni and Sūrya (5)

Pr̥ṣadhra Kāṇva
5 verses: gāyatrī 1–4, paṅkti 5

Like the preceding hymn, this is more likely a dānastuti by Praskaṇva of his patron Dasyave Vr̥ka (once again mentioned in vs. 1) than of Praskaṇva. The hymn follows the general pattern of VIII.55: the generosity of the patron is praised in the first verse, and the details of the gifts follow, especially in verses 3 and 4. The latter verse describes the presentation of an adorned female whose identity is disputed, as the readings of the R̥gveda and the khila collections differ. Some scholars consider her to be Pūtakratu's wife, thus the patron's mother or stepmother, but the daughter of Pūtakratu's wife (following the R̥gveda reading with some minor adjustment), the patron's sister or half-sister, might make more sense. The final verse (5) to Agni and Sūrya marks the moment of the kindling of the ritual fire at sunrise, when the ritual gifts are distributed.

1. Your immoderate generosity has just been seen, Dasyave Vr̥ka—
   Your capacious power is like heaven in its extent.
2. To me Dasyave Vr̥ka, son of Pūtakratu, granted ten thousands from his own wealth.
3. A hundred donkeys for me, a hundred wooly ewes, a hundred slaves, and garlands beyond that.

4. Then there was also led forth the adorned (daughter) of Pūtakratu's wife [=Dasyave Vr̥ka's sister] just as if she belonged to a troop of horses.
5. Agni, the perceptive, has just been perceived, the oblation-conveyor along with his chariot.
   Agni shone with his blazing flame, having his own sun aloft, as the Sun shone in heaven.

VIII.57 (1026) Aśvins

Medhya Kāṇva
4 verses: triṣṭubh

This sequence of verses inviting the Aśvins to the soma sacrifice is unremarkable save for a few features. The first verse explicitly establishes the context as the Third Pressing, which, as we have discussed elsewhere, was probably a recent addition to R̥gvedic ritual. And especially in verse 2 there are insoluble textual problems. Since the verse itself is not terribly interesting in content, the difficulties can safely be left aside here.

1. You two, o gods worthy of the sacrifice, yoked by your age-old purpose, with your chariot come here to the powerful (soma?), o Nāsatyas, with your skills. You will drink this Third Pressing here.
2. You two have the gods, the thrice eleven, (called upon); those realest of the real have appeared in front.
   Taking pleasure in our sacrifice, our pressing, drink the soma, o Aśvins, as ones for whom the fire glows.
3. This deed of yours, o Aśvins, is to be wondered at. The bull of heaven, of the dusky realm, of the earth, and the thousand chants, which (are performed?) at the quest for cattle—drive up to all those, to drink (the soma).
4. Here is a portion deposited for you, you worthy of the sacrifice; here are hymns, o Nāsatyas—drive up to them.
   Drink the honeyed soma among us. Foster the pious man with your skills.

VIII.58 (1027) "Fragment"

Not mentioned in the Anukramaṇī, so without r̥ṣi attribution
3 verses: triṣṭubh

This fragment of three verses is not transmitted as a unity in the khila collections, with verses 1–2 and 3 located separately. Verse 3 in fact appears to belong to the Aśvin hymn VIII.57, with which it fits well: the "left-over" soma it mentions is a standard offering in the Third Pressing treated in VIII.57.

As for the other two verses, Geldner memorably characterizes verse 1 as a riddle without an answer, and verse 2 as an answer without a preceding riddle. This seems persuasive, and the two verses may have been secondarily connected because of the bahudhā́ "in many forms, in many ways" that appears in the middle of the first pāda of each verse. Proferes argues (2007: 56), again persuasively, that verse 1 inquires about the compact or agreement between the Sacrificer and the priests that is ritually dramatized in the later śrauta system in the ritual of the Tānūnaptra, in which a formal alliance is created among these participants, and he suggests that this verse is a precursor of that later ceremony. Verse 2, on the other hand, has been taken, since Sāyaṇa, as the answer to the riddle posed in X.88.18ab "How many fires and how many suns? How many dawns, and how many waters?" and the tone of this verse is in harmony with the philosophical speculation characteristic of such Xth Maṇḍala hymns.

1. This sacrifice here, which the priests, configuring it in many ways, carry out with one mind, and the Brahman who was yoked as reciter—what is the Sacrificer's compact there [=with them]?
2. Just one fire is kindled in many forms; just one sun has projected through all.
   Just one dawn radiates over this whole (world). In truth just One has developed into this whole (world).
3. Your light-filled, three-wheeled, well-naved chariot, providing a beacon, easy to sit in, bringing abundant valuables, at whose yoking (Dawn) of bright bounties is born—that I call upon, for you two to drink the "left-over" (soma).

VIII.59 (1028) Indra and Varuṇa

Suparṇa Kāṇva
7 verses: jagatī

This last Vālakhilya hymn presents a number of uncertainties in transmission, and so it is difficult to know whether its sometimes awkward phrasing belonged to the original poem or is the result of flawed transmission. In contrast, the hymn has a rather tight structure, with an apparent omphalos: verses 3 and 5 have a number of lexical correspondences, and in particular they both announce a truth (satyám). These correspondences form a ring that defines verse 4, the central verse of the hymn, as the omphalos, as well as containing the "truth" proclaimed in the adjacent verses. All three verses refer to a group, or groups, of seven in riddling fashion. At least the female "seven" in verses 3 and 4—seven voices, seven sisters—can be identified as the soma-purifying waters, conceived of as the "seven rivers" of Vedic mythology. (They are called "voices" because of the noise they make, just as one of the words for "river," nadī́, is derived from the root nad "roar," an etymology explicitly recognized by Vedic speakers.) The three heptads of verse 5 may refer to the same streams, multiplied, or may evoke the number of gifts Indra and Varuṇa should bestow in response.

The omphalos verse is left incomplete: the poet urges the two gods to "establish . . . " (dhattam [if this is the correct reading, as we think]) but does not specify the object desired. This truncated wish returns at the end of the hymn, however. The final verse contains two occurrences of this same verb, with a plethora of objects. This completion of the unfinished expression of verse 4 may be seen as another example of "poetic repair" (Jamison 2006).

Indra and Varuṇa do not form a natural pair, and it is not surprising that very few hymns are dedicated to the two alone (I.17, IV.41–42, VI.68, VII.82–85, and a tr̥ca in III.62 [1–3]). In the more prominent hymns to both divinities, especially the justly celebrated IV.42, their contrastive qualities, especially their different types of kingship, are highlighted. Here by contrast the two gods are essentially featureless (the possible exception is 2cd), their only activities being to accept the soma offering and give prosperity to the sacrificers in return. In fact, vocabulary appropriate to a more standard pair of gods, the Aśvins, is adapted here, especially the vocative "you two lords of beauty" (śubhas patī), a common epithet otherwise confined to the Aśvins.

1. These portions here run to you two, Indra and Varuṇa; run forth to you when the (soma-drinks) are pressed, for your great (generosity?).
   At every sacrifice you bustle toward the pressings, when you do your best for the sacrificer who presses (soma).
2. The plants and waters, offering tribute to these two, have reached greatness, o Indra and Varuṇa—the two who run on the far side of dusky space, at the far limit of their road, the two of whom no non-god vaunts himself as their rival.
3. This is really true, Indra and Varuṇa: the seven "voices" of Kr̥śa milk out a wave of honey for you two.
   With these, you lords of beauty, help the pious man who, undeceivable, keeps watch over you with his thoughts.
4. The ghee-sprinkling companions of soma, possessing lively drops, the seven sisters in the seat of truth, who are ghee-dripping for you two, Indra and Varuṇa—with these establish . . . . Do your best for the sacrificer.
5. We have proclaimed a true thing for great good fortune, have proclaimed greatness and Indrian strength for the two vibrant ones.
   Help us who drip ghee, o Indra and Varuṇa, with three groups of seven, you lords of beauty.

6. O Indra and Varuṇa, in that you in the beginning gave to the seers inspired thought, the thinking of speech, what is heard—the insightful (seers) launched these as poems as they stretched out the sacrifice. I looked upon them with fervor.
7. Indra and Varuṇa, establish undistracted benevolence and thriving of wealth among the sacrificers.
   Establish offspring, prosperity, and development among us. Lengthen our lifetime for long life.

The grouping of the VIIIth Maṇḍala hymns that follow the Vālakhilya hymns (60–103) is not as clear as in the earlier section of the maṇḍala, in great part because the poets are far less likely to identify themselves. Nonetheless, the order of deities and the number of verses per hymn provide good evidence. We follow Oldenberg's (1888: 216–18) proposed structure.

The next collection of hymns (VIII.60–66) is ascribed to Pragātha and several of his sons. All but the first are dedicated to Indra.

VIII.60 (669) Agni

Bharga Pragātha
20 verses: br̥hatī alternating with satobr̥hatī, arranged in pragāthas

The focus throughout most of this hymn is Agni in his sacrificial role, a theme strongly established in the first five verses, and in his close relationship to the household and clan. As a consequence of this latter relationship he also appears as the protector of those entities against external threats: see verses 6–10, 12–14, and especially the two final verses 19–20. The usual prayers for wealth and aid are not absent, however.

1. Agni, drive here with your fires: we would choose you as our Hotar.
   Let the oblation-bearing (ladle), held forth, anoint you, the best sacrificer, for you to sit upon the ritual grass,
2. For the ladles are moving toward you at the ceremony, o son of strength, o Aṅgiras.
   We supplicate the child of nourishment, ghee-haired Agni, foremost at the sacrifices.

3. O Agni, pure one, you are the sage poet and ritual expert, the Hotar who receives (the command) "sacrifice!"— delightful, the best sacrificer, to be invoked at the ceremonies by our inspired poets with their thoughts, o blazing one.
4. Without deception, convey the eager gods here for them to pursue (the offerings), o youngest one, untiring.

Come here to the well-placed pleasing offerings, o good one. Take delight as you are spurred on [/set in place] by our insights.

5. Just you, of great extent, are the entruthed sage poet, o guardian Agni.
Just you do the inspired poets and the ritual experts seek to attract here, o you who shine while being kindled.
6. Blaze bright, brightest blazing one; shine joy for the clan. Give to the praiser. You are great!
Let my patrons, overpowering their rivals and endowed with good fires, be under the shelter of the gods.

7. Just as you incinerate the brushwood grown thick on the ground, o Agni, in the same way burn whoever stalks (us), lying to us and ill-intentioned, o you who deploy the might of alliance.
8. Do not make us subject to a mortal who is a cheat possessed of demonic power, nor to one who utters evil.
O youngest one, protect us with your protectors that are unfailing, overwhelming, but kindly.

9. Protect us with one, Agni, and protect us with a second.
Protect us with three hymns, o lord of nourishments; protect us with four, o good one.
10. Protect us from every hostile demon. Ever further us when prizes (are at stake), for we approach just you, the one nearest to the divine assemblage and our friend, for strengthening.

11. (Bring) here to us praiseworthy wealth that strengthens vital force, o pure Agni, and give it to us, o apportioner—(wealth) much craved and very glorious—with your good guidance—
12. (Wealth) with which we will vanquish in battles those who vaunt themselves, as we overcome the aims of the stranger.
Strengthen us because of our pleasing offering, o you who have the goods of skill. Quicken our insights so they find goods.

13. Like a bull sharpening his horns, shaking them again and again, is Agni.
His sharp jaws are not to be withstood: well fanged is the young (son) of strength.
14. For your fangs are not to be withstood when you spread yourself out, o bullish Agni.
Make our oblation well poured, o Hotar. Win for us many things worth choosing.

15. You lie in the pieces of wood and in your two mothers [=kindling sticks]; the mortals kindle you.
 Tireless, you convey the oblations of him who makes oblation. Right after that you shine [/rule] among the gods.
16. The seven Hotars reverently invoke just you, o Agni, the unabashed one displaying great abandon.
 You split apart the rock with your heat and your flame. Agni, stand out beyond the peoples.

17. Agni after Agni, not one poor, would we invoke for you [=the assembled clans]—we with our ritual grass twisted, with our pleasing offerings set in place—Agni here in each and every (clan), the Hotar of the settled domains.
18. He [=singer?] keeps company with your intention in the shelter made of good melody. O perceptive Agni, the *pieces of wood are for you.
 By impulsion bring here to us the prize of many forms to be nearest to us, for our aid.

19. O Agni, o singer and god, you are the clanlord who burns the demons, the houselord who doesn't go abroad; you are great—the protector from heaven, but devoted to the house.
20. Let demonic power not enter into us, nor the sorcery of those who deploy sorcery, o you who have the goods of the glowing one [=Pūṣan].
 Keep thirst and hunger away, far beyond the pasture-lands; o Agni, keep away those who deploy demonic power.

VIII.61 (670) Indra

Bharga Pragātha
18 verses: br̥hatī alternating with satobr̥hatī, arranged in pragāthas

This hymn begins with the invitation to soma (vss. 1–3), but the poet soon turns his attention to the gifts Indra will bestow, a theme that dominates the rest of the first half of the hymn (through vs. 8). The sacrificial context returns at this point, and in verses 11–12 the sacrificers seek to harness Indra as their comrade, whose powers they wish to marshal for their protection against hostile forces (see esp. vss. 13, 15–18).

The syntax is fairly straightforward, but there are a number of rare words and hapaxes (e.g., the last two words of vs. 9) and pleasing verbal plays. The poet especially likes variable repetition (of the type "unassailable assailant" vs. 3).

1. If Indra nearby will hear this twofold speech of ours, the most powerful benefactor will come here to the soma-drinking by reason of our fully focused insight.

2. For the two Holy Places [=Heaven and Earth] fashioned the bull as sovereign king, for strength.
   And as the first among the highest you take your seat, for your mind has desire for soma.

3. Drench yourself in the pressed stalk, o Indra who bring many goods, for we know you, o master of the fallow bays, as victorious in battles, as the unassailable assailant.
4. You whose reality cannot be confounded, o bounteous Indra, it will be just as you wish according to your intention.
   Might we win the prize with your help, o you of fair lips, as we go quickly, o master of the stones.

5. Exert your ability, o master of ability, o Indra, through all your help, for we follow after you who are like Bhaga, glorious and finding goods, o champion.
6. As multiplicity yourself, you are a multiplier of horseflesh, of cattle; you are a golden wellspring, o god, for no one will shun a gift in your (control). Whatever I beg for, bring that here.

7. Come on and find fortune, to give goods to the attentive man.
   Boil up and over, generous one, for the seeking of cattle, up and over for the seeking of horseflesh, Indra.
8. You are ready to give many thousands and hundreds of herds.
   We of inspired speech have brought the stronghold-splitter here, singing Indra for his help.

9. If without inspiration or if inspired, someone has dedicated his speech to you, Indra, he will reach elation in devotion to you—o you of a hundred resolves, whose battle-fury is upfront, whose (motto is) "I shall win!"
10. The strong-armed stronghold-splitter who causes destruction—if he will hear my call, we, seeking goods, will call upon the goods-lord of a hundred resolves, upon Indra, with songs of praise.

11. Let us not be regarded as evil, or stingy, or greedy, if just now we will make Indra, the bull, into our companion at the pressing.
12. We have yoked the strong one, victorious in battles, the undeceivable one who wants what he's owed.
    The winner, the best charioteer recognizes a prizewinning (racehorse), even when it's a blur—which is just the one he will attain.

13. Whatever we are afraid of, Indra, make us unafraid of that.
    Bounteous one, exert your ability then through your help for us. Smash away hatreds, away slights.
14. For you, lord of largesse, are (lord) of great largesse and of the dwelling place of him who does honor.
    We, who have pressed (the soma), invoke you, bounteous Indra, who long for songs.

15. Indra, spy and Vṛtra-smasher, protector from afar, is worth our choosing.
    He will guard the last one of us and the midmost. Let him protect us from behind and from in front.
16. Protect us from behind, from beneath, from above, from in front, from everywhere, Indra.
    Put far away from us fear of the gods, far away the ungodly missiles.

17. Today after today, tomorrow after tomorrow, rescue us, o Indra—and in the future.
    Through all the days, by day and by night, you will guard our singers, o lord of settlements.
18. Shattering champion, bounteous patron of powerful bounty, equipped for heroic action—o you of a hundred resolves, both your arms are bulls, which hold fast to the mace.

VIII.62 (671) Indra

Pragātha Kāṇva
12 verses: paṅkti, except bṛhatī 7–9, arranged in tṛcas

A pleasantly limpid praise of Indra, which emphasizes Indra's pleasure in praise and sacrifice (e.g., vss. 1, 4, 6) and the usual reciprocal benefits exchanged between the god and his worshipers. The relationship between Indra and the sacrificers seems to become stronger as the hymn progresses, its growth tracked through the word "yoke." In the early verses of the hymn Indra is isolated in his accomplishments: in verse 2 he is said to be "without yokemate" and to accomplish his deeds alone; in verse 3 he is about to win even with an unsatisfactory horse. But after he comes to the sacrifice, the exchange relationship between worshiper and god comes to the fore (vs. 5) and already in verse 6 the poet announces that Indra makes the soma-offerer his partner and "yokemate." By the penultimate verse (11) the poet himself, in the first person, proposes that the god and the mortal "yoke ourselves together," to achieve the winnings Indra was on the point of winning alone in verse 3. The poet somewhat hubristically claims that any enemy will yield to "us two," implicitly claiming a kind of equality between the man and the most powerful of gods.

The final verse, as often, is a summary, and it seems to establish the truth value of the whole preceding hymn, as well as the précis given in the last half-verse. The refrain found in every verse establishes the cheerful tone from the start.

1. Present a praise invocation to him so that he will find pleasure.
   By solemn recitations the providers of soma increase the great vitality of Indra.
   – Auspicious are the gifts of Indra.
2. Without yokemate, without equal among superior men, irrepressible—he alone has grown strong over the many peoples, over all created things, with his might.
   – Auspicious are the gifts of Indra.
3. He of lively gifts is on the point of winning, even with a steed that's not spurred on.
   That of yours should be proclaimed, Indra, when you are going to perform heroic deeds.
   – Auspicious are the gifts of Indra.

4. Drive here! We shall make strengthening sacred formulations for you, Indra, in which you will delight, you strongest one. There is something auspicious here for one who seeks fame.
   – Auspicious are the gifts of Indra.
5. Bold also is the mind of (you,) the bold, o Indra, when you act for the man who renders service with sharp soma drops, who attends with homages.
   – Auspicious are the gifts of Indra.
6. He who is equal to song gazes down on the (soma-)springs like a man into wells.
   Finding pleasure, he makes a partner and yokemate of the skillful soma-bearer.
   – Auspicious are the gifts of Indra.

7. All the gods conceded heroism and resolve to you.
   You became the herdsman of all, o you praised by many.
   – Auspicious are the gifts of Indra.
8. I sing that utmost strength of yours, Indra, for the divine assembly, that you smash Vṛtra with your might, o lord of ability.
   – Auspicious are the gifts of Indra.
9. He will make those who marvel at him into festive assemblies, as it were, throughout the generations of men.
   Indra knows his own distinctive sign: he is famed (for it).
   – Auspicious are the gifts of Indra.

10. They have increased your new-born strength, Indra, increased you and your resolve many times, o you of many cows, under your shelter, bounteous one.
    – Auspicious are the gifts of Indra.
11. I and you, o Vṛtra-smasher—let us two yoke ourselves together for winnings.
    Even a hostile man, o master of the stones, will yield to the two of us, o champion.
    – Auspicious are the gifts of Indra.
12. This is really true—and thus we shall praise this Indra—not false:
    he is the great weapon of death for the man who does not press soma, but many are his lights for the man who does press.
    – Auspicious are the gifts of Indra.

VIII.63 (672) Indra (except the Gods 12)

Pragātha Kāṇva
12 verses: gāyatrī, except anuṣṭubh 1, 4, 5, 7 and triṣṭubh 12, arranged in tṛcas.

Compared to the simple diction of the last hymn, this one seems deliberately stiff and full of labored expressions whose decoding slows the pace of the hymn, perhaps on purpose. The hymn's structure, by contrast, is rather simple and follows a straightforward trajectory, with each of the four tṛcas expressing a different theme.

The hymn opens with a mysterious figure, the "tracker," who is smeared or anointed with mental constructs—intentions and insights—by two different agents, who can be plausibly identified as the gods and Manu in his role as father of mankind and the first sacrificer. This liminal figure, the tracker, is most likely a ritual mediator between the divine and the human, and Agni makes the most sense as the referent. The second verse confirms the ritual setting, and in the third verse Indra makes his first appearance, in his role as opener of the Vala cave. This mythological reference calls dawn to mind, and suggests the time of the current sacrifice. Thus, the first tṛca establishes the scene as the Morning Pressing.

The second tṛca (vss. 4–6) then calls Indra to that sacrifice; each verse contains the word arká "chant." In the third tṛca (vss. 7–10) various deeds of Indra are celebrated, especially his defeat of enemies for the Five Peoples (vs. 7) and his involvement, with Viṣṇu, in the killing of the Emuṣa boar (vs. 9), a myth which is a specialty of this part of Maṇḍala VIII (VIII.69.14–15; 77.1–2, 6–8, 10–11; 96.2). Here only the preliminaries, in which a rice porridge is fetched by Viṣṇu to nourish Indra, are treated. The middle verse 8 mentions Indra's manly deeds in general, but also contains the phrase "you furthered the turning of the wheel" (cakrásya vartaním), which reminds us of the later designation cakra-vartin "turner of the wheel" for a universal monarch. The last tṛca (vss. 10–12) introduces the Maruts and finally the gods in general as associates of Indra and calls on all of them for help.

1. The tracker [=Agni?], stationed in front, has been smeared with the intentions of the great ones [=gods], he on whose doors father Manu smeared insightful thoughts to the gods.
2. The stones with soma on their backs have sat up, as if to the measure of heaven.
   The solemn words and sacred formulations are now to be recited.
3. Indra, knowing how, uncovered the cows for the Aṅgirases.
   That manly act of his is to be praised.

4. As of old, let Indra, strengthener of poets, fortifier of speech, the kindly one, come among us for help at the pouring of our chant.
5. And therefore, following the intention of your will, those eager to sacrifice (have cried out) "hail!";
   their chants have cried out to (you), who are swollen with strength, Indra, to give of the cowpen.
6. All heroic deeds, both done and to be done, are in Indra, whom the chants know as the very ceremony itself.

7. When cries were sent surging to Indra by the clan belonging to the Five Peoples, through the power of their inspiration, through the power of his measure he laid the strangers low. He is peaceful dwelling.
8. Here is the praise that follows you: you did these manly deeds;
   you furthered the turning of the wheel.
9. (Viṣṇu) strode widely to the rice porridge for this bull to live on.
   (Indra) took it, as cattle do barley.

10. Seeking help as we present this (praise hymn), through you (all) might we have skill as our father for the strengthening of the one accompanied by the Maruts [=Indra].
11. Yes indeed! through our chanters we cry out again and again for your establishment according to the ritual sequence, o champion.
    Let us conquer with you as our yokemate, Indra.
12. For us are the Rudras [=Maruts] in their profusion and the mountains of one accord at the Vṛtra-smashing, where the call is "Carry (the day)!"
    The steadfast one who has been established for the praiser and presser—with him, Indra, as their chief let the gods help us.

VIII.64 (673) Indra

Pragātha Kāṇva
12 verses: gāyatrī, arranged in tr̥cas

A hymn artful in its extreme simplicity. Its diction, its syntax, and its structure are all straightforward. It consists of four tr̥cas. The first (vss. 1–3) begs Indra for gifts and aid against enemies and celebrates his preeminence. The second (vss. 4–6) calls him to the sacrifice. The third (vss. 7–9) consists of rhetorical questions about Indra's whereabouts and the possibility of his consorting with other sacrificers. The final one (vss. 10–12) presents him with the just-pressed soma.

The transparency of the hymn is produced in great part by its syntax: many of the verses contain several short, generally pāda-length sentences (vs. 1 is a typical example), and more extreme concision is encountered in the abrupt series of imperatives "come! run! drink!" in the last tr̥ca (vss. 10c and 12c; cf. also 4a). Even when the sentence extends beyond the pāda, it often deploys simple parallel constituents across two pādas (e.g., vss. 3ab, 6ab). There is also no overt subordination in the hymn (unless we count the nahí ["for not"] clause of 2c). There are almost no past tenses (only in 5c [perfect] and 9a [aorist]); the finite verb forms are otherwise limited to imperatives, indicative presents, and one presential perfect (8c).

The sentiments expressed and the vocabulary are likewise uncomplex and standard. Only the penultimate verse (11), with its apparent references to locales for finding soma, causes any interpretive problems.

1. Let the praises whip you up. Show your generosity, o master of the stones.
   Strike down the haters of sacred formulations.
2. With your foot stamp down the ungenerous niggards. You are great, for no one is equal to you.
3. You are master of the pressed soma-drops, and you, Indra, of the unpressed ones.
   You are the king of the peoples.

4. Come here! Go forth—your dwelling is in heaven—as you take heed of the separate communities.
   You fill both worlds.
5. This very mountain, this peak, which holds a hundred, a thousand (cows),
   did you shatter apart for your praisers.
6. We by day at the pressing and we by night call upon you:
   fulfill our desire!

7. Where is this young, strong-necked bull who cannot be bowed?
   Who is the formulator who serves him?
8. To whose pressing does the bull, relishing it, descend?
   Who finds their pleasure in Indra?

9. Whom have your gifts accompanied, whom have masses of brave men, o Vṛtra-smasher.
   Who at the recitation is closest (to you)?

10. This soma here is being pressed for you amid the people of Manu, among the Pūrus.
    Of that—come! run!—drink!
11. Here is your dear (soma) in the reed-filled (pond?), here in the Suṣomā (River?)
    the most invigorating in the foamy (lake?).
12. (Drink) this delightful one today for (you to show) great generosity, for thrilling invigoration—come to it, Indra! run! drink!

VIII.65 (674) Indra

Pragātha Kāṇva
12 verses: gāyatrī, arranged in tṛcas

This hymn is at least superficially a twin to the last one: it is attributed to the same poet, consists of the same number of verses, and is in the same meter. And indeed it shows important similarities to VIII.64. It, too, tends to short, often pāda-length, syntactic units and to balanced parallel constituents (e.g., 2a, c, 6ab), and there are even agreements in wording: the abrupt verse-final imperative "drink!" of VIII.64.10 and 12 is repeated in 65.5 and 8 (with the former also containing éhi "come!" like the examples in VIII.64), and "we call upon" appears in the same verse (6) in the same position in both hymns.

However, VIII.65 introduces some complications absent from VIII.64. Unlike 64, which had no subordination at all, 65 begins with a subordinating conjunction (yád), which occurs three times in the first two verses, and verse 2 finds its main clause only in verse 3. (See also vs. 7.) Though present indicatives and imperatives predominate, the range of verbal forms is somewhat widened as well, with injunctives (9b, 10c), aorists (8b, 12c), a subjunctive (2b), a preterital perfect (probably, 11c), and a number of dative infinitives, as well as two of the much discussed -ṣé forms (5a).

The diction can be more resistant than that of VIII.64, as in verse 2 where the choices given to Indra are puzzling. Are these places (as in the also puzzling 64.11) or sources of exhilaration, and are there two choices or three? What do the opaque phrases, especially "the sea of the stalk," refer to?

Like VIII.64 this hymn consists of four tṛcas. The last (vss. 10–12) is clearly defined as a dānastuti. The other three are not thematically differentiated. They all call on Indra to attend our sacrifice, and the major concern running throughout is that rival sacrificers are competing with us for his presence (e.g., vss. 1, 2, 7, 9). These first three tṛcas, before the dānastuti, display ring composition: the command

"drive here straightaway" (ā́ yāhi tū́yam) in 1c is echoed in 9b "come here straightaway" (tū́yam ā́ gahi).

1. When, Indra, you are being called forward or back, upward or down by men, drive here straightaway with your swift (horses).
2. Whether you will bring yourself to exhilaration on the outpouring of heaven in the presence of Svarṇara, or on the sea of the stalk,
3. I call you here with songs, you great and broad, like a cow to give sustenance, and to drink of the soma, Indra.

4. Your greatness, Indra, your grandeur, god—let your fallow bays, bearing it, carry it here on your chariot.
5. Indra, you are to be hymned and praised: great, powerful, performing the master's part.
   Come to our pressed soma! Drink!
6. We, who have pressed soma and have a pleasing offering, call you to take your seat here upon this our ritual grass.

7. Even though you are the support common to each and every one, Indra, we summon you to us.
8. Here is the somian honey for you—the men have milked it out with stones.
   Finding enjoyment, Indra, drink it!
9. Look beyond all the strangers who are also attentive to poetic inspiration. Come here straightaway.
   Place lofty fame in us.

10. The king is a giver to me—of dappled cows (with horns) wrapped in gold.
    Let the bounteous patron not suffer harm, o gods.
11. On top of the thousand dappled cows, I took glistening, lofty, wide, gleaming gold.
12. The descendants of Durgaha, very generous with a thousand for me, have made fame for themselves among the gods.

VIII.66 (675) Indra

Kali Prāgātha
15 verses: bṛhatī alternating with satobṛhatī, arranged in pragāthas, except anuṣṭubh 15

This hymn of fifteen verses is longer than the Indra hymns that precede it (VIII.62–65, all twelve verses long), and is therefore out of place in the collection. Oldenberg suggests (Noten ad loc.) that it may consist of two hymns (or even three): verses 1–8 and 9–14, with verse 15 appended in a different meter. However, as he also notes (1888: 217), there is no strong internal support for this division, and it may very well be a single hymn.

The invitation to Indra to the soma sacrifice is the primary theme of the hymn. It begins with a call for Indra's help (vs. 1) and continues with descriptions of the sacrificial offerings (vss. 5–8, 11–12), along with the usual hope that Indra will choose our sacrifice over those of others (see esp. vs. 12). The poet remarks particularly on the regular and predictable nature of the sacrifice (vs. 7), and in a striking image in verse 8 suggests to Indra that, since even the apparently uncontrollable wolf follows its own routine, Indra should make it a habit to attend our sacrifice as he has before. The regular nature of the sacrifice has its drawbacks, of course: many others before us and many others around us have performed and continue to perform it, but the poet assures Indra in verse 11 that although he and his comrades are only the most recent among the sacrificers, their formulations are novel and unprecedented (see also vs. 5). The competition between us and the others is emphasized by the numerous occurrences of "many" in this hymn.

Interspersed are verses celebrating Indra's power and his aid to his worshipers (vss. 2–4, 9–10). Not all of this praise is entirely clear, especially that in 3ab, where Indra is identified with two hapaxes, our translations of which are quite provisional. In the final pragātha (vss. 13–14) the poet makes his strongest plea for Indra's help. The final verse (15), in a different meter as noted, is puzzling. It reassures an otherwise unknown group of people, the Kalis, that if they press soma, whatever is threatening them will disappear.

1. With staying power and force (I call for) Indra, finder of goods, for help; as (we) sing loftily at the rite with its pressed soma, I call (for him) as if for the takings of a decisive victor, 2. Whom neither obdurate nor substantial hindrances will obstruct when the fair-lipped one is in the exhilaration of the stalk, who, tearing them out for the laboring presser, is the giver of praiseworthy (goods) to the singer.

3. The able one, who is a horse's curry comb [?] or who is a golden stake [?], he sets the opening of the cattle-pen to shaking—Indra the Vr̥tra-smasher.
4. He who casts upward for the pious man the goods assembled by many, even when they are buried deep, Indra, with mace, fair lips, and fallow bays, will act as he wishes according to his will.

5. O champion praised by many, whatever belonging to men you held dear even before,
   we assemble that for you, Indra: the sacrifice, the solemn word, and the surpassing speech,

6. As well as the soma drinks for your exhilaration, o mace-wielder invoked by many, heaven-ruling soma-drinker.
   For you become the best giver of desirable goods to the creator of sacred formulations, to the presser.

7. At this time yesterday we made the mace-bearer drink here; today, in the same way, bring the pressed soma to him. Now attend upon the renowned one.
8. Even a wolf—wild and sheep-stealing—attends to its own patterns.
   Come here, having found pleasure in this praise song of ours with its shimmering insight, Indra.

9. What manly deed of his now remains undone by Indra?
   Indeed, by what fame has the Vr̥tra-smasher not been famed from his birth?
10. Are there great powers that are unassailable by him? What has not been laid low by the Vr̥tra-smasher?
    Indra dominates all the Bekanāṭas who see the day and the Paṇis through his will.

11. (Although we are) the latest of many, we present to you sacred formulations without precedent, o Indra, Vr̥tra-smasher, like a present, o mace-bearer invoked by many.
12. For although many are the hopes that call to you, powerfully ranging Indra, and many are your forms of help, pass over the pressings of the stranger, good one. Most mighty one, heed my call.

13. We are yours; we inspired poets abide just in you, o Indra, for there exists no other dispenser of mercy than you, o bounteous one invoked by many.
14. You—rescue us from this neglect and hunger, from their curse.
    You—because of our brilliant insight, do your best for us with your help, most able one, as the way-finder.

15. Let just your soma be pressed. Kalis, stop fearing:
    this miasma will go away; by itself it will go away.

The next group likely consists of 67–71, though Oldenberg (1888: 217) considers the possibility that VIII.72 belongs here as well. Save for VIII.67 with its fanciful authorial ascription, the rest (68–71) are attributed to Āṅgirasa poets.

VIII.67 (676) Ādityas

Matsya Sāmmada or Mānya Maitrāvaruṇi or many fish caught in a net [bahavo matsyā jālanaddhāḥ]
21 verses: gāyatrī, arranged in tṛcas

According to the Anukramaṇī, a fish (Matsya) or "many fish caught in a net" are two of the three possible composers of this hymn. Unfortunately, there is not a scrap of evidence in the hymn itself for these intriguing ascriptions. The poet begs the Ādityas and their mother Aditi, who is more prominent in the hymn than in most Āditya hymns (vss. 10–12, 14, 18), for shelter and protection from a range of dangers and enemies and for continued life for ourselves and our progeny.

1. Now we shall beg these rulers, the Ādityas, for help—the very merciful ones, (for us) to prevail.
2. Mitra will carry us beyond constraint, and Varuṇa and Aryaman, just as the Ādityas know how.
3. For their bright, praiseworthy shield exists for the pious man—
 (the shield) of the Ādityas for the man who does it right.

4. Great is the help of you who are great, o Varuṇa, Mitra, and Aryaman.
 We choose your help.
5. Gird us, alive, against the deadly blow, o Ādityas.
 Are you ones who heed the call?
6. Your shield, your shelter that exists for the man who has ritually labored and who presses soma—with that intercede for us.

7. O gods, does there exist wide (space emerging) from out of constraint?
 Does there exist a treasure for the blameless man,
 o Ādityas, you (whom others') offenses cannot mislead?
8. Let this fetter here not bind us; let it avoid us for our great (good fortune?),
 for only Indra is famous for imposing his will.
9. Don't (harm) us with the harm of crooked cheats.
 O gods greedy to help, seize them!

10. And, great goddess Aditi, I entreat you, the very merciful, (for us) to prevail.
11. Deliver us, whether we're in the shallows or the deep, from someone who wishes to smite us, o you who have powerful sons.
 Let none of our offspring be injured.
12. Make faultless (shelter) for us, o widely spreading (goddess) possessing a wide enclosure, (for us) to extend afar and for our offspring to live.

13. They who, as heads of the settled peoples, untrickable, self-glorious, without deceit, guard their commandments—
14. Being such, free us from the mouth of wolves, o Ādityas, like a thief who's been bound, o Aditi.
15. Let this arrow go away from us, o Ādityas, away malevolence, without striking us.

16. Because, o Ādityas of good gifts, over and over, previously and now, we have benefited by your help—
17. Because, o attentive gods, each and every man, even one coming back from an offense,
do you make to live—
18. This is the new (life) for an older (man) that will free us, o Ādityas, like a bound man from his bondage, o Aditi.

19. We do not have the driving force to leap beyond, Ādityas.
You—have mercy upon us!
20. O Ādityas, let the missile of Vivasvant, the finely made arrow, not strike us now before old age.
21. O Ādityas, rip apart hostility, apart constraint, apart what is packed together;
rip malady apart and asunder.

VIII.68 (677) Indra (1–13), Dānastuti of R̥kṣa and Āśvamedha (14–19)

Priyamedha Āṅgirasa
19 verses: gāyatrī, except anuṣṭubh 1, 4, 7, 10. Verses 1–12 arranged in tr̥cas

This hymn falls into two parts. It begins with four tr̥cas (vss. 1–12) dedicated to Indra, each beginning with an anuṣṭubh verse and continuing in gāyatrī; there follows a single appended verse (13) continuing the thought of the previous verse. The final six verses are a dānastuti to a set of patrons whose names and identities are not entirely easy to sort out.

The Indra portion is conventional, with an emphasis on his extreme power and might. The dānastuti is likewise comparatively straightforward compared to others of this genre, with a catalogue of the gifts received and a promise to the patrons, expressed in surprisingly negative terms, that even a man who wishes to insult them will not be able to do so (vs. 19).

1. We will turn you here, like a chariot, for help and favor, you powerfully ranging one who vanquish through your attack, o Indra, strongest lord of the settlements.

2. O you of powerful outbursts, of powerful will, you able one whose thought is everywhere, you have filled (everywhere) with your greatness,
3. You the great, whose hands with their greatness have encompassed the earth-encircling mace of gold.

4. The lord of the unbowable strengths who has domain over all men do I call for you, together with his means and help for the separate peoples and their chariots—
5. Him, ever-strengthening, whom men, every man for himself, call on in (contests) whose prize is the sun, for dominance and for help,
6. Indra, beyond measure and equal to song, strong, of good generosity, holding sway also over goods.

7. Him and him alone, Indra, do I impel to drink, for the sake of his great generosity—the dancer who holds sway over the communities, according to the ancient praise that follows him.
8. You whose fellowship no (other) mortal has attained, he will not attain your strengths, o you who swell with strength.
9. Aided by you, with you as our yokemate, might we win in our battles a great stake in the waters and the sun, o mace-bearer.

10. We implore you with our sacrifices, with our songs, o Indra most longing for songs, just as you helped Purumāyya in the prize-contests.
11. You whose fellowship is sweet, whose leadership is sweet, o master of the stones—yours is the sacrifice worth tussling over.
12. Make it wide for our own body and our lineage, wide for our dwelling.
    Extend it wide for us to live.

13. As a path wide for our men, wide for our cow, wide for our chariot—thus do we consider our pursuit of the gods.

14. Six men having sweet gifts approach me two by two, in the excitement of soma.
15. From Indrota I received two silvery ones, from the son of Ṛkṣa two fallow bays, and the two chestnuts of the son of Aśvamedha;
16. (Horses) having good chariots from the son of Atithigva, those having good reins from the son of Ṛkṣa, and those having good ornaments from the son of Aśvamedha.

17. I gained six (horses), along with brides [?], from the son of Atithigva, from Indrota,
    along with Pūtakratu.
18. In the midst of these silvery ones there appeared a ruddy female [=Dawn?] along with a bull, having good reins and a whip.
19. Never will a mortal seeking to scorn you [=patrons], o you who are kin to prizes,
    hold disrepute over you.

VIII.69 (678) Indra (1–10, 13–18), All Gods (11ab), Varuṇa (11cd–12)

Priyamedha Āṅgirasa
18 verses: anuṣṭubh, except gāyatrī 4–6, paṅkti 11, 16, bṛhatī 17–18 [2 wrongly identified as uṣṇih by Anukramaṇī]

This often baffling hymn is metrically complex, as the above summary shows, and its metrical patterns do not always coincide with its intricate structure. Although many details remains obscure, the thematic outline of the hymn becomes clearer when that structure has been discerned. In our view, the hymn falls into two halves (vss. 1–9, 10–18), which are exactly parallel. Each consists of two tṛcas (1–6, 10–15), followed by a single verse celebrating the partnership between Indra and the poet (7, 16), and ending with two verses concerning the Priyamedhas' ritual offering to Indra (8–9, 17–18). The parallelism is especially clear in the final three verses of each half: both 7 and 16 contain the dual optative sacevahi "might we two become comrades" and concern a journey of a certain number of steps. In both 8–9 and 17–18 the Priyamedhas are explicitly mentioned. They are exhorted to ritual performance in verses 8–9, while in 17–18, as is suitable in hymn-final verses, their performance is summarized. The parallelism between the opening tṛcas of both halves is much freer, though there are rough correspondences.

The relationship between the two tṛcas of the first half is noteworthy. The first tṛca (vss. 1–3) is quite puzzling, with opaque phraseology and uncertain references; the second tṛca (vss. 4–6) seems a double of the first, paraphrasing and explaining it, in a sort of global example of "poetic repair" (Jamison 2006). The second tṛca exhorts the poet to "chant forth" to Indra (vs. 4), and the next two verses describe the preparation of soma for Indra, with the soma drops racing to the milk (conceptualized, as so often, as cows). With this in mind we can approach the first tṛca. In verse 1 the opening phrase "forth, forth" recalls the similar phrase in verse 4 and allows the verb "chant" to be supplied (see also vs. 8). In verse 1 the recipient of what is chanted, the poem, identified as "triṣṭubh refreshment," is clearly Soma ("the drop"), not Indra as in verse 4, but the constructions are parallel. The poem is then the subject of the second half of the verse, as it seeks to win something unspecified. In our opinion the subject of verse 2 is this same poem, taking aim at Soma (the "roaring bull") among the cows, who represent the milk-mixture. In verse 3 the soma mixture is prepared for Indra, and, it seems, for the rest of the gods.

This matched pair of triplets is followed by the remarkable verse 7, in which the poet proposes a partnership between himself and Indra, a partnership to be sealed by the symbolic seven steps that in the later marriage ceremony make a marriage legal after the bride and groom have taken them, and that already in the R̥gveda (X.8.4) are the symbolic act creating a contract or alliance. The phrase "the seven(th) step of the comrade" seems to refer to this ceremonial institution. In order to make this alliance the poet and Indra go to Indra's own home and drink the soma together, having made the journey over the surface of the sea of soma (in our view, though others consider this to be a reference to the sun). The relationship between poet and god is thus a surprisingly intimate one, reminiscent of that between the poet Vasiṣṭha and Varuṇa in VII.86–89, especially the verses describing their former comradeship with grammatical constructions and lexicon very similar to those here (VII.88.3–5). It is also similar to nearby VIII.62.11, where the poet again proposes that he and Indra yoke themselves together. The first half of the hymn is then brought to a close by the aforementioned exhortation to the Priyamedhas to chant to Indra (vs. 8), with a tantalizing glimpse of what appear to be three musical instruments accompanying them (vs. 9).

The two tr̥cas opening the second half of the hymn (vss. 10–15) reverse the order of obscurity. The first (vss. 10–12) is relatively straightforward and, at least to begin with, matches material in the first half: the speckled cows giving milk for the soma mixture in verse 10 remind us of the dappled cows and their milk in verse 3 (also 5–6), and Indra and other gods partake of the soma in verse 11, though the presence and role of Varuṇa in verses 11–12 are somewhat puzzling. However, it is the next tr̥ca (vss. 13–15) that almost defeats the interpreter, especially verse 13. There is no agreement even on what god (or gods) the verse concerns, much less on what the actions in question are and whether the verse is a self-contained syntactic unit. We are inclined to take the verse as a suite of relative clauses referring to Indra, who is triumphantly proclaimed in verse 14. The second half of verse 14 alludes to the Emuṣa myth (also treated in VIII.77, etc.), in which, it seems, Indra as a boy slew a boar named Emuṣa by shooting through a mountain, and brought (or Viṣṇu brought him) a rice porridge and some buffalo (which had been protected by the boar?) from the mountain. The next verse (15) most likely also concerns this myth, or it may refer to another of Indra's boyhood deeds. There are numerous difficulties in these three verses, and our translation is only provisional.

The following verse (16) brings us back to the present, with the poet's second proposition of fellowship to Indra, again in the course of a journey. And the final two verses (17–18) summarize the Priyamedhas' ritual efforts and pronounces them even better than before.

We cannot claim to have settled the many issues of this hymn, but the structure outlined above does give a context in which to evaluate the difficulties that remain.

1. Forth, (chant) forth your triṣṭubh refreshment to the drop that invigorates heroes.
   With your visionary thought and with plenitude it is seeking to win, in order to gain wisdom.
2. You take aim at the roaring bull among your moist [=willing] females and at the roaring bull among the females who keep hanging back, at the lord of your prized milk-cows.
3. These dappled cows, which give the sweetening milk, prepare the soma for him [=Indra].
   At its birth the clans of the gods are in the three luminous realms of heaven.

4. Chant forth with a song to the lord of cows, to Indra, in the way that is known, to the son of the real, the master of settlements.
5. The tawny (soma-drops) have been let loose at the ruddy (cows) upon the ritual grass, where we will bellow out together.
6. The cows have milked out the milk-mixture for Indra, the honey for the mace-bearer, since he found them in the remote place.

7. As we two, Indra and (I), go up to his home along the surface of the coppery (soma), having drunk of the honey three times, might we two become comrades at the seven(th) step of the comrade.

8. Chant! Chant forth! Chant, o Priyamedhas!
   Let your little sons chant, and you—chant boldly as if against a fortress.
9. The Gargara(-instrument) will gurgle downward, the Godhā(-vīṇā) will keep resounding all around, and the Piṅgā(-string) will keep quivering all around. The sacred formulation is offered up to Indra.

10. When the speckled (cows), who yield good milk and never kick, fly here, take hold of the kicking soma for Indra to drink.
11. Indra has drunk; Agni has drunk. All the gods have become exhilarated.
    Varuṇa will settle here, too. The waters have bellowed out to him, as (cows) that share their young do to their calf.

12. You are well-provided with gods, Varuṇa—you through whose gullet the seven rivers stream, as through a tube that provides easy flow.

13. He who made the paired, well-yoked horses leap for the pious man, (who is) their swooping leader—and just this is the marvel—who was set loose as the very measure (of heaven)—
14. Just he is solemnly proclaimed as the able one, as Indra, beyond all hatreds.
    The lad ripped (out) the rice porridge that was cooking far away on the mountain.
15. Like a teeny-tiny wee little boy, he mounted his new chariot.
    He cooked the wild buffalo of prodigious will for his father and mother.

16. You fair-lipped houselord, mount your golden chariot.
    Then we two might become comrades along the heavenly, ruddy (path) with a thousand steps, faultless and leading to well-being.

17. Bringing homage, they reverently approach him, their sovereign king, just so.
    Just this is his well-set goal when they turn him here to come and to give.
18. Following the (custom) of their ancient house, the Priyamedhas with twisted ritual grass, with their pleasing offering set in place, have equaled their previous presentation.

VIII.70 (679) Indra

Puruhanman Āṅgirasa
15 verses: br̥hatī alternating with satobr̥hatī arranged in pragāthas 1–6; br̥hatī arranged in tr̥cas 7–12; uṣṇih 13, anuṣṭubh 14, puraüṣṇih 15

Another metrically complex hymn. The first six verses consist of three pragāthas in br̥hatī alternating with satobr̥hatī, the next six (7–12) of two tr̥cas in br̥hatī, and the last three (13–15) of verses in three different meters, but all consisting of eight syllable or a mixture of eight and twelve syllable lines, like the br̥hatī/satobr̥hatī verses before them.

The thematic divisions correspond well with these metrical divisions. The first six verses are extravagant praise of Indra's unequalled power. Having flattered him with his praise, the poet occupies the tr̥ca portion with the usual requests for Indra to exercise his generosity and, more strikingly, for him to punish mortals who do not worship him and do not follow the Ārya way, with the culminating verse 11 listing the numerous ways in which this evil man can deviate from the proper path. One of the stylistic features especially of the tṛca section (but see also vs. 4) is the tendency for the final word or words of the c and d pādas to match (4cd, 7cd, 8cd, 11cd, 12cd; see also 9a+d), and there are other verse-internal echoes.

The final three verses (13–15) are a dānastuti of Śara Śauradevya, or rather what we might term an anti-dānastuti or, technically, a satire. The first of these verses (13) poses a rhetorical question that seems to promise lavish praise to come, but the poet takes this back in verse 14 with another rhetorical question: will you really receive praise for a gift that consists of calves doled out in miserly fashion? The final verse specifies just how miserly: a single calf for three poets. In these verses the standard vocabulary of generosity (benefactor, patron, bounteous one) is deployed sarcastically, and the poet cleverly gives his criticism a gloss of praise.

For an analysis of the phonetic and grammatical features of the entire hymn, see Watkins (1995: 184–87).

1. He who is king of the separate peoples, a driver with chariots, rich, an overcomer in all battles, who is sung as the preeminent smasher of Vṛtra—
2. Beautify that Indra, o Puruhanman, for his help, him whose (mace) is once again in (the hand of) the apportioner:
   the mace, lovely to see, has been put back into his hand, like the great sun into heaven.

3. No one will catch up with him who by his (ritual?) action created an ever strengthening one like Indra, welcomed with sacrifices by all, ingenious, unassailable but of assailing might,
4. Invincible, mighty, and victorious in battles, in whose (control) are the great, wide-expanding (waters?).
   While he was being born, the milk-cows kept bellowing in unison; the heavens and earths kept bellowing.

5. Since a hundred heavens and a hundred earths could be yours, Indra, a thousand suns were not equal to you when you were just born, o mace-bearer, nor were the two world-halves.
6. You have filled all things with your bullish greatness, bull, and with your strength, strongest one.
   Help us to a pen full of cattle with your bright help, bounteous mace-bearer.

7. A godless mortal shall not acquire refreshment, o long-lived one!
   Indra, who will yoke his two steeds that win dappled cows, who will yoke his two fallow bays—

8. (Call upon) him to give to you—Indra, the conqueror to be greatly magnified, who is to be called upon at the fords and in foreign parts, who is to be called upon at the prize-contests.
9. Shape us up for your great generosity, o good one, champion—(shape us) up for your great giving of bounty, bounteous one; (shape us) up for great fame, Indra.

10. You are the one who seeks the truth for us, Indra. You find no satisfaction in him who reviles you.
    Gird yourself in between your thighs, o you of mighty manliness. Jab down the Dāsa with your blows.
11. The man who follows other commandments, who is no son of Manu, no sacrificer, no devotee of the gods—him should your own comrade, the mountain [=mace?], send tumbling down; the mountain (should send down) the Dasyu for easy smiting.
12. O strongest Indra, grab a handful of these (cows), o most capacious one, to give to us, like a handful of roasted grains, being disposed toward us. Grab two, being disposed toward us.

13. O comrades, find the resolve: how shall we bring to success our invocatory praise of Śara, who is a benefactor, a patron without restraint?
14. Will you be praised in any way by many seers provided with ritual grass, Śara, if you will hand over your calves in just this way, one by one?
15. The bounteous son of Śūradeva, having grabbed hold of its ear, led a calf here to us three, a patron (leading) a nanny-goat to give suck (to three kids).

VIII.71 (680) Agni

Sudīti Āṅgirasa and/or Purumīḷha Āṅgirasa
15 verses: gāyatrī arranged in tr̥cas 1–9; br̥hatī alternating with satobr̥hatī arranged in pragāthas 10–15

This, the last hymn of the small Āṅgirasa collection VIII.67–71, falls into two parts, defined by meter: verse 1–9 in gāyatrī tr̥cas and 10–15 in br̥hatī/satobr̥hatī pragāthas. As Oldenberg suggested (1888: 217; Noten ad loc.), it could be made up of two separate hymns, and the lack of thematic continuity in fact favors this division, though there is some shared vocabulary. The first names of the two alternative poets suggested by the Anukramaṇī were extracted from verse 14.

The first nine verses beg Agni's protection for the pious worshiper from all manner of malign and threatening forces, particularly those of other humans. It is Agni's power as a god that is emphasized, with mortals hostile or devout subject to this superior divine power, to be punished or rewarded, as they deserve.

The second part of the hymn (vss. 10–15) is dominated by a stylistic pattern: Agni in the accusative case is the goal of sacrificial actions and words throughout this section. In verse 10 he is not named, but an epithet in the accusative is found in every pāda of the verse. His name (agním) begins the next verse (11a), and in the subsequent verses it is featured again and again. Verse 12 contains five occurrences of agním, one beginning every pāda, plus one in the middle of the third. Verse 13 varies the pattern by beginning with a nominative form of the name, but the second half-verse returns to the initial accusative, which continues through the subsequent verses: three examples of initial agním in verse 14 (pādas a, c, d), two in the final verse (15a, b). The interplay between our ritual devotion and prayers and his gifts and aid is the topic of this section, but the content is far less noticeable than the form.

1. O Agni, protect us by your great powers from all hostility and from mortal hatred.
2. For no human fury is master of you (gods), o (Agni), born dear.
   Just you are the protector of the earth.
3. O child of nourishment, of fortunate flame, along with all the gods give us wealth consisting of all desirable things.

4. Hostilities do not keep that mortal away from wealth, o Agni, the pious one whom you safeguard.
5. Whom you impel toward the stakes at the winning of the wisdom—o Agni, inspired poet—
   he by your help will arrive at cows.
6. (Give) wealth consisting of many heroes to the pious mortal.
   Lead us forth to a better state.

7. Deliver us: do not hand us over to one who wishes evil, o Jātavedas, to the mortal of evil intent.
8. Agni, let no non-god keep away the gift of you, a god.
   You are the master of goods.
9. Mete out a measure of your great good, o child of nourishment, to us who are your singers, o comrade, o good one.

10. Let our songs go to him of sharp flame, lovely to see;
    (let) our sacrifices (go) with reverence to him of many goods, lauded by many, for his help—
11. To Agni, the son of strength, Jātavedas, for a gift of valuable things, (Agni,) who once again has come to be the immortal here among mortals, the most delighting Hotar in the clan.

12. Agni (we beseech) on your behalf with sacrifice to the gods, Agni as the ceremony proceeds,
    Agni first in insights, Agni when a charger (is at stake), Agni to assure success to the cultivated lands.

13. Let Agni in fellowship give us of his refreshments, he who is master of valuable things.
Agni we beseech over and over when progeny and posterity (are at stake), since he is the good one, the protector of our bodies.

14. Agni—with songs reverently invoke him of sharp flame for help;
Agni the famed (do) men (invoke) for wealth, o Purumīḷha; Agni as shelter for Sudīti.
15. Agni we hymn to keep hatred away from us; Agni to give us luck and lifetime.
In all the clans he will be the one to be invoked like a helper, the lighter of the morning rays.

The next group consists of only three hymns, X.72–74 and has no real signature features.

VIII.72 (681) Agni or Praise of Oblations

Haryata Prāgātha
18 verses: gāyatrī

This hymn is so opaque that it is not even clear to whom, or what, it is dedicated. The Anukramaṇī gives two choices: Agni or "praise of oblations" (haviṣāṃ stutiḥ). There are several good reasons to prefer the second designation, or at least to reject the first. On the one hand, Agni is named only once, close to the end (vs. 15) and in conjunction with Indra. Though the ritual fire and its divine representative are clearly the referents in a number of verses, a number of different ritual substances and apparatus are also referred to through the hymn; the fire is not significantly more prominent. Moreover, as Oldenberg points out (1888: 217), the third hymn in this little collection is clearly to Agni, so that the first should have a different dedicand.

As a number of scholars have noted, the hymn contains a sequence of ritual moments, sometimes even quoting from mantras found in later ritual, depicted in allusive and indirect fashion. Although some have tried to find a systematic and sequential representation of the, or a, sacrifice, these efforts have not been successful. Rather we seem to have a set of discontinuous sacrificial vignettes, cast as riddles. Though nowhere near as famous as the well-known riddle hymn (I.164), this hymn resembles that one in certain ways, including a fondness for numerology (vss. 7–9) and for unidentified referents (throughout).

We confess to being uncertain about many of the answers to these implicit riddles, and for others the machinery of explanation would overwhelm the poetry. We have therefore for the most part avoided parenthetical identifications and paraphrases. In general the first verses (esp. 2–5) seem to concern Agni and the initiation of the sacrifice, signaled by the sighting of the horses and chariot (of the sun?) in verse 6. Most of the rest of the hymn, verses 7–17, concerns the preparation of soma. The final verse (18) has much the same structure as verse 6, which closed the first section of the hymn, and has similar annunciatory function.

1. Make oblation! He will come here. The Adhvaryu seeks (him) again, knowing his command.
2. The Hotar sits down beside the sharp soma-plant, in Manu's presence, taking pleasure in its companionship.
3. They seek him within (themselves) and among the people, (seek him) as Rudra beyond inspired thought.
   With his tongue they grasp the grain.
4. I have heated my familial bow. Imparting vital force, he has mounted the wood.
   With his tongue he has struck the millstone.
5. The gleaming calf, roaming here, does not find anyone to bind it.
   It pursues its mama to praise (her).
6. And it's just now that his team of horses, great and lofty, the binder of the chariot, has been sighted.
7. The seven (priests) milk the one (cow [=soma plant?]), and the two (=hands?) send the five (fingers?) nearby, at the ford of the river, at its sound.
8. With the ten (fingers) of Vivasvant, Indra has agitated the cask of heaven with his triple hammer.
9. A newer firebrand goes around the ceremonial course three times.
   With honey the Hotars perform the anointing.
10. With reverence they dip out the encompassing wellspring with its (water-)wheel above and its sides facing downward, the inexhaustible one.
11. The pressing stones are just on their way to it. The honey has been poured down into the lotus at the wellspring's surging forth.
12. O cows, approach the wellspring with help. Great is (the vessel?) of the sacrifice, giving teeming abundance; its two ears [=handles?] are golden.
13. Into the pressed soma pour glory [=milk], the full glory of the two world-halves.
    The Rasā (River [=water]) should receive the bull.
14. They [=soma juices] recognize their own home. Like calves coming together with their mothers, they pair off with their kin [=milk and water].
15. In the jaws of the (soma press) as it chews they make themselves a support in heaven,
    make their reverence to Indra and Agni, and create the sun.

16. The stranger has milked the swelling refreshment, the nourishment associated with the seven steps, along with the seven rays of the sun.
17. O Mitra and Varuṇa, at the rising of the sun I take of the soma:
    it is healing for the afflicted.
18. And it's just now that his place, the place of the delightful one, is to be laid down:
    he has stretched around heaven with his tongue.

VIII.73 (682) Aśvins

Gopavana Ātreya or Saptavadhri Ātreya
18 verses: gāyatrī arranged in tr̥cas

Unified by its refrain, this hymn otherwise seems haphazardly structured, with standard straightforward appeals to the Aśvins to come to our sacrifice (e.g., vss. 1–2) alternating with undeveloped questions and statements (e.g., 11–12) and, more baffling, mythic allusions. The poorly understood story of the Aśvins' rescue of Atri is mentioned in verses 3 and 7–8, their relation to Saptavadhri in verse 9, and an unnamed figure, sometimes identified by commentators as Saptavadhri, is addressed in the final verses 17–18. The stories of Atri and Saptavadhri (who are sometimes considered to be the same person) have often been discussed, and radically incompatible plots have been reconstructed for them. See, for example, Jamison (1991: 212–46) and, more recently, Houben (2010), who discusses previous accounts. Houben emphatically rejects Jamison's version, and his own has some points in its favor but remains unconvincing in its entirety, at least to us.

1. Rise up for the man who acts according to truth; hitch up your chariot, o Aśvins.
   – Let the help of you two become truly nearby.
2. Drive here with your chariot that is quicker even than a wink, Aśvins.
   – Let the help of you two become truly nearby.
3. For Atri you made an underlayer with snow beneath the hot pot, o Aśvins.
   – Let the help of you two become truly nearby.

4. Where are you? Where have you gone? Where have you flown like falcons?
   – Let the help of you two become truly nearby.
5. If today, at any time at all, you two should hear this call,
   – let the help of you two become truly nearby.
6. The Aśvins, most often summoned on their journey, do I beg for closest friendship.
   – Let the help of you two become truly nearby.

7. You made a helpful house for Atri, o Aśvins.
   – Let the help of you two become truly nearby.
8. You obstruct the fire from burning, for Atri who speaks agreeably.
   – Let the help of you two become truly nearby.
9. Saptavadhri honed the blade of fire with hope.
   – Let the help of you two become truly nearby.

10. Come here, o you who bring bullish goods; hear this call of mine.
    – Let the help of you two become truly nearby.
11. What is this (deed?) of yours proclaimed in age-old fashion, like that of old men?
    – Let the help of you two become truly nearby.
12. You have a common kinship, a common connection (with us), o Aśvins.
    – Let the help of you two become truly nearby.

13. Your chariot that drives through the airy realms, through the two world-halves, o Aśvins—
    – Let the help of you two become truly nearby.
14. (With it) come here near to us with your thousands of cattle and horses.
    – Let the help of you two become truly nearby.
15. Do not overlook us with your thousands of cattle and horses.
    – Let the help of you two become truly nearby.

16. Breathing her ruddy breath, Dawn has appeared; following the truth she has made the light.
    – Let the help of you two become truly nearby.
17. Looking hard at the Aśvins, as a man with a hatchet does a tree—
    – Let the help of your two become truly nearby.
18. Break (it) like a fortress, o bold one, you who were oppressed by the black clan.
    – Let the help of you two become truly nearby.

VIII.74 (683) Agni (1–12), Śrutarvan Ārkṣya's Dānastuti (13–15)

Gopavana Ātreya
15 verses: mixed anuṣṭubh and gāyatrī arranged in tr̥cas, with the first verse of each tr̥ca anuṣṭubh, the other two gāyatrī; final tr̥ca (13–15) all anuṣṭubh

This hymn consists of five tr̥cas, each of which is thematically and syntactically unified. The first four (vss. 1–12) concentrate on the formal praise and invocation of Agni, who appears in three of the four (vss. 1–6, 10–12) insistently as the accusative object of the reverent approach of the worshipers. (The other tr̥ca, verses 7–9, has the worshiper's prayerful thought as its subject.)

Somewhat surprisingly, Agni is several times associated with a lexical and mythic complex far more characteristic of Indra: obstacle [/Vr̥tra] smashing. Agni is called the best smasher of obstacles in verse 4, and the theme returns in verses 9 and 12. This association may have been triggered here by the identification of Agni as the tribal fire of the Anu (vs. 4), the group whose leader appears to be the poet's patron Śrutarvan (vss. 4, 13, 15). The tribal fire represents the (temporary) unification of separate groups of people generally mobilizing against outside threat, and an obstacle-smashing tribal fire would serve their purposes well. Although the unification theme is not insistent in the hymn, notice that the first verse begins by announcing Agni's affiliation with every clan, "dear to many" (vs. 1ab), and the joint invocation of Agni by various peoples is repeatedly mentioned (vss. 2, 6, 10, 12).

The final tr̥ca (vss. 13–15), with slightly different metrical structure, is the poet's dānastuti of Śrutarvan and his gift of four horses and a chariot. Though it is not as self-consciously clever as some dānastutis, verse 13 contains a nice pun.

1. The guest of every clan, dear to many, (shall we praise) on your behalf as (we) seek the prize;
Agni belonging to the house shall I praise on your behalf, (with) speech and with thoughts of fortifying song—
2. (Agni), whom the peoples laud with their lauds like Mitra [/an ally], offering oblations to him whose potion is melted butter—
3. To Jātavedas, much to be admired, who raised to heaven the oblations lifted up among the conclave of the gods.

4. We have come to the best smasher of obstacles [/of Vr̥tra], preeminent Agni [/the chief fire] belonging to the Anu, before whose face lofty Śrutarvan, the son of R̥kṣa, flares up;
5. To immortal Jātavedas, lovely to see across the dark shades, receiving the ghee-oblation, worthy to be invoked;
6. To Agni, whom these peoples here urgently invoke with oblations, pouring offerings with their ladles held forth.

7. This newer thought here has been produced from us for you, o Agni, o delighting, well-born, strong-willed guest, unerring and wondrous.
8. Let it be most wealful, most pleasing, and dear to you, Agni.
Well praised by it, grow strong.
9. Brilliance with its brilliance, it should set lofty fame upon fame at the smashing of obstacles [/Vr̥tra].

10. (Him,) bestowing the chariot, the horse, and the cow, vibrant, a lord of settlements like Indra, whose claims to fame you [=priests] bring to triumph, and the one ever to be admired (whom) the separate peoples (hymn).
11. You whom Gopavana will please with his hymn, o Agni, o Aṅgiras, o pure one, hear our call.

12. You whom the peoples urgently invoke to win the prize, be attentive when it's the time for overcoming obstacles.

13. Being summoned to Śrutarvan the son of R̥kṣa, who is roused to elation,
    I will swipe [=take] four head (of horses) as if swiping [=stroking/ grooming] flocks of tufted (sheep).
14. The four swift runners of most powerful (Śrutarvan), along with a good chariot, will convey me to my pleasure, as birds conveyed the son of Tugra.
15. This is really true—what I forcefully point out to you, o great river Paruṣṇi:
    o waters, there exists no mortal who is a greater giver of horses than most powerful (Śrutarvan).

The next group of hymns, VIII.75–79, consists of one hymn to Agni (75), three to Indra (76–78), and one to Soma (79), in appropriately descending number of verses. The Indra hymns are all assigned to the same Kāṇva poet by the Anukramaṇī, but the other two hymns have different authors, 75 an Āṅgirasa, 79 a Bhārgava.

VIII.75 (684) Agni

Virūpa Āṅgirasa
16 verses: gāyatrī arranged in tr̥cas

Agni's role in the sacrifice and his relationship with the poet-sacrificers is the subject of the first two conventional tr̥cas (vss. 1–6), but a martial, indeed a belligerent, strain appears beginning with verse 7. The setting seems to be a contest for cattle or a cattle raid, and the poet calls on Agni to use his aggressive powers to defeat encroaching threats and assure victory and the winning of cattle and wealth (vss. 7–13). The hymn ends with general, and less combative, prayers for help for the sacrificer (vss. 14–16).

1. Harness your horses that best summon the gods, o Agni, like a charioteer.
   Take your seat as the primordial Hotar.
2. And as one who knows better, invite the gods for us, o god.
   Make our trust (in the sacrifice) into all things worth desiring,
3. Since you—o youngest one, o son of strength to whom offering is made—have become the one possessing the truth and worthy of the sacrifice.

4. This Agni here is the lord of the thousandfold prize and of the hundredfold; as sage poet he is the head of riches.

5. As craftsmen [/Ṛbhus] bend the felly, bend here, closer to the sacrifice, with the shared invocations, o Aṅgiras [=Agni].
6. Now for him, for the heaven-bound bull, o Virūpa [=poet], with your very own speech rouse your lovely praise hymn.

7. What Paṇi shall we lay low with his weapon, the weapon of Agni whose eye is not fooled, when cattle are at stake?
8. Let not the clans of the gods, like rosy bathers [=Dawns], leave us behind like cows a scrawny (calf).
9. Let not the coercion of anyone of evil intention and encompassing hatred crash down on us, like a wave on a boat.

10. Homage to your power, Agni! The separate peoples hymn you, o god.
With your attacks shake our foe to pieces.
11. Surely you will toil for wealth for us, for our quest for cattle, Agni?
Make a wide (way) for us, you wide-maker.
12. Do not shun us in this (contest for) great stakes, any more than a burden-bearer would (his burden).
Win wealth as your takings.

13. Let this misfortune here follow some other one than us, to frighten him, o Agni.
Strengthen our power of attack.
14. (The man) who offers homage or is no stingy patron, whose ritual labor he [=Agni] has enjoyed—him alone does Agni help with strengthening.
15. From beyond the distant boundary, cross over to the ones below, where I am. Help them!

16. For we know of your help from of old, o Agni—help like that of a father—and so we beg your favor.

VIII.76 (685) Indra

Kurusuti Kāṇva
12 verses: gāyatrī arranged in tṛcas

A simple hymn that never strays far from its twin themes: Indra accompanied by the Maruts and Indra drinking soma. The Maruts are mentioned as Indra's companions in each of the first nine verses, and the invitation to soma occupies the middle six verses (4–9), while the Vṛtra myth, glancingly alluded to, occupies much of the first tṛca. Only the last tṛca lacks mention of the Maruts.

The first verse of the last tr̥ca (10) appears to present the soma-drinking as accomplished, and Indra's role as Dasyu-smiter is celebrated in the next (11). The final verse of the hymn (12) is a meta-verse describing the production of the hymn itself. The numerological expression "eight-footed, nine-cornered" is, as Oldenberg suggests (Noten ad loc.), a reference to the gāyatrī tr̥cas in which this hymn is composed, with eight-syllable lines arranged into three verses of three pādas each.

Although the hymn is simple, it makes implicit reference to a complex ritual development—that, in the course of the R̥gvedic period, the Midday Pressing, originally dedicated entirely to Indra, made room for the Maruts as joint recipients of the soma with Indra. An important mythological treatment of this ritual innovation is found in I.165 and related hymns. Here we see only the liturgical result, an insistence on Indra Marutvant in a soma-drinking context.

1. This master of artifice here I now invoke, Indra, holding sway by his might, accompanied by the Maruts—as if to twist (him here).
2. This Indra here, with the Maruts as comrades, split apart the head of Vr̥tra with a hundred-jointed mace.
3. Having grown strong, with the Maruts as comrades, Indra propelled Vr̥tra apart, releasing the waters of the sea.

4. Here he is—the one by whom in truth this sun was won, by Indra, accompanied by the Maruts—to drink the soma.
5. Accompanied by the Maruts, possessing the silvery drink, mighty, conferring abundance—Indra do we invoke with songs.
6. Indra, accompanied by the Maruts, we invoke with our age-old thought, to drink of this soma here.

7. O Indra, accompanied by the Maruts, giver of rewards, drink the soma, you of a hundred resolves, at this sacrifice here, much praised one.
8. Just for you, o Indra, accompanied by the Maruts, possessor of the stone, are the pressed soma-drinks, provided with hymns, poured out with our whole heart.
9. Just drink, o Indra, with the Maruts as comrades, the pressed soma at the rituals of the day, sharpening your mace with might.

10. Standing up with your might, you made your two lips shake after you had drunk the pressed soma in the cup, Indra.

11. Both the world-halves yearned after you as you howled, Indra, when you became the smiter of the Dasyus.
12. An eight-footed nine-cornered speech that touches the truth—
    I have measured out its body because of Indra.

VIII.77 (686) Indra

Kurusuti Kāṇva
11 verses: gāyatrī arranged in tr̥cas 1–9; br̥hatī 10, satobr̥hatī 11, arranged in a pragātha

This hymn primarily treats the obscure Emuṣa myth, a boyhood deed of Indra's. As far as can be determined, in the R̥gvedic version (there are later Vedic prose versions, e.g., Taittirīya Saṃhitā VI.2.4.2–3) the just-born Indra, after a brief dialogue with his mother, takes a bow named Bunda and kills a boar named Emuṣa, allowing him to capture (or Viṣṇu to capture for him) a special mess of rice porridge, as well as some buffalo, which he cooks for his father and mother. The most important (and essentially only) R̥gvedic passages about this myth outside of VIII.77 are I.61.7, VIII.45.4–5, VIII.69.14–15, and VIII.96.2.

Our hymn begins with Indra's dialogue with his mother (vss. 1–2), a dialogue found in the same words in VIII.45.4–5. Since in that passage Indra takes the Bunda bow prior to questioning his mother, we can connect the first two verses of this hymn with the story in verses 6–8, even though the Bunda bow is not mentioned here in verses 1–2 and other material intervenes. Between the dialogue of verses 1–2 and the rest of the story starting in verse 6 are several references to other deeds of Indra's, at least one of them (vs. 5) even more obscure than the Emuṣa myth. It does seem likely, however, that the drinking of prodigious amounts of soma in verse 4 is part of the Emuṣa story: in III.48, also about Indra's boyhood and his relationship to mother and father, he consumes vast amounts of soma right after birth.

When the story is taken up again, we first are given a general summary of the myth in 6ab, and then the first incident in the story, the taking of the Bunda bow, in 6c. In our opinion, verse 8 is the speech of Indra's mother, urging him to capture the porridge by means of the bow. Her "just born right now" (vs. 8c) echoes the "just born" that begins verse 1, and these two phrases form a ring defining the Emuṣa story. Verse 7 continues the story of the Bunda bow and the aiming of the arrow. Verse 9, the final verse in the gāyatrī meter, is a standard summary of Indra's great deeds.

The last two verses (10–11) are in different meter. The first gives a précis of the myth, introducing Viṣṇu's role in securing the rice porridge, a detail that does not appear in accord with verse 6. The final pāda of verse 10 identifies Indra's opponent as a boar (no mention of the boar in the earlier verses) and in its final word provides the boar's name, Emuṣa, as the solution of the riddle. (The name Emuṣa occurs only here in the R̥gveda.) The version given in verse 10 agrees better with the one in I.61.7 than it does with the treatment in the rest of this hymn and indeed in the rest of Maṇḍala VIII, which contains the other pertinent passages, and one wonders if the poet was trying to harmonize two versions that he knew of this myth by tacking the Viṣṇu verse onto the Viṣṇu-less version found in the gāyatrī portion of the hymn. The final verse (11) is a high rhetorical celebration of the Bunda bow and of Indra's arms that wield it.

1. Just born, the one of a hundred resolves asked his mother,
   "Which ones are powerful; which ones are famed?"
2. Then she, the strong one [/Śavasī], named to him Aurṇavābha [/the spider's son] and Ahīśuva [/the one puffed up like a snake].
   "Let them be (yours) to lay low, son."
3. The Vr̥tra-smiter just hammered them together, like spokes in a nave with a hammer.
   When grown up, he became smiter of Dasyus.

4. At one shot he drank thirty ponds at once, hogsheads [?] of soma—(did) Indra.
5. He bored through to the Gandharva in the bottomless dusky realms, to strengthen the composers of sacred formulations—(did) Indra.
6. He pierced (the boar Emuṣa), pierced the cooked rice porridge forth from the mountains, and held it fast.
   Indra (took) the well-stretched Bunda-bow.

7. Your arrow with a hundred ruddy glints and a thousand feathers was the single one that you made into your yokemate, o Indra.
8. [Indra's mother:] "With it [=Bunda-bow] bring to the praisers, to the superior men and to their ladies, (the rice porridge?) to eat, though you were just born right now, o steadfast one of the R̥bhus."
9. These highest exploits performed by you in profusion you held fast with your whole heart.

10. All these things Viṣṇu brought here, the wide-striding one spurred on by you:
    a hundred buffaloes, a rice porridge cooked in milk—(when) Indra (pierced) the boar Emuṣa.
11. Powerfully ruling, well-made, made of boar is your bow, the golden Bunda, that aims straight.
    Your two arms are fit for battle, well-equipped, increasing injury even for one who protects himself from injury.

VIII.78 (687) Indra

Kurusuti Kāṇva
10 verses: gāyatrī, arranged in tr̥cas 1–9, br̥hatī 10

This hymn is all about greed. The first tr̥ca (vss. 1–3) barely mentions the offerings we make to Indra in the haste to list the things we want in return, down to the earrings in verse 3. The last tr̥ca (vss. 7–9) praises both Indra and Soma for their (potential) generosity, and verse 9 gives another list of desired gifts. Verse 10, in a different meter, may be the most egregious of all: the poet, picking up the desire he expressed for grain in verse 9, tells Indra he plans to do no labor for his grain, but expects Indra to deliver it, not only grown but processed—preferably stacked, but at least mown. So Indra is expected to serve as farmhand! This verse may indirectly express the stockbreeder's disdain for agriculture.

The middle tr̥ca (vss. 4–6) contrasts somewhat with its surroundings. Though the greed motif is found in verse 4, it is expressed in terms of Indra's unique powers to increase wealth, to win goods, and to give them. The rhetorical pattern set in this verse carries into the following verses, where the description of the god's powers becomes more general. However, the theme of the rest of the hymn is not far from the surface, for Indra's ability to see and to anticipate everything a mortal might do would allow him to identify proper recipients and deny gifts to those who behave badly.

1. (Taking pleasure) in the offering cake and of the soma-stalk, Indra, bring here to us a thousand and a hundred cows, o champion.
2. Bring here to us an ornament, a cow, a horse, an adornment, along with golden jewelry.
3. And bring here to us many earrings, bold one, for you are famed as a good one.

4. Never is another man within your abundance, Indra. There is no good winner and no good giver other than you for the cantor, o champion.
5. Never is Indra to be put down nor the able one to be circumvented.
   He hears and sees all.
6. Not to be outwitted, he watches out for the fury of mortals, watches out before the insult (comes).

7. Full of resolve is the belly of the powerful, (booty-)apportioning, Vr̥tra-smiting drinker of soma.
8. In you are goods united and all auspicious things, o Soma, goods good for giving, not to go astray.

9. Just toward you does my desire hasten, seeking grain, seeking cattle, seeking gold, toward you, seeking horses.

10. With my hope on you, Indra, I never take scythe in hand.
Supply us with grain by the handful, whether just mown or already stacked together, bounteous one.

VIII.79 (688) Soma

Kr̥tnu Bhārgava
9 verses: gāyatrī, except anuṣṭubh 9, probably arranged in tr̥cas

One of the rare hymns to Soma outside of the IXth Maṇḍala. None of the physical or ceremonial properties of soma the substance, the ritual drink, is found in this hymn. There is only indirect reference to the preparation of soma, in verse 3, where the "body-makers," presumably the priests who prepare the soma, are given shelter from hatred, and in verse 4 soma is called "possessor of the silvery (drink) [that is, soma itself]," an epithet otherwise almost exclusively used of Indra.

Instead of the ritual soma, we have here a portrait of an all-powerful and multi-talented divine helper: a winner (vs. 1), a poet (vs. 1), a healer (vs. 2), a giver (vs. 5), a finder of lost objects (vs. 6), and especially a protector from hostility (vss. 3, 4, 9). Only in verse 8 is there any hint that Soma might ever be anything but benevolent to us, but this hint is not developed.

1. Here is the effective gambler, ungraspable, all-conquering Soma, who got the lucky break—a seer, an inspired poet with poetic skill.
2. He covers over what is naked; he heals everything that is sick.
The blind man sees; the lame sets forth.
3. O Soma, for those who create your body [=soma-pressers] you hold out a broad defense from the hateful things done by others.

4. You possessor of the silvery drink—through your perception, through your skills you keep away from heaven and earth the hatred of any evil man.
5. And when those with (ritual) tasks proceed to their tasks, they will surely reach the generosity of the giver, should they (manage to) deflect the desire of the thirsting man.
6. He finds what was previously lost; he raises up the man who follows truth.
He lengthens our (as yet) untraversed lifetime.

7. Very kindly to us, merciful, of undistracted resolve, unquenchable—be weal for our heart, o Soma.
8. Don't agitate us, o Soma; don't frighten us, o king.
   Don't smite our heart with turmoil.
9. When I behold malevolent thoughts of the gods in my own seat, o king, ward off hateful things; you who give rewards, ward off failures.

The next group of hymns consists of 80–87, with three hymns to Indra (80–82), one to the All Gods (83), one to Agni (84), and three to the Aśvins (85–87), all but the last showing the appropriate descending number of verse. But 87 can in fact be broken into two original hymns, to produce the proper sequence. The poets named by the Anukramaṇī are various.

VIII.80 (689) Indra (1–9), Gods (10)

Ekadyū Naudhasa
10 verses: gāyatrī, probably arranged in tr̥cas, except final verse, triṣṭubh 10

The final pāda of this hymn (10d) is the same as the refrain in the verbally clever and finely structured hymns of Nodhas Gautama in Maṇḍala I (I.58, 60–64). (R̥gveda I.59 is also attributed to him, but lacks the refrain; see also nearby VIII.88.) The patronymic of our poet (Naudhasa) identifies him as a descendant of Nodhas, and he seems to have inherited some of his ancestor's skill: the tone of the hymn is light and slangy, and he addresses Indra informally and with mocking exasperation, especially in the second tr̥ca (vss. 4–6), in which the poet complains that Indra has been slow to help his chariot in the race (see also vs. 8).

The poet seems to be withholding his highest praise for Indra until Indra has earned it. He begins the hymn by announcing that he hasn't chosen anyone else for certain as his mercy-giver, and invites Indra to show mercy. He ends the hymn proper (vs. 9) with a promise that Indra will be proclaimed as lord after he "makes his fourth sacrificial name." What these four names are is not at all certain, but we suggest that the phrase forms a ring with the first verse, where the title/name "mercy-giver" hasn't yet been bestowed on the god. The poet is thus urging Indra to perform the actions that will earn him the names that will attract sacrifice and praise from mortals.

In the final verse, in a different meter, the poet names himself and reminds all the gods (and goddesses, an unusual inclusion) that he has performed service for them, demanding appropriate recompense.

1. Because I have not made anyone else my for-certain dispenser of mercy, o you of a hundred resolves,
   be merciful to us, Indra.

2. You who, not shirking, in the past, time after time, helped us to win the prize, be merciful to us, Indra.
3. Are you really one who rouses even the feeble, who are the helper of the soma-presser?
   Will you indeed muster your ability for us?

4. O Indra, possessor of the stone, advance our chariot even when it is behind;
   put it in front for me.
5. Blast it! Are you just going to sit there now? Put our chariot first for utmost fame that seeks the prize.
6. Help our chariot that seeks the prize. Easy for you to do. Why this runaround?
   Just make us victorious!

7. Indra, stand fast. You are a stronghold. The lucky woman goes to a rendezvous with you—this visionary thought conforming to her season [/the ritual sequence].
8. Don't make it [=chariot?] share in disgrace: the racecourse is wide, the stake is set;
   the elbows have been twisted outward [=driving posture?].
9. When you will make your fourth sacrificial name—this we eagerly desire—after that you will be solemnly proclaimed as our lord.

10. Ekadyū has strengthened you, you immortals; he has invigorated you, you gods and you who are goddesses.
    To him show generosity to be praised. – Early in the morning—soon—he should come, acquiring goods through his insight.

VIII.81 (690) Indra

Kusīdin Kāṇva
9 verses: gāyatrī, arranged in tr̥cas

Though assigned to a different poet, this hymn, like the last one (VIII.81), addresses Indra with a certain irreverence and informality, with multiple demands that Indra seize goods and bring them to us, in addition to the usual praise of his power and generosity. One verse is somewhat puzzling: the middle verse (5), in which Indra seems to participate in the ritual in priestly roles as well as being the object of worship, but this theme is not pursued.

1. Grab for us here a brilliant cattle-rich handful, o Indra, who have great hands, with your right one.

2. For we know you as powerfully ranging, of powerful gifts, of powerful bounty, of powerful mass, with your help.
3. For when you wish to give, o champion, neither gods nor mortals hinder you, anymore than they would a fearsome bull.

4. Come now! Let us praise Indra, the sovereign king who holds sway over goods.
   He will not neglect us with his generosity.
5. He will start up the praise; he will join in the singing; he will listen to the sāman being sung.
   He will greet it with generosity.
6. Bring to us with your right hand; seize with your left.
   Indra, don't deal us out of goods.

7. Hop to! Bring here boldly, bold one, for the peoples the possessions of the very impious.
8. Indra, the prize that now is yours is to be won by the inspired poets.
   Win it with us.
9. Your all-glittering prizes come speeding in an instant to us.
   They awaken at our will and right away.

VIII.82 (691) Indra

Kusīdin Kāṇva
9 verses: gāyatrī, arranged in tr̥cas

This hymn is an insistent invitation to the soma sacrifice, punctuated by imperatives: "run," "come here," "drink," and so forth, and larded with descriptions of the soma in various stages of preparation. It is simple in diction and entirely focused on the ritual situation and the hope for Indra's arrival, save for the last verse (9), which alludes briefly to the myth of the stealing of soma from heaven. The last tr̥ca is marked by a refrain.

1. Run here from afar and from nearby, Vr̥tra-smiter, in response to the proffering of the honey.
2. Sharp are the soma-drinks. Come here! The pressed drinks are ready to exhilarate.
   Drink heartily as you are accustomed.
3. Become exhilarated on the refreshment, and then in accord with your desire and your fervor it will become weal for your heart, Indra.

4. You without rival—here, come here! You are being called down to the hymns (while you are) in the highest luminous realm of heaven.

5. For you this one here has been pressed by stones, prepared with cows [=milk], for exhilaration.
   The soma is being poured forth, Indra.
6. Indra, hear my call. Reach the drinking and satiety of the soma that has been pressed among us and provided with cows.

7. Indra, the soma in the beakers and in the cups that has been pressed for you—drink of it. You are master of it.
8. The soma that is seen in the cups, like the moon in the waters—drink of it. You are master of it.
9. That which the falcon brought to you with his foot across the airy realms—the one that could not be recaptured—drink of it. You are master of it.

VIII.83 (692) All Gods

Kusīdin Kāṇva
9 verses: gāyatrī, arranged in tr̥cas

The first two tr̥cas (vss. 1–6) of this hymn to the All Gods mention only the Ādityas and are quite straightforward. The poet praises the help of these gods in the first tr̥ca (vss. 1–3) and asks for valuables in the second (vss. 4–6). The final tr̥ca turns to other gods (see esp. vs. 7) and to a more interesting topic: the ultimate kinship of gods and men (vss. 7–8). The gods are reminded of this relationship presumably to stimulate them to give help and goods.

1. We would choose the great help of the gods, of the bulls, to aid us.
2. Let them be our yokemates always—Varuṇa, Mitra, Aryaman—and forethoughtful strengtheners.
3. You carry us across many perils [?], as if across the waters with boats—you charioteers of truth.

4. Let there be a treasure for us, o Aryaman; a treasure worthy of praise, o Varuṇa, for we would choose a treasure.
5. For you forethoughtful ones, who care for the stranger, are holding sway over a treasure.
   What belongs to evil (shall) not (reach) it, o Ādityas.
6. O you of good gifts, we, whether dwelling peacefully or traveling on our route, call upon you, gods, for strengthening.

7. O Indra, Viṣṇu, Maruts, Aśvins—of these your common births with us take cognizance.

8. You of good gifts, now once again in the same way we bring to the fore our brotherhood with you in the womb of our mother.
9. For you of good gifts, with Indra preeminent—you are heaven-sent.
   And so I call just upon you.

VIII.84 (693) Agni

Uśanā Kāvya
9 verses: gāyatrī, arranged in tr̥cas

This short and simple hymn to Agni makes no reference to his fiery qualities, and only glancing ones to his ritual role: as guest in our houses (vs. 1) set here by the gods (vs. 2). The most salient aspect of the hymn is the series of questions it contains: in the second tr̥ca (vss. 4–6) the poet asks what services we should perform for Agni and how we should perform them (vss. 4–5); the final tr̥ca (vss. 7–10) again begins with a question (vs. 7), this time about which poet is the recipient of Agni's poetic stimulation. The poet is clearly concerned with producing the proper praise for the god; he mentions hymns or praises in verses 3–7.

The Anukramaṇī names as the poet the legendary and mythic figure Uśanā Kāvya, to whom the three hymns IX.87–89 are also attributed. It is not clear why, save for the mention of the kaví "sage poet" in verse 2.

1. The dearest guest will I praise for you—dear like an ally—
   Agni, worth acquiring like a chariot,
2. Him, discerning like a sage poet, whom the gods now once again have set down among mortals.
3. You, youngest one—protect pious men; listen to their hymns.
   Guard their lineage along with their life.

4. In what fashion (shall we present) a praise invocation to you, o Agni, Aṅgiras, child of nourishment,
   (fit) for your desire, your fervor?
5. With our mind on what sacrifice might we do pious service, o youthful
   (son) of strength?
   And what shall I speak as homage here?
6. So that then you will make all dwellings lovely for us and make our hymns have riches as their prize.

7. Whose thoughts in profusion do you now quicken, o houselord—the man whose hymns are (presented) to you at the winning of cattle?

8. They groom him, the very resolute one who goes in front at the contests, the prizewinner, in their own dwelling places.
9. He dwells peacefully in peaceful ways that bring success—whom no one smites, but who himself smites.
   O Agni, whoever is rich in heroes thrives.

VIII.85 (694) Aśvins

Kr̥ṣṇa Āṅgirasa
9 verses: gāyatrī, arranged in tr̥cas

Renou (EVP XVI: 68) deems this hymn "elementary," and indeed the hymn reduces the divine–human interaction to its simplest dimensions—the refrain promising the gods ritual offerings and the rest of the verse sketching the poet's invitation, the gods' journey, and the returns desired. The poet identifies himself twice (vss. 3–4).

1. Come to my call, o Nāsatyas, o Aśvins, to drink of the honeyed soma.
2. Hear this praise song of mine, Aśvins, this call of mine,
   to drink of the honeyed soma.
3. This Kr̥ṣṇa is calling you, o Aśvins whose goods are prizewinning mares,
   to drink of the honeyed soma.

4. Hear the call of Kr̥ṣṇa the praising singer, o men,
   to drink of the honeyed soma.
5. Extend undeceivable protection to the praising poet, o men,
   to drink of the honeyed soma.
6. Go to the house of the pious man who praises just so, o Aśvins, to drink of the honeyed soma.

7. Hitch the donkey to the chariot whose parts are solid, o you who bring bullish goods,
   to drink of the honeyed soma.
8. With your triply-turning chariot with its three chariot boxes drive here, o Aśvins, to drink of the honeyed soma.
9. Now promote my hymns, o Nāsatyas, o Aśvins,
   to drink of the honeyed soma.

VIII.86 (695) Aśvins

Kr̥ṣṇa Āṅgirasa or Viśvaka Kārṣṇi
5 verses: jagatī

This hymn clearly depicts a precise situation, with the poet Viśvaka making a direct appeal to the Aśvins, but the particular nature of the situation is difficult to ascertain. The two named men, Viśvaka and Viṣṇāpū, are found together three times elsewhere, always in Aśvin context. In nearly identical Kakṣīvant passages (I.116.23, 117.7) the Aśvins "gave" (dadathuḥ) Viṣṇāpū to Kr̥ṣṇiya Viśvaka (Viṣṇāpū compared to "a lost herd-animal" in 116.23); in X.65.12 they "let loose" (áva sr̥jathuḥ) Viṣṇāpū to Viśvaka. The first verb occurs twice in our hymn (2b, 3b), though not with a personal object; the other verb has a close synonym (mumócatam "release") in the refrain of all five verses. Thus, our hymn seems roughly to conform to the other R̥gvedic occurrences of these personae. Unfortunately this is all we know of the story: neither of the named men occurs in later texts, and though Geldner provides a contextualizing narrative, himself relying on Sāyaṇa, with Viśvaka the "grieved and deserted" (betrübte und verlassene) father who catches sight of his son, a poet who had gone far away to seek his fortune, there is no real evidence for this plot in the R̥gvedic passages—not even for the father–son relationship. Like many of the Aśvin myths it is intriguing and probably ultimately unknowable.

The Viśvaka/Viṣṇāpū episode seems only to occupy the first three verses, which may form a tr̥ca, as Oldenberg suggests (Noten ad loc.). The last two verses (4–5) retain the final-pāda refrain (of vss. 1–3), but omit the repeated c-pāda with its mention of Viśvaka. The appeal to Indra for help (vs. 4) and the praise of truth (vs. 5) seem loosely attached to the rest of the hymn.

1. Since both of you are wondrous healers, embodying joy, and both of you are (men) of skill and of speech, Viśvaka calls upon you at the making of bodies [=sons?]. – Do not keep us away from partnership with you. Release (him? [=Viṣṇāpū?])!
2. How shall one of expansive mind now offer praise to you? You two have given insight (to me? Viṣṇāpū?) to seek a better state.
   Viśvaka calls upon you at the making of bodies. – Do not keep us away from partnership with you. Release (him?)!
3. Since you two have given this radiance to Viṣṇāpū to seek a better state, o you who provide many enjoyments, Viśvaka calls upon you at the making of bodies. – Do not keep us away from partnership with you. Release (him?)!

4. And this hero, the winner of spoils and possessor of the silvery drink [=Indra], do we call upon for help, even though he is at a distance, upon him whose favor is sweetest like that of a father. – Do not keep us away from partnership with you. Release (him?)!
5. By truth god Savitar performs his labors; the horn of truth is extended widely.

The truth overpowers even those doing great battle. – Do not keep us away from partnership with you. Release (him?)!

VIII.87 (696) Aśvins

Dyumnīka Vāsiṣṭha or Priyamedha Āṅgirasa or Kr̥ṣṇa Āṅgirasa
6 verses: br̥hatī alternating with satobr̥hatī arranged in pragāthas

A typical and rather banal Aśvin hymn, with the simple message "come here, drink the soma, give us aid and goods," although there are a few striking images, especially in verse 1.

As Oldenberg (1888: 217) points out, this six-verse hymn, following a five-verse hymn, violates the proper order, but, as he also points out, the first two pragāthas are parallel in structure and phraseology, and may well form one four-verse hymn, with the final pragātha (vss. 5–6) an originally separate hymn. Detaching the last verses would restore an acceptable order, with a five-verse hymn (86), followed by four- and two-verse hymns.

1. Brilliant is the praise song for you two, o Aśvins, like a blood-red (horse) [?] at its outpouring. Come here!
   This (outpouring) of pressed honey is dear to heaven, o men. Drink like buffaloes at a salt-pocket.
2. Drink the honeyed hot milk, o Aśvins; sit here on the ritual grass, o men.
   Reaching exhilaration here in the dwelling of Manu, protect our vital energy along with our property.

3. The Priyamedhas have called you here with all your forms of help.
   Drive your course right up to the pleasing sacrifice of the man who has twisted the ritual grass at the rituals of daybreak.
4. Drink the honeyed soma, o Aśvins; sit close together on the ritual grass.
   Having grown strong, come from heaven right up to our good praise, like buffaloes to a salt-pocket.

5. Now drive here with your horses frothing at the mouth, o Aśvins.
   O wondrous ones of golden course, o lords of beauty, strong through truth, drink the soma.
6. Because we inspired poets in our admiration call upon you to win the prize, you two, agreeable, wondrous, and possessed of many wonders—come here with insight and attentive hearing, o Aśvins.

Oldenberg groups the four Indra hymns 88–91 together, though their numbers of verses do not conform to the expected sequence.

VIII.88 (697) Indra

Nodhas Gautama
6 verses: br̥hatī alternating with satobr̥hatī, arranged in pragāthas

This hymn is attributed by the Anukramaṇī to Nodhas Gautama, the skillful poet of I.58–64, whose descendant Ekadyū Naudhasa is the purported author of nearby VIII.80, which utilized the Nodhas Gautama refrain. This refrain is not found in this hymn, though the most striking word in the refrain, makṣū́ "soon, right away," does appear in verse 2. And in verse 4 the Gotamas are identified as creators of the chant being presented to Indra in phraseology very close to that used in the Nodhas Gautama hymns in Maṇḍala I (esp. I.61.16, but also I.60.5, I.63.9, I.62.13).

The hymn contains the usual mixture of praise for Indra's overwhelming might and pleas for his largesse. The poet uses Indra's unconstrained powers as an argument for his exercising generosity (see esp. vss. 3, 6). It is a well-crafted and pleasing piece; however, whether it is a part of the oeuvre of the Nodhas of Maṇḍala I is difficult to determine on stylistic grounds.

1. To him, the wondrous, vanquishing with his attack, becoming exhilarated from the good stalk, to Indra do we bellow with our hymns on your behalf, like milk-cows in good pastures to their calf.
2. The heaven-ruling one of good drops, swathed in powers, much nourishing like a mountain do we beseech for a prize rich in livestock, hundredfold, thousandfold, consisting of cattle—right away.

3. The high, hard rocks do not obstruct you, Indra.
   When you wish to give goods to a praiser like me, no one confounds this (intention) of yours.
4. As a battler with resolve, vast power, and wondrous skill, you surmount all created things with your might.
   This chant here will turn you hither for help, the chant which the Gotamas have generated.

5. Because you project beyond the limits of heaven with your strength, the earthly realm does not contain you, Indra. You have waxed strong following your independent power.
6. There is no constriction of your bounty, bounteous one, when you show favor to the pious man.
   Become the stimulator of our speech, most munificent, for the winning of prizes.

VIII.89 (698) Indra

Nṛmedha Āṅgirasa and Purumedha Āṅgirasa
7 verses: bṛhatī alternating with satobṛhatī, arranged in pragāthas 1–4; anuṣṭubh 5–6, bṛhatī 7, arranged in a tṛca

The signature word of this hymn is bṛhánt "lofty": it is the first and last word of the hymn, and appears in every verse except the two anuṣṭubh verses (5–6). (Note that the names of the other two meters in the hymn, bṛhatī and satobṛhatī, contain a form of this word as well.) The theme of the hymn is the Vṛtra battle and the singing of the Maruts that strengthens and inspires Indra for the battle. The middle verse (4) is quite possibly the Maruts' direct address to Indra, the sacred formulation (bráhman—note the phonological similarity to bṛhánt) mentioned in the previous verse (3).

The hymn begins and ends with an exhortation to produce a song or hymn for Indra. In verse 1 it is explicitly the Maruts who are thus urged (so also vs. 3), but in the last half of verse 7 the addressees are not identified (though they must be plural, unlike the singular "you" of 7ab). This lack of referent allows the verse to be interpreted in two ways—as a further address to the Maruts or as an address to the human poets—and this in turn allows the Maruts and the poets to be identified with each other and allows the current ritual to acquire the resonance of a divine correspondent. The ritual context is clear from the beginning: in verse 1 the generation of the light suggests the dawn sacrifice; in 6ab the creation of the sacrifice and its elements are Indra's recompense for his cosmogonic deeds; and in 7cd the mention of the heated gharma pot evokes a particular ritual, the Pravargya, which involves heating milk to boiling—milk that may be indirectly alluded to in 7a.

The hymn is also notable for what it lacks: any request for aid or riches. It is that very rare thing in the Ṛgveda, a pure hymn of praise. It is also nicely crafted, with balanced rhetorical responsions and variations and phonological and morphological play throughout, in deceptively direct and simple language.

1. For Indra, o Maruts, sing the lofty (sāman) that best smites Vṛtra, with which those who are strong through truth [=Maruts or gods] gave birth to the light, god(like) and wakeful, for the god.
2. The smiter of malediction blew away the interdictions. Then brilliant Indra was at hand.
   The gods yielded themselves to partnership with you, Indra—you of lofty radiance, with the Maruts as your flock.

3. To lofty Indra, o Maruts, chant your sacred formulation.
   He will smite Vṛtra—the Vṛtra-smiter of a hundred resolves—with his mace of a hundred joints.
4. [Maruts:] "Bear down boldly, you of bold mind: there will be lofty fame for you.
   Let the waters, the mothers, flow apart at speed. You will smite Vṛtra; you will win the sun."

5. When you were born for the smiting of Vr̥tra, you bounteous one without predecessor, then you spread out the earth, and then you propped up heaven.
6. Then the sacrifice was born for you, then the chant and (the fire's) "laughter."
   You dominate all this, what has been born and what is to be born.
7. You brought the cooked (milk) into the raw (cows); you made the sun mount in heaven.
   [To singers/Maruts:] Like the gharma pot when the sāman (is sung), heat the lofty (song) enjoyable to the one who yearns for song, with its well-twisted ornaments.

VIII.90 (699) Indra

Nr̥medha Āṅgirasa and Purumedha Āṅgirasa
6 verses: br̥hatī alternating with satobr̥hatī, arranged in pragāthas

Indra as the powerful smiter of obstacles is called to our sacrifice and begged for aid in battle and for riches. There is nothing particularly remarkable in this hymn except for verse 5, where there appears to be an obscure reference to Varuṇa as the "sustainer of domains," who concedes various unopposable obstacles to Indra. This epithet, carṣaṇī-dhŕ̥t, is actually more often used of Indra than of other gods, but Varuṇa is also so called (IV.1.2, twice), and a telling passage, VII.85.3, describes an amicable division of labor between Indra, who smashes unopposable obstacles, and Varuṇa, who sustains the peoples, in almost identical phraseology to our verse 5. What then does "concede" mean in our passage? Most likely, in our view, that Varuṇa concedes the sphere of warfare and martial defense to Indra, while continuing to perform his own task of assuring orderly existence in times and places of peace.

1. Let Indra, who is to be invoked, tend to all our battles.
   Let the Vr̥tra-smiter attend upon our sacred formulations and our pressings—he who has the highest overwhelming power, who is equal to song.
2. You are the foremost giver of bounties; you are the real thing, the one who performs the master's part.
   We would choose to be the associates of the powerfully brilliant son of strength, of the great one.

3. The unsurpassable sacred formulations are being performed for you, o Indra who yearn for song.
   Take pleasure in these "teams," o possessor of fallow bays, which we have thought up for you, Indra.

4. For you, bounteous one, the real thing who cannot be bowed, bear down on many obstacles.
   You, o strongest one with mace in hand—bring wealth nearby for the pious man.

5. You, Indra, are the glorious possessor of the silvery drink, o lord of strength.
   You, all alone, smite the unopposable obstacles that have been conceded by the one who sustains the domains [=Varuṇa?].
6. You, o lord, the forethoughtful one, do we now beseech for bounty, as we would beseech Bhaga for a portion.
   Your shelter is like a great hide, Indra. May your benevolent thoughts reach us.

VIII.91 (700) Indra

Apālā Ātreyī
7 verses; paṅkti 1–2, anuṣṭubh 3–7

This deceptively simple, and much discussed, hymn consists of a monologue embedded in a charm for healing and fertility. Unusually the speaker is an unmarried girl, who undertakes a clandestine soma ritual for Indra, with erotic overtones, in ultimate preparation for her marriage. It begins with a contextualizing introduction (vs. 1a–c): a maiden going to fetch water finds soma on her way. She brings it home and addresses first the soma and then Indra. She announces to soma her intention to press it (1de): as it turns out she presses it with her own mouth (2c) and offers it to Indra along with all the accoutrements of a real soma sacrifice (vs. 2). Indra arrives for the soma, and she seeks to understand his intentions, even as she assures him that she will keep his presence a secret (3ab). The lexeme translated "recite" (ádhi √i) is an item of pedagogical vocabulary, appropriate to her age and stage of life, and refers to students' oral recitation of their lessons; in this context it seems to mean "reveal your presence verbally." She then urges the soma to flow softly, in contrast to the excessive noise usually associated with soma's preparation (3cd). In verse 4 she tremulously speculates to herself about whether Indra will be able to achieve what she wants from her private soma-pressing, and worries, as an adolescent girl apprehensive about sexuality and marriage, about sexual intercourse with Indra, a rather formidable first sexual partner, one might think. In the next two verses (5–6) she expresses her wishes—three different types of hair growth: on the fields, that is, plants; on her father's bald head; and on her "belly," the last wish indicating a desire for pubic hair as a sign of sexual maturity. Apālā's words end here; the final verse says nothing directly about whether Indra fulfilled her expressed wishes (though we take it as implying that he did), but simply states that he purified her by pulling her through increasingly smaller holes, rendering her “sun-skinned,” quite possibly a reference to the curing of teenage acne, a frequent accompaniment to the entry into sexual maturity.

This R̥gvedic hymn is extensively quoted and embedded in a prose narrative in the Jaiminīya Brāhmaṇa (I.220–21). For detailed discussion of this hymn and its middle Vedic version, see Jamison (1991: 149–51, 165–67). That account and this translation are deeply indebted to and dependent upon the ground-breaking discussion by Hanns-Peter Schmidt in chapter 1 “The Affliction of Apālā (R̥gveda 8.91)” in his 1987 Some Women's Rites and Rights in the Veda (pp. 1–29).

1. A maiden going down to the water found soma along the way.
   Bringing it home she said, “I will press you for Indra; I will press you for the able one.
2. “You over there, the dear little hero who goes earnestly looking from house to house, drink this (soma), pressed by the jaws—(soma) accompanied by grain, by gruel, by cakes, by hymns.
3. “We wish to comprehend you; we will not ‘recite’ you aloud.
   Softly-like, ever so softly-like, o drop, flow around for Indra.
4. “Will he be able? Will he do it? Will he make us better off?
   Shall we, though coming as husband-haters, unite with Indra?
5. “Indra, make these three surfaces grow forth—
   the head of my Papa, the field, and this on my belly.
6. “That field of ours, this body of mine, and my Papa's head—make all these hairy.”
7. In the nave of a chariot, in the nave of a wagon, in the nave of a yoke, o Indra of a hundred resolves, having purified Apālā three times, you made (her) sun-skinned.

The next three hymns, 92–94, should be grouped together, according to Oldenberg (1888: 218).

VIII.92 (701) Indra

Śrutakakṣa Āṅgirasa or Sukakṣa Āṅgirasa
33 verses: gāyatrī, except anuṣṭubh 1, arranged in tr̥cas

This long, loosely structured hymn is essentially a constantly repeated invitation to Indra to come to the soma sacrifice. Although the poet does ask for aid from time to time, the focus is on the sacrifice, the verbal accompaniments, and the soma itself. The poet names himself (or nicknames himself: the name is Śrutakakṣa “having a famous armpit" [or a famous crotch]) in verse 25. This nickname appears in the midst of a striking sequence using the adverb áram "fitting(ly)" (vss. 24–27) in a clever shift implicitly equating Indra's body parts (e.g., "fit for your cheek" vs. 24a) with the gifts the poet hopes to receive (e.g., "fit for a horse" vs. 25a), at least once punningly: verse 35c, where the word dhā́mane can refer both to a body part, the "fundament," that is, the buttocks, and to Indra's conferring of gifts.

1. Sing (him) here to the drinking of your stalk; sing forth to Indra, the all-conquering one, of a hundred resolves, most liberal to the settled domains,
2. Much-invoked, much-praised leader of song, famed of old—call him, "Indra!"
3. It's Indra who is the giver to us of great prizes, the dancer.
   The great one, in a crouch [=driving posture], will guide (the prizes) here.

4. The belipped one has drunk of the stalk conferring good skill, accompanied by oblations, of the drop mixed with grain—has Indra.
5. Chant forth to him, to Indra, to drink the soma, for that is his strengthening.
6. Having drunk of this god here, of his exhilarating drinks, the god with his power will surmount all beings.

7. Him, entirely victorious, held in place amid all your hymns you will rouse for help—
8. The soma-drinker who is an unassailable fighter who cannot be budged, a superior man of unobstructable resolve.
9. Do your best for wealth for us, as one knowing many things, o Indra, you who are equal to song.
   Help us in the decisive (contest for) spoils.

10. Even from yonder, Indra, drive up close to us with hundred-prized, thousand-prized refreshment.
11. Let's go to the visionary thoughts of our visionary poet; with (the thoughts as) our steeds, o able one who breaks out the cows, might we conquer in battles, o possessor of the mace.
12. We will make you take pleasure in our hymns, o you of a hundred resolves, as cows do in their pastures.

13. Because all things in the mortal way are in accord with your desire, o you of a hundred resolves, we have arrived at our hopes, possessor of the mace.

14. To you, o son of strength, the desirers of desires have turned.
    Nothing surpasses you, Indra.
15. O bull, give aid to us with the awesome, dashing visionary thought that gains the most, and with plenitude.

16. O Indra of a hundred resolves, that which now is the most brilliant exhilaration for you, with that you should now become exhilarated on the exhilarating drink—
17. That of yours which possesses the brightest fame, which is the best smiter of Vr̥tra, Indra, that exhilaration which best gives strength.
18. For we know what of yours was given by you—possessor of the stone, real drinker of soma—to all communities, wondrous one.

19. Let our hymns encircle with rhythm the soma pressed for Indra for exhilaration.
    Let the bards chant their chant.
20. He in whom are all splendors, in whom the seven who sit together [=priests] take pleasure, Indra do we invoke when the soma is pressed.
21. The gods have stretched for themselves a noteworthy sacrifice among the Trikadrukas.
    Just him [=Indra] let our hymns increase.

22. Let the drops enter you, like rivers the sea.
    Nothing surpasses you, Indra.
23. O wakeful bull, with your greatness you encompass the portion of soma that is in your belly, Indra.
24. Let the soma be fit for your cheek, o Indra, Vr̥tra-smiter, fit for your "fundament" the drops.

25. Śrutakakṣa ["Famous Armpit"] sings fit for a horse, fit for a cow, fit for the "fundament" [/bestowal] of Indra.
26. For fittingly you exert yourself when our soma drinks are pressed, Indra, fittingly for your giving, able one.
27. Even from a distance our hymns reach you, possessor of the stone.
    Let us go fittingly to you.

28. For as surely as you are one who acts the hero and as surely as you are a steadfast champion, just as surely is your thought to be realized—

29. Just as surely has your giving, powerfully liberal one, been ordained by all the Ordainers.
    And so, Indra, (you are) in partnership with me.
30. Do not become like an indolent formulator, o lord of prizes.
    Exhilarate yourself on the pressed soma accompanied by cows [=milk].

31. Let not (ill) intentions toward us guide us away from the sun into the nights, Indra.
    With you as yokemate, we would gain it.
32. With just you as yokemate, Indra, we would respond to the challengers.
    You are ours; we are yours.
33. For those seeking you, ever bellowing after you, will proceed just to you—your comrades, the bards, o Indra.

VIII.93 (702) Indra (except Indra and R̥bhus 34)

Sukakṣa Āṅgirasa
34 verses: gāyatrī, arranged in tr̥cas

This long hymn begins with an address to the rising sun (vs. 1), which is echoed in the first verse of the second tr̥ca (vs. 4), and near its end are two verses directed to Agni (vss. 25–26). These paired addresses to other deities within an Indra hymn suggest the ritual context of a dawn soma sacrifice (though Dawn herself is not alluded to). Indeed, the soma offered to Indra is the dominant theme of the hymn, which becomes more insistent as the hymn progresses. Not surprisingly, mention of the aid and material wealth he will give in return for the soma is also not scanted.

Throughout the hymn Indra is especially celebrated as (best) Vr̥tra-smiter: the simple epithet and its superlative form occur an astonishing nine times, even though the myth itself is treated only sparingly (vss. 2, 7, 14–15).

As often, the tr̥cas become more tightly organized toward the end of the hymn, with a partial refrain in verses 25–27, and full-pāda refrains in 28–30 and 31–33, the latter being introduced (31a) by the same pāda that provides the refrain (31–33c). There are also intra- and inter-tr̥ca verbal echoes in these later verses. The separate final verse (34) mentioning the R̥bhus seems to have little or no connection to the rest of the hymn.

1. Up toward the bull whose bounty is famous, who performs manly work, toward the archer do you go, o Sun.
2. He who split the nine and ninety strongholds with his arm-strong (mace), and as Vr̥tra-smiter smote the serpent,
3. That Indra, propitious companion, will milk out for us (wealth) in horses, in cows, in grain, like (a cow) yielding a broad stream.

4. O Vr̥tra-smiter—whatever today you have risen over, o Sun, all that is under your will, Indra.
5. Or if, o lord of settlements grown strong, you think, "I shall not die," just that comes true for you.
6. The soma drinks which have been pressed in the distance, which nearby, to all those do you go, Indra.

7. We incite this Indra to smite great Vr̥tra.
   He will become a bullish bull.
8. Indra is the one made for giving. Strongest is he when ensconced in exhilaration; brilliant is he who, deserving of soma, receives the (invitatory) call.
9. Like a mace equipped with a hymn, powerful, not to be budged, he has waxed high, not to be laid low.

10. Even in difficult going, make easy passage for us when you are hymned, o Indra who yearn for hymns, if you will so desire, bounteous one—
11. You whose aim, whose sovereignty they never confound—neither god, nor the exalted folk.
12. And the two goddesses, both the World-Halves, respect your unrepulsable forcefulness, o you of good lips.

13. You fixed this fast in the black (cows) and in the reddish ones, and in the gray ones—the gleaming white milk.
14. Then as all the gods strode away from the turbulent power of the serpent, the onslaught of the wild beast found them.
15. And after that he became a covering for me: the Vr̥tra-smiter displayed his masculine nature—he for whom no rival has been born, he who cannot be laid low.

16. Him famed as the best smiter of Vr̥tra, the propelling force of the settled peoples, do I inspire to great generosity to you (patrons).
17. (I inspired you, Indra,) with this visionary thought and with desire for cattle—o you of many names, praised by many—so that you appeared at every soma-pressing.
18. Let him be of attentive mind just toward us—the Vr̥tra-smiter possessing many pressed drinks.
    Let the able one listen to our prayer.

19. (Coming) with what help for us do you reach exhilaration, bull?
    With what (help) for the pressers? Bring it here!
20. In whose pressed soma does the bullish bull with his teams take pleasure, the Vr̥tra-smiter, for soma-drinking?

21. On reaching exhilaration, (bring) wealth in thousands to us.
    Become a provider to the pious man.

22. These pressed drinks here, accompanied by their wives [=waters], go eagerly in pursuit.
    Regularly coming, ever filling [?] is (the wave) of the waters.
23. The desirable [/offered] libations, strengthening Indra at the ceremony, have surged to his down-stroke with their power.
24. Hither let these two feasting companions, the pair of fallow bays with golden manes, convey (you) to the pleasure set out (for you).

25. For you have these soma drinks here been pressed and the ritual grass strewn, o you of radiant goods [=Agni].
    Convey Indra hither for the praisers—
26. (Agni,) as you diffuse your skill through the luminous realms and distribute treasures to the pious man.
    (All of you,) recite to Indra for the praisers.
27. I establish here your Indrian strength and set out all solemn words for you, o you of a hundred resolves.
    Be merciful, Indra, to the praisers.

28. Bring us every good thing, every refreshment and nourishment, o you of a hundred resolves, when you will show us mercy, Indra.
29. Bring us all welfare, o you of a hundred resolves,
    when you will show us mercy, Indra.
30. We who have pressed soma call upon just you, best smiter of Vr̥tra, when you will show us mercy, Indra.

31. Right up to our pressed soma with your fallow bays—drive, o lord of exhilarating drinks—right up to our pressed soma with your fallow bays.
32. He who is known, now as before, as Indra, best smiter of Vr̥tra, possessing a hundred resolves—right up to our pressed soma with your fallow bays.
33. For you, Vr̥tra-smiter, are the drinker of these soma-drinks—right up to our pressed soma with your fallow bays.

34. Let Indra give us the wealth belonging to craft [/R̥bhu] as the craftsmaster [/R̥bhukṣan] for our refreshment.
    Let the prizewinner give a prizewinner.

VIII.94 (703) Maruts

Bindu Āṅgirasa or Pūtadakṣa Āṅgirasa
12 verses: gāyatrī, arranged in tr̥cas

This hymn, focused on soma-drinking, is a curious mix of almost vapid simplicity and baffling obscurity. Although the Anukramaṇī assigns the whole hymn to the Maruts, it has several features that deviate markedly from the general pattern of Marut hymns. To begin with the clearest, the second tr̥ca (vss. 4–6) names a number of gods as drinkers of the soma being presented: not only the Maruts (vs. 4), but the Aśvins (vs. 4), Indra (vs. 6), and the Ādityas, both as a body (vs. 4) and separately (vs. 5). By contrast, in the remaining tr̥cas (vss. 7–9, 10–12) only the Maruts are mentioned, but they are several times qualified by epithets and actions that are ordinarily the province of other gods: for example, "having refined skill" (vss. 7 and 10), generally used of one or more of the Ādityas; "mountain-dwelling" (vs. 12), usually of Soma. Since the lexicon of Marut hymns is often tightly limited, this borrowing of attributes is somewhat remarkable. Similarly the cosmogonic acts of spreading out the cosmic realms (vs. 9) and propping apart the two world-halves (vs. 11) are Indra's signature deeds, not otherwise attributed to the Maruts.

It is the first tr̥ca (vss. 1–3) that is the most problematic, however. It ends (vs. 3c) exactly as the third tr̥ca ends (9c), and with a variant of the formula found in all three verses of the final tr̥ca (vss. 10–12), in all cases inviting "the Maruts to drink the soma." But the hymn begins with a paradox (vs. 1), a cow who herself sucks rather than giving suck, a cow identified as the mother of the Maruts and also, in a sharply different animal metaphor, as the draft-horse of their chariots. In the second verse this female figure seems to transform into, or be identified with, Aditi: "the lap of Aditi" is a common phrase. It is this idiom that gives some clue as to the intent of the first two verses. "The lap of Aditi" seems elsewhere to refer to the ritual ground, or some part of it or some vessel associated with it, and soma is prepared or deposited in this lap. The statement that "the gods cause their commandments to be upheld" in this lap is a way of saying that the ritual activities of mortals sacrificing to the gods keep the cosmos functioning, so that, for example, the sun and the moon can be seen. As for the first verse, Pr̥śni, the mother of the Maruts, is in a few mysterious passages (notably IV.5.7, 10) also apparently identified with some part of the ritual ground or equipment, and so Aditi (in "the lap of Aditi") and Pr̥śni can be superimposed on each other. If "the cow" of verse 1 is the ritual ground (or some part thereof or piece thereon) as Pr̥śni, she "sucks" by receiving the oblation, and she is the draft-horse of the Maruts' chariots in providing the occasion for their journey.

The identification of the Maruts' mother with Aditi in the first tr̥ca and the ascription to them of epithets and activities characteristic of other gods in the rest of the hymn presumably stem from the same motive: to universalize the Maruts and make them a species of All Gods.

1. The cow herself takes suck, the fame-seeking mother of the bounteous Maruts;
   she is yoked as the draft-horse of their chariots,
2. She in whose lap all the gods cause their commandments to be upheld, for the sun and moon to be seen.
3. So then do all our bards sing them here, away from (the sacrifice of) the stranger—
   the Maruts to drink the soma.

4. Here it is—this pressed soma. They drink of it—the Maruts, and also the self-ruling ones [=Ādityas] and the Aśvins.
5. They drink—Mitra, Aryaman, Varuṇa—of the one purified in a continuous (stream), which possesses three seats and grants offspring.
6. And now at pleasure Indra (drinks) of it, of the pressed one with its cows [=milk-mixture];
   early in the morning he will become exhilarated like a Hotar.

7. Have the patrons [=Maruts] grown excited? Like the waters they rush beyond failures, the (Maruts) of refined skill.
8. Do I today choose the help of you gods, who are great and by nature of wondrous luster?
9. Those who spread all the earthly realms here and the luminous realms of heaven, (I call) the Maruts to drink the soma.

10. Just these of refined skill—you, o Maruts—from heaven I now call,
    to drink of this soma.
11. Just these, who propped apart the two world-halves, the Maruts I now call,
    to drink of this soma.
12. Just this, the bullish mountain-dwelling Marut flock, I now call,
    to drink of this soma.

Oldenberg collects the hymns 95–101 into a single group, despite the varying number of verses and the lack of other clear unifying features.

VIII.95 (704) Indra

Tiraścī Āṅgirasa
9 verses: anuṣṭubh, arranged in tr̥cas

A simple hymn in which the poet, who names himself in verse 4, both urges Indra to come to the soma sacrifice to enjoy the soma and the words of praise offered to him and exhorts his fellow celebrants to redouble their praises. The most notable feature of the hymn is the last tr̥ca (vss. 7–9), with its inescapable repetition of the word śuddhá "cleansed, washed," applied not merely to the soma but also to its verbal accompaniments, as well as to Indra and the help he will bring. This verb is not a standard part of soma vocabulary: it is used only once in Maṇḍala IX (IX.78.1), where it refers to the washing of the soma plant before its pressing. The verb is in general rare: almost all of its R̥gvedic attestations are found in the last three verses of this hymn. In the few other occurrences where the nature of the action can be determined, water is the agent, and it is clear that washing is the literal meaning of the verb and the metaphor deployed in this hymn.

1. Like a charioteer (his chariot), the songs have mounted you at the pressings, o you who long for songs.
 In unison they have bellowed to you, Indra, like mothers to their calf.
2. The clear pressed (soma drinks) have roused you hither, o Indra who long for songs.
 Drink of this stalk, Indra: it has been set for you among all (the clans).
3. Drink the soma for exhilaration, Indra, the pressed soma brought by the falcon,
 for you are the lord, the king of each and every clan.

4. Hear the call of Tiraścī, who honors you, Indra.
 Grant fullness of wealth in good heroes and in cows. You are great.
5. (Hear the call of Tiraścī,) who has begotten for you, Indra, a newer, invigorating hymn,
 a visionary thought stemming from a perceptive mind, an age-old vision swollen with truth.
6. Let us praise him—Indra, whom the songs and solemn words have strengthened.
 Seeking to gain them, may we win his many manly powers.

7. Come now! Let us praise Indra the cleansed with a cleansed sāman.
 Him grown strong through cleansed hymns let the cleansed (soma) with its milk-mixture exhilarate.
8. O Indra—cleansed, come here to us; (come) cleansed with cleansed help.
 Cleansed, lay down a foundation of wealth; cleansed, become exhilarated as the one deserving of soma.

9. For, o Indra, cleansed, (you lay down) wealth for us, cleansed, (you lay down) treasures for the pious man.
   Cleansed, you keep smashing obstacles, cleansed, you seek to gain the prize.

VIII.96 (705) Indra (except Maruts 14d, Indra and Bṛhaspati 15)

Tiraścī Āṅgirasa or Dyutāna Māruti
21 verses: triṣṭubh except virāj 4, arranged in tṛcas

A rich and complex hymn containing both glancing references and vivid treatments of several Indra myths. Its parts conform well to the tṛca structure, especially (as often) toward the end. Each of the last four tṛcas (vss. 10–21) has a verbal signature: in verses 10–12 the half-pāda refrain "surely he will take cognizance" (kuvíd aṅgá védat); in verses 13–15 the "droplet" (drapsá); in verses 16–18 the opening "you then" (tuvám̐ ha tyád); in verses 19–21 the definitional "Vṛtra-smiter" (vṛtrahā́).

The first tṛca of the hymn (vss. 1–3) sets the stage for the wide-ranging praise of Indra by describing his overwhelming power in three different areas. In verse 1 the powers of nature are subject to him. Verse 2 apparently contains a snatch of the Emuṣa myth, most extensively related in VIII.71. In that myth Indra shoots a boar named Emuṣa through many mountains; here only the mountains and the arrow-shot are mentioned, but the prodigious nature of the unnamed archer's action is clear, and the audience would be aware that this was a boyhood deed of Indra's. In verse 3 Indra's body is described as the site of his powers, both physical and mental.

The second tṛca (vss. 4–6) begins with a summary of his preeminence (vs. 4), but soon moves to the Vṛtra battle (vs. 5) and especially to the Maruts' role in it, a topic that will also occupy the third tṛca. The Maruts appear to be the "formulators" (*brahmán*s) introduced at the end of verse 5, bellowing to Indra. Verses 6–9 are best interpreted as the direct speech of the Maruts to Indra, offering him their praise while seeking an alliance with him. They remind him (vs. 7) that they stuck and continue to stick by him when the other gods deserted him in the Vṛtra battle, and they put in their claim to share the sacrifice with him (vs. 8), a claim also vividly dramatized in the dialogue hymn I.165. They end their speech (vs. 9) with the reassurance that together they, the Maruts and Indra, will make an unbeatable team.

The next tṛca (vss. 10–12) returns to the ritual present, with the poet's exhortation to himself to produce well-crafted words for Indra—whose attention to the praises he nervously hopes for. The following tṛca (vss. 13–15) is the most puzzling part of the hymn; it concerns an otherwise unknown story about a "droplet" (drapsá) or perhaps an individual (human? divine? semi-divine?) so named. There is a conflict of some sort in the Aṃśumatī River, which Indra appears to win in verse 15. The middle verse of the tṛca (vs. 14) is 1st-person direct speech and may be the words of Indra addressing the Maruts. But the "story" may also be an extended ritual metaphor. "Droplet" is a word also used of soma, and the name of the river means literally "possessing (soma) plants." The descent of the droplet into the river could well describe the rinsing of the soma plant that forms a regular part of soma preparation, although the ritual counterpart of the mythic conflict is difficult to identify.

Unified by its opening words "you then," the next tṛca (vss. 16–18) provides a survey of some of Indra's great deeds, some obscure (like the rivalry with the unidentified seven in vs. 16), some familiar: the defeat of Śuṣṇa (17c), the release of the cows from Vala (17d), and the Vṛtra battle again (18). The last tṛca begins with a riddle, though not a very challenging one. The first three pādas of verse 19 give a series of definitional descriptors of a hero. Those asked the riddle give their answer to "the other," in our opinion the riddler himself: "That's the Vṛtra-smiter!" And they provide other embellishments to the Vṛtra-smiter in the following two verses (20–21), while declaring the need to invoke and praise him. The hymn thus keeps returning to the Vṛtra battle, and the final three verses implicitly assert that Vṛtra-smiter is Indra's fundamental role.

1. For him do the dawns pass along their course; for Indra do the eloquent evenings (pass along their course) by night.
   For him do the waters, the seven mothers, stand still—the rivers easy to cross, for men to traverse.
2. They were pierced through by the archer, though he wavered—the thrice seven backs of the mountains fitted firmly together.
   No god nor mortal could surpass this—(the deeds) that the bull, grown strong, performed.
3. The metal mace is an appendage of Indra; greatest power is in the two arms of Indra.
   The intentions of Indra are in his head exclusively; into his mouth they rush en masse, to (become speech) worthy to be heard.

4. I consider you the most worthy of the sacrifice of those worthy of the sacrifice; I consider you the stirrer of the unstirrable;
   I consider you the beacon of warriors, Indra; I consider you the bull of the settled domains.
5. When, o Indra, in your two arms you took the mace stirred by exhilaration, to smite the serpent, the mountains bellowed forth, and forth the cows, forth the formulators [=Maruts] approaching Indra.
6. [Maruts:] "Let us praise him, who begat all these creatures here below him.
   We would like to establish an alliance with Indra with our hymns; we would come near the bull with reverences."

7. [Maruts:] “Shrinking from the hissing of Vṛtra, all the gods who were your partners deserted you.
   Let your partnership be with the Maruts, Indra. Then you will win all these battles here.”
8. [Maruts:] “We, the thrice sixty Maruts, having increased you as ruddy throngs [=herds of cattle] increase, are deserving of the sacrifice.
   We reverently approach you. Make a share for us. We would honor your unbridled force with this oblation.”
9. [Maruts:] “Sharp is the weapon, the vanguard of the Maruts. (And) who dares venture against your mace, Indra?
   The lords lacking gods are weapon-less. With your wheel [=discus?] scatter them, possessor of the silvery drink.”

10. For the great, strong, powerful one, for the one most propitious to cattle send forth a well-twisted (hymn).
    Produce many hymns for Indra whose vehicle is songs, for his body. Surely he will take cognizance (of them)?
11. To him whose vehicle is hymns, to the far-ranging one send an inspired thought like (a boat) to the far shore of rivers with a wooden (paddle).
    Stroke the body of the famous, very enjoyable one with a visionary thought. Surely he will take cognizance (of it)?
12. Labor at what Indra will enjoy from you. Give as praise a good praise hymn. Seek to entice him here with reverence.
    Be attentive, singer. Don’t screech, but make your speech heard. Surely he will take cognizance (of it)?

13. The Droplet descended into the Aṃśumatī (River), the black one speeding with the ten thousand.
    Indra with his skill helped him as he blew. The manly minded one repelled the “blizzards” (of attacking warriors?).
14. “I saw the Droplet wandering in the oscillating eddy of the Aṃśumatī River, descending like a black cloud. I dispatch you, bulls. Fight in the contest.”
15. Then the Droplet held his body in the lap of the Aṃśumatī, as he glittered.
    With Bṛhaspati as yokemate, Indra overcame the godless clans as they attacked.

16. You then—just as you were being born, you became the rival to the seven unrivaled ones, Indra.
    You discovered heaven and earth, which were hidden. You provided joy to the wide-ranging creatures.

17. You then—emboldened, you smote the power without counterpart with your mace, mace-bearer.
 You brought low (the power) of Śuṣṇa with your murderous weapons. You found the cows just with your skill, Indra.
18. You then—bull of the settled domains, you became the forceful bane of obstacles.
 You released the rivers, which had been blocked. You conquered the waters whose husband was a Dāsa.

19. "He is the very resolute one, who is the enjoyer of the pressings, to whom the battle-fury has been conceded, who is like a rich man through (all) the days, who all alone is the performer of manly labors." "That's the Vr̥tra-smiter!" they respond to the other.
20. That's the Vr̥tra-smiter—Indra, sustainer of the settled domains. Him who is to be invoked would we invoke with a lovely praise hymn.
 He is our bounteous helper, our advocate. He is the giver of the prize deserving of fame.
21. That's the Vr̥tra-smiter—Indra, the master of the R̥bhus. As soon as he was born, he became one to be invoked.
 Performing many manly labors, like soma when drunk he is to be invoked by his comrades.

VIII.97 (706) Indra

Rebha Kāśyapa
15 verses: br̥hatī 1–9, atijagatī 10, upariṣṭādbr̥hatī 11–12, atijagatī 13, triṣṭubh 14, jagatī 15, arranged in tr̥cas

Though metrically complex and metrically disturbed, this hymn follows a familiar thematic pattern, with its contents structured by the tr̥ca division. In the first tr̥ca (vss. 1–3) the poet asks Indra to take possession of wealth belonging to other human lords, who do not follow proper ritual behavior, and to redistribute it to the ritualists of the poet's own group. The next tr̥ca (vss. 4–6), as often, calls on Indra to come to the sacrifice from wherever he happens to be. The hope for Indra's exclusive company and the fear that he might not come at all are balanced in the third tr̥ca (vss. 7–9). This tr̥ca has an unusual structure, with the first and last pādas of each verse identical, a type of very tight ring-composition.

Only in the following tr̥ca (vss. 10–12) does the poet turn to formal praise of the god (though vs. 9 serves as a transition), but these verses function almost as much as a praise of the praisers themselves. In verse 11 the mockingly designated "raspers" (rebhá), that is, the singers, especially the poet himself, whom the Anukramaṇī identifies as Rebha, make Indra strong through their praise. More strikingly, in verse 12 the poets "bend the felly" of his chariot just by looking at it, and make Indra himself bow by their words; the point is surely that they thereby make Indra change the course of his journey and come to the sacrifice. In verse 10 an unidentified group both fashions and begets Indra; given the agents of the following verses, it is very tempting to assume that Rebha intends us to understand that it is the poets who fashioned and begot Indra (although the gods themselves, mentioned at the end of the previous verse, could also be the subject). In the last tr̥ca the poet combines praise of Indra's immense power with pleas for him to use it for our benefit.

1. The delights that you, the possessor of the sun, brought here from the (other) lords, o Indra, from that strengthen only your praiser, bounteous one, and those who have twisted the ritual grass for you.
2. What you have appropriated, Indra—the horse, the cow, and the ovine portion—confer that on the one who sacrifices, presses, and offers priestly gifts—not on the niggard.
3. He who slumbers sleepily not following the commandments, not following the gods, o Indra, through his own activities he will hinder his wealth from prospering. Put him far away from it.

4. Whether, able one, you are in the distance, whether nearby, Vr̥tra-smiter, from there he who has pressed soma seeks to attract you, Indra, with hymns as hairy-maned (horses) on heaven's way.
5. Or whether you are in the luminous realm of heaven or on the surface of the sea, whether in an earthly seat, best smiter of Vr̥tra, whether in the midspace—come here!
6. When our soma drinks are pressed, o soma-drinker, lord of power, bring yourself to exhilaration—with your liberal generosity, Indra, with wealth in profusion.

7. Don't shun us, Indra. Become our feasting companion.
   You—be there with help for us; just you—be friendship for us. Don't shun us, Indra.
8. Among us, Indra, at our pressing, sit down to drink the honey.
   Produce great help for the singer, bounteous one—among us, Indra, at our pressing.
9. The gods have not attained you, nor mortals, o possessor of the stone.
   You dominate all created things with your vast power. The gods have not attained you.

10. The superior man who is even more dominant over all battles—Indra have they jointly fashioned and begotten for ruling—most excellent in resolve and a hindrance in obstructing, strong, strongest, powerful, surpassing.

11. The "raspers" have cried out in unison to him, to Indra to drink of the soma, so as to increase him, the lord of the sun. For he of steadfast commandments is united with strength and with help.
12. The inspired poets bend the felly just with their gaze and bow the ram [=Indra] with their cry.
Very bright, without deceit, along with your versifiers they (cry out) close to the ear of the surpassing one.

13. I constantly call on this Indra, bounteous, strong, unrepulsable, deploying his own powers in every way.
If the most munificent one, worthy of the sacrifice, will turn here because of our hymns, let the mace-bearer make all our pathways easy for wealth.
14. You, o Indra, perceive how to utterly destroy the strongholds with your strength, most powerful, able one.
In fear of you, mace-bearer, do all the worlds and both heaven and earth tremble.
15. Indra, brilliant champion, let this truth be protective for me. Carry us across manifold difficulties, as if across the waters.
When, King Indra, would you show us the favor of wealth, to be eagerly sought like the distillate of all mother's milk?

VIII.98 (707) Indra

Nr̥medha Āṅgirasa
12 verses: uṣṇih, except kakubh 7, 10–11, puraüṣṇih 9, 12, arranged in tr̥cas.

Although the hymn is composed in three different meters, each of the three meters consists of two pādas of eight syllables and one of twelve, just differently arranged, so that the hymn is more formally unified than the bare metrical synopsis suggests. It is arranged in tr̥cas, but not all the tr̥cas show unity of form or content. The second tr̥ca (vss. 4–6) has a four-syllable refrain, and each verse of the last (vss. 10–12) begins with a form of "you" and contains the vocative "you of a hundred resolves," though not always in the same position. Otherwise there are no clear formal marks.

The hymn begins (vs. 1) with an exhortation to the ritualists to sing to Indra, and the second tr̥ca begins (vs. 4) with a complementary request to Indra to come to the sacrifice, but most of the rest of the first six verses is devoted to generalized praise of Indra. In the third tr̥ca (vss. 7–9) the ritualists mobilize their verbal resources to strengthen Indra and bring him to the sacrifice, and in the last tr̥ca (vss. 10–12), as usual, the poet then states our requests, here for battle strength and fighting heroes rather than wealth.

1. To Indra sing a sāman, a lofty one to the lofty inspired poet, to the creator of the foundations, who is attentive to poetic inspiration, inviting admiration.
2. You, Indra, are the dominator; you caused the sun to shine.
   Accomplishing all deeds, controlling all the gods, you are great.
3. Flashing forth (like) the sun with its light, you went to the luminous realm of heaven.
   The gods yielded themselves to partnership with you, Indra.

4. Come here to us, Indra, as the dear, entirely victorious one, who cannot be concealed, broad on all sides like a mountain—as lord of heaven.
5. For, you real drinker of soma, you dominate both world-halves.
   Indra, you are the strengthener of the soma-presser—as lord of heaven.
6. For you, Indra, are the splitter of each and every stronghold, the smiter of the Dasyu, the strengthener of Manu—as lord of heaven.

7. For therefore, o Indra who yearns for hymns, we have sent our great desires surging to you as those who come with waters [=Maruts] do their waters.
8. Like water with its floods, our sacred formulations are strengthening you, o champion, even though you have already grown strong day by day, o possessor of the stone.
9. With a song they yoke the two fallow bays of the vigorous one to the broad chariot with its broad yoke, the two conveyors of Indra, yoked by speech.

10. Indra, bring here to us strength and manly power, you unbounded one of a hundred resolves, bring here a hero victorious in battle.
11. For you are our father, o good one of a hundred resolves, you our mother.
    And therefore we beg for your favor.
12. To you who seek the prize do I appeal, you tempestuous much-invoked one of a hundred resolves.
    Grant us a mass of good heroes.

VIII.99 (708) Indra

Nr̥medha Āṅgirasa
8 verses: br̥hatī alternating with satobr̥hatī, arranged in pragāthas

As often, an invitation to the soma sacrifice begins the hymn (vss. 1–2), but it then continues directly to the topic of Indra's giving (vss. 3–4), which often ends hymns. The poet expresses his hope for goods somewhat indirectly, in a curious simile about getting cooked in the sun (vs. 3) and in the complex negative constructions of verse 4. The references to the same time yesterday (vs. 1) and to the apparent rebirth, that is, the regular rising, of the sun (vs. 3) suggest that the setting is the dawn ritual, when priestly gifts are distributed.

The second half of the hymn (vss. 4–8) is the praise hymn proper, with emphasis on Indra's irresistible might in battle. The changes rung on the root tṝ "overcome" as well as the balanced oppositions (of the type "who X-es but is not X-ed") and parallelisms (e.g., the recurrence of -tar- agent nouns) give this portion of the hymn a high rhetorical polish.

1. At this time yesterday these fervent men made you drink, o mace-bearer.
 Listen here to those whose vehicle is the praise song, Indra; come right up to the good pasture.
2. Become exhilarated, you well-lipped possessor of the fallow bays: we beseech you for this. The ritual adepts attend to you.
 Yours are the utmost claims to fame deserving of hymns at our pressings, o Indra who yearn for song.

3. As those who "get cooked" [=become warm/fervent] share in the sun, they share in all (the goods) of Indra.
 When he [=the Sun?] who has been born before is being born (again) with strength, we direct our thoughts toward goods, as if toward our share.
4. Praise the giver of goods, whose presents are not harmful. The presents of Indra are beneficial.
 He does not take umbrage at the desire of a man who does honor, as he bestirs his mind for giving.

5. O Indra, at the battle-charges you dominate all contenders.
 You are the smiter of maledictions, the begetter, the all-overcomer.
 Overcome those who seek to overcome.
6. The two "opponents" [=Heaven and Earth] follow after your gusting in its headlong rush, like two parents after their child.
 All contenders go slack before your battle fury, when you overcome Vṛtra, Indra.

7. For you (people) (we invoke) the one with enduring help, the unaging driver who cannot be driven, the swift victor, impeller, best of charioteers, the strengthener of the Tugryas who cannot be overcome—
8. The one who sets right but needs no setting right, made by might, of a hundred forms of help and a hundred resolves, common (to all)—Indra do we invoke for help, the possessor of goods, speeder of goods.

VIII.100 (709) Indra (1–9, 12), Vāc (10–11)

Nema Bhārgava (1–3, 6–12), Indra (4–5)
12 verses: triṣṭubh, except jagatī 6, anuṣṭubh 7–9

A vivid but baffling hymn, consisting in great part of snatches of dialogue or direct speech that may or may not be connected with each other. Needless to say, it has been much discussed and disagreed upon, and our own interpretation of it is not entirely secure.

The first two verses are a brief dialogue between an unidentified speaker and his addressee, Indra. The first speaker demands that Indra obtain a portion of the sacrifice for him before he will assist Indra in his deeds (vs. 1). In verse 2 Indra promises him the soma and proposes an active partnership. The first speaker has been variously identified, but we are in agreement with Oldenberg (Noten ad loc.), inter alia, that it is Vāyu, the god who along with Indra receives the first soma-offering at the soma sacrifice. (The word ágre "at the beginning" in vs. 2 gives strong support to this view.)

Thus we seem to have embarked, in mythical time, on the ritual day of real time. Such blending of mythical and current ritual time is not uncommon. And, in our view, what happens next, in the next snatch of dialogue (vss. 3–6), is the emergence of the real-time ritualist. A singer (who may, or may not, be named Śarabha [vs. 6]), addresses his colleagues (vs. 3), urging them to praise Indra, even as he raises doubts about Indra's existence—doubts that Indra counters directly (vs. 4) by his epiphany and self-praise. The scene has shifted from the mythical dialogue between Indra and Vāyu to the ritual dialogue between Indra and the singer.

Indra continues to speak in verse 5, though the contents of the speech are rather unclear. In our view the verse concerns the relationship between Indra and the Maruts, often called Indra's "companions" (sákhāyaḥ) as here, and the verse is here both because of the progress of the ritual day and because of an association of ideas with verses 1–2. The second or Midday Pressing of the soma sacrifice is dedicated to Indra and the Maruts, but the Maruts' share of the pressing was only established mythically when they reminded Indra of their help to him in the Vṛtra battle and demanded from him a share in the soma—a scene effectively dramatized in the famous hymn I.165. Thus, we have moved from the Morning Pressing with Indra and Vāyu to the Midday Pressing with Indra and the Maruts, and the covert thematic connection is that both Vāyu and the Maruts demanded a share of the sacrifice from Indra. What makes the mental association even more complex is the fact that in verse 5 Indra remains in dialogue with the singer, while remembering and recounting to the singer his side of a dialogue with the Maruts. In any case the singer is now convinced of Indra's reality and declares that Indra's deeds are to be praised.

The following three verses (7–9) in dimeter meter (as opposed to the trimeter meter of the rest of the hymn) are in our opinion the contents of the singer's praise hymn to Indra, highlighting the Vr̥tra battle (vss. 7 and 9) and the falcon's theft of soma for Indra (vs. 8). But, not surprisingly, the narration is far from straightforward. Most strikingly, in verse 7 there is a further layer of ventriloquism: in this verse the singer imitates the speech of yet another speaker, a witness or participant in the Vr̥tra battle, urging the waters, freed by Indra's slaying of Vr̥tra, to flow forth. The speaker whom the singer is quoting might be Indra, speaking of himself in the 3rd person or perhaps the Maruts. But in either case we the audience are three levels down: we are listening to the hymn's poet (supposedly Nema Bhārgava) imitating an unnamed singer in dialogue with Indra, and the singer is in turn imitating Indra or some other eyewitness of the mythical scene. The following verse (8) returns to straight narration, of the falcon's flight with the soma. In verse 9 we are back to the Vr̥tra battle, but notably the description is in the present tense, as if still from the point of view of an eyewitness, and it depicts a curious, indeed unprecedented episode, Indra's mace lying covered with water—a scene that reminds us of the dead Vr̥tra, who is famously described as lying defeated with the waters streaming over him in I.32.8, 10.

As complex and uncertain as our reading of these first nine verses is, the following two verses (10–11) are considerably more mystifying. It is not that the language or the content is difficult in itself; the verses concern the goddess Speech (Vāc) and present the common image of Speech as a milk-cow (vss. 10–11) and the common theme of the four divisions of speech (vs. 10). The perplexing part is why Vāc should make her appearance at this point in the hymn. The best answer to this question was given by Oldenberg well over a century ago (1885): he cited a story in later Vedic prose (Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa IV.1.3) relating a dispute between Indra and Vāyu after the Vr̥tra battle. Vāyu, as the swiftest god, was sent to make certain that Vr̥tra was dead, and he was rewarded with the first offering. Indra wanted a share of it (thus the opposite of the issue in our first two verses) and promised Vāyu in return that speech would be intelligible. The two gods then wrangled over their proper shares, and Indra received only a quarter, not the half he was expecting. Therefore he decreed that only a quarter of speech would be intelligible. The details of the story match in many ways those in the two verses in question, and it may well be that with these verses we return to the beginning of our hymn and the bargaining between Vāyu and Indra, in a sort of thematic ring composition. However, the Brāhmaṇa story is narratively confused and, as just noted, assigns the roles of petitioner and share-giver exactly opposite. It could therefore also be an after-the-fact attempt to rationalize the peculiarities of this part of the R̥gvedic hymn. We reserve judgment, and also point out that the cow in association with speech is celebrated at the end of the next hymn (VIII.101.15–16).

And then there is the final verse, addressed to Viṣṇu and echoing the first two verses verbally: the initial vocative "comrade" matches Indra's offer of comradeship to Vāyu in verse 2c, and the promise "we two will smite Vr̥tra [/the obstacle]" matches the almost identical phrase in 2d "we two will keep smashing obstacles." The close similarity of these verses led Geldner to assume that Viṣṇu is the speaker in verse 1, not Vāyu. In our opinion this assumption is unnecessary. We think rather that the final verse is an attempt to identify Viṣṇu with Vāyu, or to transform the older god Vāyu (who has a good Indo-Iranian pedigree) into the emergent and increasingly important god Viṣṇu, whose roots are not so deep.

Like many late R̥gvedic hymns, the difficulties here lie not in the language or the imagery, as is the case in earlier hymns. A major question in this hymn is what ties all the parts together. If we are correct that the first nine verses mark the progress from the morning to the midday rituals, via the gods (Vāyu, Maruts) associated with Indra at those occasions and their negotiations with Indra about their sacrificial share, and if Oldenberg is correct that the verses concerning Speech (vss. 10–11) conceal the story about the dispute between Indra and Vāyu after the Vr̥tra slaying, then we confront two different and superficially contradictory possibilities of hymnic unity. On the one hand, it may be a ritual unity—the progress of the ritual day—but then the Speech part awkwardly returns us to the beginning of the day. Or it may be a mythological unity, with the Vr̥tra battle viewed from different angles by different participants—but this leaves the ritual real time, with the prominent role of the singer, out of consideration. It is possible, but extremely speculative, that the final Viṣṇu verse gives us a way to reconcile these two approaches. As we have noted frequently elsewhere, the Third Pressing of the soma sacrifice was most likely a ritual innovation, slowly adopted by various clans at different times through the R̥gvedic period and after. Viṣṇu's most famous deed, the most prominent theme associated with him in the R̥gveda, is the cosmogonic taking of "three strides," which define and measure out the three worlds. It is possible that because of his association of "three," the introduction of Viṣṇu at the end of this hymn brings us to the end of the new ritual day, to the Third Pressing, while maintaining the mythic focus on the Vr̥tra slaying.

We do not claim to have solved the manifold difficulties of this hymn, but we hope that readers can still enjoy and respond to the intense directness of the dialogues and the stimulating if destabilizing rapidity of the transitions from one vignette to another.

1. [Vāyu:] "Here I go with my body before you. All the gods advance toward me from behind.
   When you will have secured a portion for me, Indra, only after that will you perform manly deeds along with me."

2. [Indra:] "I establish a draught of the honey for you at the beginning (of the sacrifice). Let the pressed soma be established as your portion, and you will be my comrade on my right side. Then we two will keep smashing obstacles in abundance."
3. [Singer:] "Proffer praise as you all seek the prize—real praise to Indra, if he is the real thing.
   'Indra does not exist,' so says many a one. 'Who has seen him? Whom shall we praise?'"
4. [Indra:] "Here I am, singer: see me here. I dominate all created things with my greatness.
   The instructions of truth [=hymns] strengthen me. As the one who keeps breaking open (Vala), I keep breaking the worlds.
5. [Indra:] "When the trackers of truth mounted to me, sitting alone on the back of the delightful one [=fallow bay/soma?], my mind just responded from the heart: 'My comrades have cried out (to me) like children.'" 6. [Singer:] "All these (deeds) of yours are to be proclaimed at the pressings, those which you did, bounteous Indra, for the presser—when you uncovered the goods, stemming from afar, brought together by many, for Śarabha of seers' lineage."

7. [Singer:] "'Now, (waters,) run forth each separately: he who obstructed you is not here.
   Indra has let fly his mace down onto Vr̥tra's mortal place.'
8. [Singer:] "Going at the speed of thought, it crossed the metal stronghold [=sky?].
   The fine-feathered (falcon), having gone to heaven, brought the soma to the mace-bearer.
9. [Singer:] "Within the sea it lies—the mace covered over with water.
   Streaming forth in front continuously, they [=waters] bring it tribute."

10. When Speech, saying indistinguishable things, sat down as gladdening ruler of the gods, she milked out in four (streams) nourishment and milk drinks. Where indeed did the highest of hers go?
11. The gods begat goddess Speech. The beasts of all forms speak her.
    Gladdening, milking out refreshment and nourishment for us, let Speech, the milk-cow, come well praised to us.

12. Comrade Viṣṇu, stride out widely. Heaven, grant a place for the mace to prop apart.
    We two will smite Vr̥tra; we two will give leave to the rivers. Let them, unleashed, go at the impetus of Indra.

VIII.101 (710) Various Gods: Mitra and Varuṇa (1–5c), Ādityas (5d-6), Aśvins (7–8), Vāyu (9–10), Sūrya (11–12), Uṣas (or Praise of the Sun's Radiance) (13), Pavamāna (14), Cow (15–16)

Jamadagni Bhārgava
16 verses: br̥hatī 1, 5, 7, 9, 11, 13; satobr̥hatī 2, 4, 6, 8, 10, 12; gāyatrī 3; triṣṭubh 14–16, arranged (for the most part) in pragāthas.

As the above summary of the deities and the meters demonstrates, this hymn is structurally quite complex, and indeed it may consist of several original hymns. (See Oldenberg 1888: 218 n. 1.) The divisions we see are somewhat at variance with the Anukramaṇī's analysis. The first six verses appear to belong together, with two pragāthas (vss. 1–4) to Mitra and Varuṇa and a third (vss. 5–6) expanding to include the Ādityas in general, the three best known (Mitra, Varuṇa, and Aryaman) named and the rest subsumed under the title "kings." The focus is on the gods' journey to the sacrifice and the praise presented to them there, save for the second pragātha (vss. 3–4), which gives a notable description of Mitra and Varuṇa's missile and the threat it poses.

There follow a pragātha to the Aśvins (vss. 7–8) and one to Vāyu (vss. 9–10), focused even more strongly on their journeys to the sacrifice. The following pragātha to the Sun (vss. 11–12) contains some of the most flat-footed verses in the R̥gveda; it is hard to tell whether the poet's inspiration gave out, or if there is some deeper purpose that escapes the modern reader.

In our opinion the praise of divinities stops here, and the remainder of the hymn (vss. 13–16) depicts the ritual moment. In verse 13 an oblation of butter or some other milk product is poured into the fire by the priests; verse 14 (the most difficult verse in the hymn) appears to concern the offering of soma. The final two verses (15–16) exalt the cow, who appeared briefly in verse 13, in the most extravagant terms, as kin to major groups of gods, source of immortality, and a goddess associated with speech. This association (vs. 16) reminds us of the somewhat intrusive presence of the goddess Speech as a milk-cow at the end of the immediately preceding hymn (VIII.100.10–11).

1. That mortal has labored just so for the conclave of the gods, each one by one, who has now brought Mitra and Varuṇa here for their preeminence, for our giving of oblations.
2. The two possessing highest dominion and broad vision, superior men, kings of longest fame, with their wondrous skill as if with their arm-strength they drive their chariot, together with the rays [/reins] of the sun.

3. Who ran forth as your quick messenger, o Mitra and Varuṇa, copper-headed, hasty in his exuberance,

4. Who does not come to rest to negotiate, nor to be called back, nor to come to agreement—from collision with that one deliver us today, deliver us with your two arms.

5. (Sing) forth for Mitra, forth for Aryaman, o you rich in truth, a speech, a companionable, pleasurable, protective praise song—sing to Varuṇa, to the kings.
6. They rouse their own ruddy, noble treasure, the single son of the three (mothers) [=Agni].
They, undeceivable, watch over the immortal foundations for mortals.

7. (Drive) here to my upraised speeches, the most brilliant ones that are to be performed—drive, Nāsatyas, both of one accord, to make tracks toward the oblations.
8. When we call to you for your giving without animus, you two rich in prize mares, come, advancing the advancing ritual offering, you superior men, as you are sung by Jamadagni.

9. Drive here to our sacrifice that touches heaven, Vāyu, with the well-disposed (gods).
(The one soma drink) within the sieve above is being mixed; this pure (soma) here has been held out to you.
10. The Adhvaryu pursues (you) along the straightest paths, (for you) to receive the oblations.
Then, teamster, drink of both of ours—the pure soma and the one mixed with milk.

11. Yes indeed! you are great, Sūrya; yes indeed! Āditya, you are great.
The greatness of you who are great attracts admiration. Certainly, god, you are great.
12. Yes indeed! Sūrya, you are great in fame; in every way, god, you are great.
Because of his greatness the lordly one was set in front for the gods, as the extensive undeceivable light.

13. Here is the one [=butter offering] who is heading downward, accompanied by chants, her form created by a ruddy (cow).
Like brilliant (Dawn) she has appeared opposite, coming hither within the ten arms.
14. Three offspring [=soma-drinks/pressings] have made their traversal (of the filter); the others have settled down around the chant.
Loftily he has stood among the creatures; the self-purifying (soma) has entered within the golden (flames).

15. Mother of the Rudras, daughter of the Vasus, sister of the Ādityas, navel of immortality—
    I now proclaim to observant people: do not smite the blameless cow—Aditi.
16. Knowing speech, rousing speech, reverently approaching with all visionary thoughts, the goddess, coming hither from the gods, the cow—*let not a small-witted mortal appropriate me.

The final group of hymns consists of 102–103, dedicated to Agni.

VIII.102 (711) Agni

Prayoga Bhārgava or Agni Pāvaka Bārhaspatya or Agni Gr̥hapati Sahasaḥ Sūnu and Agni Yaviṣṭha Sahasaḥ Sūnu (together or one or the other)
22 verses: gāyatrī, arranged in tr̥cas

For most of its length, this hymn is a conventional treatment of Agni's ritual activities, but with particular stress on his role as kaví "poet" or "sage poet" (vss. 1, 5, 17, 18). In general there is little internal unity in the tr̥cas, and indeed the third tr̥ca (vss. 7–9) is particularly disjointed, making a false start with two unconnected sentence fragments (vs. 7), followed by a purpose clause with no main clause (vs. 8). However, the second tr̥ca (vss. 4–6) has a refrain, and a curious one at that: "Agni, whose garment is the sea." This description probably references several different Agni themes: his identification and ultimate merging with Apām Napāt "Child of the Waters" (see esp. II.35); the myth about Agni's flight from his ritual duties, in which he hides in the waters; and the sprinkling of the fire with consecrated water in the Agnihotra, a ritual action also referred to in verse 14, where the associated act of laying ritual grass around the fire is also mentioned. Verse 14 may also recall Agni's flight and his concealment in the waters.

The conventional hymn appears to end with the sixth tr̥ca (vss. 16–18), solemnly treating the generation and installation of Agni as the conveyor of both the gods and the oblations. The next tr̥ca (vss. 19–21) has a light and self-deprecating tone. The poet claims to have neither of the barebones requisites for even a simple offering to Agni, a cow for the oblation and wood to feed his flames (vs. 19). All he has is "something like this"—namely the hymn he has just produced. This is clearly false modesty, and indeed the poet treats the standard wood and ghee rather slightingly in the next two verses (20–21). In the final appended verse (22, not part of a tr̥ca), he proudly pronounces that a man should kindle Agni with his mind and his vision (not, the implication is, with mere wood and ghee), and indeed that he has just done so.

1. You, Agni, establish lofty vitality for your pious server, god, as sage poet, houselord, youth.
2. Along with the one [=offering ladle] who reverently invokes the gods, who offers friendship to them, o far-radiant Agni,
   as observant one, convey them here to us.
3. With you as best inciting yokemate, o youngest one, we become dominant to win the prize.

4. Like Aurva and Bhr̥gu, like Apnavāna, I call upon the gleaming one, upon Agni, whose garment is the sea.
5. I call upon the sage poet, whose rush is the wind's, upon his might, whose roar is thunder's,
   upon Agni, whose garment is the sea.
6. As if upon the stimulus of Savitar, upon the benefit of Bhaga,
   I call upon
   Agni, whose garment is the sea.

7. Toward Agni, the strengthening one, best of many for your ceremonies...
   for the mighty child (of might)...
8. So that this (Agni) here will be at hand for us, as Tvaṣṭar is at hand for the forms to be crafted, with his will—the will of this glorious one...
9. This Agni here is master over all the splendors among the gods.
   He will come near to us here with prizes.

10. Praise here the most glorious of all Hotars, Agni, foremost at the sacrifices,
11. Sharp, pure-flamed, who shines preeminent in the houses, of longest fame.
12. Sing him, o poet, like a winning steed, the tempestuous one, who arranges the peoples in their places, like Mitra.

13. Those akin [=waters?], constantly directing to you the hymns of him who prepares the oblation, have approached you in front of Vāyu.
14. Whose ritual grass still stands uncut, not yet triply bundled—even his footprint you waters have deposited.
15. The footprint of the generous god, with his unassailable forms of help, is an auspicious sight, like the sun.

16. O god Agni, heating up with your flame through visions of ghee, convey the gods hither and sacrifice to them.
17. The mothers, the gods begot you, the sage poet, o Aṅgiras, as immortal conveyor of the oblation.

18. You, o sage Agni, a discerning messenger worthy to be chosen, have they installed as conveyor of the oblation.

19. Because I have no cow, nor an axe in a wooden (tree),
    I therefore bring just a thing like this to you.
20. When, Agni, we set any pieces of wood whatsoever in you, enjoy them, youngest one.
21. What the little termite eats, what the ant creeps over, let all that be ghee for you.

22. Kindling Agni with his mind, the mortal should follow his visionary thought.
    I have kindled Agni with the dawning lights.

VIII.103 (712) Agni (1–13), Agni and the Maruts (14)

Sobhari Kāṇva
14 verses: br̥hatī 1–4, 6; virāḍrūpā 5; satobr̥hatī 7, 9, 11, 13; kakubh 8, 12; gāyatrī 10; anuṣṭubh 14. One tr̥ca (1–3), 5 pragāthas (4–13), final verse (14).

Another metrically complex hymn, consisting mostly of pragāthas in various combinations of meters, but beginning with a tr̥ca (vss. 1–3) and ending with a single verse (14). Proferes (2007: 38–40) argues that the opening tr̥ca concerns the forging of a unified power from multiple clans by commitment to their mutually worshiped fire, which is identified as belonging to Divodāsa, the great Bharata leader (vs. 2). The territorial expansion and the overcoming of other populations therein are treated in verses 2–3.

Though the pragātha that follows (vss. 4–5) does not explicitly continue the theme of victory through centralized leadership, it does promise rewards to the man who devotes himself to Agni—particularly the renowned "imperishable fame" (ákṣiti śrávaḥ, vs. 5), a phrase whose Indo-European antiquity has been known and discussed for a century and a half. And "heroic glory" (vīrávad yáśaḥ, vs. 9), as well as goods and protection, are the rewards for service to Agni in the following pragāthas (vss. 6–11). The final pragātha (vss. 12–13) seeks to avert Agni's anger. In the summary verse (14) the poet names himself and invites Agni to the sacrifice.

1. He has just appeared, the best pathfinder, in whom they have established the commandments.
   Right up to him just born, the increaser of the Ārya, to Agni have our hymns reached.
2. The Fire allied to Divodāsa (has gone) forth, as if (all the way) to the gods with his might.
   He has unrolled himself along Mother Earth; he has taken his stand on the back of the firmament.

3. Before whom the communities tremble, as he performs (deeds) to be constantly acclaimed, the one who by himself wins thousands as if at the winning of wisdom—serve Agni with insightful thoughts.

4. The mortal whom you wish to lead forward for wealth, who does pious service for you, good one, he acquires a hero who proclaims solemn speech, who fosters a thousand by himself, o Agni.
5. With a steed he bores through to the prize even in the stronghold; he acquires imperishable fame.
   In you among the gods might we always acquire all things of value, o you of many goods.

6. He who distributes all goods, the gladdening Hotar of the peoples—like the cups of honey that go first to him, the praises go forth to Agni.
7. Those of good gifts, seeking the gods, groom (you), the charioteer (of the ceremonies), like a horse, with hymns.
   Deliver both our progeny and our posterity (to safety), o wondrous clanlord; deliver (to us) the generosity of the bounteous ones.

8. Sing forth to the most munificent one, to truthful, lofty, pure-flamed Agni, o Upastutas.
9. The bounteous one will gain heroic glory (for us)—he who is brilliant when kindled and bepoured.
   Surely his benevolence will come here to us anew along with prizes?

10. O Āsāva, praise the dearest of the dear ones, the guest,
    Agni, the controller of chariots,
11. The one deserving the sacrifice who at sunrise, as finder of tied-down goods, will turn them hither, whose waves [=flames] are difficult to cross, like the waves in a torrent, when he seeks to win the prize with his insightful thought.

12. Let the guest not be angry at us, this good Agni, proclaimed by many, who is the good Hotar of good ceremony.
13. And let those not suffer harm who (approach you) with invitations here in sundry ways, o good Agni.
    For even a weakling reverently invokes you for a mission if he is a man of good ceremony who has bestowed the oblation.

14. O Agni, drive here, as comrade of the Maruts, along with the Rudras, for soma-drinking.
    (Drive) to the good praise of Sobhari. Make yourself euphoric in the presence of Svarṇara.

Volume III

IX

Maṇḍala IX

The IXth Maṇḍala is the only major grouping in the R̥gveda devoted to a single ritual procedure. It consists of 114 hymns dedicated to Soma Pavamāna, "self-purifying Soma." It treats the deified ritual substance, the exhilarating drink soma, whose preparation and offering are the focus of the most important Vedic ritual, the soma sacrifice, but it treats that substance at only a single episode in the whole elaborate sacrifice, the time when the soma juice, which has already been pressed, is poured across the sheep's fleece that serves to "purify" it—that is, to remove the vegetable detritus still present in the liquid—before it is first diluted with water, then mixed with milk, and poured into the offering vessels. (For more detailed treatment of the ritual procedures involved see, e.g., Geldner's introduction to this maṇḍala and Oberlies 1999.)

There are no other hymns to Soma Pavamāna in the R̥gveda and only a few to Soma in his other aspects (I.91, VIII.48, VIII.79, X.25, as well as a few dedicated to Soma and another god [e.g., Soma and Rudra I.43, Agni and Soma I.93]). Judging from this absence, as well as from the data provided by the poets named by the Anukramaṇī, it is clear that many of the hymns in the maṇḍala were extracted from the original bardic collections and assembled in this liturgically oriented collection, while other hymns in the maṇḍala were composed by younger poets. The beginnings of the construction of a pan-Ārya sacrificial system, superseding the separate and competing clan rites—a construction that led to the middle Vedic śrauta ritual system—can be discerned in various composite hymns, especially IX.67.

It is little short of remarkable that the R̥gvedic bards could take this ritual snapshot, consisting of what seems like extremely unpromising material, and make it into high poetry not once, but 114 times, and even the most devoted Vedicist approaches this maṇḍala with some trepidation and with fear of the ennui to be induced by endless repetition of a few ritual tropes. What is truly surprising is that the poets for the most part managed to create an extraordinary variety of approaches to this limited theme, and, for readers interested in how the traditional poets of antiquity used all their ingenuity and poetic resources to trick out and ring changes on an invariant topic, the IXth Maṇḍala serves as a sort of laboratory to observe these skills in action. The hymns in the latter part of the maṇḍala in trimeter meter especially display this richness of approach, but even the sixty-seven hymns in the short (24 syllables per verse) gāyatrī meter are very different from each other.

One of the ways in which the poets imbue this ritual moment with gravity beyond the simple facts of the procedure is by animatizing all the elements deployed in the procedure and making them actors, rather than inert things acted upon. The soma juice is configured as Soma, king and god, making a royal progress across the filter to his rendezvous with the gods. Or he is a powerful charging bull, or a swift racehorse, or a bird in flight. The fleece filter is a ewe; the milk is regularly conceived of as a herd of cows, eager to mate with the bull Soma. These ritual elements are also given cosmic dimensions. Soma is a pillar between heaven and earth; the sheep's fleece is the whole surface of the earth or of heaven; the waters for dilution are a vast sea into which the waves of soma empty themselves; the milk in its gleaming brightness is the sun or the day-lit sky. Once they have assumed these other poetic identities, the elements of the ritual then participate in still other metaphors and images that stretch those identities further. And the identities shift constantly within even brief hymns. In short, although it may be difficult to love the Soma Maṇḍala, it provides an almost ideal lesson in how to construct traditional poetry. However, in order to appreciate the artistry and the distance between the real subject and its ennobling verbal treatment, it is necessary to keep the physical facts of the ritual always in view; we have emphasized these regularly in the introductions to the individual hymns. For a close study of the imagery, form, and composition of the soma hymns, see Oberlies (1999).

The maṇḍala is organized by meter, with the majority of the hymns in the dimeter gāyatrī meter (IX.1–67), followed by smaller collections of trimeter—jagatī (68–86) and triṣṭubh (87–97)—then anuṣṭubh (98–101), uṣṇih (102–106), pragātha structures (107–108), ending with miscellaneous meters (109–114). Within each metrical group the hymns are arranged by length, from longest to shortest. Although the gāyatrī, jagatī, and triṣṭubh collections end with some very long hymns, these "hymns" can easily be deconstructed into smaller hymns containing the correct number of verses. For example, the jagatī group ends with two apparently nonconforming hymns. After a long series of five-verse hymns (IX.75–84) we find IX.85 at twelve verses and IX.86 at forty-eight. But IX.85 can be broken down into three four-verse hymns and IX.86 into sixteen tr̥cas (three-verse groupings). The longest hymn in the R̥gveda is the final hymn of the triṣṭubh group, IX.97 with fifty-eight verses, divisible into tr̥cas (with a final, extra verse).

Gāyatrī Hymns: 1–67

IX.1 (713) Soma Pavamāna

Madhuchandas Vaiśvāmitra
10 verses: gāyatrī

The poet to whom the Anukramaṇī ascribes this hymn has the same name as the poet of the first collection of hymns in the R̥gveda: Madhuchandas Vaiśvāmitra is the author named for I.1–11 (and a descendant, Jetar Mādhuchandasa, for I.12). It is possible that in the absence of a known author the Anukramaṇī simply borrowed the name for this first hymn; in fact, the first four hymns of the IXth Maṇḍala are attributed to the first four authors of Maṇḍala I. On the other hand, the Soma Pavamāna hymns of the first four poets of Maṇḍala I may have been selected to begin the Soma Maṇḍala in order to provide an ordered framework.

The command "purify yourself" (pávasva) is the first word of the second pāda of this hymn and sets the theme for the entire maṇḍala: "self-purifying" soma. This first verse also introduces the necessary complement to this self-purifying soma, namely the consumer of soma par excellence, Indra. Thus the verse encapsulates in its simplicity the endlessly repeated and often monotonous concerns of the maṇḍala. The second verse alludes to the technical details of soma's preparation, another topic that will preoccupy the hymns to follow. Soma's powers to benefit men and gods directly are the subject of verses 3–5, while his power to stimulate Indra to do the same, an indirect benefit for both populations, closes the hymn (vs. 10).

Verses 6–9 contain more idiosyncratic material, a catalogue of female beings who aid in the preparation of soma. True, both the fingers that perform the pressing, metaphorically described in verses 7–8, and the cows that provide the milk to mix with soma (vs. 9) are common denizens of soma hymns, but the Daughter of the Sun is not: she otherwise appears in the IXth Maṇḍala only almost at the end, in IX.113.3. It is unclear what her role is here; perhaps she signals the Morning Pressing. Moreover, the "skin pipe" blown by the maidens in verse 8 is somewhat puzzling; on the basis of other passages (I.117.21 and VII.89.2) it appears to be a musical instrument, but how this image is meant to apply to soma (perhaps the stalk?) and how the fingers can also "blow" is not clear.

In short, most of this hymn is familiar, not to say clichéd, material in soma hymns, but as usual there are small deviations and striking images that challenge our notion that the soma hymns, particularly those in gāyatrī meter, are an undifferentiated mass of repetitive phrases.

1. Purify yourself in the sweetest, most exhilarating stream, Soma, when you are pressed for Indra to drink.
2. Demon-smasher, common to all domains, he has reached his seat upon the metal-hammered womb, upon his sitting place, by means of the wooden (vessel).
3. Become the best establisher of the wide realm, most munificent, best smasher of obstacles.
   Deliver (to us) the bounty of the liberal ones.

4. Rush to the pursuit of the great gods with your stalk, to the prize of victory and to fame.
5. Toward you do we proceed; this is just our goal every day.
   O drop, in you are our hopes.
6. The Daughter of the Sun purifies your circling soma with the fleece-filter in unfailing measure.
7. Him do the delicate ones grasp at the clash—the ten maidens [=fingers], the sisters—on the decisive day.
8. Him do the unwed girls impel, as they blow the skin bagpipe, him, the threefold wild honey.
9. And him do the inviolable milk-cows prepare, as their child, the soma, for Indra to drink.
10. In the raptures of just this (soma) Indra the champion keeps smashing all obstacles and bestows bounties.

IX.2 (714) Soma Pavamāna

Medhātithi Kāṇva
10 verses: gāyatrī

Medhātithi Kāṇva is the named poet of several hymns in the first half of Maṇḍala VIII (2–3, 32), with its predominantly Kāṇva authorship—but more to the point also of the second division of Maṇḍala I (I.12–23). So, just as the first hymn of IX is ascribed to the poet of the first hymns of Maṇḍala I, the second hymn of IX is said to have been composed by the poet of the second collection in I.

The hymn begins with the signature command "purify yourself" (pávasva), and the first word of the second pāda belongs to the same root: pavítram, the "means of purifying," that is, the filter. The first verses in general follow the steps in the preparation of soma after the pressing proper: the filtering of the pressed soma (vs. 1), into a vessel (vs. 2) with water (vss. 3–4), followed by the mixing with milk (vs. 4). This process is summarized in grandiose and cosmic terms in the following two verses (5–6), with the verbal accompaniment, the hymns and prayers, introduced in verses 7–8. Verse 9 echoes the earlier part of the hymn, particularly verse 3, and the poet ends (vs. 10) with a description of all of Soma's winnings, which can be interpreted as a covert request for Soma to provide us with these items.

There is nothing particularly noteworthy or out of the ordinary in this hymn, which could be taken as a prototypical Soma hymn.

1. Purify yourself across the filter at speed, Soma, pursuing the gods.
   As a bull, enter Indra, o drop.
2. Coil yourself toward great enjoyment, o drop, as the most heaven-bright bull.

Sit steadfast on your womb.

3. The stream of the pressed one, of the ritual adept, has milked out its own dear honey.
Very resolute, he has clothed himself in the waters.
4. The great waters, the rivers, rush after you, the great one, when you will clothe yourself with the cows.
5. The sea has been groomed in the waters—the prop and buttress of heaven, the soma in the filter, seeking us.
6. The tawny bull has bellowed; the great one, lovely to see like an ally, shines along with the sun.
7. O drop, the industrious songs are constantly groomed by your power, the songs by which you are (in turn) beautified for exhilaration.
8. We implore you, who make wide space, for ardent exhilaration.
To you belong great praise songs.
9. For us, o drop, while seeking Indra, purify yourself in a stream of honey, like rain-bearing Parjanya.
10. O drop, you are cow-winning, man-winning, horse-winning, and prize-winning.
You are the ancient embodiment of the sacrifice.

IX.3 (715) Soma Pavamāna

Śunaḥśepa Ājīīgarti
10 verses: gāyatrī

Following the pattern set by IX.1–2, the Anukramaṇī gives as the poet of this hymn the author of the third collection of hymns in Maṇḍala I (24–30), Śunaḥśepa Ājīgarti, also the protagonist of the famous Aitareya Brāhmaṇa story of father/son sacrifice (AiB VII.13–18), related during the Rājasūya, the Royal Consecration.

The hymn is verbally unified by the "this (one)" (eṣá), which begins every verse. It is thematically unified by its focus on only one step of the preparation, the filtering through sheep's wool that is the self-purification proper. A form of the verb "purify oneself" appears in seven of the ten verses (and "filter" derived from the same root in an eighth; only vss. 1 and 6 lack such a form). The poet provides variety with a range of images, from the bird of verse 1 to the chariot rider in verse 5, and as is common he conflates, and equates, the ritual and cosmic spheres. So, for example, the filter across which the soma moves is both a tangle of wool (vs. 2) and the vast spaces of heaven and the atmosphere (vs. 7).

1. This god, the immortal, flies like a bird on the wing toward the wooden cups to take his seat.

2. This god, created by poetic inspiration, streaks across the tangles (of sheep's wool) purifying himself, impossible to deceive.
3. This god, the tawny one, purifying himself, is groomed for the prize by the admiring (poets) who pursue the truth.
4. This one, like a champion traveling with his warriors, strives to win all desirable things, while he purifies himself.
5. This god rides on a chariot; while he purifies himself, he shows his favor and makes manifest his noise.
6. This one, praised by the inspired poets, the god, plunges through the waters, establishing treasures for the pious man.
7. This one streaks through heaven, across the airy spaces in his stream, whinnying again and again as he purifies himself.
8. This one has now run through heaven, across the airy spaces, and cannot be recaptured—good at the rite as he purifies himself.
9. This one, pressed in the way of his ancient birth, the god pressed for gods, the tawny one, rushes into the filter.
10. And this one here, he of much authority, giving birth to refreshing drinks while he is being born, purifies himself in a stream when he is pressed.

IX.4 (716) Soma Pavamāna

Hiraṇyastūpa Āṅgirasa
10 verses: gāyatrī

Once again, the poet of this fourth hymn in the Soma Maṇḍala is also the author of the fourth collection of hymns in Maṇḍala I (I.31–35), as well as another Soma hymn, IX.69.

The thematic constriction of the soma hymns is even narrower than usual in this hymn. A third of each verse is occupied by the self-contained refrain (pāda c: áthā no vásyasas kr̥dhi "then make us better off"), and many of the verses consist of short imperative clauses. There are local repetitions as well: the initial "win!" (sánā) of verses 1–3, the repeated pāda about resolve and help in verses 5b–6a, and the initial "rush" (abhy àrṣa) of verses 7–8. Only two verses (6, 9) lack an imperative, and the former contains an optative in similar usage.

These conscious formal limits of the hymn are obviously its point: content is secondary. One might note, however, that the sun's light is especially desired (vss. 2, 5, 6).

1. Win, Soma, and conquer great fame, self-purifying one.
   – Then make us better off.
2. Win light, win the sun, and all the gifts of good fortune, Soma.
   – Then make us better off.
3. Win skill and resolve. Soma, strike away the scorners.
   – Then make us better off.
4. Purifiers, purify soma for Indra to drink.
   – Then make us better off.
5. Give us a share in the sun through your resolve and your help.
   – Then make us better off.
6. Through your resolve and your help might we see the sun for a long time.
   – Then make us better off.
7. Rush, well-armed Soma, toward double-lofty wealth.
   – Then make us better off.
8. Rush toward wealth, as the unbudgeable victor in battles.
   – Then make us better off.
9. They have increased you with sacrifices at your expansion, self-purifying one.
   – Then make us better off.
10. Bring us glittering wealth in horses, o drop, through our whole lifetime.
   – Then make us better off.

The pattern of matches between the order of poets in the Maṇḍala I and that of IX is broken by IX.5. The next twenty hymns (IX.5–24) are attributed to Asita Kāśyapa or Devala Kāśyapa, poets not otherwise found in the Anukramaṇī list of R̥gvedic poets, though there are other poets with the patronymic Kāśyapa, as well as Kaśyapa Mārīca, to whom a number of hymns, including several in IX, are attributed.

IX.5 (717) Āprī

Asita Kāśyapa or Devala Kāśyapa
11 verses: gāyatrī 1–7, anuṣṭubh 8–11

An interesting hybrid: the poet has taken the strict patterning of the Āprī hymns of the animal sacrifice, in which each verse contains a key word or phrase (italicized in translation) and the verses appear in the same order, and adapted it to the Soma Pavamāna genre. The same key words are found in the same order, but they are no longer directly addressed to or descriptive of a series of different divinities and divinized ritual elements. Instead Soma is sometimes identified with the divinity of the original Āprī verse (vss. 2, 7), or characterized by the epithet used for that divinity (vss. 1, 3), or, most often, he manipulates the divinized element (vss. 4, 5, 10) or associates with the Āprī divinity at the sacrifice (vss. 6, 8, 9, 11). Each verse contains a form of pávamāna "self-purifying" to anchor the Āprī structure to the soma context.

1. Enkindled, the self-purifying lord shines forth in every direction, giving pleasure, the ever-roaring bull.
2. As Tanūnapāt, the self-purifying one, sharpening his horns, rushes through the midspace, ever-shining.
3. Worthy to be invoked, the self-purifying one, heaven-bright wealth, shines forth with his streams of honey, with his strength.
4. The tawny self-purifying one, strewing the ritual grass toward the east with his strength, speeds as a god to the gods.
5. With their frames the golden Divine Doors open up aloft, well praised by the self-purifying one.
6. The self-purifying one acts the bull to the two handsomely adorned females, lofty and great,
   Night and Dawn, like two (women) lovely to see.
7. Both gods who have the gaze of men, the two Divine Hotars, do I summon—the self-purifying one and Indra the bull.
8. Bhāratī, Sarasvatī, and Iḍā the great, the three goddesses of beautiful ornaments, will come here to this sacrifice of ours for the self-purifying one.
9. Tvaṣṭar, the first-born herdsman who journeys in advance, do I summon here.
   The drop is Indra, the tawny bull; the self-purifying one is Prajāpati.
10. O self-purifying one, with your honeyed stream anoint the Lord of the Forest, the tawny one with a thousand branches, blazing, golden.
11. All you gods, come here to the svāhā-cry of the self-purifying one:
    Vāyu, Bṛhaspati, the Sun, Agni, and Indra, all of one accord.

IX.6 (718) Soma Pavamāna

Asita Kāśyapa or Devala Kāśyapa
9 verses: gāyatrī

Soma's journey—to the gods, to Indra, and to us, as well as to the state of exhilaration and to material rewards—is the primary subject of this hymn. In the last two verses (8–9) Soma's association with poetry and with the exercise of poetic skill is mentioned. The last statement, that Soma takes to himself hymns, though they are hidden, is not entirely clear, but it may refer to his ability to stimulate poetic inspiration, and to cause poets to create new hymns from deep within themselves.

Noteworthy is also the pun in verse 2, where the drop (índu) is urged to flow as "Indra." The phonological similarity between these two words is often exploited elsewhere, indeed in the immediately preceding hymn (IX.5.9).

1. O Soma, as bull purify yourself in a gladdening stream as you seek the gods,
   as you seek us, in the sheep's fleece.
2. Toward this exhilarating exhilaration, o drop, flow as "Indra"— and toward prizewinning chargers.
3. Toward this ancient exhilaration rush into the filter as you are being pressed,
   and toward victory's prize and fame.
4. In succession, the droplets, the drops, have run like waters down a slope.
   Being purified, they have reached Indra.
5. Whom the ten maidens groom like a prizewinning steed, him playing in the wood(en vessel), beyond the sheep [=fleece],
6. That bullish sap—merge it with the cows, for exhilaration, for the gods' pursuit—
   the pressed soma for the taking.
7. The god for the god—pressed, he purifies himself in a stream for Indra,
   when he [=Indra] swells his milk.
8. The embodiment of the sacrifice, the pressed soma, having been pressed, purifies himself at speed.
   He protects the age-old poetic skill.
9. In just this way, as you are being purified and seeking Indra, for him to pursue exhilaration, you most exhilarating one, you make the hymns, though hidden, your own.

IX.7 (719) Soma Pavamāna

Asita Kāśyapa or Devala Kāśyapa
9 verses: gāyatrī

The word "soma" does not appear at all in this hymn, and the epithet "self-purifying" (pávamāna) only once, in verse 5 (a finite verb form from the same root is found in vs. 8). Verses 1 and 8 have a similar structure, especially in their final pādas, and form a ring, with the last verse (9) addressed not to soma but to the world-halves and seemingly extra-hymnic. The two middle verses (4–5) contain the meat of the hymn: Soma is depicted both as a poet (as in the previous hymn, IX.6.8–9) and a successful king and warrior. The rest of the hymn (vss. 1–3, 6–8) depicts the usual journey of the soma around the fleece filter and into the wooden vessel in which he mixes with water. The final two verses of the hymn proper (7–8) name several of the divine recipients of soma; those in verse 7 are especially associated with the Morning Pressing.

1. The drops have surged along the path of truth, upon its foundation—the very splendid ones, recognizing its route.
2. Forth (goes) the stream, the forefront of the honey; it plunges through the great waters, to be extolled as the oblation among oblations.
3. Forth (he goes) as the forefront of speech, his yokemate; the bull has roared down into the wood(en vessel), toward his seat: he is the real rite.
4. When the poet, clothing himself in his poetic skills and manly powers, rushes around (the fleece), the racehorse strives to win the sun.
5. The self-purifying one sits over his opponents, like a king over the clans, when the ritual adepts set him in motion.
6. (Having circled) around the sheep's fleece, the dear tawny one sits in the wood(en vessels);
   husky-voiced, he is eager to prevail with his thought.
7. He goes with his exhilaration to Vāyu, Indra, and the Aśvins, with the joy that is in accord with his ordinances.
8. The waves of honey attract here through their purification Mitra and Varuṇa, and Bhaga, recognizing them through its powers.
9. You two World-Halves, for us to win the prize of honey, conquer wealth, conquer fame and goods.

IX.8 (719) Soma Pavamāna

Asita Kāśyapa or Devala Kāśyapa
9 verses: gāyatrī

Although this hymn is, of course, dedicated to self-purifying Soma, the process is repeatedly described in the passive ("being purified," vss. 2, 3, 6) rather than in the usual reflexive construction. However, this grammatical peculiarity does not seem to deprive Soma of agency: he (or his juices) are urged to increase Indra's power

(vs. 1), provide us with power (vss. 2, 8), cause Indra to be generous to us (vs. 3) and provide us with mortal patrons as well (vs. 7), remove hostilities (vs. 7), and cause the rain to fall (vs. 8), among other things.

The middle verses (4–6) concern the preparation of soma; as usual, the materials used in the preparation are animatized (vss. 5–6): the "ewes" are the fleece filter, the "cows" and "cattle" the milk-mixture.

The first three verses reunite the group of gods to whom Soma went in the previous hymn (IX.7.7): Vāyu and the Aśvins (vs. 2) and Indra (vss. 1, 3), the principal deities of the Morning Pressing.

1. These soma juices have flowed toward Indra's own desire, increasing his heroic power.
2. Being purified, finding a seat in the cups, going to Vāyu and the Aśvins,
   let them confer good heroic power on us.
3. O Soma, rouse the heart of Indra to generosity, as you are being purified to take your seat on the womb of truth.
4. Ten fingers groom you; seven insightful thoughts propel you.
   Inspired poets have cheered you on.
5. For the gods, for their exhilaration, you who are surging through the ewes
   do we clothe with cows.
6. Being purified in the tubs, he, tawny and ruddy, has wrapped himself in garments of cattle.
7. Attract bounteous patrons for us through your purification. Strike away all hatreds.
   O drop, enter your comrade.
8. Stream rain from heaven and heavenly brilliance from the earth.
   Confer strength in battles on us, Soma.
9. Might we have a share in you, drawing the gaze of men, drunk by Indra, finding the sun—
   and a share in offspring and refreshment.

IX.9 (721) Soma Pavamāna

Asita Kāśyapa or Devala Kāśyapa
9 verses: gāyatrī

Unlike the relatively straightforward preceding hymns, this one is full of puzzles and ambiguities, with the implements and process of soma purification compared to cosmic entities and actions. Some of the puzzles are illuminated by the next hymn, IX.10, which is in some ways a more straightforward twin to this one. This one also appears to be an omphalos hymn, with an inner ring defined by numerological repetition in verses 4 and 6, around the omphalos verse 5.

On the ritual level, the soma is pressed between or in his two granddaughters (vs. 1): most likely the hands of the priest, on the basis of IX.10.2; after his journey (vss. 1–2), accompanied by hymns he is united with the waters (vss. 4–5), who make him their eye. He is called upon to give aid to the ritual and to the hymn (vss. 7–8).

This synopsis leaves a number of questions unanswered. Who, for example, are his two mothers in verse 3? Are they the same as his two female kinsmen in verse 1? Since Ṛgvedic poets delight in paradoxical kinship relationships, this is certainly possible. If so, they could be both the ritual implement (hands) and Heaven and Earth, and in this latter cosmic manifestation their son Soma, who makes them shine in verse 3, could be identified with the sun—an identification that is supported by the "single eye" of verse 4. Again under a cosmic interpretation the rivers of verse 4 can be not only the waters with which soma mixes in his ritual preparation, but also the heavenly streams (and indeed real rivers).

The referents in the middle verses 4–6 are especially floating and uncertain: both the insights and the rivers of verse 4 are feminine in gender. The agent of verse 5 (the omphalos verse) is feminine plural, and so could be either insights or rivers or both, and "the great" is also left unspecified. In verse 6 we encounter "the seven" again, which can either be the seven insights of verse 4 (which we also met in the preceding hymn, IX.8.4) or the rivers, since the canonical number of rivers is seven. This series of puzzles is capped by the final pāda of verse 6, with the impossible word krívi, which seems here to refer to Soma. The goddesses whom he satisfies could, again, be either the rivers or the insights (or perhaps even just goddesses).

The final three verses (7–9), with their requests, cause little difficulty, by contrast.

Although the mysteries of the hymn remain largely unsolved, we can note a thematic strain that provides some unity: the issue of light and darkness. The Soma/Sun of verse 3 lights up his mothers; he may also be the Sun in verse 4. In verse 7 we call upon Soma to help us combat darkness and in verse 8 to light up the lights. The last word of the hymn (vs. 9) is "sun" (svàḥ). It seems that in this hymn Soma is both identified with the Sun and seen as a force that can win and keep the light that Vedic people so craved and worried about. This focus on the sun is also found in the next hymn, IX.10.

1. The poet of heaven makes the circuit of his own vital powers, when propelled between his two granddaughters as he is being pressed—he who has a poet's purpose.
2. You, delightful to the praiseworthy dwelling place, to the race without deceit [=gods]—
   rush ever forward in your most pleasing pursuit (of them).
3. He, their blazing son, made his two mothers shine—he just born and they just born,
   he the great and they the great, increasing through truth.

4. Propelled by seven insightful thoughts, he quickened the rivers without deceit, they who strengthened him as the single eye.
5. They installed the youth as dominating and indestructible for the great;
   they installed the drop, Indra, under your commandment.
6. The immortal draft-horse looks upon the seven as he draws.
   Krivi has satisfied the goddesses.
7. Help us in our ritual arrangements, o male. The shades of darkness must be fought, Soma.
   You shall keep smiting them, o you who are being purified.
8. Now make the paths for our newer and newer hymn reach their goal.
   Make the lights light up as of old.
9. Self-purifying one, bestow great fame, the cow, and the horse along with heroes.
   Win wisdom, win the sun.

IX.10 (722) Soma Pavamāna

Asita Kāśyapa or Devala Kāśyapa
9 verses: gāyatrī

This hymn, which shares a number of themes with IX.9, begins with three verses heavy with similes, quickly sketching the pressing, filtering, and mixing of the soma juices. After a verse (4) with no poetic figuration, the second part of the hymn switches to metaphor, and especially to metaphors of and identifications with the sun, as in IX.9. The spreading of the soma juices across the sheep's fleece is likened to suns and their rays (vs. 5). The "lone one" in verse 7 is probably both the soma crossing the filter and the sun crossing heaven. Soma's eye is first tied to the sun (vs. 8), and then the sun implicitly becomes his eye (vs. 9). In addition, the "portion" of Vivasvant ("the one shining forth") and of Dawn in verse 5 probably refers to the radiance of these divinities, obtained by the soma juices, which are then transformed into suns.

Other metaphors involve the poets and sacrificers: the doors of poetry (vs. 6), the seven siblings of the priests (vs. 7), who are no doubt the seven inspired thoughts of previous hymns (IX.9.4, 6; IX.8.4). This latter metaphor of kinship then provides our own kinship relationship to Soma himself (vs. 8). One image remains somewhat obscure: in verse 9 the "track of heaven" is said to have been placed in hiding by the Adhvaryus. This must be a specific ritual reference, with the track of heaven being likened to Soma's own tracks—perhaps when Soma disappears into the fleece when the Adhvaryu priests are first pressing him.

1. While being pressed, the soma juices, resounding like chariots, seeking fame like chargers, have marched forth for wealth.
2. Being propelled like chariots, they have run between the two hands (of the priest).
   Their takings are like those of decisive victors.
3. Like kings by encomia, the soma juices are anointed with cows, like the sacrifice by its seven ordainers.
4. While resounding [/being pressed] for exhilaration with might and song, the drops, pressed, rush around in a stream.
5. Having obtained (the portion) of Vivasvant, begetting the portion of Dawn, the suns stretch out across the fine (fleece).
6. The ancient bards thrust open the doors of poetic thoughts—the Āyus for the raging of the bull.
7. They sit all together, the Hotars with their seven siblings, guiding the track of the lone one safely across.
8. He has bound his navel to our navel, as also his eye to the sun.
   He has yielded progeny to the poet as milk.
9. Over his own dear (tracks) and the track of heaven, which was placed in hiding by the Adhvaryus, he looks with the eye of the sun.

IX.11 (723) Soma Pavamāna

Asita Kāśyapa or Devala Kāśyapa
9 verses: gāyatrī

Much of this hymn consists of exhortations to the priests to perform their parts of the soma preparation, interspersed with addresses to Soma to purify himself for our benefit. Unlike the last few hymns attributed to the same poet, the language and syntax present no difficulties, and there is almost no imagery or verbal figuration. It is a no-nonsense production.

1. Sing to him, men, to the self-purifying drop, as he seeks to attain the gods.
2. The Atharvan-priests have now mixed your milk with honey—mixed the god for the god in seeking the gods.
3. Purify yourself as weal for our cow, weal for our people, weal for our charger, weal for our plants, o king.

4. Now, to the self-powerful brown one, to the ruddy one who touches heaven, to Soma, chant a song.
5. Purify the soma pressed with stones set in motion by the hands.
   Rinse the honey in honey.
6. Just with homage approach it. Just with curds mix it.
   Place the drop in Indra.
7. As the limitless smiter of foes, o Soma, purify yourself as weal for our cow, acting for the gods according to their desire.
8. You are poured around, Soma, for Indra to drink, for his exhilaration—perceiving thoughts as master of thought.
9. Self-purifying Soma, give us wealth and an abundance of heroes, o drop, along with Indra as our yokemate.

IX.12 (724) Soma Pavamāna

Asita Kāśyapa or Devala Kāśyapa
9 verses: gāyatrī

Although entirely focused on the process of soma preparation, this hymn displays the common rhetorical inflation of this process by associating it with cosmic elements. Thus, for example, in verse 4 Soma is both "in the navel of heaven" and "in the sheep's fleece"—both referring to the filter; the "surface of the sea" in verse 6 is either the soma itself collected in the vessel or the water with which it mixes; the "dear tracks of heaven" in verse 8 are the meanderings of soma through the fleece filter (see also IX.10.9). The buffalo-cow in verse 3 is probably the hide on which the pressing apparatus is set. Only in the last verse (9) does the poet make any requests of the god.

1. The soma juices have surged, the drops pressed in the seat of truth, most honeyed for Indra.
2. The inspired poets have roared—like mother cows to their calf—to Indra, to drink the soma.
3. Arousing exhilaration, attentive to poetic inspiration, he dwells in his seat, in the wave of the river:
   Soma is set upon the buffalo-cow.
4. In the navel of heaven, he, wide-gazing, shows his greatness in the sheep's fleece:
   Soma, who is a poet with good purpose.
5. The soma that is in the tubs, that is placed within the filter, that does the drop embrace.

6. The drop sends forth his speech upon the surface of the sea, quickening the cask dripping with honey.
7. The lord of the forest who has praise as his own, yielding the juice of insights within (the filter), propelling the human generations,
8. Being himself propelled, Soma rushes toward the dear tracks of heaven, the sage poet, with the stream of an inspired poet.
9. Self-purifying one, secure wealth of a thousand lusters close at hand to us, o drop.

IX.13 (725) Soma Pavamāna

Asita Kāśyapa or Devala Kāśyapa
9 verses: gāyatrī

The first verse, with its mention of Vāyu and Indra, identifies this as the first soma-offering of the day. Otherwise the hymn is a confection of clichés familiar from many other soma hymns.

1. As he is being purified, Soma rushes in a thousand streams beyond the sheep [=fleece] to his encounter with Vāyu and Indra.
2. You who are seeking help, sing forth to the self-purifying inspired poet, who has been pressed to pursue the gods.
3. The thousand-faceted soma juices purify themselves to win the prize, being hymned to pursue the gods.
4. And for us to win the prize, by purifying yourself (bring) lofty refreshments and a heaven-bright abundance of heroes, o drop.
5. By purifying themselves, let them bring thousandfold wealth and an abundance of heroes for us—the divine drops being pressed.
6. Like racehorses being driven on by their drivers, they have surged to win the prize—swift across the sheep's fleece.
7. Bellowing like cows to their calf, the drops rush.
   They have run between the hands (of the priest).
8. Pleasing to Indra, exhilarating, constantly roaring—o self-purifying one, strike away all hatreds.
9. Striking away the non-givers, purifying yourselves, looking like the sun, sit on the womb of truth.

IX.14 (726) Soma Pavamāna

Asita Kāśyapa or Devala Kāśyapa
8 verses: gāyatrī

The poet of this hymn seems to be practicing his figurative language, presenting us in nonsequential verses with several different versions of the same step in the preparation of soma. This is especially clear in his depiction of the manual manipulation of soma: in verse 2 the hands are called "troops of five kinsmen," in verse 5 the same fingers are "the granddaughters of Vivasvant" (here the prototype sacrificer), and in verse 7 a standard word for "fingers" finally makes its appearance. Similarly he gives two quite similar expressions for the mixing with milk, both using the image of clothing (vss. 3, 5), and in verse 6 there is a glancing reference to Soma's desire for cows.

The episodic structure of the hymn also seems reflected in the shifting tenses of the verbs. In particular, the past tense of verse 3ab seems to follow directly from verse 1, with the presents of verses 2 and 3c in alternation.

1. The poet flowed around and forth, set upon the swell of the river, bringing the decisive action for which many are eager.
2. When the troops of five kinsmen [=hands], eager to work, prepare the steadfast one with a hymn—
3. After that, all the gods found exhilaration in the juice of him, the tempestuous one—
   when he clothes himself with cows.
4. Spilling over, he runs out, leaving behind the stems that belong to his body.
   In this place here he slams together with his yokemate [=Indra].
5. He who, like a handsome youth, has been groomed by the granddaughters of Vivasvant [=fingers], making the cows like a garment,
6. With a yen for cows, he goes crossways along the fine prop [=fleece].
   He raises the call that he knows as his own.
7. The fingers have come together to him, grooming the lord of refreshment.
   They have grasped the back of the prizewinning horse.
8. Ever embracing all good things, heavenly and earthly, o Soma, seeking us, make your journey.

IX.15 (727) Soma Pavamāna

Asita Kāśyapa or Devala Kāśyapa
8 verses: gāyatrī

A simple device provides formal unity to this hymn: the form "this one" that begins every verse. In the first six verses it is the nominative subject (eṣá), in the last two (vss. 7–8) the accusative object (etám), so that there is some progression and development, even while the referent remains constant.

Except for verse 2, the focus is entirely on Soma's journey across the fleece and into the cup, where both the waters (vs. 5) and the milk (vs. 6) await him. (The mention of grasses in vs. 6 is unclear.)

1. This one drives with insight along the fine (fleece), a champion with his swift chariots, going to his encounter with Indra.
2. This one exercises his insight on many things for the divine assemblage on high, where the immortals have their seats.
3. This one, propelled, is led through and within (the filter) along the path of beauty, when the fervent thrust him on.
4. This one, the bull of the herd, sharpens his horns, ever shaking them, deploying his manly powers with his might.
5. This one, a prizewinning horse, speeds with his beautiful bright shoots, becoming the lord of the rivers.
6. This one, having journeyed along the "articulation" (of the fleece) toward the "plodding goods" [=cows], goes down into the grasses.
7. This one worthy of grooming do the Āyus groom in the wooden cups, when he has produced great refreshments.
8. This one here the ten fingers and the seven insights groom, the most exhilarating one possessing good weapons.

IX.16 (728) Soma Pavamāna

Asita Kāśyapa or Devala Kāśyapa
8 verses: gāyatrī

This little hymn presents several difficulties of interpretation, even though like many hymns in this series it does not deviate from the ritual scene, especially the filtering of the pressed juice, and it is built around a limited verbal lexicon, especially the phonological near mirror images √sr̥j "surge" and √r̥ṣ "rush." In verse 1 Soma is implicitly identified with Etaśa, the sun's horse, and in verse 7 he swells "like the back of heaven." But otherwise cosmic references and comparisons are absent, and the soma again and again runs across the filter (vss. 2, 3, 4, 6, 7, 8) and joins with the waters (vss. 2–3) and the milk (vss. 2 and 6), to furnish Indra's drink (vss. 3, 5).

The most problematic form is the hapax ánapta in verse 3, about which there is no scholarly agreement. We have very tentatively connected it with naptī́ "granddaughter," a very rare word that nonetheless appears twice in this poet's collection (IX.9.1, 14.5), used of the preparers of soma or their equipment.

1. The pressers pro(pel) your sap in their arms, for ardent exhilaration.
   Etaśa charges like a surge (of waters).
2. With resolve we accompany the charioteer of skill, who clothes himself in waters along with his stalk, the winner of cows, among the fine (tufts of fleece).
3. Send the soma surging into the filter, the one difficult to overtake in the waters (even) without the granddaughters(' preparation) [?].
   Purify him for Indra to drink.
4. With attention Soma rushes forth into the filter of the one being purified; with resolve he has taken his seat.
5. Forth to you, Indra, the drops, the soma juices, have surged with homage—
   for the great taking of the decisive victor.
6. Being purified within the sheep's shape, rushing toward all that is glorious, like a champion he stands among the cattle.
7. Having swelled like the back of heaven, the stream of the pressed ritual adept rushes at will into the filter.
8. You, Soma, (sending forth speech) attentive to poetic inspiration, being purified in your full measure among the Āyus, run through the sheep's fleece.

IX.17 (729) Soma Pavamāna

Asita Kāśyapa or Devala Kāśyapa
8 verses: gāyatrī

A straightforward hymn: the soma juices flow quickly on their journey through the filter into the vessels and thence to Indra and the gods, a journey compared to that of the sun. The role of speech in the soma sacrifice is also emphasized, with soma both inspiring speech and being strengthened by it.

1. Like rivers along a downward slope, smashing obstacles, turbulent, the swift soma juices have been sent surging.
2. As they are pressed, the drops, the soma juices, like rains to the earth, have flowed to Indra.

3. The exhilarating drink of exhilaration, the soma, rushes into the filter beyond the waves, smashing aside the demons, seeking the gods.
4. He runs into the tubs; he is poured around into the filter.
   He grows strong through the hymns at the sacrifices.
5. You blaze beyond the three luminous realms like the (sun) ascending to heaven, o Soma.
   Sending forth (speech), you have spurred it on, like the sun.
6. The inspired poets, the bards, have roared to him at the head of the sacrifice, keeping the dear one in their sight.
7. The men, the inspired poets, seeking help, groom you, the prizewinning horse, with their insights, for the divine conclave.
8. Flow following the stream of honey. You, the sharp (soma), have taken your seat, pleasing to be drunk for truth.

IX.18 (730) Soma Pavamāna

Asita Kāśyapa or Devala Kāśyapa
7 verses: gāyatrī

The most salient feature of this hymn is its pāda-length refrain, promising health and wholeness. The beginning (vs. 1) and end (vs. 7) of the hymn record the ritual moment, the purification in the filter. The intermediate verses, especially 4–6, ascribe human and then cosmic powers to the ritual substance. Verses 4–6 are also syntactically unresolved, as they consist of three parallel relative clauses in the ab pādas, couched in the 3rd person, interrupted by the refrain addressing Soma in the 2nd person in the c pāda. The 3rd-person main clause that brings closure to this structure is found in the final verse, 7ab.

It is noteworthy that the word "soma" is found only in the first verse.

1. Mountain-dwelling Soma, being pressed, has flowed around in the filter.
   – You are the one who confers wholeness in the raptures of exhilaration.
2. You are the inspired one, you the sage poet, the honey that is born from the stalk.
   – You are the one who confers wholeness in the raptures of exhilaration.
3. All the gods, joined in fellowship, have attained the drinking of you.
   – You are the one who confers wholeness in the raptures of exhilaration.
4. He who holds all desirable good things in his two hands—
   – You are the one who confers wholeness in the raptures of exhilaration.

5. Who will yield milk like these two great world-halves, the two mothers together—
   – You are the one who confers wholeness in the raptures of exhilaration.
6. Who on the same day rushes around both worlds with the prizes of victory—
   – You are the one who confers wholeness in the raptures of exhilaration.
7. He, tempestuous in the tubs, kept roaring while being purified.
   – You are the one who confers wholeness in the raptures of exhilaration.

IX.19 (731) Soma Pavamāna

Asita Kāśyapa or Devala Kāśyapa
7 verses: gāyatrī

This hymn contains fewer direct ritual references than recent hymns. The focus is instead on the exchange relation between Soma and his praisers: hymns for goods, an exchange that is seen as, literally, fecund. Our insights and the words they produce are depicted as females waiting to be impregnated (vs. 5) and made to swell (vs. 2), as they call to the bullish Soma for his semen (vs. 4). The impregnated thoughts will give birth not only to inspired poetry, but also to the material goods that this poetry will win, as verses 1 and 6 make clear. The final two verses (6–7) also call for Soma's help in besting rivals.

1. O Soma, what bright good thing, heavenly or earthly, is worthy of hymns, bring that here to us as you are being purified.
2. For you two, o Soma, you and Indra, are lords of the sun, lords of cattle.
   Showing your mastery, make our insights swell.
3. The bull, being purified among the Āyus, thundering upon the ritual grass, although being a fallow bay horse, has sat down on his womb.
4. Our insightful words have bellowed over the seed of the bull, the mothers (over that) of the calf, their son.
5. Will he indeed set an embryo for those females yearning for a bull, as he is being purified—for those who give the gleaming milk?
6. Seek to win over those who stand aside, but set fear among our rivals.
   Self-purifying one, find wealth.
7. Soma, undermine the bull-like power of our rival, his tempestuousness, his vigor, whether he be in the distance or nearby.

IX.20 (731) Soma Pavamāna

Asita Kāśyapa or Devala Kāśyapa
7 verses: gāyatrī

Like the immediately preceding hymn, this one is less concerned with the details of the ritual (though they are not absent: the fleece filter, vss. 1, 7; the water and the cups, vs. 6) than with the ritual economy, where, for example, our thought helps purify Soma (vs. 3) and he in return finds wealth for the poets, singers, and patrons. Although most of the phraseology is standard for soma hymns, the image in verse 5 of Soma entering the songs seems to be a deliberate reversal of passages in which the songs themselves enter a god, and seems also to imitate and vary the numerous passages in which Soma enters Indra.

1. Forth the poet rushes, through the sheep's fleece, to pursue the gods, having prevailed over all opponents.
2. For he sends to the singers a prize of cattle in thousands, as he purifies himself.
3. With your attention you embrace all things; you purify yourself with our poetic thought.
   Soma, you will find fame for us.
4. Rush toward lofty glory, toward enduring wealth for our generous patrons.
   Bring refreshment here to the praisers.
5. You well keep commandments like a king. You have entered the songs, o Soma, while being purified, o unerring draft-horse.
6. That draft-horse, difficult to overtake in the waters, being groomed in (the priest's) hands, Soma, sits in the cups.
7. Playful, ready to give like a generous patron, you go through the filter, o Soma, establishing an abundance of heroes for the praiser.

IX.21 (733) Soma Pavamāna

Asita Kāśyapa or Devala Kāsyapa
7 verses: gāyatrī

For most of its length this hymn is a conventional depiction of the flowing of the soma drops and of the benefits that attend it. Verses 5 and 6, however, which are constructed in parallel, introduce twists of imagery. Addressed to the soma drops, the verses urge them to instruct the ungenerous man—presumably a patron who does not distribute the appropriate priestly gifts at the soma sacrifice. In verse 6 the drops are commanded to set their own will to this task, as a craftsman sets a new chariot part, probably a wheel. In verse 5 they are meant to set "the tawny tracker" in an unspecified being or thing ("in this one"); although the referents for both have been variously identified, we believe that the tawny tracker is Soma himself, and Indra, already mentioned in verse 1, is the desired location.

1. These are running for Indra, these drops, the ardent soma juices, bringing exhilaration and finding the sun,
2. Warding off attackers, finding wide space for the presser, by themselves creating vitality for the praiser.
3. Moving playfully at will toward one and the same seat, the drops have flowed in various ways into the swell of the river.
4. These self-purifying ones have obtained all things of value, when propelled like the team on a chariot.
5. O drops, set the tawny tracker [=Soma himself] here in him [=Indra], to instruct (the man) who does not give to us.
6. Like a craftsman [/Ṛbhu] a new chariot (wheel), set your will to instruct (him).
   Purify yourselves to gleaming with your flood.
7. These (drops) here have bellowed; the prizewinning horses have made the finish line.
   They have stimulated the thought of (the poet) who is really present.

IX.22 (734) Soma Pavamāna

Asita Kāśyapa or Devala Kāśyapa
7 verses: gāyatrī

The hymn begins with the conventional image of the soma juices racing forward (vs. 1), but their journey soon becomes both cosmic and mystical. Their rush is compared to cosmic forces in verse 2, and in verses 4–5 they travel through the cosmos itself. But the poet reaches even further conceptually: he equates this cosmic journey with a ritual one. In matched expressions in verses 3 and 5 the juices pervade not only the cosmic spaces (vs. 5) but also our "insights" (vs. 3), that is, the thoughts that produce ritual poetry. And in verse 6 they reach a higher place than the cosmic space, namely the sacrifice itself, symbolized, as often, by the stretched thread.

In the final verse (7) this journey theme is abruptly abandoned, and the disjunction between this verse and what precedes is also conveyed by the switch from plural ("soma juices") to singular ("Soma"), and from 3rd-person reference to 2nd. It also contains an implicit equation of Soma with (the unmentioned) Saramā, Indra's dog who reacquired for him the cows stolen by the Paṇis (see esp. X.108)—an equation seemingly unmotivated by what precedes. (The Paṇis are mentioned only one other time in the IXth Maṇḍala [IX.11.2].) Perhaps the cosmic journey of Soma reminded the poet of Saramā's long trek. The stretched thread of the sacrifice ends the hymn, and brings it back to the ritual scene.

1. These swift soma juices have been propelled forward like prizewinning chariots, surges (of them) sent surging—
2. These, (surging) wide like the winds, like the rains of Parjanya, (surging) at will like the flickerings of fire.
3. These purified soma juices, mixed with curds, attentive to poetic inspiration, have pervaded our insights with inspiration.
4. These immortal ones, once groomed, have not flagged in their flowing, as they seek to reach the paths through the airy space.
5. These, going forth widely, have pervaded the backs of the two world-halves, and this highest airy space.
6. They have reached the highest thread being stretched, along the inclines, and this one that is to be higher still.
7. You, Soma, secured from the Paṇis the good things of cattle.
   You have roared toward the stretched thread.

IX.23 (735) Soma Pavamāna

Asita Kāśyapa or Devala Kāśyapa
7 verses: gāyatrī

This hymn begins very like the last one, with the rushing of the soma juices, but goes in a different direction. Verse 2 introduces the Āyus, men both of the past (so vs. 2, also IX.10.6) and of the present, who are regularly credited with the preparation of the soma in the IXth Maṇḍala and by this very poet (IX.10.6, 15.7, 16.8, 19.3). But surprisingly in verse 4 the Āyus are identified with the soma juices, a rhetorical strategy that must result from the fact that in this verse the juices purify themselves into the exhilarating drink; in other words they prepare themselves and therefore behave like the Āyus who prepare the soma.

In the last three verses (5–7) Soma's relationship to Indra becomes the focus: in verse 5 the rushing soma acquires the power of Indra as its essence, and in verses 6 and 7 this power is transferred to Indra, to perform his heroic deeds, both in the past and in the present. Verse 7 thus harkens back to the ancient Āyus and their newer path in verse 2.

1. The swift soma juices have surged forth in a stream of honey, of exhilaration, toward all our poems.
2. The ancient Āyus have marched along a newer track.
   They have begotten the sun, for it to shine.
3. Bring here to us, self-purifying one, the patrimony of the impious stranger.
   Produce refreshments along with progeny.
4. The soma juices, the Āyus, purify themselves into the exhilarating drink of exhilaration, (going) toward the cask dripping with honey.
5. The soma rushes steadily, acquiring Indrian strength as its essence, affording good heroes, protecting against imprecations.
6. You purify yourself for Indra, o Soma, and for the gods as their shared exhilaration.
   O drop, you strive to win the prize.
7. Having drunk of it, of its exhilarating drinks, Indra smashed the unopposable obstacles, and he shall smash them now.

IX.24 (736) Soma Pavamāna

Asita Kāśyapa or Devala Kāśyapa
7 verses: gāyatrī

This hymn is the last attributed to Asita or Devala Kāśyapa, and yet again the hymn begins with the running forth of the soma juices. It is an unremarkable hymn, but covers the major topics, though not in strict chronological order: the grooming in water (vs. 1), the mixture with milk (vs. 2), the filtering (vss. 3, 5). That soma is Indra's drink is repeatedly emphasized (vss. 2, 3, 5, and under the qualifier "conqueror of territories," a word regularly applied to Indra, vs. 4). Soma himself is given the most characteristic of Indra's epithets—"obstacle-smasher"—in the superlative in verse 6.

1. The soma juices have run forth, the self-purifying drops.
   Brought to readiness, they have been groomed in the waters.
2. The cows have run toward them, like waters going along a slope.
   Becoming purified, they have reached Indra.
3. You run forth, self-purifying Soma, for Indra to drink.
   Held by men, you are led through (the filter).
4. Bringing exhilaration to superior men, o Soma, purify yourself for the one who conquers the territories, you who are the winner to be celebrated.

5. O drop, when pressed by the stones you run around the filter, fit for the fundament of Indra.
6. Purify yourself, best smasher of obstacles, to be celebrated with hymns, gleaming, pure, unerring.
7. Gleaming and pure he is called "Soma," he of the pressed honey, pursuing the gods, smashing those who utter evil.

IX.25 (737) Soma Pavamāna

Dṛḍhacyuta Āgastya
6 verses: gāyatrī

This is the only hymn in the Ṛgveda attributed to this poet, though his patronymic connects him to Agastya, the poet of a number of hymns in the late Ist Maṇḍala (I.165–91)—including the dialogue hymn I.165, in which Agastya mediates between Indra and the Maruts, who demand a share of the soma sacrifice. This connection may account for the mention of the Maruts in verse 1 as recipients of soma, along with Vāyu: the Maruts are quite scarce in the Soma Maṇḍala.

The hymn is otherwise unremarkable, though one might note the insistent identification of Soma as a kaví ("poet," vss. 3, 5, 6).

1. Purify yourself, as the one who brings skill to realization, for the gods to drink, o tawny one, the exhilarating drink for the Maruts and for Vāyu.
2. Self-purifying one, sped by insight, ever roaring toward your womb, enter Vāyu according to the (ritual) statute.
3. The bull becomes beautiful together with the gods, the dear poet in his womb, the smasher of obstacles, best pursuer of the gods.
4. Entering into all forms, becoming purified, the delightful one journeys to where the immortals have their seats.
5. Ruddy Soma, giving birth to songs, purifies himself, attended by the Āyus, going to Indra with a poet's purpose.
6. Purify yourself in a stream in the filter, you most exhilarating poet, to sit in the womb of chant.

IX.26 (738) Soma Pavamāna

Idhmavāha Dārḍhacyuta
6 verses: gāyatrī

Attributed to a descendant of the poet of the previous hymn, based on his patronymic, this hymn contains nothing novel in terms of content, but it is tightly structured. All verses but the last begin with "that one, him" (tám) referring to the Soma, while the last begins with a 2nd-person variant on this, "you" (tám tvā), literally "that you." The last four verses (3–6) all contain a 3rd plural "they impell(ed)" (ahyan, hinvanti built to the same root √hi), and the compounds of 3c and 5c "…to/of many" (bhū́ri) phonologically echo the word for "arms" (bhuríjor) in the middle verse (4a).

1. Him have the inspired poets groomed—the prizewinner in the lap of Aditi, through the fine (fleece) and with insight.
2. Him have the cows lowed toward, the imperishable one of a thousand streams, the drop, supporter of heaven.
3. Him, the ritual adept, have they impelled through their wisdom—the one purifying himself in heaven, steadfast, giving nurture to many.
4. Him have they impelled between the two arms with the insight of Vivasvant, him who is also clad in it, the undeceivable lord of speech.
5. Him do the siblings [=fingers] impel with the stones on the back (of the filter)—the tawny one, delightful, drawing the gaze of many.
6. You, self-purifying one, grown strong through song [/on the mountain], do the ritual adepts impel as exhilaration for Indra, o drop.

IX.27 (739) Soma Pavamāna

Nr̥medha Āṅgirasa
6 verses: gāyatrī

Though attributed to a different poet and a different poetic lineage, this hymn, like the last one (IX.26), is unified by a repeated initial pronoun in every verse, in this case "this one, he" (eṣá) referring to Soma. Again, the content is conventional, though there is emphasis on Soma's victories and acquisitions (vss. 1, 2, 3, 4) and his successful competition with the sun (vss. 2, 5). The cosmic aspect of Soma is thus raised but not insisted upon.

1. This one, the much-praised poet, spills over into the filter, striking away failures, while being purified.
2. This one, winning the sun, is poured all around for Indra and Vāyu in the filter, the one who brings skill to realization.
3. This one is led through (the filter) by men—the head of heaven, the bull, the pressed soma in the wooden (vessels), acquiring [/knowing] all.

4. This one, purifying himself, has roared, seeking cows, seeking gold—the drop, winning completely, not to be laid low.
5. This one races with the sun while purifying himself in heaven—in the filter he is the exhilarating drink of exhilaration.
6. This one, the tempestuous tawny bull, has flowed in the midspace, toward Indra—the drop as it is becoming purified.

IX.28 (740) Soma Pavamāna

Priyamedha Āṅgirasa
6 verses: gāyatrī

Attributed to another Āṅgirasa, whose given name is similar to the poet of the last hymn (IX.27), this follows the same pattern, with initial "he, that one" (eṣá) opening every verse. Otherwise it is constructed of the usual clichés, though the rhetoric is nicely balanced.

1. This one, the prizewinner propelled by men, all-knowing as the lord of mind,
   runs through the sheep's fleece.
2. This one has flowed into the filter, the soma pressed for the gods, entering all their domains.
3. This one, an immortal god, beautifies himself in his womb,
   the smasher of obstacles, best pursuer of the gods.
4. This one, the ever-roaring bull, held by the ten siblings [=fingers], runs to the wooden cups.
5. This one, self-purifying, boundless, made the sun shine, as the all-knowing one (knowing) all the domains.
6. This one, tempestuous, undeceivable Soma, rushes while being purified, pursuing the gods, smashing those who utter evil.

IX.29 (741) Soma Pavamāna

Nr̥medha Āṅgirasa
6 verses: gāyatrī

Another short and conventional hymn, with a focus on winning goods and conquering enemies (esp. vss. 3–5). It is attributed to the same poet as IX.27.

1. His streams have flowed forth, those of the pressed bull, who with his strength attends upon the gods in sequence.

2. The ritual adepts groom the team—the bards singing with their song the one born as the light worthy of hymns.
3. These things are easy to conquer for you as you become purified, o Soma providing outstanding goods.
   Increase the sea that is worthy of hymns.
4. Winning all good things, purify yourself in a stream, Soma.
   Drive hostilities to a single end.
5. Protect us well from the non-giver, from the mere sound of any such a one, when we have become free of insult.
6. O drop, in purifying yourself in a stream attract earthly and heavenly wealth.
   Bring here your brilliant tempestuous force.

IX.30 (742) Soma Pavamāna

Bindu Āṅgirasa
6 verses: gāyatrī

The first verse of this hymn is very like the opening verse of IX.29, and it is constructed of the usual building blocks of soma hymns, particularly those in gāyatrī meter. It clusters especially closely with the three hymns that precede it: these four hymns (IX.27–30) are all attributed to poets with the patronymic Āṅgirasa, and all four contain at least one form of śúṣma "tempestuous force" or śuṣmín "tempestuous" (IX.27.6; 28.6; 29.6; 30.1, 3), mostly in the final verse. This word thus seems to be the signature of this little group of poets. (The word does not pattern closely with other Āṅgirasa poets, even in the IXth Maṇḍala.)

1. His streams have flowed forth, those of the tempestuous one, into the filter at will.
   While becoming purified, he sends out his speech.
2. The drop, being impelled by the pressers, being groomed, ever roaring, raises a call appropriate to Indra.
3. Attract for us tempestuous force that can overcome men, much-craved force consisting of heroes,
   when you purify yourself in a stream, o Soma.
4. Soma, purifying himself in a stream, has flowed forth, beyond (the filter), to the wooden cups to take his seat.
5. They impel you, the most honeyed tawny one, in the waters with their stones,
   for Indra to drink, o drop.
6. Press the most honeyed soma for Indra who bears the mace, the dear, exhilarating one for his warrior band.

IX.31 (743) Soma Pavamāna

Gotama Rāhūgaṇa
6 verses: gāyatrī

Another unremarkable gāyatrī hymn. Parallel constructions and phraseology (e.g., the fronted "for you" [túbhyam] in vss. 3, 5, the fronted "be/become" [bhávā] of vss. 2, 4) give a sense of unity. Unlike many soma hymns, where the finale delivers the soma to Indra (e.g., the final verses of nearby hymns such as IX.23.6–7, 26.6, 27.6, 30.6), here it is "we" who declare our desire for his presence and partnership (vs. 6).

The poet, Gotama Rāhūgaṇa, is also the composer of a soma hymn in the first maṇḍala, I.91, and verse 4 in this hymn is identical to I.91.16, which occurs in a triad of ritually connected verses.

1. The self-purifying soma juices have marched forth rich in purpose.
   They make wealth manifest.
2. Become the increaser of brilliance from heaven and from earth, o drop;
   become the lord of prizes.
3. For you rush the favoring winds, for you the rivers.
   O Soma, they increase your greatness.
4. Swell here, and let bullish power come together for you from all sides, Soma.
   Be at the gathering for the prize.
5. For you, o brown one, the cows have yielded imperishable ghee and milk
   upon the highest back.
6. You—who have good weapons, who are really present, o lord of creation—
   we want your fellowship, o drop.

IX.32 (744) Soma Pavamāna

Śyāvāśva Ātreya
6 verses: gāyatrī

Although this hymn begins with the almost ubiquitous journeying forth of the soma juices (see, e.g., the first verses of IX.10, 17, 20, 24, 29, 30, 31, 33, 34, 41, 44, all beginning, like this, with prá "forth" followed by a verb of motion somewhere in the verse), it breaks the pattern of the recent collections of Soma clichés, especially with the cascade of similes in verses 3–5. This expert handling of the constricted form of gāyatrī soma hymns may lend credence to the Anukramaṇī's attribution to Śyāvāśva Ātreya, the ingenious poet of the Marut cycle in Maṇḍala V.

1. The soma juices, arousing exhilaration, pressed at the rite, have marched forth for the fame of our benefactor.
2. Then the maidens of Trita [=fingers] impel him, the tawny one, with the stones, the drop for Indra to drink.
3. Then, just as (the lead) wild goose (sets) its flock (to honking), he has made the thought of everyone bellow.
   Like a steed he is anointed [/driven together] with the cows.
4. O Soma, looking down on both (worlds?), like a great wild bird launched in flight you rush, settling down on the womb of truth.
5. The cows have lowed to him, like a young woman to her dear lover.
   He has gone to (them?) as to a contest that has been set.
6. Destine brilliant glory for us, both for our benefactors and for me—wisdom and fame as our winnings.

IX.33 (745) Soma Pavamāna

Trita Āptya
6 verses: gāyatrī

Once again the hymn begins with the soma flowing forth. There is, however, less emphasis on the physical process of purification, and more on the sounds that accompany it: verse 4 introduces three voices, which may be the three types of ritual speech, the r̥c, yajus, and sāman familiar from later śrauta ritual, or may refer to the priestly formulations (5a), the bellowing of the cows (4b), and the roar of the rushing soma itself (4c). The theme continues in verse 5, which also highlights "truth," found in verse 2 as well.

The hymn is bookended by watery references: the simile of the waves of water in verse 1 returns in the final verse (6) as the seas of wealth that soma will produce for us.

1. Forth go the soma juices, attentive to poetic inspiration, like waves of the waters, to the wooden (cups) like buffaloes to the woods.
2. To the wooden cups they have flowed, brown and gleaming, in a stream of truth, to the prize of cows.
3. Pressed for Indra and Vāyu, for Varuṇa and the Maruts, for Viṣṇu, the soma juices rush.
4. The three voices rise up, the milk-cows bellow, and the tawny one goes ever roaring.

5. The sacred formulations, youthfully exuberant mothers of truth, have lowed to him.
   They keep grooming the child of heaven.
6. Four seas of wealth for us, Soma, from every direction, in the thousands—bring these in purifying yourself.

IX.34 (746) Soma Pavamāna

Trita Āptya
6 verses: gāyatrī

The hymn begins with the usual rushing forth of the soma, but achieves an unusual ring, since in the last verse (6) it is the songs that rush (using the same verb, arṣa(n)ti) to him. What lies between is, for the most part, unremarkable. Verse 2 lists the recipients of the soma, a longer list than usual (and a verse almost identical to vs. 3 in the previous hymn, IX.33), and verses 3–4 concern the preparation of the drink. However, verse 5 is difficult: the Maruts milk for themselves (or yield as their milk) the oblation in the direction of "the upper surface of truth." Although in the context of the hymn, soma should be the product of milking (see vs. 3), the liquid the Maruts ordinarily milk is rain. Moreover, "the upper surface of truth" is a puzzling phrase, which occurs elsewhere only in the mystical and baffling Vena hymn (X.123.2). Since the latter hymn seems to concern the mystical identification between soma and the sun, it is likely that here too we have double reference, with the ritual substance soma assimilated to the cosmic fecundator, the rain, and "the upper surface of truth" referring both to the soma filter and to heaven (or the reservoir of rain in heaven).

1. Being pressed, being impelled, the drop rushes forth in its full measure in a stream, shattering the fastnesses by its might.
2. Pressed for Indra and Vāyu, for Varuṇa and the Maruts, for Viṣṇu, the soma rushes.
3. The bull controlled by bulls, the soma, do they press with stones.
   They milk out its milk with their skill.
4. It becomes the one for Trita to groom; it becomes the drink of exhilaration for Indra.
   The tawny one is anointed with the forms (of milk).
5. They whose mother is Pṛ́śni [=Maruts] milk for themselves the cherished oblation dearest to them toward the upper surface of truth.
6. These unswerving songs, flowing together, rush to him.
   Bellowing, he has made the milk-cows bellow.

IX.35 (747) Soma Pavamāna

Prabhūvasu Āṅgirasa
6 verses: gāyatrī

Soma as the source and support of wealth and as ally in conflict is the theme of this hymn, which is characterized by pleasing etymological figures (e.g., vss. 3, 4, 6) and variant repetitions (e.g., vss. 2 + 5).

1. Bringing broad wealth for us, o self-purifying one, purify yourself in a stream with which you will find the light for us.
2. You drop who set the sea to swaying, who set all in motion, purify yourself as the supporter of our wealth with your strength.
3. With you as hero, you possessor of heroes, might we overcome those who give battle.
   Stream toward us what is choice.
4. The drop sends forth (its speech), the prizewinning seer seeking to win the prize, finding his commandments to be his weapons.
5. Him who sets speech to swaying do we clothe with songs as he is being purified—
   Soma, the herdsmaster of the people.
6. Under whose commandment all people find support—under that of the master of support who brings outstanding goods while he is being purified.

IX.36 (748) Soma Pavamāna

Prabhūvasu Āṅgirasa
6 verses: gāyatrī

The hymn begins with a noble image of Soma as a racehorse racing to the finish, and the second verse contains another equine comparison, though with a more lowly type of horse. This theme is abandoned until the final verse (6), when Soma goes seeking horses for the worshipers. The hymn is otherwise a fairly standard soma hymn, though one might note that the connection of soma with light made in the previous hymn (attributed to the same poet), IX.35.1, is also found here in verse 3. Also, every verse but the last contains a form derived from the root pū "purify," always pāda-initial.

1. He has been let loose like a chariot-horse into the filter, pressed into the two cups.
   The prizewinner has stepped upon the finish-line.
2. As wakeful draft-horse, o Soma, purify yourself, pursuing the gods, beyond (the filter), toward the cask dripping with honey.
3. O age-old self-purifying one, make the lights shine forth for us; impel us toward will, toward skill.
4. Being beautified by those who seek truth, being groomed in the two hands, he purifies himself in the sheep's fleece.
5. All goods for the pious man—heavenly, earthly, and those of the midspace—let Soma bring in purifying himself.
6. O Soma, you mount the back of heaven, seeking cows, seeking horses, seeking heroes, o lord of strength.

IX.37 (749) Soma Pavamāna

Rahūgaṇa Āṅgirasa
6 verses: gāyatrī

Several overt devices provide unity to this hymn: each verse begins with sá "he," and each verse but 4 contains a verb of motion ("rush, run, flow") expressing the journey of the soma through the filter and into the cups for Indra. In addition to the mundane details of the preparation, however, the hymn makes cosmic claims for the ritual actions. The sheep's fleece of verse 3 also stands for "the luminous realms of heaven"; in verse 5 Soma finds a wide realm, usually a symbol of freedom and the acquisition of territory.

Verse 4, the pause on the journey, has been much discussed, and its various phrases, "on the back of Trita," "along with (his) relatives," also given cosmic referents (though there is no scholarly agreement on just what they are). We are of the opinion, however, that it primarily concerns the ritual preparation: the "back of Trita" is the filter and the "relatives" (jāmí) are, as usual in a soma context, the fingers of the officiant, namely Trita (see "Trita's maidens," the fingers, in the next hymn, IX.38.2). It is this ritual preparation that allows the cosmic act of Soma, making the sun shine (at the Morning Pressing), in that same verse (4).

1. He, the bullish soma, pressed for drinking, rushes into the filter, smashing aside the demons, seeking the gods.
2. He, the tawny one, wide-gazing, rushes steadily into the filter, continually neighing toward his womb.

3. He, the prizewinner, self-purifying, runs through the luminous realms of heaven, through the sheep's fleece, as demon-smasher.
4. He, purifying himself on the back of Trita along with Trita's kin [=fingers], has made the sun shine.
5. He, the Vṛtra-smasher, the bull, finding the wide realm when pressed, undeceivable—Soma has flowed as if to a prize.
6. He, the god impelled by the poet, runs to the wooden cups—the drop with his munificence for Indra.

IX.38 (750) Soma Pavamāna

Rahūgaṇa Āṅgirasa
6 verses: gāyatrī

Like the previous hymn, attributed to the same poet, this hymn is unified by the repetition of a pronominal phrase at the beginning of every verse (eṣá syá "this very one," except for vs. 2, which has only the first pronoun). It, too, concerns Soma's journey through the filter (especially the first and last verses, 1 and 6) and his manipulation by the officiant's fingers (vss. 2, 3). The hymn is enlivened by metaphors and similes, particularly those of verse 4.

1. This very one, a bull, a chariot, rushes through the sheep's fleece, going to the thousandfold prize.
2. This tawny one do the maidens of Trita [=fingers] impel with the stones,
 the drop for Indra to drink.
3. This very one do the ten tawny ones keep grooming, hard at work, those by whom he is beautified for exhilaration.
4. This very one settles among the human clans like a falcon (on a nest), going like a swain to a maiden.
5. This very one, the exhilarating juice, looks down, the child of heaven, the drop who entered the fleece.
6. This very one, the tawny one pressed for drinking, rushes steadily, neighing toward his own dear womb.

IX.39 (751) Soma Pavamāna

Bṛhanmati Āṅgirasa
6 verses: gāyatrī

This hymn is structured as a ring of sorts: it begins and ends with quoted direct speech, uttered by unidentified speakers but most likely priests. In verse 1 Soma makes his journey through the filter to the place on the ritual ground where the gods await their oblation. When he arrives there in verse 6, the priests order him to take his seat. In between, Soma's journey involves travel in both ritual and cosmic space (see esp. vss. 2, 4).

1. You of lofty thought, swiftly rush around through your dear domain, to where they will say "(here are) the gods."
2. Preparing what was not fully prepared, arranging the refreshments for the people, stream the rain from heaven all about.
3. Pressed, he goes into the filter, taking on vibrancy with his strength, gazing widely, producing wide illumination.
4. Here he is—the one with a rapid course who has flowed widely from heaven into the filter, into the swell of the river.
5. Seeking to lure from afar, and also from nearby, the pressed one is poured as honey for Indra.
6. United they have roared. They impel the tawny one with the stones, (saying,) "Sit in the womb of truth."

IX.40 (752) Soma Pavamāna

Bṛhanmati Āṅgirasa
6 verses: gāyatrī

The hymn begins with a martial theme that is not developed in what follows. Instead, beginning with verse 3, the focus is on the wealth that Soma will bring us, and the repetition of vocabulary in these four verses induces a sense of claustrophobia, with the same elements recycled: "o Soma," "o drop," "purifying," "bring us," and "wealth." Although claustrophobia is to some extent endemic to the IXth Maṇḍala, most hymns make some attempt to vary the lexicon and phraseology.

1. Becoming purified, the limitless one has attacked all the scorners.
   They [=poets] beautify the inspired poet with their inspired thoughts.
2. The ruddy one has mounted to the womb; the bull, when pressed, will go to Indra.
   He sits in the steadfast seat.

3. Now for us, o drop, for us all all around, o Soma, attract great wealth in thousands, in purifying yourself.
4. O self-purifying Soma, o drop, bring all brilliant things hither;
   you will find refreshments in thousands.
5. Being purified, bring hither wealth and an abundance of heroes to our praise singer;
   strengthen the songs of the singer.
6. Being purified, o drop, bring hither double-lofty wealth—o Soma, bullish drop—bring us wealth worthy of hymns.

IX.41 (753) Soma Pavamāna

Medhyātithi Kāṇva
6 verses: gāyatrī

This hymn and the next two (IX.41–43) are attributed to Medhyātithi Kāṇva, the poet of several hymns in Maṇḍala VIII (VIII.1, 3, 33), who names himself in IX.43.3. This hymn begins strikingly, with an incomplete sentence describing the stampede of a wild mob, against the "black skin," presumably the Dasyu referred to in verse 2. The constituents of the mob are not identified, but are presumably the soma juices, here mobilized against the non-Ārya enemy. The second verse rewrites this scene more tranquilly, though with the victory over the Dasyu more explicit. But the violence of Soma's purificatory journey returns in verse 3.

The second half of the hymn is more conventional, though with Soma's cosmic associations clear in the last two verses (5–6).

1. Those who strode forth like cattle—frenzied, turbulent, unruly, smashing away the black skin [=Dasyus]—
2. We will bring to mind the easy passage (of Soma), beyond the snare difficult to navigate [=the curly fleece filter], we having overcome the Dasyu who follows no commandment.
3. A roar like that of rain is heard—the roar of the self-purifying tempestuous one.
   Lightning flashes roam in heaven.
4. O drop, in purifying yourself attract great refreshment and wealth in cattle, in gold,
   in horses, and in prizes, when you are pressed.
5. Purify yourself, limitless one. Fill the two great world-halves as Dawn does, as the sun does with its rays.
6. O Soma, flow for us in a protecting stream all around on all sides, like (the heavenly river) Rasā, along the upper surface (of the filter).

IX.42 (754) Soma Pavamāna

Medhyātithi Kāṇva
6 verses: gāyatrī

The double affiliation of Soma with the ritual and cosmic realms leads off the hymn: in verse 1 he performs major cosmogonic deeds while participating in his ritual preparation, mixing with milk and being washed in water. This twofold theme continues through the hymn, as, for example, in verse 4 where Soma begets the gods while being poured in the filter. The hymn ends (vs. 6) with a wish for the same material benefits found in the preceding hymn, IX.41.4.

1. Begetting the luminous realms of heaven, begetting the sun in the waters, clothing himself in cows, in the waters—the tawny one—
2. He, by means of an age-old thought, a god from among the gods, purifies himself in a stream, when pressed.
3. For the ever-increasing victor [=Indra] to win the prize, they purify themselves—
   the thousand-faceted soma juices.
4. Milking out his age-old milk, he is poured around into the filter.
   Roaring, he has begotten the gods.
5. Toward all desirable things, toward the gods who become strong through truth.
   Soma rushes while he is being purified.
6. O Soma, when you are pressed, bring us (wealth) in cattle, in heroes, in horses and prizes,
   and lofty refreshments in purifying yourself.

IX.43 (755) Soma Pavamāna

Medhyātithi Kāṇva
6 verses: gāyatrī

In this last hymn attributed to Medhyātithi, he is at particular pains to draw attention to the importance of the poet's role in the preparation of the soma. Not only does he name himself in verse 3, but the first three verses emphasize the clothing (vs. 1), beautification (vs. 2), and adornment (vs. 3) of Soma with hymns. In the final verse (6) he asks for a proper recompense for the poet (that is, himself) who produces these hymns.

1. The one who is groomed like a steed with cows [=milk], for exhilaration, the delightful one—
   him do we clothe with hymns.
2. Him do all our hymns, seeking aid, beautify in the ancient way—
   the drop for Indra to drink.

3. While being purified, he makes his journey—the delightful Soma, adorned with the hymns
 of the inspired poet Medhyātithi.
4. Self-purifying Soma, for us find very beautiful wealth of a thousand lusters, o drop.
5. The drop, like a steed running for the prize, keeps neighing in the filter, when he has overflowed it, in search of the gods.
6. Purify yourself for prizewinning, for the strengthening of the inspired poet who hymns you.
 Soma, give us an abundance of heroes.

IX.44 (756) Soma Pavamāna

Ayāsya Āṅgirasa
6 verses: gāyatrī

The poet of the next three hymns (IX.44–46) seems to owe his Anukramaṇī identification to the word ayā́sya "irrepressible" in the first verse of this first hymn, where it is applied to Soma. Insofar as there is a theme in this hymn, it is Soma's relation to the gods (vss. 1, 3, 5) and his intermediary role between the gods and us, especially us poets (vss. 2, 5).

1. O drop, you rush forth for our great extension, like (a river) bearing a wave, irrepressible, toward the gods.
2. Soma is impelled in the distance, delighted by the thought, impelled by the insight of the inspired poet—(Soma himself) a sage poet—in a stream.
3. This one, wakeful among the gods, goes pressed into the filter.
 Soma the limitless is making his journey.
4. Purify yourself for us, seeking prizes, making the dear ceremony your own.
 The one with the ritual grass [=priest] seeks to lure (you) here.
5. He whose heroes are poets, growing ever stronger for Bhaga, for Vāyu—Soma will guide us to the gods.
6. You who find the will, who best find the way—in order to give us goods today, win the prize and lofty praise.

IX.45 (757) Soma Pavamāna

Ayāsya Āṅgirasa
6 verses: gāyatrī

The hymn is defined by a thematic ring: Soma has his gaze on men in verse 1 and in the final verse (6) he gazes out on the reward he gives to his human praiser. Soma, as usual, goes on his purificatory journey through the filter (vss. 1–2) and is mixed with milk (vs. 3), but unlike many of the recent soma hymns, this one also focuses on the stage beyond the filter, with striking images in verses 4 and 5.

1. Having your gaze on men, purify yourself for exhilaration, for the pursuit of the gods, o drop, and for Indra to drink.
2. Rush on your mission for us—you spill out for Indra—rush to the gods for us, your comrades, at will.
3. And we anoint you, the ruddy one, with cows for exhilaration.
   Open up the doors for wealth for us.
4. He has stepped beyond the filter, like a prize-seeking (horse) the chariot-pole on its course.
   The drop plays the lord among the gods.
5. His comrades cried out in unison to him as he was playing in the wood(en vessel), beyond the sheep [=fleece].
   To the drop the roars have roared.
6. Purify yourself in that stream in which, once drunk, you will gaze out upon an abundance of heroes for your praiser, o drop.

IX.46 (758) Soma Pavamāna

Ayāsya Āṅgirasa
6 verses: gāyatrī

This hymn surveys some familiar themes, particularly the role of the fingers in preparing the soma (vss. 4, 6), though it is perhaps noteworthy that the filter, so prominent in many soma hymns, is not explicitly present here. In contrast, some qualities of soma known from elsewhere that are rarely or never mentioned in the IXth Maṇḍala make their appearance—in particular his source in the mountains (vs. 1) and in verse 4 the technical distinction between "pure" (that is, unmixed) soma (śukrá) and soma with grain stirred in (manthín, a word otherwise only found once elsewhere in the Ṛgveda [III.32.2]). (In the later śrauta ritual, cups of śukra and manthin soma form both a ritual and a grammatical pair, in the dual dvandva compound śukrā-manthinau, here found in discontinuous form.) The gods Vāyu (vs. 2) and Indra (vss. 3, 6), recipients of the first soma oblations at the Morning Pressing, are named. Verse 2 contains a striking image of the soma drops adorned like a girl for marriage.

1. They have been released to pursue the gods, like steeds that get results, flowing, grown strong in the mountains.
2. The drops, adorned like a maiden with her patrimony, the soma drinks have been released to Vāyu.

3. These soma juices, the drops, dispensing delight when pressed in the cup, strengthen Indra along with the (ritual) activities.
4. Rinse it, you (fingers) of good hands; grasp the two (soma drinks), the stirred and the pure.
   Mix the exhilarating one with cows.
5. Purify yourself, you winner of stakes, as provider of great bounty and as pathfinder for us, o Soma.
6. The ten fingers groom this one worth grooming, the self-purifying exhilarating drink of exhilaration for Indra.

IX.47 (759) Soma Pavamāna

Kavi Bhārgava
5 verses: gāyatrī

The next three hymns (IX.47–49) are attributed to Kavi Bhārgava, to whom the Anukramaṇī also credits the five Jagatī hymns IX.75–79. The Soma of this hymn is distinctly militant, using the power he has acquired (vs. 1) to destroy the Dasyus (vs. 2) and win spoils, as Indra's very mace (vss. 3, 5). But the same Soma is both a poet (vs. 4) and a recipient of poetry (vs. 3), who facilitates the human poet's acquisition of treasure from his patron (vs. 4).

1. Through this good ritual performance Soma has waxed strong even over the great ones.
   Becoming exhilarated, he up and acts the bull.
2. His deeds done and to be done, crushing the Dasyus, are conspicuous, and the bold one exacts recompense for debts.
3. Then Soma, the sap destined for Indra, becomes a mace winning thousands,
   when a hymn is born for him.
4. Himself a sage poet, he seeks a treasure for the inspired poet at (the hands of) the distributor, as he keeps grooming his insightful thoughts.
5. Desirous of winning riches, as of winning chargers at prize-contests, you are among those who are victorious in the raids.

IX.48 (760) Soma Pavamāna

Kavi Bhārgava
5 verses: gāyatrī

The poet begins his hymn with a request for benefit, though a rather generic one (vs. 1). The militant theme of the previous hymn is visible in verse 2, while the story of the falcon's theft of Soma from heaven, a myth not prominent elsewhere in Maṇḍala IX, is the subject of verses 3–4. Unlike most of the gāyatrī soma hymns, this one contains no explicit reference to the preparation of the soma, with only a glancing mention of the "impelling" of soma in the final verse (5), a term generally used in IX of the push that starts the soma on its purificatory journey through the filter.

1. You who bear your manly powers among the seats of great heaven we implore for something dear through this good ritual performance—
2. You who have encoiled the bold and are worthy of hymns, having very great commandments, exhilarating, eager to break a hundred strongholds.
3. From there, from heaven, the unfaltering falcon brought you, the king, to wealth, o strong-willed one.
4. It was for everyone to see the sun that the bird brought you as one (to be) held in common,
   the herdsman of truth, crossing through the airy realm.
5. And now, being impelled, he has acquired more eminent greatness, appropriate to Indra,
   as the limitless creator of superiority.

IX.49 (761) Soma Pavamāna

Kavi Bhārgava
5 verses: gāyatrī

Each verse of this hymn contains a form (two in vs. 3) of the root pū "purify," all verbs except for the "filter" word (pavítram) in verse 4; the three middle verses (3–5) also all contain the instrumental dhā́rayā "in a stream." The hymn thus has a tight lexical structure, and the content is similarly limited, to wishes for rain as refreshment and nourishment (vss. 1, 3–4) and for increase in cattle (vs. 3). The first four verses contain imperatives addressed to Soma, the last verse a 3rd-person past tense, suggesting that the wishes expressed have been fulfilled.

1. Purify yourself, bringing rain to us, a wave of waters from heaven, lofty refreshments free from disease.
2. Purify yourself in that stream by which the people's cows will come here, right up to our house.

3. Purify yourself in a stream as ghee, you who best pursue the gods at the sacrifices; for us bring rain through purification.
4. For our nourishment run through the fleecy filter in a stream, for the gods will surely listen!
5. Purifying himself, he has flowed, constantly smashing away demons, making the lights light up as of old.

IX.50 (762) Soma Pavamāna

Ucathya Āṅgirasa
5 verses: gāyatrī

The next three hymns (IX.50–52) are attributed to the same poet, who is not otherwise found in the R̥gveda. This hymn has a distinct focus on sound, that of Soma as he is being prepared (vs. 1), of (probably) the officiating priests (vs. 3), and of the ritual chant (vs. 4). A potential pun in verse 2 suggests that the priestly voices there are both competing with each other and seeking the sacrificial reward. Verse 5 contains another potential pun, with the same word (aktú) meaning both "ointments" and "nights."

1. Your snortings rise up like the roar of the wave of a river.
   Spur on the wheel-rim of the music.
2. At your stimulus there rise up three voices ready for combat [/seeking bounty], when you go onto the back of the sheep.
3. On the sheep's fleece with stones they drive the dear tawny one around, purifying himself, dripping with honey.
4. Purify yourself in a stream in the filter, you most exhilarating poet, to sit in the womb of chant.
5. Purify yourself, most exhilarating one, being anointed with cows as ointments [/through the nights],
   o drop, for Indra to drink.

IX.51 (763) Soma Pavamāna

Ucathya Āṅgirasa
5 verses: gāyatrī

This simple hymn sets Soma in relation both to the humans involved in his preparation, namely the Adhvaryu priest (vs. 1) and the praiser (vs. 4), and to the gods who consume him, Indra (vss. 1–2), the gods in general, and the Maruts (vs. 3). The entry into the filter, mentioned in verses 1 and 5, provides an elementary ring.

1. O Adhvaryu, send the soma, pressed by stones, surging into the filter.
   Purify it for Indra to drink.
2. The highest beestings of heaven, the most honeyed soma—press it for Indra who bears the mace.
3. Of your stalk, of your honey, o drop, do these gods eat;
   of you, the self-purifying one, do the Maruts.
4. For you, Soma, are strengthening when you are pressed for fervent exhilaration,
   to help the praiser, you bull.
5. O wide-gazing one, pressed in a stream, rush into the filter to the prize of victory and to fame.

IX.52 (764) Soma Pavamāna

Ucathya Āṅgirasa
5 verses: gāyatrī

Unlike the very straightforward preceding hymn (IX.51) attributed to the same poet, this one is full of tricks, especially in the middle verse (3), which can thus be viewed as an omphalos. The contents of the first two verses are conventional enough—the entry of Soma into the filter—but they contain several instances of phonological and morphological play, as do the final two verses (4–5). These cannot be conveyed in translation.

Verse 3, characterized by the repetition of the verb īṅkhaya ("push, shove") of highly marked formation, has a slangy and disparaging tone. Its object is generally interpreted, in our opinion correctly, as a reference to an ungenerous rich man, perhaps the poet's patron. He is compared to a pot, no doubt both because he is full of goods and because of his stodgy demeanor, and the soma drop is urged to prod this miser into giving.

Two matching compounds, sanád-rayiḥ "gaining wealth" (vs. 1) and maṃhayád-rayiḥ "readying wealth" (vs. 5), provide a thematic and grammatical ring.

1. Heaven-ruling, gaining wealth, bringing a prize to us with your stalk, being pressed, rush around into the filter.
2. Along your age-old routes, around onto the sheep's fleece, the dear one drives, a thousand streams in extent.
3. The one who is like a pot, give him a shove; give a shove to the one who doesn't give on his own, o drop.
   Give him a shove with your strokes, you striker.
4. (Strike) down the bluster of those people, o much-invoked drop, of anyone who takes aim at us.
5. With a hundred forms of help for us, o drop, or with a thousand gleaming (soma drinks),
   purify yourself, readying wealth.

IX.53 (765) Soma Pavamāna

Avatsāra Kāśyapa
4 verse: gāyatrī

The next eight hymns (IX.53–60) are attributed to the same poet as V.44, a hymn to the All Gods often declared to be the hardest hymn in the Ṛgveda. Although these brief soma hymns have some interesting features, they lack the mind-boggling verbal pyrotechnics of that hymn.

On the other hand, the organizing principle of V.44 is the double application of each verse to two different divinities, Agni and Soma, with a lexicon ambiguous enough to allow both interpretations. Something of the same thing is visible in this hymn, in which each verse but the last (4) invites the audience to supply a referent different from the one meant. The first verse deploys clear Indraic vocabulary, particularly the vocative "possessor of the stone," though Soma can, and should, be its subject. The first two-thirds of the second verse (2ab) suggest either Indra or Soma as referent, until the 1st singular verb form "I will praise" that opens the last pāda establishes the 1st-person speaker as the referent. Again, the third verse opens like a verse to Varuṇa or another Āditya, and only the "self-purifying" that begins the second pāda ties it to Soma. It is only the last verse that contains unmistakable somian vocabulary and which, in its final pāda, clarifies the roles of the drop (índu) and Indra.

1. Your blasts have arisen, splitting the demonic power, you possessor of the stone.
   Push aside the challengers all around
2. With this (insightful thought), slamming down with strength when chariots clash and a prize is set,
   I will praise with fearless heart.
3. The commandments of this self-purifying one cannot be ventured against by one of bad insight.
   Break the one who battles you.
4. Into the rivers they impel him who arouses exhilaration, the tawny one who seeks the prize,
   the drop exhilarating to Indra.

IX.54 (766) Soma Pavamāna

Avatsāra Kāśyapa
4 verses: gāyatrī

Like the last hymn, this one withholds unambiguous identification until the end of the hymn, while employing suggestive vocabulary in the earlier verses. However, unlike the last hymn, the poet does not try to mislead the audience into supplying the "wrong" referent. Rather, the hymn is structured as a series of explicit riddles: a form of the pronoun ayám "this one" opens each of the first three verses (and also 2b), and what is predicated of "this one" fits, or can fit, the Soma paradigm. The explicit solution to the riddle is given in the last pāda of verse 3, with the name Soma prominently situated. And the final verse brings the drop (índu) and Indra together in the same way as IX.53.4.

1. In accord with the age-old brilliance of this one, they have milked the gleaming, immoderate milk from the seer who wins thousands.
2. This one is a sight like the sun; this one runs to the lakes, along the seven slopes, to heaven.
3. This one, being purified, stands above all beings like the Sun-god: he is Soma.
4. To pursue the gods for us, you rush around the prizes consisting of cows, being purified, o drop, seeking Indra.

IX.55 (767) Soma Pavamāna

Avatsāra Kāśyapa
4 verses: gāyatrī

The first three verses of the hymn are unified by a reference to the stalk (ándhas) of the soma plant, although the role of the stalk is somewhat vague. Verse 1 is notable for its mention of agriculture, though again the relevance is not entirely clear. The martial Soma is on display in verse 4.

1. Stream around to us grain upon grain, fruiting upon fruiting with your stalk, o Soma, and all the gifts of good fortune.
2. O drop, just as there is praise of you (now), just as (the honey) has been born from your stalk,
   (so) sit down on the dear ritual grass.
3. And as cow-finder for us, horse-finder, purify yourself, Soma, with your stalk through the days soonest to come.
4. Who conquers and is not conquered, who smashes his rival on just confronting him—as such a one, purify yourself, o winner of thousands.

IX.56 (768) Soma Pavamāna

Avatsāra Kāśyapa
4 verses: gāyatrī

The first three verses of this simple hymn describe Soma's journey in the filter (vs. 1), as the liquid separates into multiple streams in the channels of the fleece (vs. 2), and his preparation by the fingers (vs. 3). The fourth verse then requests protection for ourselves and our men, while urging the soma to flow for its divine recipients.

1. Swift Soma, as lofty truth, rushes about in the filter, smashing apart the demons, seeking the gods,
2. When Soma rushes toward the prize, as a hundred hardworking streams, entering fellowship with Indra.
3. The ten young women have cried out to you, like a maiden to her lover.
   You are groomed, o Soma, for winning.
4. You, o drop, the sweet one—flow around for Indra, for Viṣṇu.
   Protect the superior men, the praisers from difficult straits.

IX.57 (769) Soma Pavamāna

Avatsāra Kāśyapa
4 verses: gāyatrī

In this little hymn, Soma is explicitly or implicitly compared to rain (vs. 1), a warrior (vs. 2), a law-abiding king or his subject (vs. 3), and a falcon in its nest (vs. 3). The ambiguity of the term "keeping his commandments well, having good commandments" in verse 3 allows the description to apply either to the imposer of the commandments, the king, or to those who abide by them, the vassals. The final verse (4) is, as so often, the locus of our requests.

1. Your streams go forth inexhaustible, like rains from heaven, to the thousandfold prize.
2. Toward the dear (products of) poetic skill, observing all does he rush, the tawny one brandishing his weapons.
3. Constantly being groomed by the Āyus, keeping his commandments like a vassal (or) a king, like a falcon he sits in the wood(en vessel)s.
4. All goods from heaven and from the earth bring hither to us, while being purified, o drop.

IX.58 (770) Soma Pavamāna

Avatsāra Kāśyapa
4 verses: gāyatrī

A curious little hymn or hymn-fragment. All four verses have a pāda-length refrain, which is entirely applicable to Soma, and the hymn begins with this same refrain. The first verse is clearly a soma verse throughout, but verse 2 is more appropriate to Dawn and verses 3 and 4 appear to be an abbreviated dānastuti. The patrons named in verse 3 are identified as protegés of the Aśvins in I.112.23 (though with the first in slightly different form); middle Vedic literature also has a confused tradition about these same personages.

1. In crossing, the invigorating one runs, the stream of the pressed stalk.
   – In crossing, the invigorating one runs.
2. The ruddy goddess knows of the goods, of the help of the mortal.
   – In crossing, the invigorating one runs.
3. At (the hands of) Dhvasra and Puruṣanti we take thousands.
   – In crossing, the invigorating one runs.
4. At (the hands of) those two we take thirty and thousands in extent.
   – In crossing, the invigorating one runs.

IX.59 (771) Soma Pavamāna

Avatsāra Kāśyapa
4 verses: gāyatrī

Each of the four verses contains at least one form of "purify oneself/self-purifying," with three such imperatives in verse 2. That verse seems to contain a trio of elemental substances, which are also connected with the ritual: waters, plants, and, in our interpretation, the hearths as holy places, representative of fire. Soma as finder of good things for us provides a thematic ring for the hymn; in verse 1 he finds the material and psychological goods men desire, while in verse 4 he has raised the stakes to the cosmic level.

1. Purify yourself, Soma, as cow-winner, horse-winner, all-winner, joy-winner.
   Bring here a treasure consisting of offspring.
2. Purify yourself undeceivable for the waters; purify yourself for the plants; purify yourself for the Holy Places.
3. Purifying yourself, Soma, cross all difficult passages.
   As poet sit down on the ritual grass.
4. Self-purifying one, you find the sun; on just being born, you became great.
   Drop, you dominate all.

IX.60 (772) Soma Pavamāna

Avatsāra Kāśyapa
4 verses: gāyatrī

A satisfyingly tight structure knits together this little hymn. The first and last verses contain the epithet "boundless" (vícarṣaṇi) providing a faint ring. More salient is the chaining from verse to verse: a significant portion of the final pāda of one verse opens the next verse.

The hymn also has extra-hymnic structural echoes: its final pāda is identical to the final pāda of the first verse of the preceding hymn (IX.59.1), ascribed to the same poet, save for "semen" in place of "treasure."

1. Sing forth with a song to the boundless self-purifying one, the drop with a thousand eyes.
2. You, possessing a thousand eyes and bringing a thousand presents, they have purified across the fleece.
3. Across the fleeces the self-purifying one has streamed. He runs into the tubs, entering the heart of Indra.
4. For the generosity of Indra, purify yourself as luck, o boundless Soma.
   Bring here semen providing offspring.

IX.61 (773) Soma Pavamāna

Amahīyu Āṅgirasa
30 verses: gāyatrī, arranged in tr̥cas

The first sixty hymns of the Soma Maṇḍala, all in gāyatrī meter, are arranged in the normal order of descending number of verses, starting with hymns of ten verses and ending with those of four. (The only exception is the Āprī hymn, IX.5, which has eleven.) But the gāyatrī sequence ends with six thirty-verse hymns (IX.61–66), followed by one with thirty-two verses (IX.67)—all arranged in tr̥cas (the final two verses in IX.67 are supplements) and each attributed to a different poet or group of poets—before the jagatī group begins. It is probably not an accident that these groupings of tr̥cas come at the end of the gāyatrī sequence, since, as agglomerations of three-verse sequences, they logically follow the four-verse hymns.

In this particular hymn there is little evidence of unity either within tr̥cas or between them: the standard topics of soma hymns—the details of preparation (e.g., vss. 4–5) and the gods for whom he's prepared (e.g., vss. 8–9), the cosmic connections of Soma (e.g., vss. 10, 16, 18), and the largesse and aid we ask him for (e.g., vss. 3, 23–24)—are strung together in no apparent order. There is a discernible tendency, however, to emphasize Soma's role in combating hostile forces, either directly or by strengthening someone else to do so, especially Indra. The hymn begins with two verses mentioning some of Indra's exploits performed under the influence of Soma, though without naming Indra, and the theme of Soma the smiter and aggressive warrior returns toward the end of the hymn and dominates the last two tṛcas (vss. 19–20, 22, 24–30).

1. Flow around in pursuit (of him) who amid your raptures, o drop, smashed down the nine and ninety—
2. (Smashed down) the strongholds in one day for the one whose thought is to the point, (smashed down) Śambara for Divodāsa, and as for that Turvaśa and Yadu. . . .
3. Stream around to us horseflesh, as horse-finder, and (wealth) in cattle and gold, o drop,
   and thousandfold refreshments.

4. While you are purifying yourself, while you are flooding the filter, we choose your companionship.
5. Your waves that flow into the filter in a stream—with them be gracious to us, Soma.
6. Being purified, bring us wealth and refreshment consisting of heroes, while you hold sway everywhere, o Soma.

7. Just him do the ten fingers groom, him whose mother is the river(s).
   He has been reckoned among the Ādityas.
8. Pressed, he goes into the filter, uniting with Indra and Vāyu, uniting with the rays of the sun.
9. Purify yourself for us, honeyed for Bhaga, for Vāyu, for Pūṣan, dear to Mitra and Varuṇa.

10. It was born high above from your stalk; though it was in heaven, on earth it took for itself mighty shelter and great fame.
11. Seeking to gain all the brilliant things of humans from the stranger, with it we shall win them.
12. Flow around for worshipful Indra, for Varuṇa, for the Maruts, finding a wide realm for us.

13. Up to the one who, just born, crosses the waters, breaking through, adorned by cows—
    up to the drop have the gods traveled.
14. Only him let our hymns strengthen, as (cows) who share their young do a calf—him who gains the heart of Indra.
15. Rush as weal for our cow, Soma; milk out swelling refreshment.
    Increase the sea, worthy of hymns.

16. Purifying himself he has begotten thunder dazzling like that of heaven and the lofty light belonging to all men.
17. When you are purifying yourself, o king, your sap, the exhilarating drink that brings no misfortune, rushes through the sheep's fleece.

18. Self-purifying one, your potent sap shines forth brilliant, as light for everyone to see the sun.

19. Your exhilarating drink that is worthy to be chosen, with that stalk purify yourself,
pursuing the gods, smashing those who utter evil.

20. Smashing Vr̥tra the hostile, winning the prize every day, you are a winner of cows and of horses.

21. Become a ruddy (bull) mingling with milk-cows as if with (ladies) with lovely laps,
sitting like a falcon on your womb.

22. Purify yourself, you who helped Indra to smash Vr̥tra, who was obstructing the great waters.

23. Might we of good heroes win the stakes, o Soma the rewarder.
Becoming purified, strengthen our hymns.

24. Aided by you, with your help, might we be combative against hindrances.
O Soma, be watchful over the commandments.

25. Smashing away the scorners, away the ungenerous, Soma purifies himself, going to the rendezvous with Indra.

26. Bring great wealth here to us, self-purifying one; smash the scorners.
Give glory in heroes, o drop.

27. A hundred crooks [/wool tufts] will never confound you when you are eager to give largesse,
when you, becoming purified, do battle [/act bounteously].

28. Purify yourself, o drop, when you, the bull, are pressed. Make us glorious among the people.
Smash away all hatreds.

29. In the companionship of you here, in your highest brilliance, o drop, might we overcome those who do battle.

30. Your fearful sharp weapons, which exist to injure, (with them) guard us from the insult of anyone at all.

IX.62 (774) Soma Pavamāna

Jamadagni Bhārgava
30 verses: gāyatrī, arranged in tr̥cas

Though long, this hymn remains focused on the familiar details of the preparation of the soma, often ennobled by establishing cosmic parallels. The journey across the fleece is especially prominent, and the soma is frequently likened to a fast horse. One verse, 17, is more specific than the usual generic treatments: here the soma is a horse yoked to the chariot of the sacrifice, which has three backs and three seats, presumably the three pressings and the three fires, by the visionary thoughts of the seven seers. It is also notable how often Soma is called a poet or connected with poetry in the second part of this hymn (vss. 13, 14, 25, 26, 27, 30). In the final verse he is in fact called "the entruthed poet" or "the poet (who is) truth (itself)," a powerful expression of his relationship to creative speech.

Though some of the tr̥cas display internal formal unity (e.g., vss. 19–21 beginning with ā́), most do not. The poet to whom the hymn is attributed names himself in verse 24.

1. These drops have surged, swift across the filter, toward all gifts of good fortune.
2. The prize-seekers, smashing apart the many obstacles to progress, making the ways easy going for our offspring and for our steed by their own extension,
3. Making a wide realm for the cow, they rush toward the lovely praise hymn,
   toward lasting refreshment for us.

4. The plant has been pressed in the waters for exhilaration, the potent one abiding on a mountain.
   Like a falcon he has sat on his womb.
5. The beautiful stalk coveted by the gods—(the soma) rinsed in the waters, pressed by men—do the cows sweeten with their milk.
6. Then, like drivers a horse, they have beautified him for the immortal, the sap of honey for joint revelry.

7. Your streams, dripping with honey, which have surged for our aid, o drop,
   with them you have sat down on the filter.
8. Rush, for Indra to drink, across the sheep's fleece, sitting on your womb, in the wooden (vessels).
9. You, o drop, stream around—sweetest for the Aṅgirases, finding a wide realm—to the ghee, the milk.

10. Here has the limitless one been established; purifying himself, he takes note of lofty friendship while being impelled.
11. This bull following his bullish commandments, purifying himself, smashing malediction,
    will provide goods for the pious.

12. In purifying yourself bring wealth in thousands of cows and of horses, much gleaming, much craved.

13. This one here is poured in circles, being continually groomed by the Āyus, the wide-going one with a poet's purpose.
14. Possessing a thousand forms of help, a hundred bounties, measurer of the airy realm, poet—the exhilarating drink purifies himself for Indra.
15. Born on a mountain [/begotten by a hymn], praised here, the drop is placed for Indra, a bird in his womb, as if in a nest.

16. Purifying himself, pressed by men, Soma has flowed, as if to a prize, to sit in the cups, through his mastery.
17. They yoke him to the three-backed, three-seated chariot, to drive, yoking him by means of the seven visionary thoughts of the seven seers.
18. O pressers, impel the swift one to drive for the prize—the winner of spoils, the tawny prize-seeker.

19. Pressed, entering the tub, rushing to all that is glorious, he stands among the cows like a champion.
20. The Āyus milk your milk for exhilaration, o drop;
the gods (milk) honey for the gods.
21. Into the filter send our soma, the most honeyed for the gods, the most audible to the gods.

22. These soma juices, while being hymned, have surged for great fame in a stream of most exhilarating (soma).
23. You rush to pursue bovine (goods) and manly powers, while being purified.
Winning the prizes, flow around.
24. And rush to all our refreshments provided with cows, encircled with rhythm, while being hymned by Jamadagni.

25. Purify yourself, Soma, with your bright help, going at the forefront of speech toward all products of poetic skill.
26. You—going at the forefront, rousing the waters of the sea and the speeches—purify yourself, o you who set everything in motion.
27. For you, o poet, do these worlds here take their stand, for your greatness, o Soma; for you do the rivers rush.

28. Like rains from heaven your streams go forth inexhaustible, toward the gleaming underlayer.
29. For Indra purify the drop, the strong one bringing success to skill, the lord whose largesse is worth pursuing.
30. Self-purifying Soma, the entruthed poet, has sat in the filter, establishing for the praiser an abundance of heroes.

IX.63 (775) Soma Pavamāna

Nidhruvi Kāśyapa
30 verses: gāyatrī, arranged in tr̥cas

Like the last hymn, this one is much concerned with the ritual preparation of soma, but it sketches a larger conceptual world in which this preparation takes place. On the one hand, the purification is seen as a process of Ārya-ization (vs. 5), and the spaces that Soma traverses, for example the filter, become "Ārya domains" (vs. 14). The waters that Soma crosses (vss. 5, 21) and the rivers in which he is groomed (vs. 17) are both the ritual waters in which the soma plant is rinsed and rehydrated and, metaphorically, the frontier rivers the Āryas crossed in expanding their realms. (See also the mentions of finding or making "wide space" in the two preceding hymns [IX.61.12; 62.3, 9].)

On the other hand, Soma is compared to and identified with the Sun (especially in the third tr̥ca, vss. 7–9, also vs. 13), and his journey across the filter is also metaphorically the Sun's daily journey across the heaven. Since the ritual activity happens on earth, at the hands of Manu (vss. 7–8), the first sacrificer and the cultural ancestor of the Ārya, even the rising of the Sun is thus implicitly attributed to human agency.

The hymn is, of course, also full of requests for material goods of all sorts, and, especially toward the end, for Soma to smite all manner of enemies and hostile forces (vss. 24, 26, 28–29; also 5).

Although the hymn does not seem tightly structured, some tr̥cas show formal unity (e.g., vss. 25–27 with forms of the root sr̥j "surge"), and the hymn begins and ends with verses containing the imperative dhāraya "secure, sustain."

1. In purifying yourself, o Soma, bring wealth in thousands and an abundance of good heroes;
   secure our claims to fame for us.
2. You swell refreshment and nourishment; most exhilarating for Indra, you sit down here in the cups.
3. Pressed for Indra, for Viṣṇu, soma has streamed into the tub.
   Let it be honeyed for Vāyu.

4. These swift brown ones have surged across the tangles (of sheep's wool), the soma juices, in a stream of truth.

5. Strengthening Indra, crossing the waters, making it all Ārya, smashing away the non-givers,
6. The pressed juices rush along their own realm, the brown ones, the drops, going to Indra.

7. Purify yourself in the very stream with which you made the sun shine, impelling the waters belonging to Manu.
8. He has yoked Etaśa, (the steed) of the Sun, purifying himself in Manu's presence, to drive through the midspace.
9. And these ten tawny mares of the Sun he has yoked, to drive, the drop, announcing, "(I go) to Indra."

10. From here sprinkle in circles the soma pressed for Vāyu, the songs, (the soma) exhilarating to Indra, onto the sheep's fleece.
11. O self-purifying Soma, find wealth for us that is difficult to surpass, that is difficult to attain by one who craves it.
12. Rush toward wealth in thousands of cows and of horses, toward the prize of victory and fame.

13. Soma, like the Sun-god, purifies himself, pressed by stones, placing his own sap in the tub.
14. Across the Ārya domains these clear juices in a stream of truth have flowed to a prize of cows.
15. Pressed for Indra the mace-bearer, the soma juices, mixed with curds, have streamed across the filter.

16. O Soma, as the most honeyed, rush forth into the filter for wealth, as the exhilarating drink that best pursues the gods.
17. Him do the Āyus groom in the rivers, the tawny prize-seeker, the drop exhilarating to Indra.
18. In purifying yourself, o Soma, bring masses of gold, of horses, of heroes;
    bring hither a prize of cows.

19. As if sprinkling a prize-seeking (horse) when the prize (is set), sprinkle prize-seeking (soma) in circles onto the sheep's fleece,
    (the soma) most honeyed for Indra.
20. The inspired poets, seeking help, with their insights groom the sage poet worthy to be groomed.
    The bull rushes ever roaring.
21. To the water-crossing bull, Soma, in a stream of truth have the inspired poets cried out in unison with their insights, their thought.

22. Purify yourself, o god, attended by the Āyus. Let your exhilarating drink go to Indra; mount to Vāyu according to the (ritual) statute.
23. O self-purifying Soma, you spill down wealth worthy of fame.
    As dear one, enter the sea.
24. Smashing away the scorners, you purify yourself, finding the resolve, exhilarating, o Soma.
    Thrust from yourself the people who do not seek the gods.

25. The self-purifying soma juices, the clear drops have surged toward all products of poetic skill.
26. The swift, resplendent, self-purifying drops have surged, smashing away all hatreds.
27. The self-purifying ones have surged from the heaven, from the midspace onto the back of the earth.

28. Becoming purified in a stream, o Soma drop, smash away all errors, away the demonic forces, o you of good resolve.
29. Smashing away demons, Soma, rush ever roaring toward highest brilliant tempestuousness.
30. In us, o Soma drop, secure goods—heavenly, earthly, all that are choice.

IX.64 (776) Soma Pavamāna

Kaśyapa Mārīca
30 verses: gāyatrī, arranged in tr̥cas

The hymn begins with an insistent tr̥ca establishing Soma as a bull. What follows is for the most part a conventional treatment of the purification process, with special emphasis on his entry into "the sea" (that is, the purificatory waters, vss. 8, 16, 17, 19, 27). The association with the Sun found in the preceding hymn is also present here, with Soma not merely yoking the Sun's horse, Etaśa, but identified with him (vs. 19) and with the Sun himself in the final words of the hymn (vs. 30; see also vss. 7, 9). Soma's light and brilliance are also mentioned throughout (vss. 1, 8, 13, 15, 28).

1. A bull are you, Soma, a brilliant one—a bull following his bullish commandments, o god.
   As bull, you have established your own foundations.
2. Of you, the bull, bullish is the strength; your wooden (cup) is a bull, your exhilarating drink a bull.
   In truth, o bull, you are really a bull.

3. You, the bull, whinny like a horse. Sur(round) the cows, sur(round) the steeds, o drop;
   open up the doors for wealth for us.

4. They have surged forth—the prize-seeking soma juices—with a yen for cows and for horses, with a yen for heroes—the swift clear ones.
5. Being beautified by those who seek truth, being groomed in the two hands, they purify themselves in the sheep's fleece.
6. All goods for the pious—heavenly, earthly, and those of the midspace—let these soma juices bring in purifying themselves.

7. O you who find [/know] all, of you purifying yourself the surges have surged forth, like the rays of the sun.
8. Making a beacon, from heaven you rush toward all forms.
   O Soma, you swell as the sea.
9. Yourself being impelled, you send out your speech, you who purify yourself at your expansion.
   You have roared like the Sun-god.

10. The drop has become purified, the conspicuous dear one, by the thought of the poets.
    Like a charioteer his horse, it has released (its wave),
11. Your wave which, pursuing the gods, has streamed around in the filter, sitting on the womb of truth.
12. Rush into our filter, as the exhilarating drink that best pursues the gods,
    o drop, for Indra to drink.

13. For refreshment purify yourself in a stream, being groomed by the inspired ones.
    O drop, with your light come toward the cows.
14. Becoming purified, make wide space and nourishment for the people, o you who long for song, when you are released into the milk-mixture, o tawny one.
15. Becoming purified for the pursuit of the gods, drive to your rendezvous with Indra, flashing, guided by the prize-seekers.

16. Being impelled forth, the swift drops, sped by insightful thought, have surged to the sea.
17. Continually being groomed, the lively drops have come at will to the sea, to the womb of truth.
18. Inclined toward us, encompass for us all goods with your strength.
    Protect for us a shelter full of heroes.

19. Etaśa the draft-horse measures out his pace, being yoked by the versifiers, when he is deposited in the sea.
20. When the swift one sits on the golden womb of truth, he leaves behind the undiscerning.
21. The seekers have cried out to (him); the discerning wish to attain (him).
    The undiscriminating sink down.

22. For Indra with the Maruts, o drop, purify yourself as the most honeyed, to sit on the womb of truth.
23. The inspired poets knowing [/finding] speech, the ritual adepts, adorn you;
    the Āyus groom you all over.
24. Mitra, Aryaman, and Varuṇa drink your sap, o poet, as do the Maruts, when you purify yourself.

25. You, Soma, while becoming purified, send out speech that is attentive to poetic inspiration and brings a thousand presents, o drop.
26. And speech bringing a thousand presents, ready for combat [/bounty], o Soma—becoming purified, o drop, bring that hither.
27. Becoming purified, o drop, much invoked by these peoples,
    as dear one, enter the sea.

28. (Provided) with ever-flashing light, with a form that encircles with chant are (both) the clear soma drinks and those mixed with cows [=milk].
29. Being impelled, guided by the impellers, the prize-seeker has stridden to the prize—sitting (on the womb of truth) like raptor(-birds).
30. Separately [=unmixed], o Soma, and uniting (with milk), as poet of heaven purify yourself for well-being and as the sun to be seen.

IX.65 (777) Soma Pavamāna

Bhr̥gu Vāruṇi or Jamadagni Bhārgava
30 verses: gāyatrī, arranged in tr̥cas

Even in this maṇḍala devoted to "self-purifying" Soma, the constant repetition of that epithet and its associated verbal forms ("purify yourself," etc.) in this hymn is remarkable. In particular, the idiom "by purifying yourself bring here . . ." (much more economically expressed in Sanskrit by ā́ pavasva) is insistent, along with other demands that Soma bring or convey goods here. Intermingled are verses treating the familiar details of soma preparation. All in all, the hymn seems flat, uninspired, and repetitive.

The tr̥ca consisting of verses 22–24 breaks the monotony to some degree, with the first two verses listing various places where the soma may be pressed (the meaning of some of these words is disputed and their translation provisional), and only the third returning to the dominant theme of the hymn. The final tr̥ca (vss. 28–30) brings the hymn to a close with a flurry of repetitions of the preverb ā́ "here, hither," in a list of items we wish to bring to hand as a result of the soma offering.

1. The rosy (fingers) impel the sun; the kindred sisters impel their lord; those seeking the great impel the great drop.
2. O self-purifying one, with light after light, as god from among the gods, enter all good things.
3. O self-purifying one, by purifying yourself bring here good praise, rain, and friendship from the gods, continuously for refreshment.

4. Because you are a bull, we, very attentive, invoke you who are brilliant with radiance,
   o self-purifying one.
5. By purifying yourself bring here an abundance of heroes, you yourself becoming exhilarated, o you of good weapons.
   Come just here, o drop.
6. When you are poured all around with waters, being groomed in the two hands,
   you attain to your seat by means of the wooden (vessel).

7. Sing forth to self-purifying Soma, as Vyaśva did—to the great one with a thousand eyes—
8. Him whose tawny hue, dripping with honey, they impel (like) a fallow bay with the stones,
   the drop for Indra to drink,
9. It's with you—that prize-seeker who has won all the stakes—that we choose partnership.

10. As bull purify yourself in a stream, and as exhilarating drink for the one accompanied by the Maruts [=Indra], making all things your own by your strength.
11. You, o self-purifying one, who look like the sun, the upholder of (Indra's?) two arms,
    do I impel—the prize-seeker to the prizes.
12. Conspicuous because of this poetic inspiration, purify yourself as tawny one in this very stream.
    Spur on your yokemate to the prizes.

13. By purifying yourself bring great refreshment here for us, o drop visible to all, finding the way for us, o Soma.
14. The tubs have cried out, o drop. In streams, with strength, enter (them) for Indra's drinking.
15. You, whose exhilarating, sharp sap they milk out with stones—purify yourself as smasher of hostility.

16. The king is sped by (words of) wisdom, purifying himself in Manu's presence, to drive through the midspace.
17. Convey to us here, o drop, hundredfold thriving of cattle, an abundance of horses, and the gift of good fortune, for aid.
18. Bring to us here, o Soma, strength and speed, as if in physical form, for luster, when you have been pressed to seek the gods.

19. Rush, o Soma, most brilliant, to the wooden vessels, constantly bellowing, sitting like a falcon in your womb.
20. For Indra, for Vāyu, for Varuṇa, for the Maruts, for Viṣṇu the water-winning soma rushes.
21. Establishing refreshment for our offspring and for us on all sides, o Soma, by purifying yourself bring thousandfold (wealth) here.

22. The soma juices that have been pressed in the distance, those nearby, or those yonder in a reed-filled (lake),
23. Those (pressed) in foamy (places) among performers (of rituals), those in the middle of dwelling places, or those among the five peoples,
24. By purifying themselves, let them bring here to us rain from heaven and an abundance of heroes—the gods, the drops, being pressed.

25. He purifies himself, the delightful tawny one, while being hymned by Jamadagni and being impelled onto the hide of the cow.
26. Forth (go) the clear (soma juices), speeding with vigor, being impelled like teams.
    Being brought to readiness, they are groomed in the waters.
27. Those present at the pressings have impelled you for the sake of the divine conclave.
    Purify yourself with this light.

28. Here your skill, which is joy itself, we choose today, here (you as) draft-animal,
 here the much coveted drink,
29. Here the gladdening (drink), here the one worthy to be chosen, here the inspired poet, here the inspirited one,
 here the much coveted drink,
30. Here wealth, here kind attention, here, o strong-willed one, right here on our bodies, here the much coveted drink.

IX.66 (778) Soma Pavamāna, except Agni 19–21

One hundred Vaikhānasa poets
30 verses: gāyatrī (except anuṣṭubh 18), arranged in tr̥cas

This hymn sets larger rhetorical goals for itself than the last one and inhabits a less airless rhetorical space. Indeed, the hymn is in part about space: the constricted area in which the soma is prepared and the materials employed in the preparation are likened to various cosmic domains and natural phenomena (see, e.g., vss. 2–3, 5–6, 12–13). Soma himself is explicitly or implicitly identified with other deities and natural forces, and they with him: the sun (vss. 18, 22, 27), probably Indra (vs. 26), and especially Agni (vss. 19–21). This last identification is so complete that the Anukramaṇī identifies Agni as the divinity of this tr̥ca—not surprisingly, as it begins (vs. 19) with an address to Agni, who is assigned the archetypal Soma epithet "self-purifying" (vs. 20, with verbal forms in vss. 19 and 21), while also keeping his own characteristic vocabulary (esp. "installed in front" [puróhita] vs. 20).

The poet also seeks comradeship with Soma (vss. 1, 4, 14, 18), in addition to the usual good things.

From an Indo-European perspective, the hymn is notable for containing one of three R̥gvedic occurrences of the famous phrase ákṣiti śrávaḥ "imperishable fame," cognate with Greek kléos áphthiton "idem," and the formula, identified by Adelbert Kuhn in 1853, that launched the field of comparative Indo-European poetics.

1. Purify yourself, you who are common to all the separate peoples, (surging) toward all products of poetic skill, a comrade for your comrades, to be reverently invoked.
2. From those two you rule over all, self-purifying one—from the two domains [=Heaven and Earth] that stand facing (each other), o Soma.
3. The domains that are yours, Soma, you surround entirely according to the ritual sequences, o self-purifying poet.

4. Purify yourself, begetting refreshments, (surging) toward all valuables, as a comrade to aid your comrades.
5. Yours are the gleaming rays that spread widely on the back of heaven across the filter, Soma, through your domains.
6. Yours are these seven streams that flow forth to your command, Soma.
 For you do the milk-cows run.

7. Drive forth, Soma, in a stream, pressed as exhilarating for Indra, establishing for yourself imperishable fame.
8. Together the seven siblings cried out to you, inciting with insightful thoughts the inspired poet at the contest of Vivasvant.
9. They groom you together, the unwed ones, on the sheep's *back, in the lively (water), when, hoarse-voiced [/creaking], you are anointed [/greased] in the wood(en cup).

10. Of you purifying yourself, o poet and prizewinner, the surges have surged, like chargers seeking fame.
11. Toward the cask dripping with honey they have surged onto the sheep's fleece.
 The insightful thoughts have bellowed.
12. Toward the sea have the drops gone, like milk-cows toward home, to the womb of truth.

13. For our great joy the waters, the rivers rush forth, o drop, when you will clothe yourself with cows.
14. Since we are likely to gain in comradeship with you, with you as our help, we long for comradeship, o drop.
15. Purify yourself for the quest for cattle, for the great one of manly eye, o Soma.
 Enter here into the belly of Indra.

16. Great are you, Soma, preeminent, strongest of the strong, o drop.
 Being a battler, you win every time.
17. (You,) who are stronger even than the strong, more a champion even than champions, more generous even than those who give much,
18. You, Soma, are the sun; (bring) refreshments here at the winning of the offspring of our own bodies.
 We choose (you) for comradeship; we choose (you) for fellowship.

19. O Agni, you bring (longer) lifespans through your purification; impel hither nourishment and refreshment to us.
 Into the distance thrust misfortune.

20. Agni—a seer, self-purifying, belonging to the five peoples, installed in front—him we beseech for a great household.
21. Agni, as a good worker, through your purification bring luster and an abundance of heroes for us, establishing in me wealth and thriving.

22. The self-purifying one rushes across failures toward the lovely praise hymn, visible to all like the sun.
23. He, being constantly groomed by the Āyus, affording pleasure, is established for pleasure, the drop, a steed visible afar.
24. The self-purifying one, as the lofty truth, has begotten the gleaming light, continually smashing (back) the black shades of darkness.

25. Of the self-purifying one, continually smashing (back the darkness), of the tawny one, the glittering (drops) have surged, lively ones with flickering radiance.
26. The self-purifying one, the best charioteer, proclaimed as most resplendent by the resplendent (Maruts), gold-glittering, with the Maruts as his flock, 27. The self-purifying one will pervade with his rays, the best winner of prizes, establishing for the praiser an abundance of heroes.

28. Being pressed, the drop has flowed forth across the fleecy filter; being purified, the drop (has flowed) to Indra.
29. This Soma plays on the hide of cows with the stones, repeatedly invoking Indra to exhilaration.
30. You, self-purifying one, whose heaven-bright milk was brought here from heaven, with it be gracious to us, for us to live.

IX.67 (779) Soma Pavamāna [or, according to Anukramaṇī, Soma Pavamāna 1–9, 13–22, 28–30; Soma Pavamāna or Pūṣan 10–12; Agni 23, 24; Agni or Savitar 25; Agni or Agni and Savitar 26; Agni or the All Gods 27; Praise of the Student of the Pavamānī Verses 31–32]

Bharadvāja 1–3, Kaśyapa 4–6, Gotama 7–9, Atri 10–12, Viśvāmitra 13–15, Jamadagni 16–18, Vasiṣṭha 19–21, Pavitra Āṅgirasa or Vasiṣṭha or both 22–32 32 verses: gāyatrī, except dvipadā gāyatrī 16–18, anuṣṭubh 27, 31–32, puraüṣṇih 30, arranged in tṛcas through verse 21.

This final hymn of the IXth Maṇḍala gāyatrī collection is, according to the Anukramaṇī, the product of at least seven different poets, most of them founding poets of the Family Books of the R̥gveda and all eponymous ancestors of the most prominent gotras of later times—each responsible for a single tr̥ca, with the last eleven verses assigned either to yet another poet or to Vasiṣṭha, the poet of the immediately preceding tr̥ca. It has been convincingly argued by Proferes (2007: 10) that this structure shows that the separate lineage rites were already being collected into a single pan-Ārya ritual during the R̥gvedic period and that this composite hymn was a conscious attempt to bring the various clans under one ritual umbrella. He argues that the final two verses (31–32) were added by the redactors or compilers and celebrate this ecumenical project, by declaring that the assemblage is greater and more powerful than the sum of its parts.

Certainly its parts are quite various. The first twenty-one verses, attributed to the various clan-poets, are for the most part conventional Soma Pavamāna verses, and the tr̥cas for the most part exhibit some internal cohesion. The single unconventional tr̥ca consists of verses 10–12, attributed to Atri, in which the god Pūṣan dominates. Pūṣan otherwise scarcely appears in the IXth Maṇḍala, has little or no connection with soma elsewhere (gruel is his favored meal), and barely appears in the Atri Maṇḍala (V) except in lists of other gods. The reason for his intrusion here is unclear.

Verses 22–27 form a self-contained purificatory spell, calling on various gods, including Soma, Agni, and Savitar, in addition to groups of gods, to purify us with their own characteristic instruments. There follow two verses (28–29) that return to the soma theme, and then the strangest verse of all (30). The interpretation of this verse is much disputed, but it appears to refer to the myth of the disappearance of the ritual Agni and urges Soma to bring him back, along with a, or the, rat, which may be a reference to the god Rudra, whose animal victim in later ritual is a rat. But this is only a guess.

The last two supplementary verses (31–32) were discussed above.

1. You, Soma, are supporting, invigorating, strongest at the ceremony.
   Purify yourself, readying wealth.
2. You, bringing exhilaration to superior men when pressed, most exhilarating when you have run, are patron to Indra, with your stalk.
3. You, having been pressed by stones—rush, roaring constantly, toward highest brilliant tempestuous force.

4. The drop, being impelled, rushes across the sheep's fleece;
   the tawny one has roared for the prize.
5. O drop, you rush through the fleece, through to acclamations, through to gifts of good fortune,
   through to prizes consisting of cows, o Soma.
6. Bring here to us, o drop, wealth in cattle and horses—a hundredfold, a thousandfold, o soma.

7. The self-purifying drops, swift across the filter, have reached Indra on their journeys.
8. The prominent somian sap, the primordial drop purifies itself for Indra—a lively one for a lively one [/Āyu].
9. The rosy (fingers) impel the sun; to the self-purifying one, dripping with honey, they cry out in unison with a song.

10. Pūṣan whose horses are goats is our helper on every journey.
– He will give us a share in maidens.
11. This Soma here purifies himself, honeyed like ghee, for the one with braided hair [=Pūṣan].
– He will give us a share in maidens.
12. This pressed soma here purifies himself, gleaming like ghee, for you, glowing one.
– He will give us a share in maidens.

13. As child of the speech of the poets, o Soma, purify yourself in a stream.
You are the one among the gods who establishes treasure.
14. He runs into the tubs; the falcon plunges through the armor toward the cups, roaring constantly.
15. Your sap, Soma, when pressed, has surged forth and around into the tub.
Like a falcon launched in flight, it rushes.

16. Purify yourself, Soma, causing exhilaration, most honeyed for Indra.
17. They have been released to pursue the gods, like chariots seeking the prize.
18. The clear pressed soma-juices, most invigorating, have surged to Vāyu.

19. Pounded by the stone, bepraised, you go to the filter, o Soma, establishing for the praiser an abundance of heroes.
20. This one, pounded, bepraised, plunges across the filter, the sheep's fleece, as demon-smasher.
21. What peril nearby and what at a little distance finds me here—o self-purifying one, smash that away.

22. The one who purifies himself through our filter today, the limitless one who is the purifier, let him purify us.
23. The filter that is stretched out here within your flame, o Agni, and the sacred formulation—with that purify us.
24. Your filter of flames, Agni—with that purify us; with the impulsions of sacred formulations purify us.
25. With both, god Savitar, with the filter and with your impulsion purify me all about.

26. With the three purify us—you, god Savitar, with your greatest (impulsions), you, Soma, through your greatest domains, and you, Agni, with your skills.
27. Let the godly folk purify me; let the Vasus purify me with insight.
 O All Gods, purify me; o Jātavedas, purify me.

28. Swell forth, flow forth, Soma, with all your shoots as highest oblation for the gods.
29. Close to the dear youth who always excites wonder, the one growing strong through the poured offering, have we come, bearing homage.

30. The axe [=flame] of the one not to be stilled [=Agni] (has) disappeared.
 By purifying yourself bring it here, o god Soma, so also the rat [=Rudra?], o god Soma.

31. Whoever studies the "Self-Purifying" (verses), the sap assembled by the seers, that one eats the whole purified (sap), sweetened by Mātariśvan.
32. Whoever studies the "Self-Purifying" (verses), the sap assembled by the seers, for him Sarasvatī milks out milk, fresh butter, honey, and water.

Jagatī Hymns: 68–86

IX.68 (780) Soma Pavamāna

Vatsaprī Bhālandana
10 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 10

The first of the Soma hymns in jagatī meter (IX.68–86), this poem well demonstrates the increased possibilities for verbal and conceptual richness that the longer meter affords, in contrast to the concision and constriction of gāyatrī. The hymn has an omphalos structure: since verse 10 is a summary verse and in a different meter (triṣṭubh), verse 5 is the middle verse and encodes the esoteric knowledge that is the hymn's message. This verse is framed by a number of verbal and semantic responsions (though not as tightly arranged as in some omphalos hymns): for instance, the fingers of verses 4 and 7, as well as the same phrase "held by men" in both verses; the forms of the root vid "find, discover" in verses 3 and 6 (and 9).

More important is the conceptual architecture: the hymn leads up to the omphalos and away from it, returning to its conceptual starting point. It begins with the ritual soma and the familiar details of its preparation (vss. 1–2): the journey across the filter and the mixing with milk, complete with details about the actual filtering process, as the juice leaves its detritus in the filter. But toward the end of verse 2, the journey gains a larger resonance, however vague: soma circles "the wide expanse," an area that sounds more ample than a mere sheep's fleece. In verses 3 and 4 the journey has turned cosmic: heaven and earth are now the domain for Soma's travel and for his fecundating activity, and in our view the contrast between Soma's swelling footprint in 4b and his head in 4d expresses his cosmic reach, from his feet on earth, swelling with rain, to his distant head in heaven.

Verse 5, the omphalos, provides an explanation, albeit a mystical one, for the difference between the ritual soma of the first two verses and the cosmic one of verses 3–4. He really had two births, one in secret even beyond the two worlds and one made evident to all. And as a consequence there are actually two Somas, a fact first recognized by Heaven and Earth. (Such is our reading of this verse, which has generally been interpreted quite differently: one influential opinion identifies the Aśvins as the twins mentioned, a solution of desperation in our opinion.)

The second form of Soma, the physical and visible one, is brought to earth in verse 6, and the poets and ritualists transform him into the ritual soma now familiar to us. The remaining verses before the summary (7–9) bring us back to the current ritual soma with which we began, but with a clearer awareness of the powers his dual nature has bestowed on him. For example, in verse 1 the drops are simply "provided with speech," but in verses 8–9 Soma "rouses speech" all the way to heaven. Similarly, in verse 2 he simply "circles around" the wide expanse, whereas in 9d, the last pāda of the hymn proper, he "finds" wide space, a feat much desired and much celebrated by the Vedic Āryas.

1. Forth toward the god have the honeyed drops flowed, like milk-cows.
   Sitting on the ritual grass, provided with speech, with (full) udders, they have assumed as their swirling raiment the ruddy (cows' milk).
2. Bellowing continually he has cried out to the (cows) in front; loosening his shoots, the tawny one becomes sweet.
   Across the filter, circling around the broad expanse, the god will lay down his stems at will.
3. The exhilarating drink, which measured across the converging twin sisters [=Heaven and Earth], swelled those two imperishable ones, grown strong simultaneously, with imperishable milk.
   Continually rediscovering the two great, unbounded world-halves, advancing upon imperishable (space), he assumed his full dimension.
4. Wandering between the two mothers [=Heaven and Earth], stirring up the waters, the wise one swells his own footprint by his independent power.
   The plant is ornamented with grain when he is held by men; while he joins with his female kin [=fingers], he guards his own head.

5. Along with skill and mind the poet is born; the embryo of truth was deposited beyond the twins [=Heaven and Earth].
Those two were the first to recognize that there were two youths: the (one) birth deposited in secret and the other held aloft.
6. The inspired thinkers discovered the form of the gladdening one, when the falcon brought the stalk from out of the distance.
They groomed him in the rivers, the eager well-grown plant, circling around, worthy of verses.
7. The ten maidens [=fingers] groom you when you are pressed, Soma, when you are impelled by the seers with thoughts and insights and with invocations of the gods through the sheep's fleeces. Held by men, you will break out the prize to be won.
8. The inspired thoughts, the rhythms have roared to Soma, the branchy one, circling forth, keeping good company, who, honeyed, in a stream, in a wave from heaven, rouses speech—the immortal one who conquers wealth.
9. This is the one who rouses (speech) to the whole realm of heaven. Soma, being purified, sits in the tubs.
He is groomed with waters, with cows, when he has been pressed by stones. Being purified, the drop finds dear wide space.
10. In just this way, o Soma, purify yourself, being poured all around, establishing for us vigor most bright.
We would invoke Heaven and Earth, the two without hatred. O gods, establish wealth rich in heroes for us.

IX.69 (781) Soma Pavamāna

Hiraṇyastūpa Āṅgirasa
10 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 10

Attributed to the same poet as the author of the famous Indra hymn I.32 (and indeed I.31–35, as well as IX.4), this hymn is dense with ever-shifting imagery, expressed in many forms: similes, metaphors, identifications. Sometimes several referents are simultaneously possible, as in verse 1, where both "thought" and "soma" could be the subject of the middle part of the verse. This verbal richness is quite appropriate, since at least the first two verses concern the poetic impulse; note the nice description of the tongue as "the gladdening goad" in 2b.

The middle verses (3–7) treat Soma's journey across the filter to meet and mix with the cows/milk. This mixture is described in increasingly elaborate images of clothing in verses 4–5, ending with the cosmos as his garment (5cd). The journey is completed in the first half of verse 7, and the hymn comes to a more conventional ending with prayers for goods and aid.

1. Like an arrow on a bow, my thought is aimed. It is released like a calf to the udder of its mother.
   Like (a cow) with a broad stream, it gives milk as it comes here in the lead. Under the commandments of this one [=Soma the god], the soma (juice) is dispatched.
2. And while my thought is being engorged, the honey is poured. The gladdening goad [=tongue] bestirs itself within the mouth.
   The self-purifying one is a thundering, like (the thundering) of beaters. The honeyed drop rushes round the fleece.
3. Seeking his wives, he purifies himself all around in the fleece and upon the hide. The granddaughter of Aditi loosens (her garment [=shoots of the soma plant]) for him who goes to truth.
   The tawny one [/fallow bay], held fast, has whinnied—the sacrificial exhilarating drink. Sharpening his own manly powers, like a buffalo, he beautifies himself.
4. The bull bellows, and the milk-cows go in response. The goddesses go to their rendezvous with the god.
   He has stridden beyond the silvery sheep's fleece. Soma has wrapped himself in (milk) as if in a freshly washed cloak.
5. Being arrayed, the immortal tawny one has wrapped himself with an unworn, gleaming garment.
   With his might he has made the back of heaven for his raiment and an underlayer made of cloud in the two cups.
6. Like the rays of the sun that set sleepers in motion, the exhilarating (soma juices) arise all at once from sleep.
   The swift surges (surge) around the stretched string [=filter]. But without Indra he [=Soma] does not purify any domain of his.
7. As at the forward plunge of a river toward the deep, the swift exhilarating drinks, roused by bulls, have achieved their course.
   Weal (be) for our two-footed and our four-footed at their homecoming. Let prizes and peoples stand by us, Soma.
8. By purifying yourself bring (wealth) in goods and gold, in horses, cows, and barley, and an abundance of good heroes, for you (soma-juices), o Soma, are my fathers, the heads of heaven, set forth as creators of vitality for me.
9. These self-purifying soma juices have gone forth to Indra, like chariots to a win.
   Pressed, the tawny ones go beyond the ovine filter, having left behind their cover, to the rain.
10. O drop, purify yourself for lofty Indra, since you are very merciful, beyond reproach, caring for the stranger.
    Bring gleaming goods to the singer. O Heaven and Earth, together with the gods—further us.

IX.70 (782) Soma Pavamāna

Reṇu Viśvāmitra
10 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 10

An intricate and difficult hymn, some of whose puzzles remain unsolved. The theme of the hymn is the difference between, and ultimate unity of, heavenly Soma and earthly, ritual Soma—a theme that was also the subject of nearby IX.68. The disjunction is announced in the first verse, where the "real" milk-mixture is produced in heaven, and the worlds are Soma's garment. In verse 2, by contrast, it seems that the earthly Soma is seeking a share of his heavenly counterpart by performing cosmic deeds through ritual means. A rapprochement is effected in verse 3, where Soma's beacons (kétu) go to and work upon both men and gods, and as a consequence they accept him as their king; on the basis of other passages in which this term is found, the beacons appear to be both his cosmic sunlike rays and the glinting streams of ritual soma as they circle in the filter. The intermediary role of Soma between gods and men and Heaven and Earth remains the subject of the following verses (4–6), though not all is clear, especially the first half of verse 4 and the last half of verse 6. The last four verses (7–10) return us to the ritual Soma and his ultimate goal, the body of Indra, but the cosmic associations he acquired in the earlier parts of the hymn make him nourishment fit for the gods.

1. Three times seven milk-cows have milked out for him the real milk-mixture in the foremost distant heaven.
   He made the four other dear worlds to be his raiment, when he grew strong through the truths [=hymns].
2. Seeking a share of the dear immortal one, through his poetic skill he has loosened both, Heaven (and Earth), from each other.
   He lavishly wraps himself in the glinting-sharp waters when, by the god's [=Soma's] fame, they [=waters] know his seat.
3. Let those immortal undeceivable beacons of his suffuse both races [=gods and men], the beacons by which both manly and godly (powers) become purified.
   Just because of that have the zealous ones accepted him as their king.
4. He, being groomed by the ten who work well [=fingers], (goes) forth to bellow forth amid the midmost mothers [=waters?].
   Protecting the commandments of the dear immortal one [=heavenly soma], having his sight on men, he surveys both clans [=gods and men].
5. Constantly being groomed, propelled between the two worlds-halves, he is roused to give suck to Indra.
   With his blustering the bull thrusts away evil thoughts, always setting his sights, like a sharpshooter, on rich spoils.

6. The ruddy one, becoming visible, goes (to Heaven and Earth) as if to his two mothers, roaring again and again, like the clamor of the Maruts.
   Recognizing the first truth, which is the realm of solar splendor, he of strong will has chosen it for his glorification.
7. The fearsome bull bellows forcefully, sharpening his golden horns, wide-gazing.
   Soma sits down upon his well-made womb. His skin comes to be made of cattle; his garment of sheep.
8. Gleaming, purifying his spotless body, the tawny one has run down onto the sheep's back, pleasing to Mitra, Varuṇa, and Vāyu. The honey is made threefold by those who make it well.
9. Purify yourself as bull, Soma, to pursue the gods. Enter the heart of Indra, which is the receptacle of Soma.
   Ahead of oppression, carry us across difficulties, for he who knows the territory tells the directions to the one who asks.
10. Like a team spurred on, rush to the prize. O drop, purify yourself into the belly of Indra.
   Carry us across (difficulties) as if across a river with a boat, since you know how. Like a battling champion, rescue us from insult.

IX.71 (783) Soma Pavamāna

R̥ṣabha Vaiśvāmitra
9 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 9

The subject of this hymn is, as so often, Soma's journey across the filter to take his seat as ritual drink after the various stages of preparation. The journey is presented as a straightforward trajectory on the one hand, with his arrival among the gods and his union with the praise hymn the last step, in verse 8. But the hymn is also structured by a number of responsions between the earlier and the later verses; note especially 2b and 8a, with the almost identical phrases "the color that is his" and "this is his color." In this particular example the forward movement of the journey and the architectonic structure of responsions complement each other, for in verse 2 Soma sheds his original form and color and in verse 8 he gains new ones.

1. The tempestuous one is sent surging, along with the gift-cow, to take his seat here. Vigilant, he pursues deceits and protects from the demon.
   The tawny one makes himself a headdress, cloud and milk for an underlayer in the two cups, and the sacred formulation for his raiment.

2. Like a smiter of peoples, explosive he goes forth, roaring again and again. He spills down the lordly color that is his.
   He abandons his covering, and he goes to his rendezvous with his father. He makes what floats nearby [=milk] in its full measure into his fresh garment.
3. Pressed by the stones, he purifies himself between the two hands. With his cloud he acts the bull [/rains]; he trembles (in poetic inspiration) with his thought.
   He rejoices in, unites with, achieves success through the song. He washes himself in the waters. He sacrifices for himself in his fullness.
4. All around they sprinkle the heaven-ruling (son) of strength, of honey, grown strong upon the mountain, the conqueror of the secure house, in whom, on whose head, the cows prepare the foremost (milk) in their udder in broad (streams) for him who eats the good oblation [=Indra].
5. The ten sisters on the two hands have assembled him like a chariot, here in the lap of Aditi.
   As he goes, he extends toward the secret track of the cow which the thoughtful have produced for him.
6. Like a falcon to its womb [=nest], the god hastens to sit upon the golden seat made by insight.
   They let the dear one spill onto the ritual grass with a song. Like a horse (its stall), the one worthy of the sacrifice approaches the gods.
7. Far away is the ruddy poet of heaven, all adorned. The three-backed bull has bellowed to the cows.
   The marshal who has a thousand ways and means [=Soma] radiates, like the hoarse-voiced singer [=Agni], across the many dawns as they go away.
8. He makes for himself a glittering form—that is his color. When he has lain down in the clash (of the pressing stones), he wards off errors.
   Winning the waters, he drives by his own will to the divine folk. He joins with the lovely praise hymn, with what is tipped with cows.
9. Like a bull going around the herds, he has bellowed as he circles. He has put on the glitterings of the sun.
   The heavenly eagle looks down upon the earth. Soma surveys the creatures in accord with his purpose.

IX.72 (784) Soma Pavamāna

Harimanta Āṅgirasa
9 verses: jagatī

The role of humans in both the physical and the verbal preparation of Soma is emphasized in this hymn. The first verse sets this tone, with the anonymous priestly subjects of "they groom" of pāda a and the anonymous praisers who impel the soma in the second half, a division of labor found as well in verse 2; see also verses 4–6, 8. The exact responsion of the last parts of 4d and 5b seem to mark an omphalos, but there is little other evidence for such a structure.

The hymn contains one major problem: the hapax vinaṃgr̥sá in 3c. The phraseology in this pāda is strongly suggestive of erotic slang, but unfortunately the word has so far defeated all attempts to decode it. It is worth noting, however, that it is a partial anagram of the patronymic of the poet Harimanta Āṅgirasa, and he may be punning on his name in this playful, erotic context.

1. They groom the tawny one [/fallow bay]; like a chestnut he is yoked.
   Soma is anointed with milk-cows in the tub.
   When he raises his voice, the circle of friends of the one praised by many—however many they are—speed him on with their thought.
2. The many inspired thinkers speak all at once, when they have milked the soma into the belly of Indra, when the men of skilled hands groom him, the desirable honey, with the ten belonging to the same nest [=fingers].
3. Not stopping, he goes beyond (the filter) toward the cows, across the dear bellow of the Daughter of the Sun.
   According to his pleasure, the vinaṃgr̥sa [?] "stuck it" to him. He dwells together with the paired, kindred sisters [=fingers].
4. Rinsed by men, pressed by stones, the dear one on the ritual grass, the husband of the cows, from of old the drop that follows the ritual seasons,
   accompanied by Plenitude, assuring success to the sacrifice of Manu, gleaming, with insight he purifies himself for you, Indra.
5. Driven on by the two arms of men, pressed in a stream, following his own nature Soma purifies himself for you, Indra.
   He has fulfilled their intentions; he has won completely the thoughts at the ceremony. Like a bird sitting in the wood the tawny one has taken his seat in the two cups.
6. They milk the thundering, imperishable plant; the industrious inspired poets (milk) the poet.
   The cows and the thoughts in uninterrupted array, ever regenerating, go together to him in the womb, the seat of truth.
7. On the navel of earth is the buttress of great heaven. In the wave of the waters and within the rivers he is sprinkled.
   The mace of Indra, the bull possessing conspicuous goods, the invigorating soma purifies himself in a way dear to the heart.
8. Purify yourself all around the earthly realm, as you do your best for the man who praises and the man who rinses (you), you very resolute one.
   Don't deal us out of a portion of a good that will touch our dwellings: might we clothe ourselves in ample golden wealth.

9. (Bring) here for us, o drop, a hundred shares of horses, a thousand shares of flocks and gold.
   Measure out lofty, rich refreshments. Give study to our praise, self-purifying one.

IX.73 (785) Soma Pavamāna

Pavitra Āṅgirasa
9 verses: jagatī

A complex and enigmatic hymn, whose difficulties stem primarily from the double system of reference that pervades the hymn. The signature phrase is "they have sounded in unison" (sám asvaran, vss. 1, 4, 5, 6); in none of its occurrences is there an overt subject, an omission that is surely deliberate. The verb forms in question, and indeed most of the hymn, can be interpreted as referring either to the soma streams as they noisily cross the filter or to the priests/poets who provide the hymns that accompany soma's journey. This double reference is found even in the name of the poet to whom the hymn is attributed: Pavitra ("Filter"): the filter is both the sheep's wool filter that purifies the soma and the poet who creates the ritual speech; the word pavítra occurs several times in the hymn (vss. 3, 7, 8, 9, and implicitly 4). The "solution" to the central riddle of the hymn, this dual reference, is suggested in the first half of verse 7 and definitely expressed in the final verse (9), where "the thread of truth" (ṛtásya tántuḥ) is stretched both on the filter and on the tongue-tip. The thread may be both the track of the soma across the filter and the continuous line of speech. The second half of the verse emphasizes the importance of united action to attain it, and the necessity of always advancing.

Another thematic strain is the deployment of the power of this unified sound against enemies and hostile forces (see esp. vss. 5, 6, 8), a power associated with Varuṇa and his māyā́ ("magic power, artifice," vss. 5 and 9), with whom Soma is identified, first in verse 3. Varuṇa is of course the protector of commandments (vratá, vss. 3, 5, 8) and is associated with truth/true speech (ṛtá, vss. 1, 6, 8, 9), words prominent in the hymn. Thus, Soma, as the embodiment of Varuṇa, and the poets who assist him can marshal Varuṇa's weapon, "true speech," against forces that deny or attempt to thwart it.

Many individual puzzles remain, but the overall structure and purpose of the hymn are clear.

1. In the jaw (of the pressing stones) while the droplet was blowing its blast, they sounded in unison. The ties of lineage have joined together in the womb of truth.
   The lord [=Soma] has made his three heads to be seized. The boats of the trusty one [=Soma] have brought the good (ritual) performer across to the other shore.

2. Altogether joined together, the buffaloes have been propelled [/have propelled (him)]. The seekers have set (him/speech) atremble in the swell of the river.
   Giving birth to the chant with the streams of honey, they have made Indra's own dear body grow strong.
3. Provided with the filter, they take their seats around speech. Their ancient father guards his commandment.
   As great Varuṇa, (Soma) has hidden himself in the sea. Only the insightful have been able to take hold of his supports.
4. Down in that (filter) of a thousand streams, they have sounded in unison—as have the honey-tongued, inexhaustible (streams) in the vault of heaven.
   His fervent spies do not blink: at every step there are snares that bind.
5. Those who sounded in unison from the father and the mother [=Heaven and Earth], blazing with their verse, burning up those who follow no commandment, they blow away by magic power the black skin hated by Indra, from earth and from heaven—
6. Those who sounded in unison from their ancient edifice, those with a signaling call for their reins, counselors of the wild one [=Soma].
   The blind and deaf have retreated: evildoers do not traverse the path of truth.
7. Here in the wide-stretched filter of a thousand streams the poets of inspired thought purify their speech.
   The lively Rudras [=Maruts] without deceit are their spies, well directed, lovely to see, with their eyes on men.
8. The herdsman of truth is not to be tricked: his will is strong. He has set three filters within his heart.
   Knowing, he looks upon all living creatures. He jabs the disgusting deniers of commandments down into the pit.
9. The thread of truth is stretched widely, here on the filter and on the tip of the tongue, through the magic power of Varuṇa.
   Only the insightful, seeking to reach it together, have attained it. The one who does not advance will fall down into the pit here.

IX.74 (786) Soma Pavamāna

Kakṣīvant Dairghatamasa
9 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 8

This hymn is attributed to Kakṣīvant, the skilled and crafty poet of I.116–126, who names himself in verse 8. Although it is not as intricate as some of his Ist Maṇḍala productions, it invites the same sort of double readings as the previous hymn (IX.73) and achieves this ambiguity by the same means, the suppression of overt referential subjects and objects. It is notable that the word sóma appears only twice (and only toward the end, vss. 7 and 9) and derivatives of the root pū "purify" only in the final verse.

The primary doubled reference arises from the identification of soma with rain. Particularly in the central verses 4–6 the entities and actions described can apply to either or both; for example, the men "pissing down" the unnamed substance in 4d may either be the Maruts producing rain or the priests producing soma. Toward the end the discourse becomes more clearly somian, and these are the verses in which the words "soma" and "self-purifying" appear.

1. Like a new-born (calf), he has roared down into the wood(en vessel).
   When the ruddy racehorse strives to win the sun, he keeps company with the milk-strong semen of heaven. We implore him for extensive protection through his benevolence.
2. The (soma) plant, the prop and buttress of heaven, which, when well extended and fully filled, encompasses in every direction, that (plant) will offer sacrifice to these two great world-halves when they turn hither. The poet unites the united pair and the refreshing drinks.
3. A great delight is the well-prepared somian honey, and wide is the pasture-land of Aditi for him who goes to truth, who, as a dawn-red bull, is master of the rain from here, who is the leader of the waters, ageless and worthy of verses.
4. The embodied cloud is milked of ghee and milk. The navel of truth, the immortal (drink) is born.
   United, possessed of good drops, they please him. The swollen men piss down the one propelled.
5. The plant, keeping company with the wave, has roared. For Manu it swells the skin that seeks out the gods.
   It deposits the embryo in the lap of Aditi, the one by which we will acquire both progeny and prosperity.
6. Let there be inexhaustible (streams) down in the (filter) of a thousand streams, and in the third realm (streams) bringing offspring.
   The four hidden (streams), bursting down from heaven, dripping with ghee, carry the oblation, the immortal (drink).
7. He makes himself a white form when he is striving to win. Soma, benefactor and lord, knows the world.
   He keeps company with insight and (ritual) labor—that is the course (that leads) to him. He will split open the water-filled cask of heaven.
8. And the racehorse, having won, has stridden to the gleaming white tub anointed with cows, at the finish line.
   Those serving the gods propel him with their mind. (Let there be a hundred) cows for Kakṣīvant of a hundred winters.

9. Your juice, when you have been infused with the waters, runs through the sheep's fleece, o self-purifying one.
   Being groomed by the poets, become sweet for Indra to drink, o most exhilarating self-purifying one.

IX.75 (787) Soma Pavamāna

Kavi Bhārgava
5 verses: jagatī

Soma's deep, almost reflexive, involvement in verbal products and production is the subject of the first two verses of the hymn. He strengthens himself on his own names in verse 1, and in verse 2 is both the physical (tongue, speaker) and conceptual (father) source of truth and insight. In the second half of verse 2, in the sort of paradox much beloved by R̥gvedic seers, he not only knows the hidden names but as son bestows them on his parents.

The remaining three verses are more conventionally concerned with the preparation of the ritual soma, though his connection with cosmic entities remains clear, especially in verse 4.

This hymn and the four following (IX.75–70) are attributed to the same poet as the gāyatrī hymns IX.47–49.

1. Delighted, he purifies himself, (aiming) toward his own dear names, upon which the youthfully exuberant one grows strong.
   The lofty one, wide gazing, has mounted upon the chariot of the lofty sun that faces in many directions.
2. As the tongue of truth, he purifies himself as his own dear honey—he, the speaker and father of this insight, who cannot be deceived.
   The son sets a secret name on his two parents and a third in the luminous realm of heaven.
3. Flashing, he has roared down toward the tubs, being guided by men into the golden bucket.
   Those who produce the milk of truth have bellowed to him. Triple-backed, he rules [/shines] afar over the dawns.
4. Pressed with stones, delighted by our thoughts, making the two world-halves, his mothers, to shine forth, the blazing one races through the woolen hairs all at once, as a stream of honey swelling day after day.
5. Run forth all around, Soma, for our well-being. As you are being purified by men, dress yourself in the milk-mixture.
   With those exhilarating drinks of yours, luxuriant and expansive, stimulate Indra to give us bounty.

IX.76 (788) Soma Pavamāna

Kavi Bhārgava
5 verses: jagatī

This portrait of Soma militant resembles the martial spirit of another of Kavi Bhārgava's hymns, IX.47. The dense series of combative images also track Soma's journey through the purificatory procedure, and his warlike power is to be harnessed for our own ends in the final verse (5). But Soma is not merely a warrior; he is also a master of verbal art, who triumphs in poetic competitions (vs. 4). A short but very satisfying poem.

1. The supporter of heaven purifies himself, the sap that gets results, the skill of the gods to be celebrated by men.
   The tawny one sent surging, like a charger by warriors, deploys his full dimensions in the rivers at will.
2. Like a champion, he takes his weapons in his hands, a chariot-rider striving to win the sun in the cattle raids.
   Rousing Indra's tempestuous force, the drop propelled by the industrious ones [=fingers] is anointed [/driven] by those of inspired thought.
3. O Soma, purifying yourself in a wave, displaying your power, enter the belly of Indra.
   Swell the two worlds for us, as lightning does the rain clouds. As if according to our vision, mete out prizes to us over and over.
4. He purifies himself, the king of all who see the sun. Vanquishing the seers, he has made the vision of truth bellow.
   He who is groomed by the lance [=ray] of the sun is the father of thoughts, one whose poetic skill is entirely unattainable.
5. Like a bull around the herds, you charge around the cask, a bull roaring again and again in the lap of the waters.
   You purify yourself to be most invigorating for Indra, so that we who have your help will conquer in the clash.

IX.77 (789) Soma Pavamāna

Kavi Bhārgava
5 verses: jagatī

In addition to familiar tropes of soma-preparation (e.g., vss. 1, 3, 4), the hymn briefly treats the famous myth in which a falcon steals soma from heaven (vs. 2), with one of the few R̥gvedic mentions of the heavenly archer Kr̥śānu, who attempted retaliation. As noted, verse 4 for the most part is a standard soma verse, but pāda c skates fleetingly and unemphatically over an apparent paradox, with a male Soma conceiving himself as his own embryo. In the final verse Soma is compared to Varuṇa, because of his control over truth and deceit, and to Mitra, in his role as mediator among communities.

1. This honeyed one has cried out in the bucket, the mace of Indra, more wondrous than any wonder.
   The good milkers of truth, dripping with ghee, rush bellowing to him, like milk-cows with their milk.
2. The primordial one purifies himself—he whom the falcon, propelled across the airy realm, stole from heaven.
   Quivering, with a mind fearing Kr̥śānu the archer, it [=falcon] binds on the honey.
3. Let these drops, those ahead and those behind, run to a great prize of cows for us—those drops worth looking at, cherished like fertile cows, which take pleasure in every sacred formulation, every oblation.
4. This one here, knowing how, will win against those who seek to win—the drop praised by many with fully focused mind, who has conceived the embryo in the seat of the powerful one and rushes to the wide-open pen of cows.
5. The active, effective sap of heaven purifies himself as great Varuṇa, not to be deceived by one who goes astray.
   The one worthy of the sacrifice has been pressed as Mitra in the (ritual) enclosures [/communities], constantly whinnying like a charger acting the bull in the herd.

IX.78 (790) Soma Pavamāna

Kavi Bhārgava
5 verses: jagatī

A fairly straightforward hymn. The first three verses treat the preparation of the soma: after being swollen with water it is sent forth into the filter, which captures the plant detritus, on its way to the milk mixture (vs. 1); it goes across the filter and into the cup (vs. 2); and it is mixed with waters, here unusually personified as the nymph-like females, the Apsarases (vs. 3). The last two verses list the benefits that will accrue to us when the gods drink the soma.

1. The king, begetting speech, has flowed forth; clothing himself in the waters, he seeks to attain to the cows.
   The sheep grasps his defilement, (the stems) attached to his body. Cleansed, he travels to his rendezvous with the gods.

2. For Indra, o Soma, you are poured in circles by the men. As a wave drawing the gaze of men, as poet, you are driven to the wood [/anointed in the wood], for there are many courses for you to travel and a thousand fallow bay horses sitting in the cups.
3. The Apsarases belonging to the sea, sitting within, have streamed toward Soma of inspired thought.
   They spur him on, the conqueror of the secure house; they beg the imperishable self-purifying one for his grace.
4. Winning cows for us, winning chariots and gold, winning the sun and the waters, winning thousands, Soma purifies himself, whom the gods have made their exhilarating draught for drinking, the sweetest ruddy drop, who is joy itself.
5. O Soma, purifying yourself, you rush, seeking us, while making these treasures real.
   Smash the rival nearby and the one who is in the distance; make wide pasturage and fearlessness for us.

IX.79 (791) Soma Pavamāna

Kavi Bhārgava
5 verses: jagatī

The combative spirit of this hymn is reminiscent of that in other hymns attributed to Kavi Bhārgava, especially IX.47 and IX.76. The hymn is especially interesting because of the light it throws on social divisions in the R̥gvedic period. The word arí (vss. 1, 3), here translated "stranger" following Thieme (1938), is a much-discussed and much-contested one, underlying as it does derivatives such as ā́rya "Ārya." We are of the opinion that an arí is a member of the larger Ārya society, but not of one's immediate community. He is thus a stranger, but one with whom one in principle shares social values and to whom one owes certain reciprocal duties, such as hospitality. But as a stranger he may also pose a threat to the smaller community one belongs to, if he exhibits hostility rather than a communal spirit. The scenario sketched in this hymn involves the latter type of arí, whose hostility menaces the success of our sacrifice (vs. 1). Verse 3 is quite explicit about the affinity of the arí: he is "one of our own," while a person who does not belong to the larger Ārya society is called a "wolf," an outlaw, when his actions threaten us. The poet calls on Soma to destroy both types of enemies.

Verse 4 provides a brief interlude, outlining the cosmic dimensions of Soma—from heaven to earth, where his "fingers," the shoots of the plant, grow—and a few details of the preparation, vividly rendered. This verse cleverly incorporates four different body parts (navel, fingers, skin, and hands) each belonging to a different entity. The final verse summarizes the process of pressing and calls once more for Soma to display his feistiness on our behalf.

1. Without impulsion let our tawny drops run, forth to those dwelling in lofty heaven, when they are pressed.
   If hostilities will reach our refreshments, those of the stranger will go to destruction. Our insightful thoughts will prevail.
2. Let our drops run forth, those arousing exhilaration, or (those) with which we speed the chargers to the stakes, across the crookedness of any mortal. May we always bear away the stakes.
3. Now, in the case of the hostility of one of our own, (we proclaim:) "he, indeed, is a stranger!" And, in the case of the hostility belonging to the other (side), (we proclaim:) "he, indeed, is a wolf!"
   As if in a desert, thirst should strike them. O self-purifying Soma, smite those of evil intent.
4. It was in heaven, in its navel to which your highest (form) was bound; your "fingers" have grown on the back of the earth.
   The stones gnaw you on the skin of the cow. Those of inspired thought milk you in the waters with their hands.
5. In just this way, o drop, do those foremost ones, excelling in splendor, express your sap of good essence and good ornament.
   Self-purifying one, you will undermine every scorn(er). Let your tempestuous spirit, your dear exhilaration become manifest.

IX.80 (792) Soma Pavamāna

Vasu Bhāradvāja
5 verses: jagatī

On the one hand, this hymn is somewhat static, stuck at the same stage of soma's preparation, as the almost exact responsion of the last two verses (4–5) emphasizes. On the other hand, Soma's relationship with the gods, especially Indra, a relationship that figures in every verse, enlarges the conceptual frame of the hymn and keeps it from seeming airless.

1. It purifies itself—the stream of Soma, who has the gaze of men. With truth he summons the gods from heaven.
   With the roar of Bṛhaspati he has flashed forth. Like seas they [=the waters?] envelop the pressings.
2. You, o prizewinner, toward whom the cows have bellowed—brilliant, you mount the metal-hammered womb [=cup].
   Lengthening the lifetime of the bounteous ones and their great fame, o Soma, for Indra you purify yourself as bullish exhilaration.

3. The most exhilarating one purifies himself in the cheek of Indra, the one of good omen clothing himself in nourishment [=milk], for fame.
   He spreads himself out facing toward all creatures. Playful, the tawny bullish steed flows.
4. You, most honeyed, do the men milk for the gods; you of a thousand streams do the ten fingers milk.
   O Soma, roused by men, pressed by stones, by purifying yourself bring all the gods here, you winner of thousands.
5. You, honeyed, do those having hands milk with stones; you the bull do the ten fingers milk in the waters.
   Exhilarating Indra and the divine race, o Soma, purifying yourself, you rush like the wave of a river.

IX.81 (793) Soma Pavamāna

Vasu Bhāradvāja
5 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 5

Attributed to the same poet as the preceding hymn (IX.80), this hymn concerns itself even more strongly with Soma's connection with the gods, devoting the final two verses of a five-verse hymn to a litany of gods invited to the soma sacrifice. The preceding verse contains two occurrences of the word vásu "good (one)," which is also the name of the poet. Soma's task of mediating between the world of gods and men is treated in verse 2, anticipating the appeal for his help to the poet in verse 3 and the invitation to the gods in verses 4–5.

1. The bedizened waves of self-purifying soma go forth to the belly of Indra, when, ladled up with the curds, with the glorious (product) of the cows, the pressings have exhilarated the champion for giving.
2. For soma has flowed to the tubs. Like a steed that pulls (the chariot), the bull has a rapid course, and knowing of the double birth of gods (and men), he attains to what is from yonder and what from here.
3. O Soma, purifying yourself, scatter goods for us; o drop, become a bounteous (giver) of great largesse.
   Conferrer of vigor, do your best for the good one [/Vasu] with your kind attention. Do not pour away your property at a distance from us.
4. Let Pūṣan, self-purifying (Soma), Mitra, and Varuṇa come here in fellowship, bringing us lovely presents—and Bṛhaspati, the Maruts, Vāyu, the Aśvins, Tvaṣṭar, Savitar, and Sarasvatī, who is easy to guide.

5. Both Heaven and Earth who set all in motion, god Aryaman, Aditi, the Apportioner, Bhaga, Praise of Men, broad Midspace—all the gods—enjoy the self-purifying one.

IX.82 (794) Soma Pavamāna

Vasu Bhāradvāja
5 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 5

The first two verses of this hymn are conventional treatments of Soma's journey across the filter and his mixing with milk (here called ghee). Verse 3, however, is more cryptically phrased, and the name Soma is not mentioned. He appears as a buffalo with feathers and/or leaves, and his father is Parjanya ("thunder"): the image is of a plant produced by the rains. As often, his home is in the mountains, here identified as the navel of the earth. And the rinsing waters, the milk, and the pressing stones of the ritual preparation appear in the second half of the verse. Verse 4 is notable for its 1st-person singular speaker; the abrupt phrase "Listen: I am speaking to you" is reminiscent of the famous command given by the goddess Speech (Vāc) in X.125.4 "Listen to me, you who are listened to. It's a trustworthy thing I tell you." First-person singular speech is quite rare in Maṇḍala IX. The combination of a riddling middle verse and the poet's announcement of his own speech is reminiscent of omphalos hymns, though there is little other support for such a structure.

1. Soma has been pressed—the ruddy, tawny bull. Wondrous like a king, he has roared to the cows.
   While being purified, he circles around the sheep's fleece, to sit, like a falcon, on his ghee-filled womb.
2. As a poet with ritual expertise, you circle around the great (filter). Groomed like a steed, you rush to the prize.
   Warding off difficulties, o Soma, be merciful. Wearing ghee as your raiment, you drive around.
3. Parjanya is the father of the feathered [/leafy] buffalo. In the navel of the earth, on the mountains he has established his dwelling place.
   The sister waters have also flowed to the cows. He will unite with the stones when the ceremony is undertaken.
4. (Kindly) like a wife to her husband, you, kindly one, are generous of yourself. O embryo of the steadfast (earth?), listen: I am speaking to you:
   amid the choir I shall advance to good living. O Soma, irreproachable, be watchful in the ritual enclosure [/community].
5. Just as for the earlier ones you encompassed the prize as a winner of hundreds, of thousands, not shirking, o drop, so purify yourself for renewed good progress. The waters follow your commandment.

IX.83 (795) Soma Pavamāna

Pavitra Āṅgirasa
5 verses: jagatī

A well-known hymn, whose manifold difficulties are also well known. It in many ways resembles the famous Vena hymn, X.123, which also involves a mystical identification between Soma and the sun. The double meanings and enigmas are, as often, fostered by the suppression of overt reference. Crucial verbs lack expressed subjects, and unidentified asya "of him/it" substitutes for expressed possession (see 2b, 2c, 3c, 4a). The word sóma does not appear in the hymn at all, nor do his common epithets. The hymn has elicited many different and contradictory interpretations, to which we add our own.

Attributed to the same poet as IX.73, this hymn shares with that earlier one the mystical metaphor of the filter (pavítra), which is also the name of the poet. Indeed, the words "outstretched" and "filter," construed with each other in the last verse of IX.73 (vs. 9), open this hymn, and the two verses (73.9 and 83.1) both concern the qualities required to attain the filter and what it represents. In this hymn the necessary quality is being cooked, rather than raw; it is somewhat startling to encounter this whiff of Claude Lévi-Strauss very much avant la lettre. In this context "cooked" must refer in the first instance to the ritual preparation of soma. Although this preparation does not involve literal cooking, via application of heat, it clearly turns the raw material extracted from the natural plant into a cultural product, both through physical manipulation and through verbal accompaniment.

But the filter metaphor has a cosmic dimension, as is especially clear in verse 2, where it is compared to the sun with its rays spread across the sky like the tracks of the soma across the filter. The "cooking" of verse 1 provides a neat transition to the "hot one" of verse 2, heat being an obvious characteristic of the sun.

Verse 3 and the first half of verse 4 are quite enigmatic—not surprisingly, given their position in the middle of the hymn. Both the "dappled one" and the "ox" can refer both to the Sun and to Soma, each of whom is also associated with dawn, and the first half of the verse thus continues the Sun/Soma identification of verse 2. The second half of verse 3 appears to contain one of those paradoxes beloved of R̥gvedic bards. In our (very tentative) interpretation, the forefathers are the ancestral poet-sacrificers or their divine prototypes. They both "set" the embryo of Soma/Sun, that is, engendered it, and they were themselves made into poets by the magic power or artifice (māyā́) of the same Soma/Sun. In this way the Soma/Sun is both progenitor of the forefathers in their ritual role and, as they fulfill their ritual role, their child. The identity of the Gandharva in verse 4 is not entirely clear, but on the basis of parallels, especially in the Vena hymn mentioned above, it seems likely that it is again a double reference to Soma and the Sun, each guarding his track (or perhaps the track of the other), thus taking up the theme of the track found in verse 2.

With the second half of verse 4 we return to a much clearer ritual context and to the filter with which we began. The filter traps the impurities of the soma as the liquid passes over it, and the priests attain (a reprise of the verb found twice in vs. 1) the prepared soma. The final verse (5) returns to the 2nd-person address to the ritual Soma, last found in the first half of verse 1. But the Soma thus addressed has achieved a much-elevated status: he is proclaimed a king, outfitted with cosmic garments and traveling a cosmic course, with the filter, the focus of the hymn, as his chariot. The very last words of the hymn attribute to him "lofty fame."

The omphalos structure of the hymn is quite pronounced. The outermost verses (1ab, 5) are couched in the 2nd person and have a clear ritual content, with an inner ring (vss. 1cd/2ab, 4cd) serving as transition between the ritual context and the mystical identifications. There are a number of formal responsions that mark these rings, besides the 2nd versus 3rd person of verses 1 and 5: pavítram (1a, 2a) / pavítra(-ratha) (5c); páry eṣi (1b) / pári yāsi (5b); āśata (1d, 4d); padá- (2a, 4a). Enclosed within these rings are the mysterious and shifting identifications that make the hymn both aggravating and mesmerizing.

1. The filter is outstretched for you, o lord of the sacred formulation.
   Advancing, you circle around its limbs on all sides.
   A raw one, with unheated body, does not attain it [=filter]; only the cooked ones, driving along, have attained it entirely.
2. The filter of the hot one is outstretched to the track of heaven; its blazing threads have been extended.
   His swift (steeds) aid the Purifier. They mount the back of heaven in their manifestation.
3. The dappled one at the front has made the dawns shine. The ox, seeking the prize, bears the worlds.
   They were measured out [=created] as masters of artifice by his artifice;
   the forefathers having their gaze on men set the embryo.
4. The Gandharva guards his track just so; the infallible one protects the races of the gods.
   The lord of snares [=filter] grasps the defiler with his snare. Those who best perform (ritual) action have attained the draught of honey.
5. You possessor of the oblation, as an oblation yourself you drive around the great heavenly seat, around the ceremonial course, clothing yourself in cloud.
   As king, having the filter as your chariot, you have mounted the prize.
   Having a thousand spikes, you win lofty fame.

IX.84 (796) Soma Pavamāna

Prajāpati Vācya
5 verses: jagatī

Unlike the last hymn, this one concentrates on the preparation of the soma, and, although he has a cosmic dimension (see esp. vs. 2), it is always clear that Soma is the topic and the referent. The most interesting image is found in verse 2, where Soma "performs the knotting and unknotting." On the ritual level, this phrase probably refers to Soma's journey through the tangle of sheep's wool on the filter, but comparison with IX.97.18 suggests that it also has moral force, with Soma separating and distinguishing the straight way from the crooked one.

1. Purify yourself—exhilarating the gods, unbounded, winning the waters—for Indra, for Varuṇa, for Vāyu.
   Make for us today wide space accompanied by well-being. Sing to the heavenly people in the wide dwelling place.
2. He who has mounted the worlds, immortal Soma flows around them all.
   Performing the knotting and unknotting in order to prevail, the drop accompanies (the gods?), like the sun the dawn.
3. He who is sent surging along with the cows onto the plants, prospering in the benevolence of the gods, bringing goods near at hand, he purifies himself with lightning, pressed in a stream—Soma, exhilarating Indra and the heavenly people.
4. This very Soma is purifying himself, thousand-winning, spurring on the vigorous speech that awakens at dawn.
   The drop rouses up the sea with his winds; he sits in the heart of Indra in the tubs.
5. The cows mix this soma with milk, him who is strengthened by milk—with thoughts, him who finds the sun.
   Winning the stakes, getting results, the sap purifies himself—an inspired poet, a sage poet through his poetic skill, who delights in the sun.

IX.85 (797) Soma Pavamāna

Vena Bhārgava
12 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 11–12

The last two hymns of the jagatī group, IX.85–86, break the standard pattern of decreasing numbers of verses, having twelve and forty-eight verses respectively, after a group of hymns with five verses (IX.75–84). However, each of these longer hymns can be divided into a series of shorter ones, which then conform to the patterns of hymn arrangement. In the case of IX.85, it consists of three groups of four verses each. The entire assemblage is attributed to Vena Bhārgava, also the supposed poet of the enigmatic "Vena" hymn (X.123; see also a brief discussion under IX.83). As we will see, there are certainly striking similarities between the last quartet of IX.85 (vss. 9–12) and X.123.

The first quartet (vss. 1–4) begins with Soma the militant, keeping unworthy and hostile forces at bay and aiding Indra in the same enterprise (vss. 1–2). His relationship to Indra persists in verses 3–4, which show a more positive side of the militant Soma: his status as king (vs. 3) and winner of space for us (vs. 4).

The second section (vss. 5–8) is quite straightforward and focuses on the purification of the soma, deploying the standard tropes.

As noted the final four verses (9–12) strongly resemble the Vena hymn (X.123), but they are considerably easier to decode. They concern heavenly Soma, who is identified with the sun, but who also appears in a number of different guises: a bull, a poet, and a king (all in vs. 9), an ox (vs. 10), an eagle, a child, and a bird (vs. 11), and finally a Gandharva (vs. 12).

1. O Soma, when well pressed, flow around for Indra. Let affliction be gone, along with demonic power.
   Let the duplicitous not reach the exhilaration of your sap: let the wealth-bringing drops be here.
2. Spur us on in the clash, self-purifying one, for you are the skill of the gods, their dear exhilarating drink.
   Smash the rivals; (come) here to those seeking blessings. Drink the soma, Indra; smash down the scorners for us.
3. Undeceivable, you purify yourself as most exhilarating, o drop; you become the very self of Indra, the highest wellspring.
   Many men of inspired thought cry out to him; they seek out the king of this creation.
4. Having a thousand channels and a hundred streams, unerring, the drop, the desirable honey purifies itself for Indra.
   Winning a dwelling place, winning the waters, rush onward. Make a wide course for us, o Soma the rewarder.

5. Ever roaring, you are anointed [/driven] with cows in(to) the tub. You rush across the sheep's fleece all at once.
   Constantly being groomed like a winning steed, Soma, you have flowed entirely into the belly of Indra.
6. Purify yourself sweet for the heavenly breed, sweet for Indra whose name is lovely to call, sweet for Mitra, Varuṇa, Vāyu, Bṛhaspati—as the honeyed one not to be deceived.
7. The ten fingers groom the steed in the tub. The thoughts, the words of the inspired poets press forward.
   Purifying themselves, they rush to the lovely praise hymn. The exhilarating drops enter Indra.

8. Purifying yourself, rush to an abundance of heroes, to wide pasturage, to great, extensive shelter.
   Let no constricting pressure take control of this (soma) of ours. O drop, with you may we win prize after prize.

9. The wide-gazing bull has mounted heaven. The poet has caused the luminous realms of heaven to shine forth.
   The king goes ever bellowing across the filter. Those having the eyes of men milk for themselves the beestings of heaven.
10. In the vault of heaven the seekers milk honey-tongued, inexhaustible (streams) from the mountain-dwelling ox, the droplet growing strong in the waters, in the sea, the honeyed one in the wave of the river, in the filter.
11. The eagle that has flown to the vault—the many hymns of the trackers yearned after (him).
   The thoughts lick the child who always excites wonder, the golden bird standing on the earth.
12. The Gandharva has stood erect upon the vault, gazing upon all his forms.
   Radiance has flashed forth with blazing blaze; the blazing one has made the two world-halves, the mothers, shine forth.

IX.86 (798) Soma Pavamāna

Akr̥ṣṭās, the Māṣā seer-group (1–10); Siktatās, the Nivāvarī seer-group (11–20); Pr̥śnis, the Ajā seer-group (21–30); Atris (31–40); Atri Bhauma (41–45); Gr̥tsamada (46–48)
48 verses: jagatī, arranged in tr̥cas

As noted in the introduction to IX.85, this last hymn of the jagatī group, one of the longest in the R̥gveda, can actually be easily divided into smaller hymns, in this case into sixteen sets of tr̥cas, and can thus be made to conform to the patterns of hymn arrangement. The resulting triadic groupings do not at all match the divisions in the Anukramaṇī reproduced above. The degree of internal cohesion between tr̥cas varies considerably: some show no obvious signs of unity, while others (e.g., vss. 28–30) are stylistically unified. There is also some chaining across tr̥ca boundaries; for example, verse 4, which begins the second tr̥ca, is strictly parallel to verses 1 and 2 (especially the former). Such chaining is not an argument against the tr̥ca division, as perceived similarities between particular tr̥cas might have dictated the arrangement of originally separate hymns. The last tr̥ca (vss. 46–48), attributed to Gr̥tsamada, ends with the Gr̥tsamada clan refrain of Maṇḍala II.

That said, the impression this sprawling collection gives is of an agglomeration of soma-hymn clichés, many of which are repeated with little or no variation at irregular intervals throughout the "hymn."

1. Forth do your swift exhilarating drinks, sped by insights, rush, o self-purifying one, like the swift-born (birds) themselves.
   The heavenly, fine-feathered, honeyed drops, most exhilarating, take their seats around the cask.
2. Forth have your swift, exhilarating, invigorating drinks surged, like chariot-horses, each separately.
   As a milk-cow (goes) to her calf with milk, the drops, the honeyed waves (go) to Indra, possessor of the mace.
3. Like a steed being spurred, rush to the prize, to the cask of heaven, whose mother is the stone—you, the finder of the sun, the bullish Soma, being purified in the filter, on the sheep's back, for Indra's suckling.

4. Forth have your heavenly (hymns), sped by insight, destined for the Aśvins, surged with their milk into the support, o self-purifying one.
   Forth within (the support) have the seers sent their substantial (hymns) surging—those ritual experts who groom you, o you who win seers [?].
5. Your beacons circle around all the domains, though you are in advance—you ingenious one whose gaze is on all.
   Reaching through (the domains), you purify yourself, Soma, according to your ordinances. You rule as lord of all creation.
6. The rays, the beacons of the self-purifying one circle around on both sides, though he stays fixed.
   When the fallow bay is groomed in the filter, seated in his womb, he sits down in the tubs.

7. Beacon of the sacrifice, lovely at the ceremony, he purifies himself. Soma proceeds toward the rendezvous with the gods.
   Having a thousand streams, he rushes around the cask. The bull keeps bellowing as he goes across the filter.
8. The king plunges through the sea, the rivers. Fixed in the streams he accompanies the wave of waters.
   The self-purifying one has mounted upon the sheep's back, on the navel of the earth, as buttress of great heaven.
9. Thundering like the back of heaven he has roared, he according to whose ordinances both heaven and earth (abide).
   He purifies himself, always finding the fellowship of Indra. Soma, while being purified, sits in the tubs.

10. Light of the sacrifice, he purifies himself as its dear honey, the father, begetter of the gods, possessing conspicuous goods.
    He establishes a secret treasure in the two independent powers [=Heaven and Earth], as the most invigorating exhilarating Indrian sap.

11. Roaring toward the tub, the prize-seeker rushes, the lord of heaven with his hundred streams, wide-gazing.
    The fallow bay sits in the seats of Mitra, the bull constantly being groomed by the sheep, the streams.
12. At the forefront of the rivers, purifying himself he rushes; at the forefront of speech he goes foremost among the cows.
    At the forefront of the prize(-contest) he takes great stakes as his share. The bull of good weapons is purified by the pressers.

13. This one here, accompanied by thought, like a bird spurred on has run into the sheep's (fleece), purifying himself in a wave.
    By your resolve, o sage poet, by your insight, the clear Soma purifies himself between the two world-halves for you, o Indra.
14. Clothing himself in a mantle that touches heaven, the one worthy of the sacrifice, filling the midspace, is fitted into the worlds.
    While being born, he has stridden along the cloud toward the sun; he wishes to entice his age-old father here.
15. He extends his great shelter to the clan, when he has reached through his first domain.
    What is his footprint in the highest distant heaven—from that he proceeds toward all the (streams) in uninterrupted array.

16. Forth has the drop proceeded to the rendezvous with Indra: a comrade does not transgress against an agreement with his comrade.
    As a young blood rushes together with young women, so does Soma—into the tub, along a path with a hundred courses.
17. Forth have your insights stridden, arousing exhilaration, expressing admiration, inviting admiration in their joint dwellings.
    The inspired thoughts, the rhythms have roared to Soma; the milk-cows have mixed him with milk.
18. O Soma, o drop, purifying yourself, bring us continuous, swelling, unfailing refreshment by purifying yourself, (refreshment) that, never drying up, will milk out for us three times a day an abundance of good heroes, along with cattle, prizes, and honey.

19. The bull of the thoughts, wide gazing, purifies himself—Soma, the lengthener of day, of dawn, of heaven.
    Through the action of the rivers he has made the tubs bellow, entering the heart of Indra through (the action of) the inspired ones.
20. Through the inspired ones the primordial poet purifies himself; guided by men he has roared around the casks.
    Engendering the name of Trita, he flows as honey, to create the partnership of Indra and Vāyu.

21. This one here, being purified, has made the dawns shine widely; this one has become the maker of wide space for the rivers.
    This one, having milked thrice seven (cows) for his own milk-mixture—the exhilarating Soma purifies himself in a way dear to the heart.

22. Purify yourself, Soma, in the heavenly domains, surging into the tub, into the filter, o drop.
    Sitting in the belly of Indra, ever roaring, guided by the men, you have made the sun mount in heaven.
23. Pressed by the stones, you purify yourself in the filter, o drop, entering the belly of Indra.
    You have become one whose gaze is on men, wide-gazing one. Soma, you opened up the cowpen for the Aṅgirases.
24. You, o Soma, purifying yourself, do the very attentive poets applaud as they seek help.
    You did the fine-feathered (falcon) carry here from heaven, o drop, you who are adorned all over with all thoughts.

25. Seven milk-cows roar toward the tawny one being purified on the sheep's fleece in a wave all around.
    Into the lap of the waters, into the womb of truth have the Āyus, the buffaloes propelled the poet.
26. The drop being purified plunges beyond the scorners, making all paths good for the worshipful one.
    Making the cows into his raiment, the delightful poet, playful like a steed, rushes around the fleece.
27. Inexhaustible, possessing a hundred streams, excelling in beauty [/serving as mixture], they [=mixing waters] roar down to the tawny one as they provide water.
    The fingers groom him wreathed with cows, on the third back, in the luminous realm of heaven.

28. Yours are these offspring of the heavenly semen; you rule over all creation.
    And all this here is under your will, self-purifying one. You are the foremost founder of foundations, o drop.
29. You are the sea, o poet, the all-knowing [/-finding] one; yours are these five regions in your [/their] expansion.
    You have carried yourself beyond heaven and earth; yours are the lights, self-purifying one, and the sun.
30. You, o self-purifying Soma, are purified for the gods in the filter, in the expansion of space.
    You did the fire-priests first grasp; to you have all these worlds submitted themselves.

31. The husky-voiced one goes forth across the sheep's fleece; the tawny bull has roared down into the woods [/wooden vessels].
The hymnic visions, bellowing [/in their longing], have roared together. The thoughts lick the child who always excites wonder.
32. He has enveloped himself with the rays of the sun, stretching his own threefold thread, in the way that is known.
Leading the newer directives of truth, as a husband he proceeds to the rendezvous with his wives.
33. The king of rivers, the lord of heaven purifies himself. He proceeds along the paths of truth, ever roaring.
The tawny one is poured around with his thousand streams as he is being purified, begetting speech, bringing goods near at hand.

34. Purifying yourself as a great flood, brilliant like the sun, you run across the fleecy filters.
Hand-purified by the men, pressed by the stones, you dash for the great rich prize.
35. Self-purifying one, you rush toward refreshment and nourishment. Like a falcon in the woods, you sit in the tubs.
For Indra is pressed the exhilarative, exhilarating drink of exhilaration, the utmost prop of heaven, wide-gazing.
36. The seven sisters, as mothers, (go) to the newborn child of worthy birth, who is attentive to poetic inspiration, the heavenly Gandharva of the waters, whose gaze is on men—to Soma, for the regulation of all creation.

37. Showing mastery, you speed across these worlds here, o drop, having hitched up your golden fine-feathered (mares).
Let them stream honeyed ghee and milk for you. O Soma, let the separate peoples stay under your commandment.
38. You, Soma, are one whose gaze is on men on every side. Purifying yourself, bull, you run across these (worlds).
Purify yourself in a manner rich in goods and gold for us. May we be (fit) to live in the worlds.
39. Purify yourself, as finder of cattle, of goods, of gold. Depositing seed, o drop, you are fitted into the worlds.
You, Soma, are rich in good heroes, finder of all [/all-knowing]. These inspired poets here reverently approach you with a hymn.

40. The wave of honey has raised (our?) desires; clothing himself in waters, the buffalo plunges through them.
The king whose chariot is the filter has mounted the prize. He of a thousand spikes wins lofty fame.
41. He rouses all blessings, consisting of offspring and easy to bear, through our whole lifetime, day upon day.

Then, o drop, when drunk, on our behalf beg Indra for a sacred formulation bringing offspring and for wealth consisting of horses in the homestead.

42. At the vanguard of the days [=dawn] the tawny, delightful, exhilarating drink makes himself conspicuous with his appearance through the days.
Setting in place the two peoples [=gods and men], he speeds between them in upholding the "praise of men" and the heavenly (praise).

43. They anoint him—anoint him separately and jointly. They lick (him who is) resolve; they anoint him with honey—him, the ox flying in the burbling up of the river. (The waters,) who purify the gold (of soma), grasp the stock-animal within themselves.

44. Sing to the self-purifying one who is attentive to poetic inspiration. Like a great stream he rushes beyond his stalk; like a snake he slinks beyond his withered skin. Playful like a steed, the tawny bull has run.

45. Going in the vanguard, the king who is found in the waters displays his power, the measure(r) of the days, fitted into the worlds.
The ghee-backed fallow bay, a flood lovely to see, having light as his chariot, accustomed to wealth, purifies himself.

46. It has been sent surging—the prop of heaven, the exhilarating drink held aloft. It rushes threefold around the worlds.
The thoughts lick the plant that always excites wonder, when the versifiers have come to array it with a hymn.

47. Your streams go forth beyond the fine (hairs) of the ewe; as you are being purified, there go continuous charges.
When, o drop, you are anointed with cows in the two cups, being pressed you sit in the tubs, Soma.

48. Purify yourself, Soma, finding the will, to be hymned by us. Run around in the sheep's fleece as dear honey.
Smite all rapacious demons, o drop. – May we speak loftily at the ritual distribution, in possession of good heroes.

Triṣṭubh Hymns: 87–97

IX.87 (799) Soma Pavamāna

Uśanas Kāvya
9 verses: triṣṭubh

This hymn, attributed to Uśanas Kāvya (perhaps because of the mention of that figure in vs. 3), is built in part of standard soma-hymn tropes, but the militant

Soma is particularly on view (vss. 2, 7), as well as his association with Indra (vss. 4, 8, 9). There are also the faintest sketches of Soma's participation in well-known myths: the Vala myth (vs. 3cd, where Soma is credited with finding the cows), the falcon's stealing of soma from heaven (vs. 6c), and the dog Saramā's role in the recovery of the cows in the Vala myth (vs. 8ab).

This last example neatly shows the integration of ritual and mythic themes. The first half of the verse, which alludes to the myth, does not identify the grammatical subject by name or attribute, but does use a pronoun to mark it as female. This might seem to exclude Soma as the referent—until we reach the final word of the verse: dhā́rā "stream," a feminine noun regularly used of the "stream of soma," which does allow the identification. From the mythological point of view, the dog Saramā comes out of the mountain and finds the cows in the cave; in ritual terms the (feminine) stream of soma comes out of the pressing apparatus and mixes with the cows' milk in the vessel. And this superimposition of ritual upon myth allows Soma, indirectly, to be identified as the rescuer of the cows himself, as in verse 3.

1. Run forth around the cask; sit down; being purified by men, rush to the prize.
   Grooming you like a prizewinning horse, they lead you toward the ritual grass with reins.
2. He of good weapons, the god, the drop purifies himself, smiting malediction, protecting the community, the father, begetter of the gods, possessing good skill, prop of heaven, buttress of the earth.
3. Seer, inspired poet, going in front of the people, an insightful craftsman [/R̥bhu], Uśanā in poetic skill—only he found what of theirs was deposited, the secret, hidden name of the cows.
4. This very one, honeyed Soma, has flowed for you, Indra, a bull for a bull, around in the filter.
   Thousand-winning, hundred-winning, much-giving, the prizewinner has mounted the ritual grass ever and always.
5. These soma drinks have been sent surging toward bovine thousands, toward acclamations, for great immortal reward, being purified by the filters—like fame-seeking steeds driving to battle.
6. Because, much invoked of the peoples, he has flowed around all nourishments while being purified—now bring pleasurable things, you falcon-brought one; thrusting out wealth, rush to the prize.
7. This Soma being pressed, the steed like a surge sent surging, has run around in the filter, whetting his sharp horns like a buffalo, on a cow-hunt toward cows, like a champion warrior.

8. This one traveled from within the highest stone [=mountain]; she found the cows that were somewhere in the enclosure.
   Like lightning from heaven thundering with the clouds, the stream of soma purifies itself for you, Indra.
9. And now while being purified, Soma, you drive around a throng of cows in the same chariot with Indra, and around many lofty refreshments, you of lively drops. Do your best, able one. These (refreshments? verses?) are your invitatory praise.

IX.88 (800) Soma Pavamāna

Uśanas Kāvya
8 verses: triṣṭubh

This hymn is structured by a series of similes; only the first verse lacks an explicit simile. Many of the similes also involve identification of Soma with other divinities (see esp. vss. 3–5, 7), and so the powers and mythological deeds of these gods are implicitly attributed to Soma by way of these comparisons.

The two outer verses (1, 8) are complementary to each other. The first is addressed to Indra and announces the soma as distinctively his, while verse 8, emphasizing the 2nd-person pronoun as verse 1 did, declares that to Soma belong the distinctive qualities and attainments of the Ādityas.

1. This soma is pressed for you, Indra; for you it purifies itself.
   You—drink of it—
   the one that you have made your own, that you have chosen, the drop, the soma to be yoked for exhilaration.
2. It has been yoked, like a chariot that conquers much, as the great one to win many goods.
   Therefore, all creatures stemming from Nahus, standing upright beside the wood(en cup), roar at him at the winning of the sun.
3. You, who like Vāyu with his team maintain your desired course, who like the Nāsatyas are most availing at a summons, who like the Treasure-Giver in person bring all desirable things—like Pūṣan you give speed to insight, o Soma.
4. You, who like Indra are a doer of great deeds, are a stronghold-splitting smiter of obstacles, Soma.
   Because, like Pedu's (horse), (you are the smiter) of those with serpents' names, you are the smiter of every Dasyu, Soma.
5. He who, like Agni in the wood, is being set loose in the wood(en cup), he deploys his full dimensions in the rivers at will.
   Like people battling is the trampling of the great one. Self-purifying Soma raises a wave.

6. These soma juices have surged across the sheep's fleeces—they are like the heavenly buckets that hold the rain from clouds—toward the tubs at will when pressed, like rivers downward to the sea.
7. Tempestuous like the troop of Maruts, purify yourself, impervious to calumny like that heavenly clan.
   Quickly become benevolence for us, having a thousand ripples like the waters, like a sacrifice that conquers in battles.
8. The commandments of King Varuṇa are yours; yours is his lofty, deep domain, o Soma.
   You are blazing pure, like dear Mitra. You are besought for skill like Aryaman, o Soma.

IX.89 (801) Soma Pavamāna

Uśanas Kāvya
7 verses: triṣṭubh

The standard tropes of soma preparation, the swelling of Soma in water, his manipulation by the priests' fingers, his journey across the filter, and his mixing with milk, provide the subject of this hymn, but, as often, each of these depictions has a cosmic dimension—as in verses 1–2, where Soma is compared with heavenly rain.

1. This draft-horse has streamed forth along the paths. Like the rain from heaven, the self-purifying one has flowed.
   Having a thousand streams, he has taken his seat by us, in the lap of his mother, and in the wood: Soma.
2. The king of rivers has donned his garment. He has boarded the ship of truth, (which goes) the straightest.
   The drop, sped by the falcon, has grown strong in the waters. His father yields him as milk; he yields as milk the offspring of his father.
3. They [=waters or cows] draw near the unbridled lion of honey, the tawny, ruddy master of this heaven.
   The champion, first in battles, asks for the cows for himself. The young bull protects them all around with his gaze.
4. The honey-backed, terrible, unbridled horse—they yoke that towering one to the wide-wheeled chariot.
   His sisters, his kin, groom him. Those who share an umbilical bond nourish the prizewinner.
5. Set down within the same support, four, yielding ghee as their milk, accompany him.
   They rush, being purified with homage. They, the many, surround him on all sides.

6. (He is) the prop of heaven, the support of the earth, and all the dwelling places are in his hand.
   Your wellspring will provide (horse-)teams to the singer. The plant of honey purifies itself for Indrian power.
7. Vanquishing but unvanquished, o Soma, as Vṛtra-smasher purify yourself for Indra and to pursue the gods.
   Have mastery over great, much-glittering wealth. Might we be lords of an abundance of heroes.

IX.90 (802) Soma Pavamāna

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi
6 verses: triṣṭubh

Attributed to Vasiṣṭha, the poet of the VIIth Maṇḍala, this hymn ends (vs. 6d) with the Vasiṣṭha clan refrain, encountered constantly in VII. Martial images dominate, starting with verse 1 and showcased especially in verse 3 (see also 4cd and 5ab). The aim of war, to secure peace and prosperity, is depicted in the center of the hymn (vs. 4ab). Some of the divine beneficiaries of Soma's invigorating capability are listed in verse 5.

1. Being propelled, the begetter of the two worlds has driven forth like a chariot, striving to win the prize, going to Indra, sharpening his weapons, taking all goods in his hands.
2. Toward the three-backed bull, who imparts vitality, have the voices of the songs bellowed.
   Clothing himself in the woods, like Varuṇa in the rivers, the conferrer of treasures distributes desirable things.
3. Having a horde of champions, having hale heroes, purify yourself as victorious conqueror and winner of stakes, with your sharp weapons and snapping bows invincible in combats, vanquishing your rivals in battles.
4. Providing broad pastures, creating (places) without danger, by purifying yourself procure the two united forms of plenty [=Heaven and Earth].
   Striving to win the waters, also the dawns, the sun, and the cows, you have roared together great prizes for us.
5. Exhilarate Varuṇa, o Soma; exhilarate Mitra. Exhilarate Indra, o self-purifying drop, and Viṣṇu.
   Exhilarate the troop of Maruts; exhilarate the gods. Exhilarate great Indra, o drop, for his exhilaration.
6. In this way, like a king full of resolve, ever smiting all obstacles to progress with your onslaught, purify yourself.
   O drop, impart vitality to our speech. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

IX.91 (803) Soma Pavamāna

Kaśyapa Mārīca
6 verses: triṣṭubh

The first three verses of this hymn concentrate on the journey of the soma across the filter toward the mixing milk and toward Indra, but the militancy characteristic of the previous hymn (IX.90) asserts itself in verse 4. The final two verses (5–6) ask for bounties and blessings in return for our verbal and ritual service.

1. Billowing, he has been let loose as if at a chariot contest—the foremost inspired thinker with his insight.
   The ten sisters drive the draft-horse on the sheep's back toward the seats.
2. In pursuit of the heavenly race, the drop is being pressed on (it [=fleece]) by the poets, the sons of Nahus, the drop that is constantly being groomed (to go) forth by men—by mortals as the immortal—by the sheep, the cows, and the waters.
3. The bull roaring over and over to the bull [=Indra], the plant, purifying itself for him, moves toward the gleaming white milk of the cow.
   A versifier who knows speech, the sun travels widely across the fine (fleece) by a thousand unbesmirched paths.
4. Shatter even the entrenched seats of the demon. While being purified, o drop, uncover the prizes of victory.
   Hew down from above with your thrusting weapon the one who led here from afar those (enemies) who are (now) nearby.
5. As of old, make forward-facing paths for our newer hymn, o you who grant all wishes.
   Lofty (riches?), which are hard to capture by the covetous—might we attain them from you, o you who do many things and have many cattle.
6. Becoming purified in just this way, (grant) waters, the sun, and cattle to us, and ample progeny and posterity, luck, broad dominion, and lights to us, o Soma—grant that we may see the sun for a long time.

IX.92 (804) Soma Pavamāna

Kaśyapa Mārīca
6 verses: triṣṭubh

Like many hymns in the IXth Maṇḍala this hymn describes Soma's journey, but here the focus is on the endpoint, on Soma's reaching his goal and taking his seat in the vessels: the "seat" theme is found in three of the six verses (2, 3, 6). Soma is also a poet (vs. 2) and surrounded by poetry (vs. 3). It is this association with the kaví, the sage poet and master of words, that probably prompted the most striking statement in the hymn, that all the gods are "in your secret" (vs. 4). This statement comes in the middle of the hymn and may constitute a weak omphalos, especially as it is embedded in a series of verses that play with numbers (2–4), often a sign of an omphalos structure.

1. The tawny one, the plant, being pressed, is sent surging all around in the filter, like a chariot being urged on to win.
   He will achieve a signal-call meant for Indra as he is being purified. He has returned the favor to the gods through his pleasurable offerings.
2. His gaze on men, he has run here, acquiring the name "poet" in the filter, in his womb, taking his seat in the cups, like a Hotar on his seat. The seven inspired seers have approached him.
3. The very wise pathfinder who belongs to all the gods, Soma as he is being purified goes forth to his very own seat.
   He is one to take his rest amid all the poems. Steadfast, he arranges himself throughout the five peoples.
4. O self-purifying Soma, it is in your secret that all these gods are, the three times eleven.
   The ten (fingers) with their autonomous powers, the seven exuberant streams groom you upon the sheep's back.
5. Now, let this be true of the self-purifying one, this on which all the bards concur:
   that he made light for the day and wide space; he furthered Manu but made close quarters for the Dasyu.
6. Circling around, like a Hotar circling the seats provided with (sacrificial) animals, going to assemblies like a true king, Soma being purified has traveled to the tubs, taking his seat like a wild buffalo in the woods [/wooden cups].

IX.93 (805) Soma Pavamāna

Nodhas Gautama
5 verses: triṣṭubh

Attributed to Nodhas Gautama, the poet of I.58–64, this hymn ends with the clan refrain found in most of those Ist Maṇḍala hymns, although it does not display the virtuosity characteristic of those compositions. The first three verses concern the journey of the soma to the vessels and the mixing with water and with milk. The last two (4–5) are requests for bounties.

1. The ten sisters, grown strong all together, the insightful thoughts of the insightful one, the runners, groomed (him).
   The tawny offspring of the sun dashed around (the filter). He reached the wooden cup like a prizewinning steed.
2. Like a calf bellowing along with the mothers, the bull of many favors [/tail hairs] has run together with the waters.
   Like a young blood going to a maiden at the trysting place, he comes together with the ruddy (cows) in the tub.
3. And the udder of the inviolable cow has swelled forth; the drop of good wisdom is accompanied by streams.
   The cows prepare his head with their milk in the cups, as if with freshly washed goods.
4. O self-purifying drop, along with the gods excavate wealth in horses for us as you bellow.
   Let Plenitude come eagerly on her chariot in our direction, for the giving of goods.
5. Now, as you are being purified, mete out to us all-glittering wealth, abounding in superior men, befriended by the wind [/whose friendship is sought].
   The lifetime of the extoller has been extended, o drop. – Early in the morning—soon—he should come, bringing goods through his insight.

IX.94 (806) Soma Pavamāna

Kaṇva Ghaura
5 verses: triṣṭubh

The word sóma does not appear until the last pāda (5d) of this hymn, which plots a sometimes difficult course to this ending. The hymn features similes that exploit idiomatic ambiguity to produce different meanings in the simile proper and the frame (see esp. vss. 1 and 3) and by obscure turns of phrase (see esp. 4d). It is therefore not surprising that, as in IX.92, Soma is identified as a kaví, a poet, enmeshed in poetry (vs. 3), and the main focus of the hymn, especially in the first three verses, is the interchange between the poetic products of the mortal participants in ritual and those of Soma himself.

1. When the insightful thoughts contend over him, like adornments upon a prizewinner, like the clans over the sun, choosing the waters, he purifies himself, poetically crafting a thought like a stable for the raising of livestock,
2. Once again disclosing the domain of the immortal one. The worlds spread out for the finder of the sun.

The insightful thoughts, swelling like cows in good pasture, acting with truth, have bellowed to the drop,

3. When the poet encompasses (all) poems, as a champion chariot [/the chariot of the *Sun] (encircles) all the worlds, exerting himself among the gods for glory for the mortal, for his skill exerting himself anew for riches among (the gods) of much exertion.
4. Born for splendor, he has come forth from splendor; he establishes splendor and vitality for the singers.
   Clothed in splendor, they have gone to immortality. Their encounters come to pass beside the one of measured pace [=Agni].
5. Rush to refreshment and nourishment, to horse and cow. Make broad light; exhilarate the gods.
   Because all these things are easy to conquer for you, o self-purifying Soma, you repel the rivals.

IX.95 (807) Soma Pavamāna

Praskaṇva Kāṇva
5 verses: triṣṭubh

As in the preceding hymn, IX.94, the complementarity and interaction between Soma's poetic efforts and those of the ritualists provide the subject of this hymn. Soma's speech is the topic of the first two verses, culminating in 2cd in his revelation of the "hidden names of the gods" that will be proclaimed aloud on the ritual ground. But the verbal compositions of the mortals take center stage in verses 3–4. In the final verse (5), Soma both prompts the speech of others and (it seems) produces his own.

1. The tawny one keeps roaring as he is being set loose, as he is sitting in the belly of the wood, as he is being purified.
   Guided by men, he makes cows his raiment. Thereupon he generates poetic thoughts through his own powers.
2. The tawny one, having been set loose on the path of truth, directs his speech, like an oarsman his boat.
   The god reveals the hidden names of the gods to be proclaimed on the ritual grass.
3. Constantly overtaking each other like the waves of the waters, the inspired thoughts press forward to Soma.
   Doing homage, they come close to him and come together with him, and desirous they enter him, who is also desirous.
4. They milk him, constantly being groomed like a buffalo on the back (of the filter), the plant, the mountain-dwelling ox.
   The poetic thoughts accompany him as he bellows. Trita carries Varuṇa in the sea.

5. Inciting speech, as the Upavaktar incites the speech of the Hotar, while being purified, o drop, unleash the inspired thought.
Since (you) and Indra have the power for good fortune, might we be lords of an abundance of heroes.

IX.96 (808) Soma Pavamāna

Pratardana Daivodāsi
24 verses: triṣṭubh

This twenty-four-verse hymn, immediately following three five-verse hymns in the same meter, can easily be made to fit the sequence if it is analyzed as consisting of a collection of four-verse hymns, as Oldenberg clearly states (1888: 201). The six hymns thus obtained show different degrees of internal cohesion.

For example, the first four verses display clear thematic unity and development. The first verse is explicitly martial, with Soma as a warrior about to charge, a picture continued in the following verse. In verse 3 he achieves one of the most desired results of Vedic warfare, wide space for us to inhabit, and with this obtained, verse 4 articulates a counter-message, that of peace and nonviolence. Indra is explicitly mentioned in the first three verses, and comradeship is a central theme, as is seen in verses 1, 2, and 4.

The second hymn (vss. 5–8) shows stylistic progression. It begins with a rhetorically restricted verse (5), consisting primarily of seven repetitions of the word "begetter" with different genitive complements. The next verse (6) continues the dominantly nominal construction of vs. 5, but with a more varied verbal repertoire, though the nominative-genitive syntagm persists. Verse 7 continues to describe the qualities and characteristic actions of Soma, in the 3rd person, though it abandons the strict nominal style. And finally vs. 8 breaks out into the dynamic 2nd person and imperative mood.

The third group (vss. 9–12) ends with a characteristic hymn-final summary verse, which seems to mark a decisive break from what follows. Although no clear thematic unity imposes itself on the four verses, the focus on Soma's relationship with our ancestral ritualists and our hope that this relationship will continue fruitfully is noticeable, especially in the last two verses (11–12). On the other hand, it is difficult to identify any unifying features in the next group of four (vss. 13–16), which consist primarily of standard soma-hymn tropes. In verses 17–20 Soma as poet (esp. in vss. 17–18) and his journey from the filter to the cups provide a weak cohesion. In the final group (vss. 21–24), three verses (22–24) contain courtship imagery, and the root krand "roar" is prominent.

1. The army-leader, the champion, at the forefront of the chariots, goes forth seeking cattle. His army bristles with excitement.

Making the invocations of Indra beneficial for his comrades, Soma puts on his ravishing garments.

2. The tawny ones [=fingers] jointly groom his tawny (horse), without resting, with acts of reverence that spur on the horse.
   The comrade of Indra mounts the chariot; the knowing one drives with him to our good thought.
3. Purify yourself, o god, for the conclave of gods, for great delight, o Soma, as Indra's drink.
   Creating the waters and making this heaven rain, from the wide (realm) make wide space for us as you are being purified.
4. For freedom from overthrow and freedom from assault purify yourself, for well-being, for lofty wholeness.
   This do all these comrades desire; this do I desire, o self-purifying Soma.

5. Soma purifies himself—the begetter of poetic thoughts, begetter of heaven, begetter of earth, begetter of Agni, begetter of the sun, begetter of Indra, and begetter of Viṣṇu.
6. Formulator for the gods, trail-blazer for the sage poets, seer for the inspired poets, buffalo of the wild beasts, falcon of the birds of prey, axe of the trees—Soma goes rasping through the filter.
7. Like a river its wave, self-purifying Soma has sent the wave of speech pulsing forth, the hymns, the inspired thoughts.
   Looking within, he surmounts these communities here below, a bull among the cows, recognizing them.
8. Exhilarating, vanquishing in battles but unvanquished, thousand-spurting—rush to the prize.
   Purifying yourself for Indra, o drop, as inspired thinker raise a wave from the plant, driving the cows.

9. The dear Soma, sought by the gods, (goes) around in the tub, the enjoyable one for Indra's exhilaration.
   The drop of a thousand streams, a hundred prizes, goes like a prizewinning team to the concourses.
10. The primordial one, finding goods (even) while being born, being groomed in the waters, being milked on the stone, protecting from imprecations, the king of creation, he finds the way for the sacred formulation as he is being purified.
11. Because with you, self-purifying Soma, our insightful forefathers performed their (ritual) acts, open up the barriers, vanquishing but unvanquished; become a benefactor to us with heroes and with horses.

12. Even as you purified yourself for Manu, as conferrer of vitality, smiter of foes, finder of wide space, accompanied by oblations, just so purify yourself now, conferring wealth. Stand side-by-side by Indra. Generate weapons.

13. Purify yourself, Soma, rich in honey, following the truth, clothing yourself in waters, on the sheep's back.
Sit down in the cups full of ghee as the most elating, exhilarating drink for Indra.
14. Having a hundred streams, purify yourself into the rain from heaven—thousand-winning, seeking the prize in pursuit of the gods, bellowing along with the rivers in the tub, along with the ruddy (cows), prolonging our lifetime.
15. This very Soma, being purified by poetic thoughts, like a prizewinning steed just outstrips hostilities.
Like the milk milked out of Aditi, it is invigorating, broad like a way, like a draft-horse easy to control.
16. Having good weapons, being purified by the pressers, rush to the dear hidden name (of the cows? of Indra?), to the prize, like a team with desire for fame, to Vāyu, to the cows, o god Soma.

17. The colt just born, the delightful one they groom; the Maruts in a flock beautify the cart horse.
Though being a poet by virtue of his hymns, a poet by his poetry, Soma goes rasping across the filter.
18. Having the mind of a seer, a maker of seers, gaining the sun, having a thousand devices, trail-blazer for poets, a buffalo, seeking to gain the third domain, Soma, as rhythm [/the anuṣṭubh meter], regulates the virāj (meter) according to rule.
19. Sitting in the cups, the falcon, the bird spreading (his wings), the cow-finding drop, bearing weapons, accompanying the wave of the waters, the buffalo declares the sea to be the fourth domain.
20. Like a resplendent young blood grooming his own body, like a steed running to gain the stakes, charging around the cask like a bull around the herds, constantly roaring he has entered the two cups.

21. Purify yourself, o drop, as self-purifying one, with your mighty powers. Constantly roaring, rush around the fleeces.
Playing, enter the two cups while being purified. Let your exhilarating sap exhilarate Indra.
22. His lofty streams have been sent surging forth. Anointed with cows he has entered the tubs.

Making a melody [/performing the sāman], devoted to a melody [/the sāman], attentive to poetic inspiration, roaring he goes as if to a comrade's sister.

23. Smiting aside the rivals, self-purifying one, you go like a swain to his beloved, the drop besung.
Sitting in the woods like a flying bird, Soma, being purified, has settled in the tubs.

24. As you purify yourself, Soma, your beams come here like a maiden—the good milkers giving good streams.
The fallow bay granting many favors, led hither into the waters, has roared in the tub of those who seek the gods.

IX.97 (809) Soma Pavamāna

Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaruṇi 1–3, Indrapramati Vāsiṣṭha 4–6, Vr̥ṣagaṇa Vāsiṣṭha 7–9, Manyu Vāsiṣṭha 10–12, Upamanyu Vāsiṣṭha 13–15, Vyāghrapād Vāsiṣṭha 16–18, Śakti Vāsiṣṭha 19–21, Karṇaśrut Vāsiṣṭha 22–24, Mr̥ḷīka Vāsiṣṭha 25–27, Vasukra Vāsiṣṭha 28–30, Parāśara Śāktya 31–44, Kutsa Āṅgirasa 45–58
58 verses: triṣṭubh, arranged in tr̥cas

This is the longest hymn in the R̥gveda, consisting of fifty-eight verses, arranged in three-verse units. It is also the last IXth Maṇḍala hymn in triṣṭubh. Despite its extraordinary length, it can be analyzed as consisting of a series of originally independent tr̥cas combined into one, and it therefore conforms to the prevailing principles of arrangement in the Saṃhitā. In the first half (vss. 1–30) each tr̥ca is attributed to Vasiṣṭha or to a different Vasiṣṭhid; the second half is divided between two, non-Vasiṣṭhid, poets. If we assume that the tr̥ca division continues in this second half (as most scholars do), the Anukramaṇī ascription does not conform to the tr̥ca division, as the first two verses of the tr̥ca of verses 43–45 are credited to Parāśara Śāktya and the last one to Kutsa Āṅgirasa. There is also an extra verse, most probably the final one (58), which contains the Kutsa refrain of Maṇḍala I (I.94.16cd, etc.). Although according to the Anukramaṇī each of these poets is responsible for fourteen verses, there is no more apparent unity in these larger stretches than in the individual tr̥cas of the first half.

As is often the case in such long, composite hymns, the tr̥cas exhibit varying degrees of cohesiveness, from the tight and emphatic verbal repetitions of verses 49–51 to the diffuseness of groupings like verses 7–9, 40–42. Some of the tr̥cas, though not thematically or verbally unified, have a third verse that marks it as final; for instance, the first two tr̥cas (vss. 1–3, 4–6) each end with the Vasiṣṭha clan refrain as the last pāda, and the final verse of three tr̥cas begins with a summary evā́ "thus" (vss. 13–15, 19–21, 25–27), a word characteristic of final verses.

As might be expected, the contents of this hymn are also extremely various, but generally exhibit the standard tropes of soma hymns: the mechanisms of soma preparation, including the journey across the filter and the mixing with waters and with milk; the power of soma to incite the gods, especially Indra, and the power of the ritualists and, especially, the poets, to strengthen the soma for this task; and the rewards the ritualists will receive from properly preparing the soma. Nonetheless, the hymn contains a number of striking similes and metaphors, and some passages of great difficulty, chief among which is the tr̥ca of verses 52–54, which may (or may not) be a dānastuti and whose translation here is provisional in places. Note also verse 38, which in our interpretation contains an archaic formula denoting an archaic figure, the "Placer of the Sun" (see Jamison 2010).

1. Being purified by his impulsion, his drive, the god has intermingled his sap with the gods.
   Pressed, he goes rasping around the filter like the Hotar around the fixed seats provided with (sacrificial) animals.
2. Wearing auspicious festival garments, as a great poet pronouncing enigmas, coil yourself into the two cups while being purified, wide-gazing and watchful in the pursuit of the gods.
3. The dear one is groomed on the sheep's back, the more glorious of the glorious ones, a fellow countryman at our side.
   Cry out, run, as you are being purified. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

4. Sing forth: let us recite to the gods. Impel Soma for great stakes.
   The sweet one will purify himself across the sheep's fleece. He will sit in the tub, seeking the gods for us.
5. The drop, coming here to fellowship with the gods, purifies himself in a thousand streams for exhilaration.
   Being praised by men, he has gone along his earlier domain, to Indra for great good portion.
6. As a fallow bay, rush for wealth for the praiser as you are being purified. Let your exhilarating drink go to Indra for the taking.
   Drive on the same chariot with the gods to bounty. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

7. Speaking forth his poetry like Uśanā, the god proclaims the races of the gods.
   Of great commandment, of blazing lineage, pure, as a boar he goes rasping toward his tracks.
8. The geese have journeyed forth to (Soma's) sharp battle-fury, from nearby to their home, in a bullish flock.
   The comrades speak in unison to the self-purifying one a songful music difficult to forget.

9. He hastens at the pace of the wide-ranging one [=Viṣṇu?]. The cows, as they seem to bellow, give their measure to the one who plays at will [=Soma].
   The sharp-horned one makes himself an ample (face). By day he appears tawny, but silvery by night.

10. The prizewinning drop purifies himself, bringing cows down in flood—Soma stimulating the power in Indra, for exhilaration.
    He smashes demonic force; he deflects hostilities, making wide space as king of the community.
11. Then being infused with honey in a stream, he purifies himself across the fleece, when he has been milked by the stone, the drop enjoying the fellowship of Indra, the god, the exhilarating drink of the god, for exhilaration.
12. He purifies himself toward his own dear (tracks?), while being purified, the god infusing the gods with his own sap.
    The drop, clothing himself in his foundations according to the ritual order, has enwrapped himself in the ten fingers on the back of the sheep.

13. The ruddy bull keeps roaring at the cows; bellowing he goes to heaven and earth.
    His voice, like Indra's, is heard at the contest. He rushes, making this speech perceptible here.
14. Good to taste, swelling with milk, you go, setting in motion the honeyed plant.
    Purifying yourself, you go, producing thunder, while being poured around for Indra, o Soma.
15. Purify yourself thus, an exhilarating one for exhilaration, bowing with your weapons (those) of the water-grasper.
    Encompassing the glistening color, seeking cows, rush to us, when you are poured around, o Soma.

16. Having taken pleasure, o drop, (making) easy pathways easy to travel for us, purify yourself on a broad (path), making us wide spaces.
    Smashing asunder obstacles to progress as if with a deadly weapon, run along the back, on the sheep's back.
17. Stream rain to us—heavenly, hurrying, bringing refreshment, luck for the livestock, of lively drops.
    Run, pulling apart [=discriminating] these bonds here below, these webs, like straightened curls, o drop.
18. Untie like a knot the straight and the crooked way that are knotted up, when you are being purified, o Soma.
    Like a fallow bay steed you whinny on being let loose; run, o god, as a man in his prime in possession of a dwelling place.

19. Delightful, for the divine conclave for exhilaration, run around the back, on the sheep's back.
    Possessing a thousand streams, sweet-smelling, not to be outwitted, flow around at the winning of prizes, at the victory over superior men.
20. Though without reins, without chariot, not yoked, having been let loose like steeds in a contest, these gleaming soma-drinks run. O gods, drive right up to them, to drink them.
21. Thus, o drop, flow around the cloud, the flood in the cups, toward our pursuit of the gods.
    Let Soma give to us desirable, lofty wealth, powerful and abounding in heroes.

22. When the speech from the mind of the seeker fashioned him [=Soma] on the foundation of the preeminent one [=Agni or Indra?] or face-to-face with the cattle, thereupon the cows came to him at will, bellowing—to the delightful husband, the drop, in the tub.
23. The divine giver of drops, sweller of drops, (goes) forth. As truth, he purifies himself for truth, the very wise one.
    Possessing the (royal) mandate, he has become the king of what belongs to the community. He has been brought forward to the earth by the ten reins.
24. Purifying himself with the filters, having his gaze on men, as the king of gods and mortals he has become once again the wealth-lord of wealth; the drop bears the pleasing truth that is easy to bear.

25. Like a steed rushing to a win for the sake of fame, rush to the pursuit of Indra and Vāyu.
    Give us a thousand lofty refreshments; become a finder of chattels while you are being purified, o Soma.
26. Pursuing the gods while being poured around, let the soma drinks run to a dwelling place rich in good heroes, bringing favor here through sacrifice, possessing all desirable things, sacrificing at day(break) like Hotars, most gladdening.
27. Thus, o god Soma, purify yourself for the conclave of gods, for their great delight, as the gods' drink, for we are greatly driven at the encounter. Make the two world-halves of good standing while you are being purified.

28. Like a horse you whinny on being yoked by the bulls, fearsome like a lion, swifter than mind.

Along paths turned hitherwards—those which are the straightest—bring benevolence here to us by purifying yourself, o drop.

29. A hundred god-generated streams have been sent surging; these thousand the poets groom.
O drop, by purifying yourself bring here from heaven a means of winning. You are the leader of great spoils.
30. Like surges from heaven, (like those) of days, his surges have surged. Like a king, the wise one does not violate his alliance.
Being put in your place according to our intentions, like a son according to the intentions of his father, bring freedom from overthrow here to this clan by purifying yourself.

31. Your honeyed streams have surged forth, when, purified, you go across the sheep's fleece.
Self-purifying one, purify yourself as the domain for the cows. On being born, you swelled the sun with rays [/chants].
32. Ever roaring along the path of truth, gleaming you radiate across the domain of the immortal one [=sun?].
Providing the means for exhilaration, you purify yourself for Indra, spurring on your own speech with the thoughts of the poets.
33. As heavenly eagle, o Soma, gaze down, swelling the streams with (ritual) action in the pursuit of the gods.
O drop, enter the tub for holding the soma. Roaring, come right up to the ray of the sun.

34. The draft-horse rouses forth the three voices, the hymnic vision of truth, the inspired thought of the sacred formulation.
The cows go asking for a cowherd; the thoughts go bellowing eagerly to Soma.
35. To Soma (go) the milk-cows bellowing eagerly; to Soma the inspired poets asking for him with their thoughts.
Soma, pressed, is purified while being anointed [/driven]; to Soma the chants, the triṣṭubh verses cry out together.
36. Thus, o Soma, being poured around, being purified, bring well-being here to us through your purification.
Enter Indra with a lofty shout; strengthen speech, beget plenitude.

37. In accordance with truth, the wakeful inspired poet of the thoughts, Soma, being purified, has sat down in the cups, he whom they serve, eager in rivalry—the Adhvaryus of good hands, the charioteers (of the sacrifice).
38. He, being purified close by, like the Placer of the Sun has filled both world-halves, and he has disclosed them.
He with whose help the winners of dear things (win) dear things, he will extend spoils as if to a victor.

39. The strengthening strengthener, being purified, Soma the rewarder, helped us with his light, with which our forefathers, knowing the track, finding the sun, burned the cows out of the rock.

40. As the sea he has roared at his first expansion, begetting the creatures as king of creation.
   The bull in the filter, on the sheep's back, Soma has grown loftily, the drop being pressed.
41. Soma the buffalo performed this great (deed), that [/when] as embryo of the waters he chose the gods.
   Purifying himself, he placed strength in Indra. The drop begat the light in the sun.
42. Exhilarate Vāyu for his quest and for our benefit; exhilarate Mitra and Varuṇa, while you are being purified.
   Exhilarate the Marutian troop; exhilarate the gods; exhilarate Heaven and Earth, o god Soma.

43. Purify yourself, as the straight smiter of the crooked, thrusting away affliction and insults, perfecting your milk with the milk of cows. You are (the comrade) of Indra; we are your comrades.
44. Purify yourself into the sweetness of honey, into a wellspring of goods; by purifying yourself bring here to us a hero and a portion.
   Sweeten yourself for Indra as you purify yourself, o drop, and by purifying yourself bring here to us wealth from the sea.
45. Soma, pressed in a stream, driving like a steed, has streamed like a river to the deep, as prizewinner.
   He has sat in the wooden womb while being purified. The drop has flowed together with the cows, with the waters.

46. This very Soma purifies himself for you, o Indra, in the cups, insightful and powerful for you who desire it—the charioteer having the eye of the sun, whose impetuosity is real, who has been sent surging like the desire of those who seek the gods.
47. He, being purified with age-old vitality, hiding himself in the forms of the daughter (of the Sun [=Dawn]) [=milk], in the waters clothing himself in shelter providing threefold defense, rasping like a Hotar he drives to the concourses.
48. Now, you, o god Soma, as charioteer—flow around for us in the two cups, while being purified, sweetest in the waters, honeyed, truthful, you whose thoughts become reality, like god Savitar's.

49. Rush toward Vāyu in pursuit while being hymned, toward Mitra and Varuṇa while being purified, toward the superior man who quickens insightful thought and bestrides the chariot, toward Indra the bull with the mace in his arms.

50. Rush toward your garments that garb well, toward the good-milking cows, while being purified, toward glittering golden goods, to bring them to us, and toward chariot horses, o god Soma.
51. Rush toward heavenly goods for us, toward all earthly goods, while being purified, toward that by which we shall win property, (that is,) toward a seer's (portion) for us like that of Jamadagni.

52. By purifying yourself with this purification bring goods here in this way. O drop, at (the time of) the hiding of the moon [=early morning] run forth into the lake.
The copper-colored (Sun/Fire), sped like the wind, is also there. The very wise one [=Soma?] also gives (to us) the superior man [=Indra?] to make the charge.
53. And with this purification purify yourself for us at the famous ford of the (prize/wealth) worthy of fame [=place of distribution of dakṣiṇās?].
The challengers' challenger [=Indra?] will shake off sixty thousand goods like ripe (fruit) from a tree, for our joy.
54. Of him—"Bull" his name—there are these two great forceful weapons of death either at the hiding of the moon or at the caressing [=mixing soma with milk]:
he put the challengers to sleep and "snowed" them. Turn back from here those without alliance (with us), back those without perception.

55. You converge on the three filters stretched out, but you run along just one while you are being purified.
You are Bhaga, you are the giver of the gift; you are bounteous to the bounteous ones, o drop.
56. This one, knowing all, possessing inspired thoughts, purifies himself—Soma, the king of all creation.
Rousing the droplets at the rites, the drop proceeds over and across the sheep's fleece all at once.
57. The undeceivable buffaloes lick the drop. On his track the poets squawk like birds of prey.
The insightful ones impel him with their ten fingers. They jointly anoint his form with the sap of the waters.

58. With you who purify yourself, o Soma, we would pull out the perfect ("hand" of dice) at the match, time after time.
– This let Mitra and Varuṇa grant this to us, and Aditi, River, and Earth and Heaven.

Anuṣṭubh Hymns: 98–101

IX.98 (810) Soma Pavamāna

Ambarīṣa Vārṣāgira and R̥jiśvan Bhāradvāja
12 verses: anuṣṭubh, except br̥hatī 11

The themes that dominate this hymn are standard soma tropes. The normal stages in the preparation of the soma are treated (see esp. vss. 2–3, 6–10), and the poet regularly reminds Soma of the gifts he should bring to his mortal preparers (see esp. vss. 1, 4–5, 12). Indeed the hymn begins and ends with an appeal for vā́ja "prizes" (vss. 1a, 12cd), in a sort of ring composition.

However, although the sentiments expressed and descriptions provided are unremarkable, the hymn is characterized by very choppy and sometimes incoherent syntax (which for purposes of translation has been cleaned up somewhat). Since there are also metrical disturbances in the hymn, one wonders if it has been transmitted entirely correctly.

1. O drop, stream to us the wealth coveted by many that best wins the prize, bringing a thousand presents, powerfully brilliant, vanquishing (even) the distinguished.
2. This one, being pressed, has engirded himself in the sheep's fleece, as a man on a chariot does in armor.
   The drop, impelled by the wooden (paddle), has flowed in streams while being impelled.
3. This drop, being pressed, has flowed around in the sheep's fleece, aroused to exhilaration, the one who, erect at the ceremony, goes seeking cows with his stream, like (Agni) with his flame.
4. Because you, o god, are goods for each and every pious mortal, o drop, you seek to win wealth in thousands, which has a hundred embodiments.
5. May we be (most nearest) to these goods of yours, coveted by many, o good one, Vr̥tra-smasher, most nearest to your refreshment and favor, o you who are not poor.
6. The self-glorious one, smashed by stones, whom the twice five sisters bathe—the one dear and desirable to Indra, full of waves, 7. This delightful tawny brown one they purify all around with the fleece, him who circles around all the gods together with his exhilarating drink.
8. For with his help (the gods) are drinking (the exhilarating drink) that brings skill to realization, the delightful one who has placed lofty fame among your [=poets'] patrons, like the sun (in heaven).

9. The drop has been born of you two at the sacrifices—o you two world-halves [=jaws of soma press?], goddesses who (yet) belong to mankind—the mountain-abiding god. Unfailingly, very noisily (I praise?) him.

10. O Soma, you are poured around for Indra, the Vr̥tra-smiter, to drink, and for the superior man who gives priestly gifts, and for the god sitting on the seat.

11. The age-old soma drinks have flowed into the filter at the break of dawn, snorting away into the distance those who know the crooked ways and those without discernment, early in the morning.

12. O comrades, might we and you, our patrons, attain him who shines in front, whose prizes are to be secured. Might we gain him who offers a house full of prizes.

IX.99 (811) Soma Pavamāna

Two sons of Rebha, the Kāśyapas
8 verses: anuṣṭubh, except br̥hatī 1

The varieties of thought and its poetic expressions are the focus of this hymn, especially in its earlier verses (1–2, 4–5), and Soma's mental and verbal powers complement those of his mortal worshipers (vs. 6). The physical preparation of soma is not neglected, however (esp. vss. 3, 7–8).

1. For the delightful daring one they draw the bow, the manly power.
Those seeking the great one weave a glowing garment for their lord at the forefront of the inspired words.

2. And prepared by night, he plunges toward the prizes, when the insightful thoughts of Vivasvant impel him, the tawny one, to drive.

3. We groom this one of his [=Vivasvant?], the one who is exhilaration, Indra's best drink, whom the cows have previously sucked with their mouths and now the patrons do.

4. They have cried out to him with an ancient song, while he is being purified.
And the insightful thoughts yearn for him, those bearing the names of the gods.

5. They purify him on the sheep's fleece, while the steadfast one grows strong.
Those of inspired thought hope for him to be like a messenger, (for them) to be first in his thought.

6. Becoming purified, the most exhilarating Soma sits in the cups, depositing his seed (in them) as if in livestock. The lord of insight displays his eloquence.
7. He is groomed by those who work well [=fingers], the god pressed for the gods.
As his complete attachment to them [=waters] is known, he plunges through the great waters.
8. O drop, pressed and held by men, you are led through into the filter.
As the one most exhilarating for Indra, you sit down here in the cups.

IX.100 (812) Soma Pavamāna

Two sons of Rebha, the Kāśyapas
9 verses: anuṣṭubh

As Oldenberg suggests (1888: 128–29), in order to conform to the principles of arrangement, this hymn must have originally consisted of two separate hymns, of five and four verses respectively. This division, made solely on numerical grounds, is confirmed by the structure of the hymn, for the final four verses repeat or ring changes on the first five. Verse 6, the first of the original second hymn, is structurally, and in part verbally, identical to the final verse of the original first hymn (5), but also incorporates, in variant form, verse 4d. Verse 7 repeats much of verse 1 in different order. Verse 8 deviates more from its model, verse 2, but reproduces verse 2d verbatim as verse 8d. Verse 9 is the most distant from its model, verse 3, but contains the "heaven and earth" found in the "earthly and heavenly goods" of 3cd. Once again we see the ways in which the R̥gvedic poet uses formulaic language and poetic templates for his own purposes.

1. Those without deceit cry out to him, dear and desirable to Indra.
The mothers lick him like a calf in its first stage of life, just born.
2. While being purified, o Soma drop, bring here doubly lofty wealth.
You foster all goods in the house of the pious man.
3. Set loose the insightful thought yoked with mind, as thunder does rain.
You foster earthly and heavenly goods, o Soma.
4. Your stream, when you are pressed, runs in a circle like (the horse) of a victor, speeding through the sheep's fleece like a winner bringing prizes.
5. For our will and skill, o poet, purify yourself in a stream, Soma, pressed for Indra to drink, for Mitra and Varuṇa.

6. Purify yourself as best winner of prizes in the filter, pressed in a stream, most honeyed for Indra and Viṣṇu, for the gods, Soma.

7. The mothers, those without deceit, lick you, the tawny one, in the filter, as milk-cows do a new-born calf, o self-purifying one, at your expansion.
8. O self-purifying one, you drive to great fame with your brilliant rays.
   Vaunting yourself, you keep smashing away all the dark shades in the house of the pious man.
9. O you of great commandment, you have carried yourself beyond heaven and earth.
   You have fastened on your mantle in your greatness, self-purifying one.

IX.101 (813) Soma Pavamāna

Andhīgu Śyāvāśvi (1–3), Yayāti Nāhuṣa (4–6), Nahuṣa Mānava (7–9), Manu Sāṃvaraṇa (10–12), Prajāpati (13–16)
16 verses: anuṣṭubh, except gāyatrī 2–3, arranged in tr̥cas

In order to conform to the pattern of arrangement, this last hymn in the anuṣṭubh group must actually have consisted originally of five three-verse hymns, with a single verse (16) appended, as was already pointed out by Oldenberg (1888: 201). There is, however, some interconnection among the tr̥cas that points to a sense of cohesion. In particular, the first and last tr̥cas (vss. 1–3 and 13–15) are linked by the striking image in their first verses (1, 13) of a sacrifice-defiling dog drawn to the sound of the soma being pressed, a dog that must be driven away. Verse 13 also contains a brief and enigmatic allusion to a myth also enigmatically mentioned to in X.171.2.

Most of the rest of the hymn contains standard material: the details of preparation of the drink and its journey across the filter to mix with the milk, as well as its relationship to the gods, especially Indra. There is some internal unity visible in the individual tr̥cas, but it is not pronounced.

1. With your advance victory over the stalk, for the pressed soma to cause exhilaration, pierce away the dog that has the long tongue, o comrades.
2. What flows forth and around in a pure stream, the pressed drop, like a horse that gets results,
3. That one, the soma, poor at burning [?], do the superior men, with their insight aimed toward all, impel to the sacrifice with stones.

4. The most honeyed pressed soma drinks, exhilarating to Indra, provided with filters, have flowed. Let your exhilarating drinks go to the gods.
5. "The drop purifies himself for Indra," so the gods said.
   The lord of speech does battle [/seeks bounties], holding sway over all with his strength.

6. Possessing a thousand streams he purifies himself, a sea setting speech aswing, Soma, lord of riches, comrade of Indra, day after day.

7. This one here is Pūṣan, Wealth, Fortune; Soma rushes as he is being purified.
As lord of all creation, he has surveyed both world-halves.
8. Together the dear ones have cried out to him, the cows avid for exhilaration.
The soma drinks make their own paths, the self-purifying drops.
9. The one who is strongest [=Indra], bring him here, o self-purifying one, the one worthy of fame, who sur(mounts) the five domains, with whom we shall gain wealth.

10. The soma drops purify themselves, as best pathfinders for us, allies, unblemished, rich in purpose, finding the sun, when they are being pressed.
11. Having been pressed by the stones, conspicuous on the hide of the cow, the finders of goods have roared together from all around toward refreshment for us.
12. These purified soma juices, attentive to poetic inspiration, mixed with curds, are worthy to be seen like suns, mobile yet fixed in the ghee.

13. Like a mortal he [=the dog] has shown preference for the speech of the stalk being pressed.
Smite away the dog, the ungenerous one, as the Bhr̥gus (did) the Battler.
14. Their kinsman has wrapped himself in a cloak (of milk) to enjoy it, like a son in the two arms (of his mother).
He runs like a swain to a maiden, like a wooer, to sit in the womb.
15. He is a hero, bringing skill to realization, who has propped apart the two world-halves.
The tawny one has wrapped himself in the filter, like a ritual adept, to sit in the womb.

16. Soma purifies himself with the fleeces of sheep, on the cow's hide.
Ever roaring, the bullish fallow bay goes to his rendezvous with Indra.

Uṣṇih Hymns: 102–106

IX.102 (814) Soma Pavamāna

Trita Āptya
8 verses: uṣṇih

The many obscurities in this hymn exist in tension with the clarity of its larger structure: it is a ring composition, with a pāda-length phrase in the first and last verses (1b, 8c) defining the ring: "spurring on the visionary power of truth." This phrase also sets one of the underlying themes, that Soma during his preparation inspires and creates poetic truth. There is clarity also in the general progression of the hymn, which follows Soma's journey from the press (vs. 2) and across the filter (vs. 3) to his final preparation (vs. 7). Another theme that runs throughout is that of Soma as a child in relation to his mothers (vss. 1, 4, 7; see also 6), who not only gave him physical birth but also formed him in his ritual rule (see vs. 4).

It must be admitted, however, that much remains puzzling in the hymn. There are a number of problems of syntax and lexicon. The two adjacent appearances of Trita (or "the third one," vss. 2–3) are also unclear, though they clearly play on the numerals two and three found in those verses. The hymn is ascribed by the Anukramaṇī to Trita Āptya, and so it might be that the poet is simply inserting himself in the poem. But, since Trita Āptya is actually a mythological figure, it is more likely that the Anukramaṇī has assigned the hymn to that figure on the basis of the occurrences of tritá in those two verses.

1. Through his action the child of the great (rivers), spurring on the visionary power of truth, encompasses all dear things—now once again.
2. In the two "jaws" [?] [=soma press?] of Trita [/the third one], when he [=Soma] took to the hidden track, (he traveled) through the seven domains of the sacrifice—now, right to his own dear (place).
3. (Across) the three (filters), on the backs of Trita ("the third one"), in a stream—rouse wealth!—
   he measures out the stages of his journey—the very resolute one.
4. The seven mothers [=rivers?] instructed him as a ritual adept, when he was born for splendor.
   This one is the enduring (treasure) of treasures, since he paid attention (to his mothers).
5. Under his commandment are all the gods of one accord and without deceit.
   Eagerly sought are your joys, since they [=gods] take pleasure (in them).
6. The embryo that those strong through truth have begotten as lovely to see, the poet, most liberal at the ceremony, sought by many—
7. Toward (him) the two youthfully exuberant mothers of truth [=world-halves? Night and Dawn?] go, conjoined but each in her own person—when stretching the sacrifice in due order, they [=priests] anoint (him).
8. Through your resolve, with gleaming eyes, you unclosed the pen of heaven, spurring the visionary power of truth forth in the ceremony.

IX.103 (815) Soma Pavamāna

Dvita Āptya
6 verses: uṣṇih

The most salient stylistic feature of the hymn is the preverb that begins each verse—pári "around" in all but the first verse—with the preverb increasingly less integrated syntactically with the rest of the verse. The focus on pári arises from the description of the motion of the soma as it is poured in circles into the filter.

Like the last hymn, this one follows the journey of Soma and also focuses on his ritual role and his participation in reciprocal ritual speech. Not only do we find the technical term vedhás "ritual adept' (vs. 1), as in IX.102.4 and 101.15, but also the likewise technical vāghát "cantor" (vs. 5) in its only appearance in the IXth Maṇḍala. The poet's presentation of his speech and poetic thoughts in verse 1 and the voices of the seers in verse 3 are met by Soma as himself "leader of thoughts" in verse 4.

The hymn shares some lexical and thematic material with the immediately preceding IX.102. In addition to the aforementioned vedhás, note, for example, the cleverly variant pādas 102.5b and 103.4b, which both contain "all the gods" and lack of deceit. But in 103 all the gods are embedded in a compound modifying Soma, whereas in 102 they are syntactically independent; moreover, the "deceit" theme is carried by two different roots (dabh, druh) in two different valences: the gods of 102 do not deceive, while Soma in 103 cannot be deceived. It is difficult not to consider 102 and 103 as composed in conversation with each other, and the Anukramaṇī's ascription of 103 to Dvita Āptya ("the second Āptya") clearly plays off 102's Trita Āptya ("the third Āptya"—but also the original Āptya from a mythological perspective, since he is a commonly mentioned figure and has an Avestan correspondent, whereas Dvita Āptya is essentially found only here).

1. Forth to the ritual adept, to Soma as he is being purified, shall I bear the upraised speech like a present, along with my thoughts. He will find enjoyment.
2. Around the sheep's fleeces he rushes, being anointed with cows.
   Being purified, the tawny one creates three seats for himself.
3. Around the cask dripping with honey he rushes on the sheep's fleece.
   The seven voices of the seers have cried out to him.
4. Around (he rushes)—the leader of thoughts, belonging to all the gods, undeceivable.
   Soma the tawny, being purified, entered the two cups.
5. Around—following your divine independent powers, drive in the same chariot with Indra, being purified as an immortal cantor by cantors.
6. Around—like a prize-seeking team, the god pressed for the gods, reaching through (it), the self-purifying one runs through (the filter).

IX.104 (816) Soma Pavamāna

Parvata Kāṇva and Nārada Kāṇva, or the two Apsarases named Śikhaṇḍinī, daughters of Kaśyapa
6 verses: uṣṇih

This hymn forms a close pair with 105 and the two are a textbook demonstration of how R̥gvedic poets generate variations on underlyingly identical lexical and thematic material. The two hymns correspond verse by verse, and even in translation the identity of many of the words, their grammatical forms, and whole phrases is clear. But the poets avoid pāda-length repetitions and introduce variation via lexical replacement or grammatical transformation.

The contents are unremarkable; both hymns deploy the usual soma-hymn tropes, though the final apotropaic verse is refreshingly vivid.

1. Comrades, sit down here; sing forth to him as he is being purified.
   With sacrifices attend on him like a child for splendor.
2. Send him like a calf to join with his mothers—him who brings success to the household, who pursues the gods, the exhilarating drink with double strength.
3. Purify him who brings success to skill, for him to pursue the troop (of Maruts), to be most wealful for Mitra and Varuṇa.
4. The voices have cried out to you, the finder of goods for us.
   With cows we will clothe your color.
5. O drop, lord of exhilarating drinks—you are the one affording delight to the gods—like a comrade for a comrade, become the best finder of the way for us.
6. Put away from us bag and baggage any demonic devourer whatsoever.
   Keep away from us the godless double-dealing one, away difficult straits.

IX.105 (817) Soma Pavamāna

Parvata and Narada
6 verses: uṣṇih

For discussion of this twin to IX.104, see the introduction to that hymn.

1. Comrades, sing to him while he is being purified for your exhilaration.
   Like a child they sweeten him with sacrifices, with greetings.
2. Like a calf, being impelled to join with his mothers, he is driven [/anointed], pursuing the gods, the exhilarating drink adorned all around with thoughts.

3. Here is the one bringing success to skill; here is the one to pursue the troop.
   Here is the pressed drink, most honeyed for the gods.
4. When pressed, o well-skilled drop, run for us (with goods) in cows and horses.
   I have fixed your gleaming color among the cows.
5. O drop, lord of the fallow bays, as the one who best affords delight to the gods, like a manly comrade for a comrade, be there for our illumination.
6. (Put) away from us bag and baggage any ungodly devourer whatsoever.
   Having prevailed, o drop, (parry) oppressions, (keep) away the double-dealing one.

IX.106 (818) Soma Pavamāna

Agni Cākṣuṣa (1–3), Cakṣus Mānava (4–6), Manu Āpsava (7–9), Agni Cākṣuṣa (10–14)
14 verses: uṣṇih

This last hymn in the uṣṇih collection, as is common with hymns positioned at the end of their metrical grouping, is too long and needs to be broken down into smaller units: four tr̥cas (vss. 1–3, 4–6, 7–9, 10–12) followed by a two-verse hymn (13–14). In this case the division is in general accord with the Anukramaṇī, which ascribes the hymn to three different mythical poets, marked by their patronymic relationships as grandson, son, and father, each with a tr̥ca. The grandson returns as poet of the last five verses, that is, of the final tr̥ca (10–12) and the two-verse unit that ends the hymn.

The contents of the hymn are entirely conventional, with a focus on Indra as drinker of the soma, especially in the first part of the hymn. Note that "finding the sun" is also a preoccupation, and that word (svarvíd) appears once in each of the first three tr̥cas (vss. 1, 4, 9).

1. Let these pressed (soma drinks) go to Indra, the tawny ones to the bull, the drops born because of (Indra's?) attentive hearing, finding the sun.
2. This one here, bringing gain for the taking, purifies himself for Indra when pressed.
   Soma takes note of the victorious one, as is (well) known.
3. Indra, in the raptures of just this (soma), grabbed a handful bringing gain, and he carried the bullish mace—he who is entirely victorious in the waters.

4. Run forth as the wakeful one, o Soma; flow around for Indra, o drop.
   Bring here brilliant tempestuous force that finds the sun.

5. For Indra purify yourself into bullish exhilaration, as the one visible to all, possessing a thousand courses, path-making, wide-gazing.
6. The best finder of the way for us, most honeyed for the gods, drive along your thousand paths, ever roaring.

7. Purify yourself in streams, o drop, to pursue the gods with strength.
Honeyed, sit in our tub, o Soma.
8. Your droplets, swimming in water, have strengthened Indra for exhilaration.
The gods have drunk you for immortality
9. O you pressed drops, run wealth to us here while being purified, bringing the heavens to rain and the waters to streaming, finding the sun.

10. Soma, being purified in a wave, runs across the fleece of the sheep, at the forefront of speech, self-purifying, ever roaring.
11. With insights they impel the prizewinner, playing in the wood, across the sheep [=fleece].
The thoughts sound together toward the three-backed one.
12. He has been sent surging toward the tubs, like a prize-seeking team at a competition.
Being purified, begetting speech, he has flowed.

13. The delightful fallow bay purifies himself, across the tufts, at speed, streaming glory consisting of heroes to the praisers.
14. In this way purify yourself, seeking the gods. The streams of honey have been sent surging.
Rasping, circle around the filter on all sides.

Hymns Arranged in Pragāthas: 107–108

IX.107 (819) Soma Pavamāna

Seven Seers
26 verses: br̥hatī alternating with satobr̥hatī, arranged in pragāthas, except dvipadā virāj bhurij 3 and dvipadā virāj 16 as supplemental verses to the preceding pragātha

This long hymn mostly stays focused the usual themes of the IXth Maṇḍala: the pressing of Soma, his journey across the filter, his entry into the waters, his mixing with cows' milk, and his arrival at his destination, the wooden cups. Interspersed are references to Soma's cosmic aspect (e.g., the heavenly udder in vs. 5) and cosmic deeds (e.g., making the sun mount in heaven, vs. 7). Especially prominent in the middle and late parts of the hymn are mentions of the sea (vss. 9, 14, 15, 16, 21, 23), referring both to the waters that the soma enters and to the expanse of soma itself.

Toward the end the hymn takes a slightly personal turn, in the pragātha of verses 19–20, where the poet celebrates his fellowship with Soma and, by implication, the mental state he achieves from drinking the soma. In particular, 20cd "We have flown like birds far past the sun…" recalls several famous 1st-person descriptions of soma's effects: VIII.48.3 "We have drunk the soma; we have become immortal; we have gone to the light; we have found the gods" and X.119, the Laba-sūkta, in which the soma-drinker flies through the cosmos, describing his bird's eye view of heaven and earth.

1. From here sprinkle around the pressed drink, which is the soma, the highest oblation.
   The manly one who has run within the waters, the soma did he [=the priest] press with stones.
2. Now, while being purified by the sheep, flow around as one who is undeceivable, very sweet-smelling.
   Even when (you) have just been pressed in the waters, we become exhilarated by your stalk, while preparing you with cows as the higher (oblation),
3. Being pressed all around to be seen—the exhilarator of the gods, the wide-gazing drop that is resolve.

4. O Soma, you rush while being purified in a stream and clothing yourself in the waters.
   Conferring treasure, you sit here upon the womb of truth as the golden wellspring, o god.
5. Milking the heavenly udder of his own dear honey, he has taken his ancient seat.
   The prizewinner rushes to the support worthy of the asking, the wide-gazing one rinsed by men.

6. O Soma, while being purified all around in the sheep's fleece, wakeful and dear, you became an inspired poet, the best of the Aṅgirases. Equip our sacrifice with honey.
7. Soma the rewarder purifies himself, the best pathfinder, the inspired, wide-gazing seer.
   You became the sage poet who best pursues the gods. You made the sun mount in heaven.

8. Soma, being pressed by the pressers upon the backs of the sheep, drives with his stream as if with a golden horse, drives with his delighting stream.

9. Provided with cows he has flowed together with the cows at the water's edge; Soma has flowed together with those that have been milked.
   They have gone into the enclosures as if into the sea. The invigorating one wells out for exhilaration.

10. O Soma, while you are being pressed by the stones, (you come) here across the sheep's fleeces.
    Like a man into a fortress, the tawny one enters into the two cups. You have established your seat in the woods [/in the wooden cups].
11. He has become groomed across the fine (hairs) of the ewe, like a prize-seeking team at a competition.
    Self-purifying Soma is to be cheered on by those of inspired thought, by the inspired reciters of verses.

12. O Soma, like a river that has swollen with its flood, you have swollen forth with the milk of the plant to pursue the gods, wakeful like an exhilarating drink, toward the cask dripping with honey.
13. The delightful one has clothed himself in a silvery cloak, to be caressed like a dear son.
    The laborers propel him, in their two hands, as they would a chariot, into the rivers.

14. The soma juices, the Āyus, purify themselves into an exhilarating drink of exhilaration—they of inspired thought, bringing exhilaration and finding the sun, (purify themselves) upon the surface of the sea.
15. Purifying himself, he crosses the sea with his wave as king and god—and lofty truth—rushing according to the ordinance of Mitra and Varuṇa, being propelled—the lofty truth,
16. Being guided by men, the delightful, wide-gazing king and god belonging to the sea.

17. Soma purifies himself as the exhilarating drink, pressed for Indra along with the Maruts.
    Possessed of a thousand streams he rushes beyond the sheep's fleece. The Āyus groom him.
18. Being purified in the cup, a poet begetting thought, Soma rejoices among the gods.
    Clothing himself in waters, he has wrapped himself with cows as the higher (oblation), sitting in the woods [/wooden cups].

19. O Soma, I rejoice in your fellowship (with me) every day, o drop.
    Many things, o brown one, get me down—way down. Go past these barriers.
20. Both by night and by day, Soma, I am at your udder for fellowship with you, o brown one.
    We have flown like birds far past the sun that scorches with its heat.

21. While being groomed, dexterous one, you impel your speech upon the sea.
    O self-purifying one, you rush toward ample, much-craved, golden wealth.
22. Being groomed, purifying yourself on the sheep's fleece, as bull you have roared down into the wood(en cup).
    O self-purifying Soma, you rush to the rendezvous with the gods, being anointed with cows.

23. Purify yourself to win the prize, (aiming) toward all products of poetic skill.
    Soma, you, the exhilarating one, were [/are] the first to spread out the sea for the gods.
24. Purify yourself all around the earthly realm and the heavenly ones, o Soma, in accordance with your ordinances.
    O wide-gazing one, the inspired poets propel you, resplendent, with their thoughts and insights.

25. Purifying themselves, they have been set loose across the filter in a steam—the exhilarating coursers, fit for Indra along with the Maruts, toward wisdom [/the ritual meal] and pleasing offerings.
26. Clothing himself in the waters, he rushes around the cask, the drop being propelled by the pressers.
    Begetting the light, he has made the delighting cows bellow, making the cows as if into his fresh garment.

IX.108 (820) Soma Pavamāna

Gaurivīti Śāktya 1–2, Śakti Vāsiṣṭha 3, 14–16, Ūru Āṅgirasa 4–5, R̥jiśvan Bhāradvāja 6–7, Ūrdhvasadman Āṅgirasa 8–9, Kr̥tayaśas Āṅgirasa 10–11, R̥ṇaṃcaya 12–13
16 verses: kakubh alternating with satobr̥hatī, except gāyatrī yavamadhyā 13, arranged in pragāthas

The Anukramaṇī names seven different poets as authors of this hymn; the Anukramaṇī's divisions do not correspond at all to the clear pragātha structure, however, and therefore seem questionable. Within the pragāthas there is, more often than not, syntactic dependency between verses (e.g., vss. 3–4, 7–8, 13–14), as well as some thematic continuity. Stylistically the hymn, especially toward the beginning, is characterized by rather choppy syntax and often presents itself as a mosaic of semi-self-contained phrases. On the other hand, there are signs of ring composition: the first phrase of the hymn, “purify yourself as the most honeyed for Indra, o Soma” recurs as the framing words of the first verse of the final pragātha (vs. 15), and the relative clause about the drinking of soma that introduces verse 2 is echoed, with the same relative pronoun, in 14a.

Allusions to the Vala myth are found in the interior of the hymn (vss. 4, 6). The heavenly soma, conceived of in part as rain, is also a prominent theme (vss. 9–11, and also probably vss. 4 [the “dear immortal one”] and 6 [the “watery” cows]). This cosmic soma is, as usual, a counterpoint to the ritual soma, the standard details of whose preparation are found throughout.

1. Purify yourself as the most honeyed for Indra, o Soma, as the exhilarating drink that best finds resolve, greatly, as the exhilarating drink that best rules heaven,
2. Since, having drunk of you, the bull acts as a bull, at the drinking of this sun-finding (soma).
Bearing good marks he [=Soma] strode toward the refreshments, like Etaśa toward the prize.

3. O self-purifying one, it was certainly you as the most brilliant who made the heavenly races heed for the sake of immortality,
4. With whom Navagva, with whom Dadhyañc uncloses (the cowpen), by whom the inspired poets have acquired for themselves
(some) of the dear immortal one [=heavenly soma] in the grace of the gods, by whom they have each attained fame.

5. This most exhilarating one here, pressed in a stream, purifies himself with the fleeces of sheep, playing like a wave of the waters,
6. He who with his might cut the ruddy, watery cows out from within the rock.
You have extended your control over the enclosure of the cows and horses. Like a man in armor, break into it, o bold one.

7. Press it, sprinkle it around, as one sprinkles a horse—(the soma that is stoma, i.e.,) the praise song that crosses the waters, crosses the airy realms, that is howling in the wood and swimming in the waters,
8. The bull of a thousand streams, growing strong through the milk, dear to the divine race, who born of truth through truth has grown strong as king, god, and lofty truth.

9. Illuminate lofty splendor and glory, o lord of refreshment, as you seek the gods, o god.
   Unleash the middle bucket [=rain cloud].
10. Coil yourself into the two cups when you are pressed, skillful one, as the clanlord of the clans, like a draft-horse.
   Purify yourself into the rain from heaven, the streaming of waters. Quicken our insights for the quest for cattle.

11. They have milked out of the heavens this thousand-streamed bull, who arouses exhilaration, who brings all good things.
12. The bull has been born, the immortal that gives birth, burning away the darkness with his light.
   Well-praised by the poets, he dons his raiment, a threefold one, by his wondrous ability.

13. He is pressed—who is the leader of goods, of riches, of Iḍā-offerings, Soma, who (is the leader) of good settlements,
14. Our (soma) of which Indra will drink, of which the Maruts, or Bhaga along with Aryaman, by whom we will bring Mitra and Varuṇa here and Indra here for great help.

15. For Indra to drink, o Soma—held by men, having good weapons and most exhilarating, purify yourself as the most honeyed.
16. Enter into the heart of Indra, the repository of soma, like rivers into the sea, being pleasing to Mitra, to Varuṇa, to Vāyu, the highest prop of heaven.

Hymns in Assorted Meters: 109–114

IX.109 (821) Soma Pavamāna

Dhiṣṇya Fires, descendants of Īśvara
22 verses: dvipadā virāj, arranged in tr̥cas

The Anukramaṇī's fanciful ascription of this hymn to the dhiṣṇya ("holy") fires finds no echo in the composition itself.

The lightness and brevity of this meter (each verse containing four pādas of a mere five syllables each) do not lend themselves to complex phraseology or elaborate images. Instead the hymn consists primarily of standard apostrophes to Soma (e.g., the imperative "purify yourself" occurs five times in the hymn: vss. 4, 5, 6, 7, 10) and simple present-tense descriptions of the process of preparation (e.g., vs. 11 "they purify"; vs. 12 "they groom").

For links with the next hymn, see the introduction to IX.110.

1. Run forth and around for Indra, o Soma, sweet for Mitra, Pūṣan, and Bhaga.
2. Indra should drink of you, Soma, when you are pressed, for will and skill—and (so should) all the gods.
3. Thus, for immortality and for great peaceful dwelling, rush gleaming as the heavenly beestings.

4. Purify yourself, Soma, as the great sea and as the father of the gods, (going) to all domains.
5. Gleaming, purify yourself for the gods, o Soma, for heaven, for earth, and as weal for offspring.
6. You are the supporter of heaven, the gleaming beestings. In your real expansion, as prizewinner purify yourself.

7. Purify yourself, o Soma, possessing heavenly brilliance and good streams, along the (fleece) of the sheep as the great ancient one.
8. Being guided by men after being born purified, he streams all (goods) [/to all (domains)]—the gladdening one who finds the sun.
9. The drop being purified, being chosen, will make offspring and all goods for us.

10. Purify yourself, Soma, for will and skill, washed down like a prizewinning horse for the stake.
11. The pressers purify that sap of yours for exhilaration, the soma for great heavenly brilliance.
12. They groom the tawny child just born, the soma in the filter, the drop for the gods.

13. The dear drop has been purified for exhilaration in the lap of the waters, the sage poet (has been purified) for good fortune.
14. He bears the name dear to Indra, with which he smashes all obstacles.
15. All the gods drink of him, prepared with cows, pressed by men.

16. Being pressed, he has streamed forth in a thousand streams, across the filter, through the sheep's fleece.
17. The prizewinner has streamed in a thousand spurts, being groomed with waters, being prepared with cows.
18. O Soma, journey forth to the cheeks of Indra, being guided by men, pressed by stones.

19. The prizewinner has been let loose across the filter, Soma of a thousand streams, for Indra.
20. With the sap of honey they anoint him, the drop for Indra the bull, for exhilaration.
21. They groom you, the tawny one clothed in waters, for the gods, for (you to attain) your full dimension at will.

22. The drop spills, spills down for Indra—the mighty one preparing and setting the waters to flow.

IX.110 (822) Soma Pavamāna

Tryaruṇa and Trasadasyu
12 verses: pipīlikamadhyā 1–3, ūrdhvabṛhatī 4–9, virāj 10–12, arranged in tṛcas

This hymn is made up of verses in three rare meters; in fact verses 4–9 are the only ones in all of the Ṛgveda in this meter (consisting of verses of three pādas of twelve syllables each), and the first three verses are the only pipīlikamadhyā stanzas in the Ṛgveda with this syllable count (12 8 12). (The meter's name means "ant-middled," because a short pāda is sandwiched between two longer ones.) Despite the heterogeneity of the meters, there is evidence that the hymn is a conceptual unity, particularly in the signs of ring composition: the last two verses (11–12) echo the first two. "The one who gains the prize" (11c) matches "to gain the prize" in 1a; the two forms of the root sah "vanquish" in verse 12 (a and c) recall the "vanquisher" in 1b; the "difficult plunges" in 12b are the negative counterpart of Soma's plunge in 2c. Internally we may note that the begetting of the sun in verse 3, at the end of the first tṛca (3a, with its initial verb ájījanaḥ) is immediately reprised in 4a, in a new meter, again with the fronted verb ájījanaḥ.

The hymn also echoes some of the vocabulary and phraseology of the preceding hymn, X.109, whose metrical simplicity is in marked contrast to this hymn. Both hymns begin almost identically, though adjusted by the addition of particles for the metrical difference: IX.109.1a pári prá dhanva and 110.1a páry ū ṣú prá dhanva…, both meaning "run forth and around." The rare word pīyū́ṣa "beestings, first-milk," which makes two appearances in 109 (vss. 3, 6), recurs in 110.8, qualified as "the beestings of heaven" (diváḥ pīyū́ṣam) like the "heavenly beestings" of 109.3 (divyáḥ pīyū́ṣaḥ).

In content the first three and the last three (10–12) verses are fairly straightforward, and, especially the last three verses, are concerned with the earthly soma of the ritual, though also celebrating his great powers in confronting enemies and obstacles. A hint of the cosmic soma comes in verse 3, in the aforementioned begetting of the sun, though in this verse this action is linked with Soma's ritual progress. The middle six verses (4–9), in an otherwise unattested meter, are more difficult and treat the interaction and blurred boundaries between earthly, ritual soma and cosmic soma. The gods' yearning for soma (see esp. vs. 6) and the primal preparation of soma (see esp. vss. 7–8) are described, and the final verse of this group (vs. 9) declares Soma's universal power.

1. Run forth and around to gain the prize, around as the vanquisher of obstacles.
   As the requiter of our debts, you speed [/are implored] to overcome hatreds.
2. Because we cheer you on, Soma, when you are pressed for the great (prize), in your kingship in the clash, you plunge forward toward the prizes, o self-purifying one.
3. For you have begotten the sun, o self-purifying one, in spreading your milk by your skill, hastening along with Plenitude, who is lively with cows.

4. You have begotten it, o immortal one, here among mortals, upon the foundation of the truth, of the dear immortal one [=heavenly soma].
   You have always flowed, ever streaming toward the prize.
5. Because with your fame you drilled ever closer to the inexhaustible drink for men, as if to some kind of wellspring, while being carried in the (priest's) hands, like (booty by someone) with arrows in his hands—
6. Because of that, seeing for themselves a friendship with him who is radiant with goods [=Soma], some heavenly beings roared to him.
   He uncovers the fleece as the god Savitar uncovers a desirable thing.

7. In you, Soma, those who first twisted the ritual grass placed their insight for the great prize of victory and for fame.
   Impel our (insight), o hero, for heroic power.
8. The ancient beestings of heaven, worthy of hymns—they milked that out of the great depth of heaven.
   They cried out in unison toward Indra as he was being born.
9. Now, o self-purifying one, in that (you) sur(mount) these two worlds here and all these creatures by your greatness, outstanding like a bull in the herd you extend yourself over them.

10. Self-purifying Soma, being purified in the sheep's fleece, has streamed, playing like a child—the drop possessing a thousand streams and a hundred prizes.
11. This one being purified, the honeyed and truth-possessing drop, the sweet wave, purifies himself for Indra—the one who gains the prize, finds wide space, and confers vitality.
12. Purify yourself, vanquishing the battlers, repelling demons and difficult plunges, having good weapons, having vanquished your rivals, Soma.

IX.111 (923) Soma Pavamāna

Anānata Pārucchepi
3 verses: atyaṣṭi

This hymn is the only one in the IXth Maṇḍala in the intricate atyaṣṭi meter, with its variable lines and patterned repetition. The poet, according to the Anukramaṇī, is Anānata son of Parucchepa, a poet not otherwise represented in the R̥gveda. However, his putative father, Parucchepa, is the author, again according to the Anukramaṇī, of I.127–39, the only sustained corpus of atyaṣṭi in the R̥gveda.

The hymn begins with a description of Soma's journey, and the final verse (vs. 3) returns to this theme. The middle verse (vs. 2) is a brief, and quite enigmatic, treatment of the Vala myth. In our view it involves something of a reversal of some standard tropes. The 2nd-person subject of the first three pādas of the verse is Soma, who is here credited with retrieving the cows stolen by the Paṇis. These cows, of course, also represent the milk with which the soma will be mixed. Soma then grooms or cleans these cows along with his (or their?) mothers. Now ordinarily it is Soma who is groomed; he doesn't perform any grooming on others. And a number of translators and commentators have attempted to make the verb used here (marjayasi) reflect this normal usage. However, this particular verb form is emphatically and unambiguously transitive, and it seems likely that the poet is thus drawing our attention to the role reversal, with the usual female agents of Soma's grooming relegated to auxiliaries.

The reference of the next item, the melody or sāman, is equally obscure. If it is part of the Vala myth, it may refer to the song sung by Indra/Br̥haspati and the Aṅgirases to open the cave and free the cows; they came "from afar" bringing their song, and to the cows within the cave the song would have sounded "from afar." It is also possible that the simile just refers to a general situation, the pleasure one gets from hearing a snatch of song out of nowhere. In any case in the last portion of this verse Soma acquires vigor or vitality from the cows, who are also identified as the three forms of ritual speech.

1. Being purified with this golden light, he crosses all hatreds with (horses) of his own yoking—like the Sun with the (horses) of his own yoking.
   In the stream of pressed (juice) he shines ruddy and tawny as he is being purified, when he makes the circuit of all his forms by (the impetus of) the versifiers—by (the impetus of) the versifiers with their seven mouths.
2. You found that good thing of the Paṇis [=herd of cows]. You groom (it), along with your mothers, in your own house—in your house through the insights of truth.
   Like a melody (heard) from afar, this is where the insights find pleasure.
   He has acquired vitality through the tripartite ruddy (cows)—shining, he has acquired vitality.

3. Following his earlier [/eastern] direction he drives, ever observant. He aligns himself with the reins [/(sun's) rays] as a chariot lovely to see—a heavenly chariot lovely to see.
   The hymns, the manly powers, have come: they excite Indra to victory, when you [=Soma] and his mace become unbudgeable—unbudgeable in battles.

The last three hymns in the IXth Maṇḍala share a refrain, are all in paṅkti meter, and can be safely considered supplements to the original book on the grounds of language and subject matter (see Oldenberg 1888: 202).

IX.112 (824) Soma Pavamāna

Śiśu Āṅgirasa
4 verses: paṅkti

This charming little hymn has no obvious connection to soma except through its refrain (which it shares with the next two hymn, 113–114, also in the same meter), which sits oddly in each verse, and through the glancing mention of the soma-presser in 1d. The diversity of people's occupations and of their goals is the theme, presented in casual style and sometimes colloquial language (see especially the designations for father and mother in vs. 3), with the gently cynical message that what everyone really wants is gain or an easy life. The final verse (4) opens out to the nonhuman world.

Perhaps the most interesting verse, as a small window on realia, is the second one, which presents a rare picture of a smith and his equipment. The "old plants" must be for producing a hot fire, the "feathers of birds" for fanning the flames, and the stones are probably whetstones.

Casting about for a reason for the refrain and for the inclusion of this hymn in the IXth Maṇḍala—it may be that the point of the refrain is that, like the people and animals mentioned in the body of the text, the drop has its own goal, particular to itself, namely simply to seek Indra. Or perhaps the hymn was simply too delightful to abandon.

1. Truly our thoughts are various, and the obligations of peoples are different:
   a carpenter seeks the broken, a healer the injured, a formulator a man who presses soma.
   – O drop, flow around for Indra.
2. With old [=dry] plants, with the feathers of birds, and with stones—throughout the days the smith seeks a man who has gold.
   – O drop, flow around for Indra.

3. I am a bard, Papa a healer, and Mama is pushing a pestle.
   Having varying thoughts but (all) seeking goods, we follow (goods) like cows.
   – O drop, flow around for Indra.
4. The draft-horse seeks an easy-rolling chariot, beguilers a joke;
   the penis seeks the hairy split, the frog just seeks water.
   – O drop, flow around for Indra.

IX.113 (825) Soma Pavamāna

Kaśyapa Mārīca
11 verses: paṅkti

The special interest of this hymn rests in the vision of heaven in its second half. Most strikingly, the imagery that describes this heaven—its freedom, joy, and satisfaction of all desires—occurs again in the Upaniṣads to characterize the mystical realization of the self. The hymn begins more or less as a conventional soma hymn, however. In verse 1 Indra is urged to drink the soma to strengthen himself for action, and in verse 2 Soma is commanded to purify himself, with the signature imperative pavasva. Verse 2 also introduces the theme of true ritual speech, which is taken up again in verses 4–6. Verse 3 seems to contain an interlude about the rain, which provides the sap to the soma plant, though the mythological sequence involving the Daughter of the Sun and the Gandharvas is obscure.

Verses 6 and 7 are the omphalos verses and provide a dramatic transition from the poet's description of the preparation of soma in the first half of the hymn to a vision of heaven (vss. 7–11), where immortality and the fulfillment of all desires are attained. Verse 6 is still set on the ritual ground and is in some ways the climax of the hymn, for it anticipates the drinking of the soma. Since soma is the drink of deathlessness, the ceremony becomes the place of immortality. Verse 6 is also grammatically incomplete, consisting only of a dependent clause and producing tension awaiting resolution in a main clause that will answer the implicit question: "what will happen in this 'where'?" The first half of verse 7 is responsive to 6 and thus builds the tension, but the locus of the "where" has changed: the poet has transformed the ritual space into the heavenly realm. The tension finds its release in the second half of verse 7, with the long-postponed main clause. The remaining verses reproduce the structure of verse 7, enlarging and embellishing the vision of the immortal world.

What links the first half of the hymn to the second, besides the transformative responsion of verses 6–7? The answer is not entirely clear, but it seems that the true speech that accompanies the preparation of the soma (vs. 2), perhaps the natural speech of the thunder (vs. 3), the true speech Soma himself speaks (vs. 4), the sacred formulation with which he is purified (vs. 5), and the verbal behavior of the formulator of that formulation (vs. 6) provide Soma with the power to bestow immortality. He does so by placing the poet in the immortal realms, and placing is also a recurrent theme in the first half of the hymn: Indra places soma's strength in himself in verse 1; the rain is placed in soma as his juice in verse 3; soma is prepared by the Placer in verse 4; the sun was placed in the heavenly world in 7b, and finally the poet implores Soma to place him in the same world in 7c. The first two of these placings also involve clear transformation of substance: soma becomes Indra's strength; the rain becomes soma's sap. We can also see transformation in the Placer's preparation of soma in verse 4, as this preparation makes a physical substance into a drink of immortality, and ultimately in Soma's placing of the poet in the immortal world, which will make the poet himself immortal. The command of the second half of verse 7 "place me in that immortal, imperishable world" is followed by the command refrain of the remaining four verses (8–11), "there make me immortal," a sequence that appears to support the notion that the "placing" both precedes and causes the poet's transformation.

1. Let Indra, Vr̥tra-smasher, drink the soma in the reed-filled (place), placing strength in himself as he is about to perform a great heroic deed.
   – O drop, flow around for Indra.
2. Purify yourself, o master of the directions, o munificent Soma, from the foamy (place).
   With real words of truth, with trust, and with fervor are you pressed.
   – O drop, flow around for Indra.
3. The buffalo grown strong through Parjanya [=thunder]—him [=rain] the Daughter of the Sun brought, him the Gandharvas received, him they placed as the juice in the soma.
   – O drop, flow around for Indra.
4. Speaking the truth, you whose brilliance is the truth, speaking what is real, you whose actions are real, speaking your trust, King Soma, you are prepared by the Placer, o Soma.
   – O drop, flow around for Indra.
5. Of (you) who are lofty and really strong the joint streams stream jointly.
   The juices of (you) who are rich in juice join together as (you) are being purified by the sacred formulation, tawny one.
   – O drop, flow around for Indra.
6. Where, o self-purifying one, the formulator, speaking metrical speech along with the pressing stone, makes himself great on soma, generating joy with soma—
   – O drop, flow around for Indra.
7. Where the inexhaustible light is, in which world the sun is placed, in that one place me, o self-purifying one, in the immortal, imperishable world.
   – O drop, flow around for Indra.

8. Where the son of Vivasvant is king, where there is a ladder down from heaven, where those youthfully exuberant waters are, there make me immortal.
   – O drop, flow around for Indra.
9. Where one can move following one's desire in the three-vaulted, three-heavened (place) of heaven, where there are worlds filled with light, there make me immortal.
   – O drop, flow around for Indra.
10. Where there are desires and yearnings, where the upper surface of the coppery one [=Sun and soma?] is, where there is independence and satisfaction, there make me immortal.
    – O drop, flow around for Indra.
11. Where joys and delights, elations and exaltations dwell, where the desires of desire are obtained, there make me immortal.
    – O drop, flow around for Indra.

IX.114 (826) Soma Pavamāna

Kaśyapa Mārīca
4 verses: paṅkti

This final hymn in the Soma Maṇḍala has the feeling of an afterthought. The seer addresses himself in verse 2, and the fortunate ritualist depicted in verse 1 is most likely Kaśyapa as well. In verse 3 he produces a triad of heptads, which have little to do with his call to Soma to protect us (3d). The final verse (4) repeats this call and enlarges on the dangers we wish to avoid.

1. The one who has stridden along the domains of the self-purifying drop, of him they say "(he will) have good offspring"—the one who has dedicated his thought to you, Soma.
   – O drop, flow around for Indra.
2. O seer Kaśyapa, strengthening up your songs with the praises of the mantra-makers, do homage to Soma the king, who was born as the lord of plants.
   – O drop, flow around for Indra.
3. Seven are the quarters, each with its separate sun; seven are the Hotars sacrificing in due order.
   The Āditya gods, who are seven—with them, o Soma, protect us.
   – O drop, flow around for Indra.
4. The oblation that is readied for you, o king—with that, o Soma, protect us.
   Let no hostile man overcome us, and let nothing whatsoever afflict us.
   – O drop, flow around for Indra.

X

Maṇḍala X

The Xth maṇḍala consists of 191 hymns like Maṇḍala I, but it has a more miscellaneous character and looser organization than its twin. As a whole, X was certainly the final addition to the codified Ṛgveda, and it contains many hymns with younger linguistic features and "popular" themes, or at least subjects that were not central to the soma sacrifice that dominates the rest of the Ṛgveda and determines the choice of hymns to be included or excluded in the rest of the text. These include life-cycle rituals like the funeral and the wedding, meta-reflections on the sacrifice and its parts, additional mythological material, celebrations of deities and divine forces peripheral to the soma sacrifice, dramatic monologues and dialogues, healing spells and curses, and so forth. However, it is easy to overemphasize the special character of X, for, when compared even with the chronologically close Atharvaveda, the intricate, playful, and allusive style, the lexicon, and the complex development of themes of most of X are quite distinctively Ṛgvedic.

Approximately half the maṇḍala is organized into collections generally attributed to individual poets. The first few of these collections are comparable in number of hymns to those in I, but starting with X.61 the hymns are arranged first in pairs (61–84) and then, beginning with X.85, as individual hymns.

This maṇḍala contains too many striking hymns, famous or unsung, to list here. The reader is referred to the introductions to the individual collections and hymns.

The first nine hymns of Maṇḍala X are assigned to two different poets: Trita Āptya 1–7 and Triśiras Tvāṣṭra ("Three-Headed Son of Tvaṣṭar") 8–9. Both of these are mythological figures, who appear as opponents in the same myth, which is narrated briefly at the end of X.8. Although the poets' names were generated from the mythological material and therefore do not reflect "real" poets, it is clear from their narrative connection that the hymns belong together (Oldenberg 1888: 232–35).

All of the Trita Āptya hymns (1–7) and the first two-thirds of X.8 are dedicated to Agni. The last three verses of X.8 (7–9), where the myth of the confrontation of Trita Āptya and his three-headed opponent is narrated, is assigned to Indra by the Anukramaṇī. The final hymn (X.9) is to the Waters.

X.1 (827) Agni

Trita Āptya
7 verses: triṣṭubh

An appropriate beginning to an Agni cycle, this hymn recounts the birth of the ritual fire at dawn—the word jātá "at birth, once born" is repeated four times in the hymn (vss. 1–3, 6). But this nascent fire is endowed with cosmic importance, identified as the embryo of the two worlds (vs. 2) and compared to Viṣṇu in his lofty reach (vs. 3ab). The role of his hymnists is also given its due (3cd), and Agni's pivotal priestly role in the sacrifice is emphasized as the hymn continues (vss. 5cd–7). In the final verse (7) Agni is sent forth to bring the gods to the ritual ground, where the sacrifice can begin.

1. At the forefront of the dawns he has stood upright on high. Having gone out from darkness, he has come here with light.
   With his luminous beam, Agni, beautiful of limb, has filled all the seats at his birth.
2. At your birth you are the embryo of the two world-halves, o Agni, the beloved one dispersed among the plants.
   A brilliant babe, circling around the dark shades and the nights, you have come forth from your mothers, constantly roaring.
3. In just such a way as Viṣṇu, knowing his farthest (step), at his birth he protects on high the third (seat?).
   When with their mouth they have made their own milk [=poetry] for him, they with single mind chant to him here.
4. And then your birth-givers [=kindling wood], bringing nurture, proceed toward you, who are strengthened by food, with food; you go toward them in turn as they (acquire) other forms [=burn]. You are the Hotar among the clans of Manu.
5. (They chant) to the Hotar of the rite, possessing a brilliant chariot, the luminous beacon of every sacrifice, to Agni, who is the half-sharer with every god in his greatness, but in his beauty the guest of the peoples.
6. Agni, donning garments and ornaments on the navel of earth, ruddy at birth in the footprint of the refreshment—when set in front, o king, sacrifice to the gods here.
7. Because you have ever extended through heaven and earth, Agni, as a son extends both his parents, drive forth to those eager ones and convey the gods here, o youngest powerful one.

X.2 (828) Agni

Trita Āptya
7 verses: triṣṭubh

The most salient characteristic of the hymn is its concern with the ritual sequence (ṛtú) and with Agni as the god who ensures that these sequences are properly arranged and performed. In this feature it reminds us of the hymns devoted to the *ṛtugraha*s (the offering of "sequential cups" to an ordered set of divinities by an ordered series of priests); see I.15 and II.36–37. Although our hymn has much in common with those hymns, it does not provide the complete series, as those hymns do. Instead it focuses on Agni as the Hotar and the central figure in the sacrificial program—the senior partner, as it were, in the ritual enterprise involving both Agni and mortals as officiants. Agni's most important quality in this hymn is knowledge: he is called vidvā́n (or pravidvā́n) "knowing" four times in the hymn (vss. 1, 3, 4, 7), and "discerning" (vijānán) once (vs. 5). The epithet we have translated as "Establisher of Thought" in verse 2 (mandhātár) probably also participates in this theme, since it is etymologically almost identical to the name of the chief divinity in the Old Iranian pantheon, Ahura Mazdā, "Lord Wisdom" (< Proto Indo-Iranian mn̥s-dhaH*). Mortals, by contrast, are very un-knowing (áviduṣṭara, vs. 4) and prone to moral and ritual mistakes (vss. 4–5).

Less prominent in the hymn, but noteworthy because of the importance of this theme later in the Xth Maṇḍala, is the distinction between the path going to the gods (vs. 3) and that to the forefathers (vs. 7), which figures prominently in the funeral hymns (X.14–18).

1. Please the gods, who are eager for it, o youngest one. Knowing the ritual sequences, o lord of the sequences, perform the sacrifice here.
   Those divine sequential-sacrificers—along with them, o Agni, you are the best sacrificer among the Hotars.
2. Pursue the office of Hotar and of Potar of the peoples. You are the Establisher of Thought and the Giver of Wealth, possessing the truth.
   (When) at the svāhā-call we shall make the oblations, let Agni the god sacrifice to the gods, (himself) deserving it.
3. We have come along the path of the gods, to carry forward along it what we can.
   Agni is the one who knows: he will perform the sacrifice; just he is the Hotar. He will arrange the rites, he the ritual sequences.
4. If we shall confound the commandments of you who know, o gods—we who are so very unknowing—knowing Agni fulfills all this through the ritual sequences by which he will arrange the gods.

5. If, naively in their thinking and scant in skill, mortals do not pay heed to the sacrifice, discerning Agni, the Hotar, finding the resolve, will sacrifice to the gods as best sacrificer according to the ritual sequence.
6. Because the begetter has begotten you as the face of all the rites, their brilliant beacon, so win by sacrifice, throughout the lands filled with superior men, eagerly sought cattle-rich refreshments belonging to all peoples.
7. You whom Heaven and Earth, you whom the waters, you whom Tvaṣṭar, the good begetter, has begotten, you, knowing the way along the path leading to the forefathers—once kindled, beam brilliantly in all directions, o Agni.

X.3 (829) Agni

Trita Āptya
7 verses: triṣṭubh

The very moment of transition from night to dawn is the event celebrated in this hymn—the time when the ritual fire is kindled. Agni's triumph over Night, a female, and his welcoming of Dawn, likewise a female, are the subjects of the first three verses, and the whole hymn is pervaded by Agni's wide shining and the many words that express his radiance and brightness.

The poet is also fond of synesthetic images, as when his journeys "kindle" calls in verse 4, or his beams "purify themselves" (the signature verb of the soma drinks) like sounds (probably of soma as well) in verse 5. The poet's pet word for Agni, aratí "spoked wheel" (vss. 1, 2, 6, and 7), presumably originally referring to the shape of the fireplace, prompts a number of chariot and journey images through the hymn (vss. 4, 6, 7).

1. The powerful spoked wheel, now kindled, has appeared, to exercise his skill—he who is Rudra-wild but of easy birth, o king.
   Observant, he beams widely with his lofty beam. Driving away black (Night), he comes to luminous (Dawn).
2. When with his form he has prevailed over black, mottled (Night), begetting the young woman [=Dawn], the child of a lofty father [=Heaven], propping upright the radiance of the sun, the spoked wheel of heaven beams widely with the Vasus.
3. The auspicious male [=Sun], in company with the auspicious female [=Dawn], has come here. As her lover, he approaches his sister from behind.

Through the days with their good portents, Agni, spreading out, has prevailed over the night with his luminous colors.

4. Of this one here—of Agni, our kindly companion—his journeys are, as it were, kindling the calls of the lofty one [=pressing stone?]; on the journey of the lofty bull worthy to be invoked, the nights appear as his own beams.
5. Whose beams, like the sounds (of soma?), purify themselves when the lofty one, bringing the good day, is shining—he who reaches heaven with his most eminent, sharpest, playful, highest radiant beams.
6. His snortings resound when he, his wheel-rim visible, is panting along with his teams—he who, the best of gods, the spoked wheel of wide extent, beams widely with his age-old, luminous, crackling (flames).
7. Convey here something great for us and take your seat here as the spoked wheel of Heaven and Earth, the two youthful ones.
   May Agni, powerfully thrusting, with his powerfully thrusting horses, the tempestuous one with his tempestuous ones, come here.

X.4 (830) Agni

Trita Āptya
7 verses: triṣṭubh

The usual high points of the birth and growth of Agni are covered in this hymn. What gives the hymn its character are the concentrated and somewhat unusual images that are studded through it. This is already evident in verse 1, where Agni (who is fire, after all) is compared to "the first drink in a wasteland"; presumably the point of comparison is that both are eagerly desired and it is not certain they will appear. A series of similes involving domestic animals follow in verses 2–3, while verses 4–6 concern the firewood that covers the nascent fire and that it begins to consume. The most elaborate and surprising image is found in verse 6, where the two arms of the priest who is tending the fire are compared to two thieves entering the woods, risking their lives. "Going into the woods" must refer to the manipulation of the firewood; the "risk" must be that of being burned. But why "thieves"? Most commentators think that the thieves are entering the wood to attack travelers and tie them up with cords—the ten cords compared to the priest's ten fingers. Perhaps, but the image is the more resonant for not being entirely transparent.

1. I begin the sacrifice to you and I propel my thought to you, so that you will become the one to be extolled at our invocations.
   You are like the first drink in a wasteland, o Agni, for Pūru who seeks to attain (you), you age-old king.

2. You, upon whom the peoples converge like cows on a warm pen, o youngest one, you are the messenger of gods and of mortals. A great one, you act the go-between through the luminous realm.
3. Raising you like a thoroughbred foal, your mother carries you, seeking your joint delight.
   From the high plain you drive eagerly along the slope. Like a herd animal set loose, you are seeking to gain your livelihood.
4. We fools do not (know) your greatness, o you who are no fool; but, observant Agni, you surely know it.
   His covering [=wood] lies still; he moves, eating it with his tongue. The clanlord licks the young woman [=offering ladle] again and again.
5. Wherever it may be, he is born anew among the old ones. He stands in the wood—a grey one with a banner of smoke.
   Although no swimmer, he pursues the waters like a bull—he whom the mortals, of one mind, lead forward.
6. Like thieves who go into the woods risking their lives, the two (arms) have harnessed (the firewood? Agni?) with ten cords [=fingers].
   Here for you, Agni, is a newer inspired thought: hitch it up like a chariot with your blazing limbs.
7. Sacred formulation and homage and this song here shall always be strengthening for you, o Jātavedas.
   Guard our progeny and posterity, o Agni, and guard our own bodies unremittingly.

X.5 (831) Agni

Trita Āptya
7 verses: triṣṭubh

A mystical and enigmatic hymn, with a number of conceptual and phraseological connections with other such hymns in the R̥gveda. There are numerous conflicting interpretations of this hymn, not surprisingly. We will just present our own, with all due caution. In our view the standard theme of the birth of Agni/the ritual fire, its growing strength, and the rise of its flames and smoke to heaven is grafted onto a treatment of the mysteries of creation and a claim that poets (or, to be more explicit, “sage poets,” kaví) have special access to these mysteries and indeed anticipate and direct the natural processes.

We should start by noting that the name Agni occurs only once in the hymn, at the beginning of the last half-verse (7c), though he is present in every verse. The hymn begins with a reference to the sea, but various parallels make it clear that this “sea” is really the sea in our heart and the source of poetic insight. The poet claims that this sea is a single entity, but that Agni, who has many births, emerges from it. Already the poet is establishing the priority of poetry over even the god Agni and the ritual he represents. Pāda c seems to describe the birth of Agni from the kindling sticks (or possibly also the two world-halves, or night and day). His later journey to heaven is anticipated by his identification with a bird in pāda d.

In verse 2 the bullish buffaloes in the same nest and the mares with which they unite are presumably the flames of the fire, mingling and twisting in the fireplace. The birth of the fire is further described in verse 3, where again the two parents referred to are probably the kindling sticks but may also represent cosmic pairings. The cosmic aspect becomes clear in verse 4, where the fire rises between the two world-halves, which nourish it. The fire rises in the midspace with its flames in verse 5, while in verse 6 it is pictured as a pillar stretching to very highest heaven. Verse 6 reprises some of the vocabulary of the beginning of the hymn: the foundation (dharúṇa) of verse 1 and the nest (nīḍá) of verse 2 and thus transports the original earthly birthplace of fire to a new location.

The final verse (7) connects this heavenward journey of the fire [/Agni] with the issue of creation. The paradoxical phrase "both the nonexistent and the existent" that famously begins the creation hymn X.129 is a signal that the undifferentiated mass of matter (for want of a better word) that precedes real creation is present in the highest heaven where the male Dakṣa, the "skillful one" (in this case identified with Agni), and the female Aditi, the pair that set the processes of creation into motion in another famous creation hymn (X.72; see esp. vss. 4–5), are born. Agni is also identified with the androgynous bovine (both bull and milk-cow) that presides over creation in another treatment thereof (III.38; see esp. vs. 7). Thus "our" just-born ritual fire is identified as both the first created thing and the creator itself, and ritual time, as so often, recapitulates cosmic time.

We have not yet said anything about the poets' role, beyond noting the assertion of priority in verse 1. In verses 2–3 the poets oversee "the track of truth" and control the thread that others (priests? gods?) are pursuing; we interpret this to mean that the poets are directing or at least keeping safe the cosmic progress of the fire (see the trails in vs. 4), and in verse 6 it is the poets who establish the boundaries that define its journey. Also in verse 2 they anticipate the endpoint of the fire's journey by setting in a secret place "the highest names." Since creation is generally viewed as the differentiation of the mass mentioned above into individual entities with "name and form," the poets' control of the hidden names in verse 2 signals their participation in the creative process.

There is much that remains unclear in this hymn, particularly the seven boundaries in verse 6. But the connection between the birth of the ritual fire and the Ur-creation, mediated by the poets, seems to be the conceptual focus of this hymn.

1. The sea is (just) one, the foundation of riches, but he, having many births, gazes out from us, from our heart.
   He attends upon the udder in the lap of the two that are hidden. The track of the bird has been set down in the middle of the wellspring.

2. Cloaking themselves [/dwelling] in the same nest, the bullish buffaloes have united with the mares.
   The sage poets protect the track of truth: they have placed in hiding the highest names.
3. The two possessing both truth and magical power have conjoined with one another. Having given him his measure, they have given birth to the babe, making him grow—him who is the navel of everything, both the moving and the fixed. They [=gods? priests?] with their mind are also pursuing the thread of the poet,
4. For the trails of truth (follow) the well-born one, and refreshments follow (him) from of old for the prize.
   The two world-halves, having cloaked themselves in their over-cloak, have strengthened (their own child) with ghee-drops and foods of honey.
5. Having bellowed [/being eager], the knowing one has carried up the seven ruddy sisters from the honey, to be seen.
   He held them, born earlier, within the midspace. Seeking a covering, he has found the one belonging to Pūṣana.
6. The sage poets have fashioned seven boundaries. To just one of these has the narrow one gone.
   The pillar stands on its foundations in the nest of the highest Āyu where the paths give out.
7. Both the nonexistent and the existent are in the highest heaven, at the birth of the skillful one in the lap of Aditi.
   Agni is for us the first-born of truth, both a bull and a milk-cow in his previous lifetime.

X.6 (832) Agni

Trita Āptya
7 verses: triṣṭubh

After the enigmas of the preceding hymn, the relative simplicity of this one comes as some relief. It begins with an annunciatory "here he is," and the remainder of the first three verses consists of relative clauses describing Agni. Relative clauses also dominate verses 5–6. The contents are fairly standard: Agni's radiance (esp. vss. 1–2), his role in the sacrifice and his reciprocal relationship with the poet and priest (vss. 3–5), and prayers for Agni's intervention in bringing help and other good things to us (vss. 6–7). These last two verses address Agni directly; in the first five verses he appears only in the 3rd person. Unlike the last hymn, in which the word agní appeared only in the last half-verse, this hymn contains a form of the name in every verse.

1. Here he is—Agni, in whose protection, in whose charge, and by whose help the singer thrives—the far-radiant one who circles around, encircled by the peerless radiant beams of the dawn rays;
2. The far-radiant one who beams afar with his radiant beams together with the gods—truthful, untiring Agni—who has pursued comradeship for his comrades, undeviating like a teamed steed;
3. Who has control of every effort to pursue the gods and has control of the dawn at its dawning throughout a full lifetime;
   Agni, upon whom a man possessing an invulnerable chariot [=sacrifice] props his oblations zealously with fortifying (hymns).
4. Grown strong with the fortifying (hymns) and being delighted by the chants, with swift flight he goes to the gods.
   As the gladdening, best-sacrificing Hotar, with his tongue Agni sprinkles the gods, mingling together (with them).
5. With hymns and reverent gestures attract him here at dawn like Indra—quivering Agni, whom the inspired poets hymn with their thoughts—Jātavedas, the tongue of the overpowering (gods).
6. You in whom all good things have joined together, like horses forming a team at a contest in their own way—o Agni, attract here, near to us, the forms of help most cherished by Indra.
7. Then, o Agni, because, having sat down with greatness, immediately on being born you became the one to be invoked, the gods followed your will. Then the foremost helpers became strong.

X.7 (833) Agni

Trita Āptya
7 verses: triṣṭubh

This last of the Trita Āptya hymns is not particularly noteworthy, though it shows some affinities with hymns earlier in the Trita Āptya sequence. Verses 5–6 point to Agni's role as "seasonal sacrificer" (ṛtv-íj), a role explored in X.2. Agni's supreme competence as a sacrificer is contrasted with the potential incompetence of the mortal sacrificer in verse 4, as in X.2.5. Otherwise the hymn seems primarily concerned with the material gain that will come to the mortal sacrificer for his ritual efforts (see esp. vss. 1d, 2, 4, and 7).

1. Provide well-being to us from heaven and from earth, (for us) to sacrifice for a full lifetime, o god Agni.

Might we be accompanied by your visible signs, o wondrous one. Make wide space for us in exchange for our wide lauds, o god.

2. These thoughts were born for you, o Agni. They applaud your generosity with its cows and horses, when the mortal has attained the benefit from you, acquiring it by (these) thoughts, o well-born good one.
3. I consider Agni our father, Agni our friend, Agni our brother and our comrade forever.
   I do honor to the face of lofty Agni, the worshipful luminous (face) of the Sun in heaven.
4. Our insights are effective and bring gain to us, o Agni. Whomever you, as his own Hotar, safeguard in his house,
   (let) that truthful one (be) possessed of chestnut horses and much livestock; for him let there be treasure throughout the days and daytimes.
5. To the one established throughout the days like an ally for the harnessing, the ancient sequential-sacrificer and lover of the rite, to Agni did the Āyus give birth with their arms and install among the clans as their Hotar.
6. Perform sacrifice by yourself to the gods in heaven, o god. How can a callow man without discernment do it for you?
   Just as you sacrificed to the gods, o god, according to the ritual sequences, so perform sacrifice to your own body, o well-born one.
7. Become our helper, Agni, and our herdsman; become the creator of vitality and the provider of vitality for us.
   And grant to us the giving of oblations, o very great one, and safeguard our bodies unremittingly.

X.8 (834) Agni (1–6), Indra (7–9)

Triśiras Tvāṣṭra
9 verses: triṣṭubh

Although the Anukramaṇī assigns this hymn, along with the following one (X.9 to the Waters), to a different poet from the first seven Agni hymns of the maṇḍala, which are attributed to Trita Āptya, it is fairly clear that these nine hymns belong together, on the basis of criteria like shared phraseology, as well as larger structural considerations. (See Oldenberg 1888: 233–34.) The poet of X.8–9 is given as Triśiras Tvāṣṭra, a speaking name: "Three-Headed Son of Tvaṣṭar" and a figure who is the mythological enemy of Trita. Thus, as Oldenberg saw, the two poets to whom this sequence of nine hymns is ascribed are narratively linked, and both names were probably assigned as poets to these hymns because of the mythological narrative sketched in this particular hymn.

Trita's defeat of his three-headed foe, also known as Viśvarūpa ("having all forms"), is treated in the last three verses of our hymn (7–9). The myth goes back to Indo-Iranian times in one form or other. In the Younger Avestan Hom Yašt (Yasna 9–11), Zarathushtra asks the Haoma (= Skt. Soma) the names and stories of the men who first pressed him. In Y 9.7–8 Haoma names a certain Āϑβiia (note the similarity to, but not identity with, Āpt(i)ya) as the second man to press him, whose son, Θraētaona, smote a mighty serpent-dragon (Aži Dahāka; cf. the Sanskrit cognate áhi "serpent" frequently used of Vr̥tra) with three heads (ϑrikamərəδa; cf. mūrdhán "head" in vss. 3 and 6 of this hymn). Immediately thereafter (Y 9.10–11) he identifies Θrita (= Skt. Trita) as his third presser, one of whose sons defeats another formidable dragon (also aži) in a particularly imaginative fashion. The names Āϑβiia and Θrita, though differently distributed, and the three-headed monster speak strongly for the kinship of the two myths, though they are not identical in all their features.

What is not clear is why this little mythic vignette has been appended at the end of this Agni cycle, though we will suggest some reasons at the end of the introduction. Here and elsewhere in Vedic the story of Trita Āptya's slaying of three-headed Viśvarūpa is associated with Indra (even in this hymn; see vss. 8–9), not Agni, and it is assimilated in several ways to the better-known Vala myth—generally an Indra myth. First, Trita Āptya begins his quest in a cave or hole of some sort (vs. 7a), and the happy result of the defeat of Viśvarūpa is the release of his cows (vss. 8–9)—just as the cows confined in the Vala cave are released at the end of that myth. Moreover, the "familial" (vs. 7) or "ancestral" (vs. 8) weapons Trita employs in the fight appear to be mental and verbal (see especially the "visionary thought" he seeks in 7b and his "speaking" his weapons in 7d). In the Vala myth Indra and his helpers, the Aṅgirases, break open the cave with verbal spells, not physical weapons. Since the corresponding Avestan version does not have these elements, it is likely that these Vala-like features were grafted onto the inherited myth, whose popularity was perhaps waning in R̥gvedic times. (It does have a robust revival in Vedic prose.)

The first few verses of the hymn for the most part contain standard Agni fare, though with a cosmic dimension. The fire, conceived of also as a powerful male animal, reaches through the worlds to heaven itself (vs. 1), just after it is born (vs. 2). His birth and installation are further treated in verse 3, where the ritual references probably also have cosmic referents. The hymn begins to take an odd turn in verse 4. In that verse Agni "sets seven steps," thereby "begetting an alliance (or, the god Mitra)." The seven-step reference is to the culminating ritual action particularly of the marriage ceremony, after which the marriage is irrevocable, when the bride and groom take seven steps together; other alliances can be assimilated to the marriage alliance by the performance of the seven steps (see Jamison 1996a: 120–23). These seven steps are always taken beside the ritual fire, and as Proferes (2007) has discussed at length (on this particular passage, see p. 61), the fire is also a symbol of the alliances made by social groups. Through those alliances the fire itself is strengthened and increased, hence the "for the sake of your own body" in this verse. The reason for this intrusion of the social world at this point in the hymn is unclear, since heretofore the focus has been entirely on Agni. In the following verses (5–6) Agni is identified with, or transformed into, a series of divinities and functional roles. Perhaps these identifications were suggested by the alliance generated in verse 4, representing the web of associations in which Agni participates.

The six Agni verses end with Agni setting his head (mūrdhán) in heaven. As noted above, the hymn in fact contains two occurrences of mūrdhán (vss. 3, 6), and its Avestan cognate kamərəδan (with pejorative ka-prefix), in the bahuvrīhi θri-kamərəδa "having three heads," qualifies the monster killed by Āϑβiia's son. The corresponding form in the Trita myth in this hymn has a different word for head, -śíras- (acc. sg. m. tri-śīrṣā́ṇam, vs. 8). However, the R̥gveda does contain an occurrence of tri-mūrdhán—but referring to Agni, in the phrase trimūrdhā́naṃ saptáraśmim "having three heads and seven reins" (I.146.1). The three heads are most likely the three ritual fires, the seven reins possibly the seven priests, but the important thing is that this same phrase, "having three heads and seven reins," is found in our hymn X.8, describing the enemy Viśvarūpa (8c). This, we would submit, is the initial point of contact between this Agni hymn and the Trita saga appended to it: the old Indo-Iranian myth used the word tri-mr̥Hdhan* for the three-headed beast. But the epithet can also be used positively as a descriptor of Agni with his three representative fires on the ritual ground. The poet is playing with the delicious positive/negative polarities of the epithet, and signals the connection between the Agni portion of the hymn and the little Trita myth by using the word originally used of the monster, mūrdhán, elsewhere in the hymn.

But there may be another connection. As we noted, Agni undergoes several transformations in the last verses of his section of the hymn. And it is quite possible that verse 7 is suggesting yet another transformation, into Trita or "the third (fire)," being born in the fireplace, seeking poetic vision and ritual release. Agni sometimes seems to be called Trita (see esp. X.46.3, 6), and the Trita/Viśvarūpa story may be introduced here via a modulation through Agni identified with Trita.

1. With his lofty beacon Agni drives forth; the bull keeps bellowing to the two world-halves.
   He has reached up even to the farthest ends of heaven; the buffalo has grown strong in the lap of the waters.
2. He rejoices as an embryo, as a hump-backed bull. No miscarriage, the calf has bellowed vehemently.
   Causing (the oblations) to be lifted up to the conclave of gods, he goes first within his own dwelling places.
3. He who has seized the head of his two parents [=Heaven and Earth? kindling sticks?], (him) they [=priests] have set down at the rite as the sun's undulating flood.
   At his flight the ruddy females [=flames? dawns?] with the horse [=fire?] as their foundation find pleasure in their own bodies within the womb of truth.

4. Because you go at the forefront of every dawn, o good one, you have become the far-radiant one at (the time of) the twins [=Night and Dawn?].
   For truth you have set your seven steps, begetting an alliance [/Mitra] for the sake of your own body.
5. You become the eye and herdsman of great truth; you become Varuṇa when you pursue (your tasks) for truth.
   You become the Child of the Waters, o Jātavedas; you become the messenger of him in whose oblation you will take pleasure.
6. You become the leader of the sacrifice and of airy space, where you are accompanied your kindly teams of horses.
   In heaven you have set your head, which wins the sun, and you have made your tongue to be the conveyor of oblations, o Agni.
7. With his resolve, Trita [/the "third" fire], within a cave [/cover]—seeking a visionary thought according to the ways of his distant forefather, longing for companionship in the lap of his parents, speaking his own familial weapons—pursues (his tasks).
8. That one, Āptya, knowing his ancestral weapons, urged on by Indra, attacked.
   Having smashed the three-headed, seven-reined (monster), Trita let loose the cows, even those of Tvaṣṭar's son.
9. Indra split (the heads) off the one trying to reach up to much power—the lord of settlements (split them off) the one who thought himself (the same).
   Having made the cows of Viśvarūpa, the son of Tvaṣṭar, his own, he twisted off his three heads.

X.9 (835) Waters

Triśiras Tvāṣṭra or Sindhudvīpa Āmbarīṣa
9 verses: gāyatrī, except triṣṭubh 8–9

The last four verses of this hymn (6–9) are identical with I.23.20–23 (save for the absence of I.23.20d) and treat the healing and expiatory properties of the Waters, who provide healing remedies (vss. 6–7) while also carrying away the detritus of moral misbehavior (vs. 8). The paradox of "fire in the waters" (as embodied elsewhere in the figure of Apām Napat "Child of the Waters," identified with Agni) is also alluded to in verses 6 and 8. The healing and life-giving qualities of the Waters are also found in the two preceding verses (4–5).

The first three verses of the hymn stand somewhat apart from the remainder of the hymn and progress from the bland and generic to a rather surprising conclusion. Verse 1 simply describes the Waters as refreshing and asks them for nourishment and happiness. In verse 2 the refreshment is specified as juice or sap (rása) and implicitly compared to breast milk, since the Waters themselves are compared to mothers. And then there is the very puzzling verse 3, which can only be understood as an enlargement of that simile, for it is said that the Waters "animate and beget us." But even more puzzling than their apparent role in giving birth to "us" is their purpose in so doing: so that we will go to be "fit" for the dwelling of an unidentified third party. This third party is generally assumed, most likely correctly, to be the patron of the sacrifice, and the poet/sacrificer calls upon the Waters to (re)vivify him, send him to the house of the patron, and make him fit to render service to this patron in the form of hymns and ritual labor—but the stark economy with which this sentiment is expressed challenges the modern interpreter.

1. Since you Waters are sheer refreshment, so destine us for nourishment and to see great happiness.
2. Your most beneficent juice—make us have a share in that here, like eager mothers (their milk).
3. Let us, as your (offspring), go to be fit for him for whose peaceful dwelling you animate and beget us, o Waters.
4. Let the goddesses, the Waters, be luck for us to prevail, for us to drink.
   Let them flow to us for luck and life.
5. Those who are mistresses of things of value, ruling over the settled domains,
   the Waters do I beseech for a healing remedy.
6. "Within the waters," Soma said to me, "are all healing remedies and Agni who is weal to all."
7. O Waters, fully grant healing and protection for my body and (for me) to see the sun for a long time.
8. O Waters, carry this away, whatever trouble is in me—whether I have committed deceit or I have cursed—as well as untruth.
9. O Waters, today I have followed (you). We have united with your sap.
   Full of milk, o Agni, come here. Merge me with luster.

The next ten hymns (X.10–19) form a Yama cycle, though the subject matter found in the individual hymns is quite various. Yama, the son of Vivasvant, is king of the land of the dead because he was the first mortal to die. Yet he was apparently born immortal (see esp. I.83.5) and chose to become mortal, subject to death, "for the sake of the gods . . . and for the sake of offspring" (X.13.4). The opening hymn in the cycle, the dialogue of Yama and his twin sister Yamī, on the fraught topic of embarking on incestuous sex in order to produce offspring, addresses Yama's change of status and his choice, but in a deliberately oblique and misleading fashion, as Yama spurns the sexual advances of his sister, and at the end of their bitter argument there seems little likelihood of children.

The last six hymns in this cycle (X.14–19) are collectively known as funeral hymns. The first, X.14, is devoted especially to Yama in his role as king of the realm of the dead, while the others, especially 15–18, concern various aspects of death and the treatment of the dead—for example, the forefathers who preceded us to Yama's realm in X.15, the cremation fire in X.16, the funeral itself in X.18. The intermediate hymns, X.11–13, have less superficially clear connections to the Yama saga, but both X.12 (vss. 6–7) and X.13 (vss. 4–5) make important comments on Yama and on Yama's choice.

There is also an underlying unifying theme, that of duality and twinned-ness: the absolute disjunction between and the ultimate complementarity and unity of the mortal and the immortal, life and death, men and gods, men and women, heaven and earth, sacred and profane. It is appropriate that the cycle should begin with the dialogue between the primal twins, Yama and Yamī, whose very names mean "twin" and who bridge the gap between mortal and immortal.

X.10 (836) Dialogue of Yama and Yamī

Yama Vaivasvata and Yamī Vaivasvatī
14 verses: triṣṭubh

This justly famous (and much discussed) hymn presents a tense dialogue between a pair of twins, the male Yama and female Yamī (yamá means "twin"; yamī́ is the feminine form), who become the first mortals. Yamī́, who speaks first, urges her twin brother to have sex with her, so that they can have children and continue their line in the approved manner. Yama indignantly rejects her advances, outraged by the idea of incest and certain that the divine guardians of moral order will see the act and punish them.

It is impossible in a short introduction to do justice to the richness of this hymn and the extraordinary skill with which the poet deploys grammatical categories such as person, number, and verb modality in service of the condensed drama of their encounter. Both Yamī and Yama make legalistic arguments, often using juridical turns of phrase, and especially in the first part of the hymn they distance the personal and emotional implications of their speech by regularly using plural and 3rd-person forms to refer to each other. It is not until the last word of verse 4 that one of them uses a 1st-person dual ("we two") form. They also use dueling divine models for the relationships they are arguing for: Yama cites their near ancestors, "the Gandharva in the waters and the watery maiden," as reason not to violate the incest taboo (vs. 4) and Mitra and Varuṇa as stern enforcers (vs. 6) with spies everywhere (vs. 8)—while Yamī claims that Tvaṣṭar, who shapes embryos in the womb, made them a married couple already in the womb (vs. 5) and twice (vss. 5, 9) invokes as their divine counterparts Heaven and Earth, a notoriously incestuous pair (as she makes quite explicit in 9c). The use and placement of kinship terms in the hymn is also notable, including the fact that "brother" and "sister" are not encountered until verse 11. It is also striking that the names of the speakers do not appear until verse 7.

The emotional temperature of the hymn rises significantly at that very point. Yamī abandons her legalistic arguments—that they need to have offspring, that they were already a married couple in the womb—in favor of a naked expression of sexual desire. Yama remains unmoved, but the roiling emotions are reflected in the ragged meter of some of the later verses (12–13), especially in the latter verse where Yamī breaks off her speech in frustration in a very short pāda containing two occurrences of a word (batá) found nowhere else and exhibiting aberrant phonology. Our rendering of the word aims at the level of slangy insult to which batá appears to belong.

The hymn ends in an impasse. Yama remains obdurate and urges Yamī to find another lover—a difficult quest when there are no other mortals! However, given the rest of his history, sketched briefly above, we must assume that he gave in in the end, on the evidence of X.13.4.

1. [Yamī:] I would turn my partner right here to partnership—even though he has gone across many (realms), across the flood.
   A (ritual) adept should provide a grandson for his father, envisioning his furtherance on the earth.
2. [Yama:] Your partner doesn't want that partnership, in that she [=sexual partner] will have the same "marks" [=family characteristics] (though) dissimilar form [=gender].
   The sons of the great one, the heroes of the Lord, the upholders of heaven, look around widely.
3. [Yamī:] The immortals do want this: a legacy of the one and only mortal.
   Your mind has (already) been set upon my mind, upon me. As husband, you should enter the body of (your) wife.
4. [Yama:] What we have not done before, should (we do it) now? While proclaiming truths, we would [/should we] murmur untruth?
   The Gandharva in the waters and the watery maiden—that is our umbilical tie; therefore our kinship is of the highest.
5. [Yamī:] (Even) in the womb the Begetter made us two a married couple, god Tvaṣṭar, the impeller who provides all forms.
   No one transgresses his commandments. Heaven and Earth take heed of this about us.
6. [Yama:] Who knows about this first day? Who has seen it; who will proclaim it here?
   Lofty is the ordinance of Mitra and Varuṇa. Will you speak about superior men [=gods] with deviant (speech), lubricious one?
7. [Yamī:] Desire for Yama has come to me, Yamī, to lie together in the same womb [/place].
   Like a wife to her husband I would yield my body. We would "let 'er rip" like two chariot wheels.

8. [Yama:] They do not stand still; they do not blink—the spies of the gods who roam about here.
   With another than me, lubricious one, drive off straightaway; with him "let 'er rip" like two chariot wheels.
9. [Yamī:] Night and day she would do service to him. She could for an instant trip up the eye of the sun.
   The couple has the same (kin-)ties as Heaven and Earth. Yamī could bear the unbrotherly (act) of Yama.
10. [Yama:] Later generations will come, in which kin will perform the unkindred (act).
   Keep plumping up your arm as pillow for a (real) bull. Seek another than me as husband, well-portioned one.
11. [Yamī:] What will "brother" (mean) when there will be no refuge. And what will "sister," if Dissolution will come down?
   Driven by desire many times I murmur this: mingle your body with my body.
12. [Yama:] Verily, I must not mingle my body with your body. They call him evil who will go down on his sister.
   With another than me arrange your pleasures. Your brother does not want this, well-portioned one.
13. [Yamī:] You jerk, you really are a jerk, Yama! Truly we have not found mind and heart in you.
   Another (woman) will surely embrace you, like a girthband a yoked (horse), like a vine a tree.
14. [Yama:] You (will embrace) another, Yamī, and another will embrace you—like a vine a tree.
   Seek his mind—or he yours. Then make yourself a very happy compact.

X.11 (837) Agni

Havirdhāna Āṅgi
9 verses: jagatī 1–6, triṣṭubh 7–9

This hymn, which has some phraseological echoes of X.10 but lacks its mythological content, falls into two metrical parts, which correspond to its thematic structure. The last three verses (7–9), in triṣṭubh, are fairly straightforward, describing the benefits that accrue to a mortal who serves the ritual fire and calling on Agni to bring the divinities to the sacrifice and let it begin.

The first six verses, in jagatī, are far more complex, and, when viewed as a piece, without the three triṣṭubh verses at the end, turn out to have an omphalos structure: the middle pair of verses (3–4) are parallel in structure, have the phrase agníṃ hótāram "Agni (as) Hotar" opening their final pādas, and together treat both the initiation of the current sacrifice and the charter myths for the introduction of the two ritual substances, fire and soma (with concomitant juggling of verb tenses). In verse 3 the first sacrificer, Manu, is present at the kindling of the ritual fire; verse 4 sketches the famous tale of the falcon's theft of soma from heaven.

The outer verse pairs, 1–2 and 5–6, treat these two substances and their deified counterparts, fire/Agni and soma/Soma, both simultaneously and in parallel, with the referent often left unclear. The final verse of this section (6) is especially busy, with both Agni and Soma actively performing their ritual tasks at the same time (and perhaps under the same descriptions; see esp. 6c). The tentative identifications in that verse are made on the basis of the use of the phraseology in other parts of the Ṛgveda. For example, the exact phrase "he trembles with his thought" is used of Soma in IV.71.3, and the verb translated as "he displays his power" (taviṣyá) in that same pāda has Soma as its subject in its two other occurrences. However, it is very likely that the poet expected the audience to consider both possibilities for the referent in each case and to grasp thereby the underlying commonalities of the two ritual substances. The first section of the hymn is thus a simpler example of the conflation of Agni and Soma found in the fiendish hymn V.44.

1. The bull [=Soma] has milked out his draughts of milk for the bull [=Indra] by the milking of heaven—he the youthfully exuberant, undeceivable (son) of Aditi.
   He [=Agni] knows everything, as Varuṇa does, through his insight. Let him who is worthy of the sacrifice perform sacrifice throughout the sacrificial sequences.
2. The Gandharvī is murmuring, and let (that) watery maiden protect my mind all around at the bellowing of the bellowing (bull) [=Soma].
   Let Aditi set us down in the middle of what we desire. Our eldest brother [=Agni] will proclaim (it) first.
3. And even now Dawn, rich in cattle, rich in glory, accompanied by the Sun, has dawned for Manu, when they [=priests] beget Agni as Hotar for the ritual distribution—him being eager for it and following the will of those who are (also) eager.
4. And this drop here [=Soma], widespread and widely visible, has the bird, the falcon that was sent (for it), brought here to the rite, when the Ārya clans choose wondrous Agni as their Hotar. And so was his insight born.
5. You are always delightful, like pasture lands to a prosperous man, (when,) o Agni, you conduct good rites with the libations of Manu, or when, having ritually labored and having gained for the inspired poet a prize worthy of hymns, you journey near with abundant (gifts).
6. Rouse his [=Agni's] two parents [=kindling sticks], (as) a lover (rouses) his "piece of luck" [=girl]. The gladdening one [=Soma] is seeking to attain (the cows?) and sends (speech) from his heart.

The draft-horse [=Agni and/or Soma?] is speaking; the bounteous one [=Agni?] is performing his work well. The lord [=Soma?] displays his power; he trembles (in poetic inspiration) with his thought.

7. Whatever mortal will attain your favor, o Agni, son of strength, he is famed beyond (all).
   Acquiring refreshment for himself, being conveyed by his horses, brilliant and formidable, he attends upon (you) through the days.
8. When, o Agni, this assembly will become godly among the gods, a sacrificial one, o sacrificial one, and when you will share out treasures, o you of independent will, then pursue a share for us rich in goods.
9. Hear us, Agni, in your seat, in your abode. Yoke the speeding chariot of the immortal one.
   Convey here to us the two world-halves, whose sons are the gods. Don't be the absent one among the gods; you should be here!

X.12 (838) Agni

Havirdhāna Āṅgi
9 verses: triṣṭubh

On first reading, this hymn appears to be full of non-sequiturs and false starts, but further consideration allows some coherence to be wrung from it. It begins innocently enough, with two verses devoted to the sacrifice initiated by Agni as Hotar, with Heaven and Earth as witnesses—picking up the topic of the last verse of the preceding hymn (X.11.9). In our view, the third verse continues that theme: an oblation derived from a cow, probably ghee, is made into the fire; thus it is Agni's "own acquisition." This sacrificial event in some sense generates the gods and their cosmic activity, which is framed as a yájus or sacrificial formula, and it also generates the rain, the "heavenly ghee." We may see here an early example of the famous Upaniṣadic doctrine of the Five Fires and the water-cycle, whereby the oblations, produced from the plants and animals on the earth, rise to heaven as smoke and return to earth as water, to start the cycle anew. The sacrifice begun in verse 1 seems to end with verse 4, where Heaven and Earth are again (as in vs. 1) called upon to hear us. What has been added conceptually is the notion that Heaven and Earth also participate in the cycle that the sacrifice controls, by producing rain ("honey") in the course of time.

The second half of the hymn (vss. 5–8; vs. 9 is repeated from the preceding hymn, X.11.9) appears to be on another subject, or several other subjects, entirely. It begins with the worried speaker speculating on what wrong we have done to Varuṇa, contrasting the unfathomable reactions of that god with the more forthright and reliable Mitra. It ends (vs. 8cd) with the perhaps over-hopeful assertion that Mitra, along with Aditi and Savitar, will declare us blameless to Varuṇa. But the verses in between (6–7) at first seem unconnected with this current drama. It is our contention, however, that these verses, especially verse 6 about Yama, provide the mythological support for the poet's hope that his relationship with Varuṇa can be repaired.

Verse 6 needs to be read in the context of X.10, the famous dialogue between Yama and his twin sister Yamī, but also of X.13.4, another cryptic verse about Yama in this cycle of hymns. In X.10, as is well known, Yama and Yamī argue about her desire to have sex with him in order to produce offspring. He strongly resists, condemning (X.10.2) their possible pairing by characterizing it with the phrase also quoted in 6b of this hymn: sálakṣmā yád víṣurūpā bhávāti, "that (the female) will have the same 'marks' [=family characteristics] (though) dissimilar form [=gender]" in our rendering. This phrase has received many different interpretations; we believe that it defines the forbidden incestuous partner Yamī as being of the same family but of a different shape—female rather than male—as Yama. The dialogue of X.10 ends with the issue unresolved. It is X.13.4 that seems to give us the answer. In that verse Yama "chose death" for the sake of the gods and for the sake of offspring "did not choose immortality." It seems that Yama was born immortal (see esp. I.83.5) but chose to forego this state, in order to produce children and also to institute the sacrifice to the gods. This act of self-abnegation and the change of state it produced is, in our view, what is being celebrated in verse 6 here. The poet first (pāda a) mentions Yama's "immortal (name)," which he does not want to think about—since it reminds him of the taint of incest (pāda b), but his other name, by implication the "mortal" one, is a happy one to think about and ensures Agni's protection for the thinker. (Note that the actual name Yama is only mentioned in the second instance.)

In the next verse (7) we move to the seat of Vivasvant, a common kenning for the ritual ground, but in this context it is important to remember that Yama is a descendant of Vivasvant (see his patronymic in, e.g., nearby X.14.1 vaivasvatám... yamám). The juxtaposition of Yama in verse 6 and Vivasvant in verse 7 reminds the audience that Yama chose death in order to institute the sacrifice, and further reminds them that when they perform sacrifice they are replicating the actions of Yama, which transformed his bad reputation ("name difficult to contemplate") into a good one. Thus, though we still have no idea why the gods do what they do (see 7ab, 8ab), we trust in the power of our sacrifice to make things right with these inscrutable gods.

1. Heaven and Earth, who speak what is real, become the first to hear in accordance with truth, when the god, setting mortals to sacrifice, takes his seat as Hotar facing (them), as he comes to his own life.
2. As the god encompassing the gods in accordance with truth, first convey our oblation, as the observant one, possessing a beacon of smoke, foaming with radiance by kindling, you, the gladdening constant Hotar, who sacrifice better with your speech.

3. It's the god's own acquisition: the immortal (drink) that comes from the cow. "Those born therefrom uphold the two wide (worlds)"— this sacrificial formula of yours do all the gods follow, when the speckled (cow) gives as her milk the heavenly ghee, the water.
4. I sing your work [/waters], o ghee-backed pair, to strengthen (it/them). Hear me, o Heaven and Earth, you two world-halves.
   When the daytimes and the days will go (on the way) leading to the other life, then let our parents [=Heaven and Earth?] hone us with honey.

5. Why has king (Varuṇa) grasped [/complained about] us? What commandment of his have we transgressed? Who fully understands?
   For Mitra, even when angry [/moving crookedly], is like a signal-call (going) to the gods, also (like) the victory-prize of those driving (in chariots).
6. Difficult to contemplate is the name of the immortal (male) in the case "that (the female) will have the same 'marks' [=family characteristics] (though) dissimilar form [=gender]."
   Whoever will contemplate Yama's (name that is) good to contemplate— protect him unremittingly, o lofty Agni.
7. At which ritual distribution the gods reach exhilaration and uphold (the two worlds) at the seat of Vivasvant [=ritual ground]— they placed the light in the sun and the nights in the moon: the two [=sun and moon] move around the brightness [=Agni] without wearying—
8. On which cryptic thought the gods converge—we do not know it.
   May Mitra, Aditi, and god Savitar here declare us to Varuṇa to be without offense.

9. Hear us, Agni, in your seat, in your abode. Yoke the speeding chariot of the immortal one.
   Convey here to us the two world-halves, whose sons are the gods. Don't be the absent one among the gods; you should be here!

X.13 (839) The Soma Carts

Havirdhāna Āṅgi or Vivasvant Āditya
5 verses: triṣṭubh, except jagatī 5

According to the Anukramaṇī, this hymn is addressed to the two havirdhāna carts, the carts on which the soma is brought to the place of sacrifice. Although the carts are not explicitly mentioned in the hymn, this assignment is undoubtedly correct and confirmed by the recitation of the first two verses in the later canonical ritual when the carts are pushed into place. The first four verses are also found in Atharvaveda (Śaunaka) XVIII.38–41 (in slightly different order) in a large collection of funeral verses, while verse 5 is paralleled by Atharvaveda VII.57.2. The hymn presents a number of difficulties, and the conceptual relationship among the verses is not always clear. Nonetheless, for various reasons (to be sketched below) it seems likely that the R̥gvedic hymn forms a unity.

The first two verses are the clearest and have the clearest ritual content: the two soma carts are hitched up, the signal for the sacrifice is given, and the carts are brought to the sacrificial ground.

After these two verses of relative clarity, we are plunged into the numerological obscurity of verse 3—not surprisingly the middle verse with the typical form of an omphalos verse. (Oldenberg refers to its "vague mysticism" [vage Mystik] and suggests resignation as a proper response for the interpreter [1913: 135 = 1967: 822].) It does not help that the first, scene-setting pāda contains the impossible word rúp, which arouses the same bewilderment in its other occurrence, IV.5.7. Nonetheless, we can sketch some parameters for the interpretation of the verse, though our interpretation is quite insecure in detail. First, it seems to continue the ritual scenario of the first two verses, and the 1st-person speaker, with his four 1st-person verbs, matches the speaker of the first pāda of the hymn. In the first pāda of this verse we suggest (following an offhand suggestion of Oldenberg's [1913: 136 = 1967: 823]) that the "five steps" (páñca padā́ni) of the rúp (here translated "mount") are the five verses of this very hymn. The "four-footed" (cátuṣpadī) entity in the next verse must be feminine in gender, and various suggestions have been made for what noun to supply. We believe that its reference is deliberately ambiguous: it may refer to the four pādas of a verse (ŕ̥c fem.), thus continuing the (possible) theme of 3a. It has also been suggested that the noun is vartaní "course, track" (also feminine), and the speaker is literally following the track of the two soma carts, each with two wheels, thus four wheel-ruts altogether. The only other R̥gvedic occurrence of the adjective "four-footed" is in I.164.41, where it modifies the noun gaurī́ "buffalo cow" referring to Speech, which is regularly said to consist of four parts. Thus in our view this pāda refers both to ritual action (following the four wheel-ruts of the carts) and ritual speech (the four-pāda verse), and ritual speech in particular calls to mind Speech in general. In the next pāda (3c) the poet seems to make explicit the equivalence of his particular ritual speech and Speech in general by claiming to make a single syllable the equivalent of Speech herself. This mystical treatment of the ritual ends with a purification (3d).

Verse 4 veers off in a different direction and alludes obliquely to what we might call the Felix Culpa ("fortunate fall") of Yama, who, though born immortal (at least according to I.83.5 and possibly X.17.1), chose death over immortality in order to sacrifice to the gods (pāda a) and produce offspring (pādas b and d), whereas the gods constituted their sacrifice through Br̥haspati and avoided death but also do not reproduce. (So, roughly, Geldner.) This fleeting reference to Yama's choice seems to answer the question left hanging at the end of X.10—will Yama yield to Yamī's frenzied entreaties for sex or will he maintain his ascetic distance? On the basis of the offspring mentioned here, he seems to have yielded, though in the present verse the role of Yamī has been elided and the agency rests with Yama—he "chose."

But why, one may well ask, is this bit of Yama's history found in a hymn dedicated to the soma carts? It is probably more productive to ask why a hymn to the soma carts is found in this Yama cycle (X.10–19), positioned right before the funeral hymns, especially X.14 dedicated to Yama. First, remember that the Atharvaveda repetitions of the first four verses of this hymn are found in the collection of funeral verses, so to the compilers of the Atharvaveda they must have seemed appropriate to a funeral context. Note, moreover, that the carts themselves are called "twins" (yamé) in verse 2, paired with verse 4 around the omphalos verse 3; "twins" of course calls to mind the twin couple Yama and Yamī. The pairing of the two carts also reminds us of the two divergent paths, one leading to the gods (devayā́na), one to the ancestors or forefathers (pitr̥yā́na); the latter is the one that the dead follow to the world where Yama presides. This journey is a particular preoccupation of the funeral hymns, and the conflation of the twin (yamé) soma carts with the twin paths, one of which leads to Yama, may explain how the soma carts ended up in the Yama collection.

The final verse brings the hymn full circle, but with a series of tricks embedded in it. On the surface the last half of the verse returns to the ritual situation and the soma carts, which take their places (yatete) with the same phraseology as verse 2 (yátamāne). They rule over and thrive on "it" of both kinds, most likely a reference to both pure and mixed soma (cf., e.g., VIII.101.10). But the lack of explicit referents for any of the forms of "both," combined with the first half of the verse, which has nothing obvious to do with the carts, invites us to look further. The first half of the verse seems to draw the same contrast as in verse 4 between gods and mortals. While the referent in pāda a is fairly clearly Indra (the epithet "accompanied by the Maruts" being a strong clue), we are inclined to see Yama as the referent in pāda b; he who surrendered his immortality for the sake of offspring is identified as a father in conjunction with sons, in fact the mortals whom he sired after he chose death. We, the poets and sacrificers, are among these sons, and have learned our verbal craft ("have made truth [our] familiar") and produced this poem.

If we are correct in our identification of Yama as the father in 5b, there are several further implications for the structure and contents of this hymn. On the one hand, the father and sons of 5b both recall and contrast with "all the sons of the immortal one" in 1c, for those were the gods. So we have another element of a formal ring structure, but with a different referent. The contrastive pairs Indra/Yama and gods/mortals may also underlie the insistent "both/both kinds" of the second half of verse 5, where (despite the neuter [or feminine] gender of the repeated subject ubhé "both") Indra and Yama may be credited with joint rulership (note that Yama is called "king" in the first verse of the next hymn, X.14.1d) and prosperity.

To sum up and indeed to go further, this hymn, and the hymn cycle within which it is embedded, are a reflection of and a reflection on the dualities that define human existence: mortal and immortal, male and female, heaven and earth, sacred and profane, as we pointed out in the introduction to the Yama cycle as a whole. These dualities are neatly conceptually symbolized in the notion of twins, the primal twins Yama and Yamī, and in this hymn also ritually symbolized by the twin soma carts, appropriate both to the sacrifice and to the divergent paths that lead to the gods and the ancestors respectively, thus providing a proper preface to the funeral hymns that follow.

1. I yoke for you two with reverence the age-old sacred formulation. Let the signal-call of the patron go forth afar like a pathway.
   Let all the sons of the immortal one [=gods] listen (to it)—those who inhabit the heavenly domains.
2. When, taking your own places like twins, you came here, the god-seeking descendants of Manu brought you forward.
   Sit here upon your own wide space, as you know it. Become good seats for our drop.
3. I have mounted along the five steps of the mount, and I go along following the four-footed (track/verse/speech) according to commandment.
   With (just) a syllable I make a counterpart to it [=Speech?]. Upon the navel of truth I purify (it) completely.
4. For the sake of the gods he chose death and for the sake of offspring he did not choose immortality.
   They [=gods] made Bṛhaspati, the seer, into their sacrifice. Yama left behind his own dear body (as offspring).
5. The seven (rivers?) flow for the child accompanied by the Maruts [=Indra]. For their father [=Yama?] have the sons made truth their familiar.
   Both (carts) rule over it [=soma?] of both kinds. Both take their places, and thrive on the one of both kinds.

X.14 (840) Yama, etc.

Yama Vaivasvata
16 verses: triṣṭubh, except anuṣṭubh 13–14, 16 and bṛhatī 15

This is the first of the funeral hymns, and it is dedicated for the most part to Yama, the first to die and the king of the world of the dead, where the forefathers dwell and to which a newly dead person makes his way along the pitṛyā́na or "way of the forefathers." Because he was the first to die, Yama discovered this path and blazed the trail, as it were, to the pleasant, well-watered (vs. 9) pasture-land (vs. 2).

The hymn falls into three parts. Verses 1–6 offer praise to Yama as the pathfinder to the ancestral world (vss. 1–2) and then invite him to attend our sacrifice along with others, both gods and ancestors—suggesting implicitly that the pitr̥yā́na is a two-way street. It is also noteworthy that, though the gods and the forefathers respond to slightly different variants of the ritual cry (vs. 3: svā́hā for the gods versus svadhā́ for the forefathers), the mechanisms for the sacrifice to gods and forefathers are presented as more or less identical in this section and in verses 13–16, and in particular Yama is offered soma. See also the next hymn, X.15.

Verses 7–12 concern not this age-old death but a recent one. A newly dead man is addressed and urged to follow the same path, to join Yama and the ancestors in highest heaven and even to reunite with the body from which he has been temporarily separated (vss. 7–8). Potential troublemakers along the way are dismissed (vs. 9), and the dead man is escorted by the two formidable guardian dogs of Yama (vss. 10–12).

The last four verses (13–16) are in dimeter meter (save for 15c), instead of the triṣṭubh of the rest of the hymn. The first three are simple exhortations to perform sacrifice to Yama; the final verse (16) is by contrast quite opaque, with some of the typical marks of obscurity: unidentified referents (pādas a and b), numerology (pāda b), and manipulation of names of meters (pāda c). In particular, pāda b presents us with six broad feminine entities and one lofty neuter one. (The contrasting grammatical genders so obvious in the Sanskrit are not easily rendered in translation.) The six broad feminines are generally considered to be worlds or realms (on the basis of VI.47.3, which, however, doesn't have an overt referent either), and the lofty neuter some other superior type of space. Given the extreme uncertainty of the referents, the syntax (should pāda b be construed with pāda a, or with cd, or, as we have done, connected neither to what precedes nor what follows?), and the reason for the presence of this verse as the finale of this hymn, we have chosen to leave the meaning open.

1. To the one who has departed along the great slopes, having spied out the path for many, son of Vivasvant, unifier of the peoples—to Yama the king show favor with oblation.
2. Yama first found the way for us: this pasture-land is not to be taken away.
   (The way) on which our ancient forefathers departed, along that (do) those who have since been born (follow) along their own paths.
3. Mātalī having been strengthened along with the poets, Yama with the Aṅgirases, Br̥haspati with the versifiers, both those whom the gods strengthen and who strengthen the gods—the ones [=gods] become exhilarated on (the cry) "svāhā," the others [=forefathers] on "svadhā."
4. This strewn grass here, Yama—just sit here on it, in concord with the Aṅgirases, our forefathers.
   Let mantras pronounced by poets convey you hither. Become exhilarated on this oblation, o king.

5. With the Aṅgirases, deserving of the sacrifice, come hither; Yama, become exhilarated here along with the Vairūpas—
   I call upon Vivasvant, who is your father—once having sat down at this sacrifice, on this ritual grass here.
6. The Aṅgirases, our forefathers, the Navagvas, the Atharvaṇas, the Bhr̥gus deserving of soma—may we be in the favor of these who are deserving of the sacrifice; may we be also in their propitious benevolence.

7. Go forth, go forth along the ancient paths on which our ancient forefathers departed.
   You will see both kings becoming exhilarated on the svadhā(-cry), Yama and Varuṇa the god.
8. Unite with the forefathers, unite with Yama, with what has been sacrificed and bestowed, in the highest distant heaven.
   Having left behind imperfection, come home again. Unite with your body in your full luster.
9. (You all)—go away, go apart, and slink away from here. It is for him that the forefathers made this world.
   A resting place anointed with waters through the days and nights Yama gives to him.
10. Outrun the two dogs of Saramā's breed, four-eyed and brindled, along the path that leads straight to the goal.
   Then approach the forefathers who are good to find, who reach exhilaration in joint revelry with Yama.
11. Your two dogs, Yama, who are guardians, four-eyed guards of the path with their eyes on men—to them deliver him, o king. Provide for him well-being and freedom from disease.
12. The two broad-nosed, reddish-brown messengers of Yama, stealers of lives, pursue the peoples.
   Let these two here today grant a fortunate life again to us, to see the sun.

13. For Yama press the soma; for Yama pour the oblation.
   To Yama goes the sacrifice, properly prepared, with Agni as messenger.
14. For Yama pour the ghee-rich oblation and set it forth.
   He will guide us to the gods, for us to live for a long lifetime.
15. For Yama the king pour the most honeyed oblation.
   Here is homage to the seers born of old, to the age-old makers of the path.
16. He flies with the Trikadrukas. Six are broad, but just one is lofty.
   The triṣṭubh, the gāyatrī, the meters—all these are established in Yama.

X.15 (841) Pitars

Śaṅkha Yāmāyana
14 verses: triṣṭubh, except jagatī 11

This hymn is simply an expansion on the invitation in the last hymn (X.14.4–6) to the forefathers to come to our sacrifice. They are repeatedly urged to sit on the ritual grass, to partake of the offerings, including soma, and to provide us with material and spiritual benefits in return. The language is quite straightforward, with very few verbal tricks. Only in verse 3 do we encounter a turn of phrase that invites our inquiry: in the first half of the verse "I" find not only the forefathers on the ritual ground but also "the grandson/child" (nápāt) and the "stride of Viṣṇu." The "grandson" may be a reference to Agni, often called "child of strength" (ū́rjo nápāt) and also frequently identified with the "Child of the Waters" (Apām Napāt), but it may also and simultaneously refer to the various descendants of the returning forefathers, descendants who would be present at the ritual and serving at it. As for Viṣṇu's wide stride, most commentators take this as the highest heaven, that is, the last of Viṣṇu's three strides. But it is hard to understand how this would be found "here"; we think rather that it refers to Viṣṇu's first stride, which measures out the earth, and in this case that it is a specific reference to the delineated sacrificial space.

Toward the end of the hymn, the god Agni becomes prominent (vss. 9–14) and his special relationship with the forefathers—as their cremation fire—is alluded to (esp. vss. 11, 14).

1. Let the nearer ones rise up, up the further, up those in the middle—the forefathers deserving of soma.
   Those who have gone to (their next) life avoiding the wolf, knowing the truth, let those forefathers help us at the invocations.
2. Let this homage here today be for the forefathers—those who went previously, those who went later, those who are seated here in the earthly realm, or who are now among the clans of good community.
3. I have found here the forefathers good to find and the grandson and the wide stride of Viṣṇu.
   Those who, sitting on the ritual grass, share in the pressed soma and the food at (the cry of) "svadhā," they are the most welcome arrivals here.
4. You forefathers who sit on the ritual grass inclined this way with your aid, we have made these oblations for you. Enjoy!
   Come here with your most luck-bringing help. Then provide for us luck and lifetime without flaw.
5. The forefathers deserving of soma have been summoned here to the dear stores on the ritual grass.
   Let them come hither, let them listen (to us) here; let them speak on (our) behalf, let them help us.

6. Having bent your knee, having sat down to the south, greet this sacrifice here—all of you.
   Do not harm us, o forefathers, because of any offense that we may do to you in our human way.
7. Sitting in the lap of the ruddy (Dawns?), provide wealth for the pious mortal.
   To your sons, o forefathers, hold out (a portion) of this good thing. Provide nourishment here.
8. Those ancient forefathers of ours deserving of soma, the Vasiṣṭhas, who journeyed along to the soma-drinking, in joint enjoyment with them let Yama—he eager with them eager—eat the oblations according to their desire.
9. Those who have thirsted, panting, among the gods, those knowing the priestly functions, those fashioned by praise along with chants—with them, o Agni, drive here, turned this way—with the forefathers who are good to find and truly here, the poets who sit by the gharma drink.
10. Those who are truly here—eating oblations, drinking oblations, taking their place on the same chariot with Indra, with the gods—with them, o Agni, drive here—with the thousand god-extolling, further, earlier forefathers, who sit by the gharma-drink.
11. Sweetened by Agni, o forefathers, come here. Sit each on his own seat, you of good guidance.
    Eat the oblations set forth on the ritual grass. Then provide wealth in hale heroes.
12. You, Agni Jātavedas, reverently invoked, have conveyed the oblations, having made them very fragrant.
    You have presented them to the forefathers; they have eaten them at (the cry of) "svadhā." (Now) you, o god—eat the oblations set forth.
13. Both the forefathers who are here and those who are not here, both those whom we know and those whom we do not know, you know how many they are, o Jātavedas. Through your own powers [/at svadhā-calls], enjoy the well-performed sacrifice.
14. Those burned by fire and those not burned by fire who become exhilarated at (the cry of) "svadhā" in the middle of heaven, along with them (go) as sovereign king (on the way) leading to (the other) life. Arrange your body as you wish.

X.16 (842) Agni

Damana Yāmāyana
24 verses: triṣṭubh, except anuṣṭubh 11–14

The focus on the cremation fire in the last part of the preceding hymn (X.15) is enlarged upon here. This fire is seen both as a blessed release of the dead man to the realm of the ancestors and as a menace to the vulnerable dead body. This ambivalence is clearly on display in the first verse, where the fire is begged not to burn up the body, but, on the other hand, to make the dead man "cooked" and ready to go to the forefathers. The same sentiment is repeated in verse 2, and the journey undertaken. The dead body itself is addressed in verse 3, with its parts consigned to the corresponding cosmic entities. Two more verses to Agni follow (4–5), continuing the themes of verses 1–2. In verses 6–7 the body is addressed again: in verse 6 it is reassured that the physical indignities it has undergone since death will be fixed by the cremation fire and by soma, but in verse 7 it is urged to protect itself against the same fire. The cremation seems to end with verse 8.

With the cremation concluded, the next verses (9–12) treat the inauspicious but powerful cremation fire and the means to render it harmless and to reintegrate it into the generally auspicious sphere of fire. The "flesh-eating fire" is first explicitly distinguished from "the other" fire, the ritual fire that receives the oblations to the gods, and the flesh-eating fire is assigned the task of taking the sacrifice to the ancestors and bringing them to the sacrifice here. Since this task is parallel to that of the other fire, the gods' ritual mediator, the negative aspects of the flesh-eating fire can be set aside, and it can be conceptually reconfigured as a positive force, a transformation completed in verse 12.

In the final two verses (13–14) the place where the cremation took place returns to nature, with the fire extinguished and plants growing again. The import of the final apostrophe to a cool and chilly feminine entity is clear, even though the referent (a water plant?) is not.

1. Don't burn him through, Agni; don't scorch him; don't singe his skin, nor his body.
   When you will make him cooked to readiness, Jātavedas, then impel him forth to the forefathers.
2. When you will have made him cooked to readiness, Jātavedas, then deliver him to the forefathers.
   When he will embark on the (way) leading to (the other) life, then he will lead at the will of the gods.
3. Let your eye go to the sun, your life-breath to the wind. Go to heaven and to earth as is fitting.
   Or go to the waters, if it has been fixed for you there. Take your stand in the plants with your limbs.
4. The goat is your portion. With your heat, heat it up. Let your flame heat it up, let your beam.
   The propitious bodies that are yours, o Jātavedas, with those convey him to the world of good (ritual) performers.
5. Release him again to the forefathers, o Agni—the one who, offered to you, proceeds by his own powers.
   Clothing himself in life, let him go in pursuit of his remains: let him unite with his body, o Jātavedas.

6. What of yours the black omen-bird pecked at, or the ant, the serpent, or the dog-footed (beast), let omnivorous Agni make it free from curse, and Soma, who has entered the brahmins.
7. Make for yourself an enveloping armor against fire with (the flesh of) cows. Cover yourself entirely with grease and fat, lest the bold one, bristling with his flame, fasten himself around you, intending to utterly burn you up.
8. This beaker here, o Agni—don't overturn it. It is dear to the gods and to those deserving of soma [=forefathers]— the beaker that is the drinking vessel of the gods—in it the immortal gods find their exhilaration.
9. Flesh-eating Agni I send off in the distance. Carrying away defilements, let him go to those who have Yama as king.
   Here let only this one, the other Jātavedas, carry the oblations to the gods, knowing what's ahead.
10. The flesh-eating Agni who entered your house, though he saw this one here, the other Jātavedas—that god I take for the sacrifice to the forefathers. He will send the gharma (drink) to the highest seat.
11. The flesh-conveying Agni who will sacrifice to the forefathers, who are strong through truth, he will proclaim the oblations to the gods and the forefathers.
12. Eagerly we would install you; eagerly we would kindle you.
    Eagerly convey the eager forefathers here, to eat the oblation.
13. The one whom you have entirely burnt, Agni, that one extinguish in turn.
    Let the kiyāmbu plant grow here and the pākadūrvā and the vyalkaśā.
14. O cool lady full of cooling, chilly lady full of chill, join together with the lady frog—stimulate this fire here.

X.17 (843) Various Divinities: Saraṇyū (1–2), Pūṣan (3–6), Sarasvatī (7–9), the Waters (10, 14), the Waters or Soma (11–13)

Devaśravas Yāmāyana
14 verses: triṣṭubh, except anuṣṭubh or purastādbr̥hatī 13, anuṣṭubh 14

This hymn consists of a disparate collection of segments, which do not seem to form a coherent whole and which do not always have an obvious connection to the death/funeral context of this cycle of hymns.

The first two enigmatic verses may well be the most discussed of all R̥gvedic mythological sketches, although this wide-ranging and ongoing discussion has not brought as much clarity as could be desired. The verses provide us with a skeletal three-generation mythological family tree, with a father, the god Tvaṣṭar, and his daughter, who is identified as both mother of Yama and wife of Vivasvant. All this is fairly clearly set out in the first verse: it opens with a Svayaṃvara ("self-choice marriage") invitation issued by the father for his daughter, to which the whole world responds (1ab), and the second half (1cd) appears to summarize the results of that marriage—the husband chosen apparently being Vivasvant, and the child issuing from the marriage apparently being Yama. (It should be noted, though, that the identity of Tvaṣṭar's daughter [1a] with the mother of Yama [1c] and wife of Vivasvant [1d] is only implicit from context, not expressly stated, and her name is not given in vs. 1.) The only disquieting part of this verse comes with the last word: "she disappeared" (nanāśa). This word sets the stage for its companion verse.

The second verse considerably muddies the clean lines of our initial family tree. It turns out that the vanished woman of verse 1 was actually hidden away (2a) by an unnamed set of individuals—perhaps the gods, who create and pass off on (the unsuspecting?) Vivasvant a simulacrum of his wife (2b). In the second half of the verse the neat maternal line of 1c is likewise made obscure: someone (the original woman? the simulacrum?) bears the Aśvins (2c), and she (or the other female) leaves behind (abandons? leaves as a legacy?) two unnamed paired ones (2d). Yama, the son in 1c, is not mentioned by name, but he may lurk as part of the two in 2d (Yama and Yamī? Yama and Manu?), who could on the other hand be the aforementioned Aśvins. Each of these possibilities has had its scholarly champions (and it has in fact also been argued that 2d refers to two pairs, that is four in all). The last word of verse 2 is the feminine name Saraṇyū (lit., "hastening"), seeming to identify our protagonist, but the name provides little help, and could, in principle, belong to either the original or the duplicate woman.

All in all, the two verses seem deliberately and cleverly designed to mislead and confuse, and in that they have admirably succeeded, beginning with the retellings of the story in the later Vedic tradition and continuing to this day. The myth has also often been invoked in a comparative Indo-European context. (For a recent discussion of the history of scholarship and for his own Indo-European interpretation, see Jackson 2006: Part II: esp. 72–93.) This is not the place to produce a full treatment of the myth behind the verses or its various interpretations; suffice it to say that we are inclined to see the paired two in 2d as Yama and Yamī, in part because a connection with Yama's history is the only way to make sense of the inclusion of these verses here.

The relevance of the next set of verses (4–6), to Pūṣan, is considerably clearer. Pūṣan as the good guide and finder of lost livestock makes an excellent psychopomp, leading the dead along the dangerous path to the next world.

The goddess, and river, Sarasvatī is addressed in the next three verses (7–9), with a final verse (10) to the Waters in general. Sarasvatī here seems especially connected with the dead forefathers and the offerings to them at the ritual (esp. vss. 8–9); this may be an early foreshadowing of the later ritual offering of water to the dead, or, as verse 10 suggests, connected with the general purificatory power of waters (see X.9.6–9 earlier in this maṇḍala).

Verses 10–13 concern the "drop" (drapsá) and are addressed in the 2nd person to Soma, who is never named but clearly identifiable from his characteristic vocabulary. There is no mention of the forefathers or of anything related to a funeral, and there is no obvious reason why these verses should have been attached to this hymn. Indeed, the final purificatory verse (14) would follow better directly on verse 10.

1. "Tvaṣṭar is arranging a wedding for his daughter": (on hearing) thus, all this world comes together.
   The mother of Yama, the wife of great Vivasvant, while being conveyed around (on her wedding journey), went missing.
2. They hid her away, the immortal, from the mortals. Having made a female of the same appearance, they gave her to Vivasvant.
   And she was carrying the Aśvins (in the womb), as it happened, and she left behind the two, the paired ones [=Yama and Yamī?]—Saraṇyū.

3. Let Pūṣan stir you forth from here—the wise one, whose livestock doesn't get lost, the herdsman of the world.
   He will deliver you to these forefathers; Agni (will deliver you) to the gods who are good to find.
4. Āyu ("Lifetime") having a complete lifetime will protect you all around. Let Pūṣan protect you from in front on the path forward.
   Where those of good action sit, where they have gone, there let god Savitar place you.
5. Pūṣan knows all these regions through and through: he will lead us along the least perilous (way).
   Granting well-being, the glowing one, possessing hale heroes—not keeping distant, let him go in front, foreknowing.
6. On the forward path of paths was Pūṣan born, on the forward path of heaven, on the forward path of earth.
   He wanders back and forth to both the dearest seats, foreknowing.

7. Sarasvatī do those seeking the gods invoke, Sarasvatī when the ceremony is being extended.
   Sarasvatī did those of good action invoke. Sarasvatī will give a thing of value to the pious.
8. O Sarasvatī, you who drove on the same chariot with the forefathers, becoming exhilarated at the svadhā(-calls), o goddess—having taken your seat here on this ritual grass, bring yourself to exhilaration. Provide us refreshments that bring no disease.
9. Sarasvatī, whom the forefathers invoke, as they arrive at the sacrifice in the south—provide here a portion of refreshment worth thousands and thriving of wealth among the sacrificers.

10. Let the waters, the mothers cleanse us; let them, ghee-pure, purify us with their ghee, for the goddesses carry forth every defilement. I rise up from them gleaming, purified.

11. The drop spurted through the first days, both through this womb here and the former one.
    I offer the drop circling around through the same womb, according to the seven priestly functions.
12. Your drop that spurts and your plant that is set in motion by the arms, from the lap of the Holy Place, or from the Adhvaryu or from the filter, that one of yours I offer with my mind when the vaṣaṭ-cry is made.
13. Your drop that has spurted, your plant, and what is below and what beyond the ladle—let this god Bṛhaspati pour it all together for benefit.

14. Full of milk are the plants, full of milk my little speech.
    Full of milk indeed is the milk of the waters. With it cleanse me altogether.

X.18 (844) Death, etc.

Saṃkusuka Yāmāyana
14 verses: triṣṭubh, except 11 prastārapaṅkti, 13 jagatī, 14 anuṣṭubh

This lovely hymn falls into several sections, each treating the end of the funeral service. The first six verses depict the mourners leaving the service and returning to their lives. Death is dismissed in verse 1, and in verses 2–3 the living turn back to an enhanced life, full of "dancing and laughter" (vs. 3). They are separated from death by a barrier (vs. 4); in the later ritual a stone is set down near the grave. Verses 5–6 are especially concerned with the orderly sequence of life and death, in particular the fear that the younger will die before their elders and disrupt the proper sequence (see esp. 5cd).

The next three verses (7–9) have been much discussed, especially in the context of "suttee" (satī) or widow-burning, though the verses are emphatically not a depiction thereof. From verse 8 it appears that the widow lies down, temporarily, beside her dead husband, but is summoned back to life and indeed symbolically reborn to become the wife of a new husband (quite possibly her brother-in-law, in levirate marriage). The happy women in verse 7 apparently approach the funeral pyre to adorn the widow for her return to life. A similar "return to life" is granted the dead man's bow in verse 9, where someone, quite possibly the dead man's son, repossesses the bow to put it to future use.

The burial is the subject of verses 10–13, with an emphasis on the softness and gentleness of the welcoming earth, both mother and bride, which lies lightly on the dead man. Verse 13 forms a sort of ring with verse 1, with both expressing a prohibition against harm with the same construction and the same root √riṣ (1d mā́… rīriṣaḥ, 13b mā́… riṣam). This ring defines the final verse (14) as outside the hymn proper, and other indications support this extra-hymnic status. It is in dimeter meter, instead of the trimeter that prevails elsewhere, and the Aśvalāyana Gr̥hya Sūtra, which treats the ritual usage of all the other verses, ignores it, as does the medieval commentator Sāyaṇa. The sense of this verse is also much disputed. Many scholars think that the poet is predicting his own future death, on a day that is approaching him, in the first hemistich, and in the second he restrains his speech in anticipation. (As Geldner says, rather more dramatically than usual, "der Rest ist Schweigen" [the rest is silence].) In contrast, we consider this to belong to the typical genre of hymn-final meta-poetic verses, in which the poet comments on his own skill in producing the poem that precedes. By this interpretation, the first half-verse concerns the well-conducted funeral that has just taken place, while the second refers specifically to the poet's taming and controlling the speech that accompanied that ritual.

1. Depart, Death, along the further path, which is your own, different from the one leading to the gods.
   To you who possess eyes and who listen do I speak: do not harm our offspring nor our heroes.
2. Effacing the footprint of death when you have gone, establishing for yourselves a longer, more extended lifetime, swelling up with offspring and wealth, become cleansed and purified, o you who are worthy of the sacrifice.
3. These the living have turned aside from the dead. The invocation of the gods has become favorable for us today.
   We have gone facing forward to dancing, to laughter, establishing for ourselves a longer, more extended lifetime.
4. I set down this barrier here for the living. Let no one of these later go to this goal.
   Let them live for a hundred ample autumns. Let them conceal death with a mountain.
5. Just as the days follow each upon the last, just as the seasons follow straightaway upon the seasons, so, o Ordainer, arrange their lifetimes, so that the later does not leave behind the earlier.
6. Mount your lifetime, choosing old age, taking your place each following the last, as many as you are.
   Here will Tvaṣṭar, affording good birth, in concert (with the Wives of the Gods), make a long lifetime for you to live.

7. These women here, non-widows with good husbands—let them, with fresh butter as ointment, approach together.
   Without tears, without afflictions, well-jeweled, let the wives first mount the womb.
8. "Arise, woman, to the world of the living. You lie beside him whose life is gone. Come here!
   You have come into existence now as wife of a husband who has grasped your hand and wishes to have you."
9. Taking the bow from the hand of the dead for our dominion, luster, and strength, you there and we here—may we with good heroes win all contests and hostile engagements.

10. Creep upon this mother earth, the broad earth of wide expanse, who is very kindly.
    The young girl, soft as wool for the one who gives priestly gifts—let her protect you from the lap of Dissolution.
11. Arch up, Earth; do not press down. Become easy to approach for him, easy to curl up in.
    Like a mother her son with her hem, cover him, Earth.
12. Let the earth stay arching up. For let a thousand (house)posts be fixed in (her).
    Let the house be dripping with ghee. Let it always be sheltering to him there.
13. I prop up the earth from you. Setting down this earth clod here, let me not be harmed.
    Let the forefathers uphold this pillar for you. There let Yama fix your seats.

14. On the day facing me [=today] they have set (him=dead man) down like a feather from an arrow.
    The speech facing me I have grasped, like a horse by its halter.

X.19 (845) Cows

Mathita Yāmāyana or Bhr̥gu Vāruṇi or Cyavana Bhārgava
8 verses: anuṣṭubh, except gāyatrī 6

This simple, repetitive, but charming call to the cows to come home is the final hymn of the Yama collection, though its connection to the other hymns in the cycle, especially the funeral hymns that immediately precede it, is unclear. The signature idiom in this hymn is "turn back," and perhaps it was attached to the Yama cycle on thematic grounds, because the first verses of the preceding hymn, X.18, concern the return to life of the living after the funeral of their dead kinsman (see esp. X.18.3).

1. Turn back. Don't keep going. Keep company with us, o rich ones.
   O Agni and Soma, who bring goods back, hold our wealth fast for us.
2. Turn them back again; bring them back here again.
   Let Indra hold them back; let Agni drive them near.
3. Let these turn back again. Let them prosper in (the care of) this man, the lord of the cattle.
   Right here, o Agni, fix them down fast. Here let it remain—our wealth.
4. Also the one who is the cowherd—I call him to the journeying back, the coming back, the bringing to agreement, and the going away, to the turning here and the turning back.
5. He who has managed the dispersal, who has managed the going away, the turning here, and the turning back—let the cowherd also turn back.
6. You turner back, turn them back here; give the cows to us again, o Indra.
   Let us find enjoyment with them alive.
7. On every side I surround you with nourishment, ghee, and milk.
   Whatever gods there are who are worthy of the sacrifice, let them join us with wealth.
8. You turner back, turn them here; you turner back, turn them back.
   The earth has four quarters: from these, turn them back.

The Anukramaṇī gives a choice of authorship for the next seven hymns, X.20–26: Vimada, the son of Indra or Prajāpati, or Vasukr̥t Vāsukra. The patronymic of the latter choice would identify the poet as a son or descendant of Vasukra Aindra, the author of the three desperately difficult hymns that immediately follow (27–29). The poet of X.25.11 also identifies with or identifies himself as Kakṣīvant, the very skilled poet of I.116–126.

Whatever the poet's affiliation, he is fond of unusual meters (see esp. 21, 22, 24, 25) as well as puns on the name Vimada. The hymns are dedicated to Agni (20–21), Indra (22–1st half of 24), the Aśvins (2nd half of 24), Soma (25), and Pūṣan (26).

X.20 (846) Agni

Vimada Aindra or Vimada Prājāpatya, or Vasukr̥t Vāsukra
10 verses: gāyatrī, except ekapadāvirāj 1, anuṣṭubh 2, virāj 9, triṣṭubh 10

This first of the Vimada hymns starts with a single-pāda verse adapted from the first verse of X.25 and placed here to provide an auspicious beginning for the series. The second verse has a similarly marked beginning: its first two words are identical to the first words of the R̥gveda, I.1.1 agním īḷe "I invoke Agni. . . ." The hymn mostly treats the familiar topic of the physical presence of the ritual fire, though with some striking imagery and turns of phrase. The fire's expansion upward, even to heaven, is the subject of the middle verses (4–6), with his expansion opening the way also for mortals and for gods. In the final summary verse (10) the poet Vimada names himself.

1. Make auspicious thought our familiar.
2. Agni do I invoke, the youngest, for delights, an ally [/Mitra] difficult to restrain by reason of his (own) command, upon whose foundation the mottled (cows) [=flames] honor the sun (as well as) the udder of their mother [=fireplace].
3. With his (own) body as his nest, his radiant beam his beacon, him whom they make increase with their mouth, he flashes—his teeth [=flames] in a row.
4. The way for the stranger and the clans goes onward, since he [=Agni] has reached the ends of heaven—as the bright-shining poet, (but also as) a cloud.
5. He takes pleasure in the oblations of the son of Manu. The craftsman stands erect at the sacrifice.
   Fixing his seat, he goes in front.
6. For he is peaceful dwelling, oblation, and sacrifice. By harkening only to him, their way goes onward:
   the gods (go) to Agni, who is equipped with axes [=flames].
7. I seek Agni, who dominates through sacrifice, and the friendship of (that) kindly ancient.
   They say that Āyu [=Agni] is the son of the stone.
8. Whichever superior men are from among us, they should all be "in the money" when they make Agni increase with their oblation.
9. Black, white, and red is his course; coppery, silver, and ruddy is glorious (Agni).
   The begetter has begotten him of golden form.
10. In just this way, o Agni, child of nourishment, Vimada, in company with the immortals, will convey to you his inspired thought and his songs, as he implores your good favors. Refreshment, nourishment, a good dwelling—all that have you brought.

X.21 (848) Agni

Vimada Aindra or Vimada Prājāpatya, or Vasukr̥t Vāsukra
8 verses: āstārapaṅkti

This hymn is notable for two related formal features, its meter and its refrain. The meter āstārapaṅkti (8 8 / 8 4 8 4) is limited to this group of hymns attributed to Vimada, providing the meter for the two hymns X.21 and X.25 and the first half (vss. 1–3) of X.24. (The Anukramaṇī identifies the meter of the single verse X.170.4

as āstārapaṅkti, but the characteristic 8 4 8 4 sequence must be read as 12 12 there.) In all the Vimada occurrences the two four-syllable pādas form a grammatically unified refrain (the same refrain in all three hymns), interrupted by an eight-syllable pāda semantically and syntactically integrated into the rest of the verse: ví vo máde x x x x x x x x vívakṣase "In my exhilaration I wish to acclaim you (gods)." The first four-syllable pāda of the refrain is also a pun on the poet's name: ví vo máde, literally "in exhilaration you . . . ," but also "Vi . . . mada" (itself interrupted by the enclitic pronoun vaḥ). Although the effect is striking and insistent, it is also impossible to render in translation, and so the refrain has been unified and placed at the end of the verse. To illustrate the difficulties of a literal translation, we will give a rendering of the first verse in this hymn in that style:

> As if with (hymns) with their own twists, we choose you, Agni, as Hotar > for our sacrifice whose ritual grass has been strewn—in exhilaration you (gods)— > (we choose you,) sharp and pure-flamed—I wish to acclaim.

The formal novelty of the hymn is not matched by its content, which is simply a typical celebration of Agni's installation as Hotar at his kindling, along with wishes for his gifts of wealth.

1. As if with (hymns) with their own twists, we choose you, Agni, as Hotar for our sacrifice whose ritual grass has been strewn, (you,) sharp and pure-flamed.
   – In my exhilaration I wish to acclaim you (gods).
2. They beautify you—those close at hand who receive bounty in horses [=priests].
   The pouring(-ladle) pursues you, o Agni, as does the oblation whose course is straight.
   – In my exhilaration I wish to acclaim you (gods).
3. Those having (you) as their foundation [=flames] sit upon you, "pouring" with their tongues like women pouring with their ladles.
   Black and silver forms and all beauties do you put on.
   – In my exhilaration I wish to acclaim you (gods).
4. Whatever wealth you hold in regard, o Agni, you overpowering immortal, bring that here for us to win the prize, the bright (wealth) here to the sacrifices.
   – In my exhilaration I wish to acclaim you (gods).
5. When just born, Agni found all the poetic arts with (the aid of) the Atharvan (priest).
   He became the messenger of Vivasvant, dear and desirable to Yama.
   – In my exhilaration I wish to acclaim you (gods).

6. They invoke you at the sacrifices, o Agni, while the ceremony is proceeding.
   You provide all desirable goods to the pious man.
   – In my exhilaration I wish to acclaim you (gods).
7. They have installed you as the beloved priest at the sacrifices, o Agni, ghee-faced and blazing for Manu, most observant with your eyes.
   – In my exhilaration I wish to acclaim you (gods).
8. O Agni, with your blazing flame you spread yourself wide and lofty.
   Roaring, you act the bull; you set an embryo in your female kinsfolk [=plants].
   – In my exhilaration I wish to acclaim you (gods).

X.22 (848) Indra

Vimada Aindra or Vimada Prājāpatya, or Vasukr̥t Vāsukra
15 verses: purastādbr̥hatī, except anuṣṭubh 5, 7, 9, triṣṭubh 15

The metrical scheme of this hymn is unique in the R̥gveda (see Oldenberg 1888: 122); most of the verses have an 11 8 8 8 configuration (or something approaching it), despite the Anukramaṇī's identifications. Like many hymns whose meter is irregular, this one is driven more by phraseology, verbal echoes, and lexical chaining than by meter. The responsion and chaining begin with the first two verses, which consist of a rhetorical question about Indra's fame (vs. 1) and its answer (vs. 2).

The general praises of Indra continue in the next two verses, but shade, in verse 4, into the myth (or fragments of myth) that occupy most of the rest of the hymn: the journey of Indra and his client Kutsa (unnamed here) to the house of Uśanā (Kāvya) with the horses of the Wind (vss. 4–6), the plea to Indra to smite the demon Śuṣṇa (7–9), and the actual slaying of Śuṣṇa and its aftermath (vss. 10–11, 14), with several verses interspersed (12–13) begging Indra for aid and comfort. (These may belong to the Śuṣṇa saga and represent the speech of the same "we" who asked Indra to kill the demon in vss. 7–9, but they can also be generalized to the current "we" of singers and patrons.)

Although there are many puzzles in these mythological verses, the real crux is the pair concerning (apparently) the slaying of Śuṣṇa, verses 10–11, which contain several well-nigh-impenetrable hapaxes and whose syntax is in places unparsable. Verse 10, especially, may be deemed impossible, and its translation is therefore provisional and differs radically from others' interpretations. We believe that it contains a badly remembered and garbled allusion to an inherited Indo-Iranian mythic complex. The hapax kārpāṇé, which others interpret as "in the sword-combat" (relating it to a much later attested word kr̥pāṇa "sword"), we connect with the Avestan word karapan (read disyllabically in the Gāthās), the designation of a person or persons hostile to the Mazdayasnian religion and associated with equally hostile *kauui*s (e.g., Yasna 44.20, Yasna 32.12, 14–15, Yasna 46.11)—just as our kārpāṇé occurs in a verse with unidentified (and, as it happens, syntactically untethered) *kavi*s. In the topsy-turvy religious system of the Gāthās, of course, entities viewed positively in the R̥gveda (like *kavi*s) have negative valuation. This is not the place to explore this hypothesis in detail, but for another apparent manifestation of this myth, see X.99.9, and for further discussion see Jamison (2009d [2013]).

The hymn ends with an impeccable triṣṭubh verse (15), containing a conventional invitation to Indra to drink the soma and conventional wishes for his good will and patronage.

1. Where is Indra famous? Among what people is he famed today like an ally among the people?—
   he who, whether in the dwelling place of the seers or in concealment, is constantly celebrated in song.
2. Here is Indra famed. Among us today he is praised as the wielder of the mace, equal to song—he who like an ally among the peoples has made glory for himself among the peoples, not by halves;
3. He who is the lord of great strength, not by halves, and of great manliness, the thruster, the bearer of the bold mace, like a father (of) his dear son.
4. As the one having yoked the two boisterous horses of the Wind, as god (having yoked those) of the god, o wielder of the mace, as the one who streams along the radiant path when set loose along the highways, he is praised.
5. You have come to just these two horses of the Wind, the silvery ones, to drive them by yourself, those for which no god nor mortal can be found as controller.
6. Then Uśanā asks you both [=Indra and Kutsa] on your coming, "With what purpose (have you come) to our house?
   You have come from afar, from heaven and earth, to a mortal."
7. You will ask for us, for our upraised sacred formulation, Indra.
   We (in return) beg you for this help, that you smite Śuṣṇa, the non-man.
8. The Dasyu of non-deeds, of non-thought, the non-man whose commandments are other, is against us.
   You smasher of non-allies, humble the weapon of this Dāsa.
9. (Be there) for us, Indra, o champion, with champions, and (let us be) aided by you, by your power.
   In many places offerings bellow to you in competition like battle cries.
10. You incited these excellent men at the obstacle-smiting for the Karpan [?], you mace-wielding champion, when (you found?) him [=Śuṣṇa] in hiding—the sage poets (being there), (profiting from) *the strength of your lordly power, *like the clans.

11. Right away these things (became) yours, Indra, on gaining control over (his) property for giving, you mace-wielding champion, when with your fellow travelers you humbled everything born of Śuṣṇa.
12. Let your good superior powers not go nowhere for us, champion Indra.
    May each one of us be in the favor of these (powers) of yours, mace-wielder.
13. For us let these (gifts?) of yours (become) real. They bring no injury— your caresses, whose benefits, like those of milk-cows, we would know, mace-wielder.
14. While, handless and footless, the earth grew strong through the powers of her wise ways, you, circling him with respectful circumambulation [=as if for the animal sacrifice], jabbed down Śuṣṇa for the whole of life.
15. Drink, drink the soma, hero Indra! Don't mean (us) harm, goods lord, since you are good.
    And protect the singers and the bounteous (patrons), and make us rich from (your?) great wealth.

X.23 (849) Indra

Vimada Aindra or Vimada Prājāpatya, or Vasukr̥t Vāsukra
7 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 1, 7; abhisāriṇī 5 (so Anukramaṇī)

The hymn begins with a fine Indo-Iranian opening "we sacrifice to/worship (yájāmahe) Indra," reminiscent of the Younger Avestan litanies with the identical verb yazamaide. The praise of Indra that follows is fairly conventional; we hear of his mace (vss. 1, 3), his pair of fallow bays (vss. 1–3), and, less usually, his beard (vss. 1, 3). He is portrayed, in contrastive but complementary fashion, as at once warrior and generous and paternal patron (see, e.g., vss. 1d, 2b, 5).

The final two verses (6–7) mention the poet Vimada (7b) and his family (6a), and both verses feature prominently the verb vidmá̄ "we know," a partial anagram of this name. Indra's name is also played upon, in the adjective iná "strong" (6c), and possibly, earlier in the hymn, by the presence of several pleonastic occurrences of the particle íd (3a, 4d). In the same spirit, the frequent occurrence of the preverb/particle ví seems designed to recall the Vimada name. This punning is more subtle and varied than that found in the Vimada hymns with the repeated catchword refrain ví vo máde… vívakṣase (X.21, 24.1–3, 25). Thus, though the contents of the praise are conventional, the playful phonological complexity gives texture to the poem.

1. We sacrifice to Indra with the mace in his right hand, the charioteer of the fallow bays who follow separate commandments.
   He stands erect, constantly shaking out his beard, while apportioning (goods) by virtue of his weapons, by virtue of his generosity.

2. His are the two fallow bays and the goods [=soma] to be found in the wood(en cup). Indra, the smiter of Vṛtra, shall be bounteous with his bounties.
   As Ṛbhu, Vāja, Ṛbhukṣa [=the three Ṛbhus] he masters his strength, (saying,) "I whet down even the name of the Dāsa."
3. When (he takes?) the golden mace, then he mounts the chariot, which his two fallow bays draw, along with the patrons—the bounteous one famed of old, Indra, master of the prize of long(-lasting) fame.
4. Even now, as rain he (sprinkles) all things belonging to his herd; Indra sprinkles his tawny beard.
   He pursues his track down to the honey having its lovely dwelling in the pressed soma. He tosses (his beard) upward like the wind a tree.
5. He who smote with his speech those of disputatious speech, those of insulting speech, and many thousands of the hostile, this and every (other) masculine deed of his do we sing—he who, like a father (his son), has strengthened his own force and strength.
6. The Vimadas have begotten this praise for you, Indra, (praise) unprecedented, best of many, for the one of good gifts [/drops], for we know the feeding of him, which is that of a strong one. May we bring him close like cowherds their livestock.
7. Let no one keep us away from this fellowship between you, Indra, and Vimada the seer, for we know your (fatherly) solicitude, o god, like that of kin. Let there be friendly fellowship of you for us.

X.24 (850) Indra (1–3), the Aśvins (4–6)

Vimada Aindra or Vimada Prājāpatya, or Vasukṛt Vāsukra
6 verses: āstārapaṅkti 1–3, anuṣṭubh 4–6

Two separate short hymns, distinguished by divinity, meter, contents, and style. The first three verses, to Indra, contain the Vimada refrain. (For a discussion of its structure see the introduction to X.21.) The poet straightforwardly asks for goods and aid from the god in return for the soma offered to him.

The second three verses, to the Aśvins, allude to an otherwise unknown or little-known myth in which these gods churn out a pair of females (which may or may not be magical fire-churning sticks), which fly away to the gods' disappointment; the gods ask the Aśvins to return them (vss. 4–5). If we knew the myth, it would no doubt be fascinating, but in the absence of further textual evidence, it must remain a tantalizing fragment.

1. O Indra, drink this honeyed soma pressed in the cup; lay down for us a foundation of wealth in thousands, o you of many goods.
   – In my exhilaration I wish to acclaim you (gods).
2. We beseech you with sacrifices, recitations, and oblations:
   o power-lord of power, set in place for us the best that can be chosen.
   – In my exhilaration I wish to acclaim you (gods).
3. You who are the lord of those things to be chosen, the invigorator of the weak, and the helper of the praisers, o Indra, protect us from hatred and constraint.
   – In my exhilaration I wish to acclaim you (gods).

4. O powerful ones, you two possessing magical powers churned out the two joined (fire-churning sticks?), when, reverently invoked by Vimada, you churned, o Nāsatyas.
5. All the gods yearned after the two joined (sticks?) as they flew away.
   The gods said to the Nāsatyas, "Bring (them) back again."
6. Honeyed is my going away and honeyed (my) coming again.
   O gods, do you two make us honeyed by your divinity.

X.25 (851) Soma

Vimada Aindra or Vimada Prājāpatya, or Vasukr̥t Vāsukra
11 verses: āstārapaṅkti

The only Soma hymn in the Xth Maṇḍala, this hymn, like the others dedicated to Soma outside the IXth Maṇḍala, lacks reference to the ritual preparation of the soma drink, the theme that dominates the IXth Maṇḍala. In fact, there is almost no acknowledgement that soma is a ritual substance at all: just the phrase "the fellowship of the stalk" in verse 1, the identification of Soma as máda "exhilarating" in verse 10, and the refrain beginning "in . . . exhilaration" (ví . . . máde), itself a pun on the name of the poet Vimada (see introduction to X.21).

The Soma of this hymn is predominately a protector, benevolently forgiving childish transgressions on our part (vs. 3), watching over our possessions and ourselves (vss. 6–7), and guarding us from external threats (vss. 3, 7–10), as well as helping us cultivate our best qualities (vss. 1, 4). This Soma also presides over the distribution of desirable things, probably in the form of the priestly gift or dakṣiṇā. This aspect of Soma is first hinted at in verse 2, developed in verse 5, and triumphantly proclaimed in the final verse, 11.

The hymn contains some curious turns of phrase and slanted imagery, and so the mention of the great Ist Maṇḍala poet Kakṣīvant in verse 10 is not altogether surprising. It is unclear whether the poet of this hymn is simply claiming Kakṣīvant's mantle or whether there is a family connection or even identity with Kakṣīvant.

The least clear part of the hymn is the second part of the final verse (11), where it is claimed that Soma will help the blind and the halt "for the seven." Soma's aid to the disabled is expressed in similar terms in VIII.79.2, another Soma hymn found outside of IX, but the identity of "the seven" in our verse is disputed, and the poet seems to have wanted to leave it open.

1. Make auspicious thought, skill, and resolve our familiars.
   Then in the fellowship of your stalk (o Soma, we will take pleasure), as cows take pleasure in a pasture.
   – In my exhilaration I wish to acclaim you (gods).
2. Touching your heart, they sit amid all your domains, Soma.
   Then these desires of mine spread out, seeking good things.
   – In my exhilaration I wish to acclaim you (gods).
3. And I transgress your commandments, Soma, through naïveté.
   So then, like a father to his son offer mercy to us; (guard us) against the fatal weapon.
   – In my exhilaration I wish to acclaim you (gods).
4. Our insights go forth together, like torrents into springs.
   Hold our resolve firm like beakers, o Soma, for us to live.
   – In my exhilaration I wish to acclaim you (gods).
5. Through the powers that belong to you who are clever and strong, o Soma, these insightful ones, avid, open the pen full of cows and horses.
   – In my exhilaration I wish to acclaim you (gods).
6. You protect our livestock, Soma, and the moving (world [=living creatures]) dispersed in many places.
   You gather them, for them to live, as you watch over all living beings
   – In my exhilaration I wish to acclaim you (gods).
7. Soma, be our undeceivable herdsman on all sides.
   Ward off failures, o king; let no defamer hold sway over us.
   – In my exhilaration I wish to acclaim you (gods).
8. Soma, stay watchful as one of good resolve, to confer vital energy on us.
   As one who knows the territory better than man, protect us from deceit and from difficult straits.
   – In my exhilaration I wish to acclaim you (gods).
9. O drop that best smashes obstacles, you are for us Indra's benevolent comrade, when they call upon him in the conflict as they do battle at the winning of progeny.
   – In my exhilaration I wish to acclaim you (gods).

10. Here he is: the exhilarating, overpowering one dear to Indra grows strong;
 he strengthens the thought of great Kakṣīvant, the inspired poet.
 – In my exhilaration I wish to acclaim you (gods).
11. He sends prizes of cows to the inspired poet, to the pious one.
 He, according to his wish, will advance the blind and the halt for the seven.
 – In my exhilaration I wish to acclaim you (gods).

X.26 (852) Pūṣan

9 verses: anuṣṭubh, except uṣṇih 1, 4

Unlike most treatments of Pūṣan in the R̥gveda, with their generally simple but lively and colloquial language and concentration on Pūṣan's mundane activities, this hymn is bristling with difficulties, oddly constructed hapax compounds, and high, though frequently unclear, sentiments. See especially verse 6, whose language and intent are almost entirely obscure.

The general themes are Pūṣan's reciprocal relationship with inspired poets and their thoughts (see vss. 1–2, 4–5) and his role as companion and friend (see vss. 2, 5–8).

1. Because our inspired thoughts, the cherished teams, go forth toward (them), [/Because their cherished teams go forth toward our inspired thoughts,] let the two wondrous ones—(Vāyu,) who possesses a chariot with teams, and mighty Pūṣan—help (them).
2. He [=Pūṣan] to whom belong this greatness, the friendship with the Wind [/sought-after friendship], this people here—the inspired poet will strive to win (him) with his hymnic visions. He [=Pūṣan] has taken cognizance of the good praise hymns.
3. He knows the good praise hymns. Pūṣan the bull, like a drop, sprinkles sprinklings [?], sprinkles on our enclosure.
4. We would contemplate you. For us, god Pūṣan, (you are) both the means to realize our thoughts and to stir up our inspired poets,
5. Half-sharer of sacrifices, horse-driver of chariots, seer—he who was established by Manu as the companion who wards off (hatred) for the inspired poet—
6. The husband of her who cares [?] [=Sūryā?], (companion) of the gleaming (female [=Dawn?]) and the gleaming (male [=Agni, Soma, Sun?]), weaver of garments of sheep [=wool], always rubbing [=cleaning] the garments.

7. Powerful lord of prizes, powerful companion of prosperities, the delightful one has shaken forth his beard, shaken it out at will—he who is not to be deceived.
8. O Pūṣan, the goats should turn the pole of your chariot hither—(you are) the companion of every striving man, born of old, not to be driven away.
9. Our chariot let Pūṣan the mighty aid with his vigor.
   He will become the increaser of prizes; he will hear this call of ours.

The three hymns ascribed to Vasukra Aindra (X.27–29) are both very rich and very strange, and will repay concentrated study for untold time to come.

X.27 (853) Indra

Vasukra Aindra
24 verses: triṣṭubh

This is one of the most obscure and also one of the most intriguing hymns in the R̥gveda. In general and in its many particulars it has received a number of competing and conflicting treatments. We will restrict ourselves to presenting our own, often tentative, interpretation, without discussion of other possibilities that have been advanced.

First of all, in our opinion the hymn falls into two complementary units, verses 1–12 and 13–24, with the former subdivided into verses 1–7, 8–10, and 11–12 and the latter into verses 13–18 and 19–24. The overall theme of the whole hymn is the proper reciprocal relationship between men and gods, especially Indra, as symbolized by the sacrifice, and the proper functioning of the cosmos that this mutual relationship ensures. But this theme is treated in distinct ways in the course of the hymn.

The first half is primarily in dialogue between Indra and the singer. In it Indra contrasts the aid he gives to sacrificers with the destruction he metes out to non-sacrificers (vss. 1, 4), and the singer echoes Indra's contrastive pairing by announcing his intention to offer to Indra, as opposed to the self-aggrandizing atheists (vs. 2). Indra is somewhat skeptical of the singer's intent (vs. 3): he suggests that men sacrifice to him only when they need his help (3cd), but after he has helped them win, they forget to offer to him (3ab). Indra continues boasting about his powers (vs. 5), perhaps taken up by the singer (or still in the mouth of Indra himself; vs. 6), promising destruction to non-sacrificers. The singer's glorification of Indra's powers and the devastation he will produce ends this section (vs. 7).

The contrast between followers of Indra and their opposites is continued by another image in the next verses, the metaphor of lost and straying livestock. In verse 8 cows are wandering loose, grazing in the pasture of a stranger, though accompanied by a cowherd. In our view the cows stand for men, turning away from devotion to "their own lord," Indra, to follow other ways and other leaders. In verse 9 Indra promises to reassemble his lost herd and reestablish proper relationships among them. The first half of verse 10 has the sound of a truth formulation, again announcing the reassembling of the herd, with the second half of the verse expressing the consequences for his weakened enemies, using the striking image of these enemies fighting Indra "with women," a phrase used elsewhere of about-to-be-defeated opponents (V.30.9; cf. I.104.3).

The mention of women in verse 10 may have prompted the coda verses 11–12, which treat the legal issue of the flawed woman given in marriage, known also from the later dharma literature (cf. Mānava Dharma Śāstra IX.72–73, VIII.205, 224). According to Manu a father is culpable if he tries to marry off a physically or mentally flawed girl without declaring her faults in advance, but if he has informed the bridegroom before the marriage, the latter has no legal recourse. Here verse 10 contrasts the suitor of a blind girl who knows she is blind (ab), with one who was tricked into marriage without that knowledge and who therefore has the right to deploy mení "the power of thwarted exchange." (For further discussion, see Jamison 1996b.) Verse 12 presents the opposite picture of an unflawed and happy bride, embodying the appropriate and successful functioning of the exchange relations that characterize Ārya society.

Thus, though this first half of X.27 utilizes three dominant images—sacrificers versus non-sacrificers, a unified herd following its herdsman versus dispersed and straying livestock, and a properly contracted marriage versus one that involves fraud and deception—all three contrast proper social relationships with aberrant ones, and warn of the consequences of the latter

The second half of the hymn seems superficially to have nothing to do with what went before, but viewed in the larger context it can be seen to pick up the first and most important image, that of sacrifice as the binding relationship between men and gods, and to develop it. The first six verses of this half (vss. 13–18) deal, in our view, with the creation of the sacrifice and the mystery of its central focus, the fire. This section begins with two riddling verses (13–14) identifying the fire without naming it: verse 13 of the already kindled fire and verse 14 of its creation by the "lofty steed" without shadow or foliage, probably the fire-churning spindle (later pramantha), and the mother, probably the lower fire stick (aráṇī) with a hole in which the spindle is turned and from which the "embryo," the fire itself, emerges. The second half of this verse describes the oblation, conceived of as a cow, "licking the calf (that is, the fire) of another (that is, the fire stick)" when poured into the fire. The creation of the fire is also treated in verse 16, with much of the same lexicon, but with the addition of the ten fingers, which manipulate the fire-making apparatus.

In between is an enigmatic verse (15) about unidentified but numerically precise groups coming from different directions. In our view this treats the original establishment of the sacrifice through the cooperation of various prototypical Ārya communities (perhaps including the Seven Seers, the Navagvas, and the Daśagvas).

This theme is continued, though somewhat enigmatically, in verse 17, but in verse 18 there is schism: two groups go off in opposite directions and follow opposite customs, cooking versus non-cooking. It is the cooks and their fire who are predicted to prevail. With this we return to the stark divisions of the first half of the hymn between sacrificers and non-sacrificers. The split depicted in verse 18 also reminds us of the fuller treatment of sacrificial schism in I.33.4–10.

If the first eighteen verses of this hymn are fiendishly difficult, the last six (19–24) might properly be termed impossible—not so much because of their grammar, but because of the rare words, the obscurity of the references, and the unclarity of the relationships of the verses to each other and to the rest of the hymn. The interpretation that follows is even more tentative than what has preceded. The first two verses of this section (19–20) seem to be riddles turning on astronomical or temporal references. The first may refer to the year and its component parts ("the horde") turning by itself and regularly bringing an end to the mortal generations while renewing itself. The "two oxen of the Pulverizer" (death or old age?) in verse 20 could perhaps be another temporal reference, to night and day as similarly measuring out the lifespan of humans, beneath the eternal world of heaven and the heavenly bodies. This theme appears to be continued in the first half of the next verse (21), though what the "mace" (vájra) represents here is entirely unclear—perhaps the year or other temporal division as a weapon that smites mortals. The second half of this verse seems to offer a less bleak picture than the inevitable decay and destruction that temporal divisions bring in their train: there is "other fame," to which old age can lead, though what that fame is or is based on is not stated.

If we are correct, the implicit answer to this question is the sacrifice and its center, fire, and this answer is given obliquely in verse 22. Fire the substance is always potentially present, but not always actually present, and so it appears to defy the temporally defined progress to old age and death. Latent "within every tree," it can burst forth at any time. It is frightening in some of its effects (the flames as "man-eating birds") and strikes terror in all beings (pāda c), but is also the benevolent focus of sacrifice (pāda d). The original establishment of the sacrifice by the gods seems to be treated in verse 23, and in the thoroughly obscure last pāda of that verse Indra, unnamed, may come himself to the sacrifice for epiphany, thus returning us to the beginning of the hymn and the direct involvement of Indra with sacrificers.

The last verse is no clearer than the preceding ones, though it seems to be announcing a final, instructive truth according to which one should lead one's life. Perhaps the idea is that the sacrifice is the means to life, which connects one to the eternal world of heaven and the sun. The destructive temporal forces mentioned earlier (vss. 20–21) were "below the sun," but in this final verse the sun reveals itself, hides the mist (if that's what the phonologically problematic hapax busá means), and reaches its "foot" (a sunbeam going toward the ground?) out to be seen, thus providing a potential bond for the sacrificing mortal to the higher world. This shaft of light, liberated from its covering, that ends the hymn, seems an optimistic promise to the addressee of better things than decay and death.

But much of this is poorly supported speculation, and the hymn, especially the final verses of the hymn, invites further detailed investigation.

1. [Indra:] I will really "boil over," singer, when I do my best for the presser, the sacrificer.
   But I am a smiter of the one who gives no milk-mixture, who injures the true, who seeks crooked ways—the nullity.
2. [Singer:] When I will drive together for battle those who do not follow the gods, puffing themselves up in their bodies, at home I will cook you a bulging bull; I will pour down sharp soma fifteen-fold.
3. [Indra:] I do not know anyone who speaks thus, after he has smashed the godless ones in the clash.
   When he has caught sight of the mettlesome clash, only then do they proclaim two bulls to me (as offering).
4. [Indra:] When I was in communities unknown, they all were bounteous to me, since I was really there.
   But truly I despoil the nullity even if he is here at peace, as I destroyed the one on the mountain [=Vr̥tra?], having grasped him by the foot.
5. [Indra:] Truly they do not confine me in (just one) community, nor do the mountains (confine me), when I am minded.
   (Even) one with a stunted ear will be afraid of my roar. Just so, day after day the dust will stir.
6. [Indra? Singer?:] He will now see those here who drink the cooked (milk oblation) and who serve the foreleg without (offering to) Indra, and those who play the lord's role for an arrow, or who have scorned their ardent comrade. The wheel-rims should now roll over them!
7. [Singer:] You have come into being, you have grown strong, and you have traversed your lifetime. Now (the opponent) in front will shatter; the one behind will shatter now.
   The two covers [=heaven and earth] do not encompass him who has labored on the far shore of this airy realm.
8. [Singer:] The cows, dispersed, ate the grain of the stranger. I saw them roaming with their cowherd.
   The cries of the stranger came together from all sides. For how long will their own lord find pleasure in them [=cows]?
9. [Indra:] When I will round up those that eat the grass and grain of the peoples all together in a wide pasture, then a yoked (animal) will seek an unhitcher, while he who longs to will yoke an unyoked one.

10. [Indra:] And just then you will consider this truly spoken by me—that I shall bring the two-footed and the four-footed together.
    Whoever then will fight the bull [=Indra] with women, I, who cannot be combatted, will share out his possessions.

11. (A father) who has a daughter blind from birth—who, knowing her (as) blind, will have designs on her [/will be hostile (to him=the father)]?
    (On the other hand, not knowing her state), which of the two will unleash (the power of) violated exchange against him [=the father]—the one who marries her or the one who woos her (on the bridegroom's behalf)?
12. How different is the maiden, gratified all around by an admirable (gift) worthy to be chosen, from a bride-seeking man from among the young bloods?
    She becomes a fortunate bride, when she is well adorned. She wins herself an ally [=spouse] in public.

13. He has swallowed (it [=firewood]) from the foot; he eats what's in front of him. He has set out head upon head [=his flames], as his shield.
    Sitting, he destroys the (kindling stick) erect in his lap; bending downward, he goes along the upstretching earth.
14. Lofty but without a shadow and without foliage is the steed [=kindling stick]. The mother [=lower fire stick] stands still; unloosed the embryo eats.
    Licking the calf of another, she [=oblation] lows. In what form did the milk-cow deposit her udder?
15. Seven heroes [=Seven Seers?] came up from the south, eight from the north: they joined together.
    Nine [=Navagvas?] with grain sacks [?] came from the west, ten [=Daśagvas?] in the east traverse the back of the rock.
16. One brownish one [=fire], common to the ten (fingers)—they spur on to decisive resolve.
    The mother bears the embryo well-placed in her belly—him seeking after nothing, she being content.
17. The heroes cooked a fat ram; there were dice strewn down for gaming.
    Two roam the lofty steppe [=heaven?], provided with filters, purifying (soma?) in the waters.
18. Shrieking, they went apart in opposite directions: one half will cook, for the other half does not cook.
    This god Savitar here says this to me, "Only he whose food is wood, whose food is melted butter will win."

19. I saw the horde [=year?] on the move from afar, turning by its own power, without a wheel.

It escorts forward the generations of peoples of the stranger, diminishing their "tails" at the same time as transforming itself ever anew.

20. These two oxen of the Pulverizer [=old age? death?] have been yoked for me. Do not drive (them) forth; wait just an instant.
The waters also come through to the goal of this one, and he has come into being as the Harmer below the sun.
21. This is the mace that has been rolled out in many ways, below the fullness of the lofty sun.
But there exists other fame beyond this. Unwaveringly, old age crosses to it.
22. Held in check within every tree, the cow [=fire?] will bellow. From there the man-eating birds [=flames?] will fly forth.
Then all this creation here will be afraid, though pressing (soma) for Indra and doing its best for the seer.
23. The first of the gods stood still at the measuring (of the sacrificial ground?); the later ones of them came up from the cutting (of it).
Three marshy places [=fire hearths?] heat the earth; the two (horses?) convey the "stammerer" [?] [=Indra?] to the fullness (of the sacrifice? of the sun?).
24. This is your means of life. And know this—don't hide away such a thing in the clash—when the sun reveals itself, it hides the mist [?]. Its "foot" is released as if from a garment.

X.28 (854) Indra

Vasukra Aindra
12 verse: triṣṭubh

Another devilish hymn by the very talented Vasukra, and a worthy companion-piece to X.27. Like the first half of X.27, this hymn consists of a dialogue between Indra and a singer/sacrificer, introduced in this case by a verse spoken by the sacrificer's wife (who then disappears from the hymn). The hymn is more tightly structured than X.27, and it complements X.27 in another way: though the second half of X.27 is deliberately obscure and esoteric in its expression, X.28 presents itself (however misleadingly) as instruction to the simple, couched in straightforward language.

The topic of the hymn, to be reductionist, is successful and unsuccessful sacrifices, and the human participants in the dialogue seem to express anxiety about failing, perhaps by accident, to provide a sacrificial offering adequate to attract the gods, especially Indra. The hymn begins (vs. 1) with the sacrificer's wife, who is also Indra's daughter-in-law, anxiously noting Indra's absence from the sacrifice. In verse 2 Indra responds that he protects those who provide him adequate soma; the singer (probably) replies, perhaps a bit testily, that not only do they press soma and cook bulls for Indra, but Indra does consume this provender (vs. 3).

There follows an abrupt change of subject, or at least change of tone. Indra begins verse 4 with "Mark well this (speech) of mine, singer" and then alludes glancingly to what appear to be animal fables of the sort found in much later texts like the Pañcatantra. In verse 5 the mortal expresses doubt about his ability to understand the god because of his (the mortal's) simple nature, but also expresses certainty that the god will enlighten him at the right time. The next three verses (6–8) we will take up below. The animal fables return in verses 9 and 10, while the last two verses (11–12) contrast greedy people, who consume what was destined for the sacrifice and thereby actually weaken themselves, with the hard-laboring sacrificers, who thrive.

The hymn is thus structured in the following way: the outer verses (1–3, 11–12) concern successful and unsuccessful sacrifices and sacrificers, the opening verses being more personal, the final ones more general. Within this frame there is an inner ring of verses (4–5, 9–10), which establish a dialogue between mortal and god about this problem and which express the god's teaching in the simple terms a mortal can understand, that is, in animal allegories briefly alluded to. This double ring of complementary verses thus surrounds and marks out the center of the hymn, verses 6–8, and especially the exact center of the twelve-verse hymn, verses 6–7. These two verses are also rhetorically responsive, and both their position and their structure define them as an omphalos. Furthermore, they are uttered directly after the singer has expressed certainty that Indra will proclaim his doctrine at the right time (vs. 5cd). Everything in the context seems to mark these verses as the direct teaching of Indra, his significant message—and, indeed, as his epiphany, the epiphany that was expected but not realized in verse 1. The vaunting self-praise in the omphalos verses contrasts strangely with the animal fable verses that form the inner ring around them, for in those the message seems to be rather that the weak can best the strong.

The re-transition from the ātmastuti ("self-praise") of the omphalos (vss. 6–7) to the animal fables (vss. 9–10) is effected by an even more enigmatic verse (8). Though it does not match any of the structurally paired verses of the rest of the hymn, it may carry the key to the whole, for it seems to treat the original establishment of the sacrifice, instituted first by the gods. This reminds us of the more elaborate treatment of the origins of the sacrifice in X.27.13–18 (esp. 15), and it also suggests that the sacrifice is the tool by which the weak (currently mortals) may control the strong (Indra and the gods), as in the animal fables that enclose the hymn's center. Reached by way of a playful transition (vss. 10d, 11a), the final two verses (11–12) return us to the present day and the ritual situation, and remind us of the contrast between sacrificers and non-sacrificers in the first half of X.27, especially verses 2 and 7.

A word about the animal verses. Despite the major importance of animal fables and allegories in later Sanskrit, there is essentially nothing like them in Vedic, especially early Vedic, and even the allusions to stories we have here—which are reminiscent of the summary verses of Pañcatantra tales—are unique in the Ṛgveda. Keeping in mind that animal stories are not told in later Sanskrit simply to amuse, but are overtly instructive and educational, especially for callow and wayward youth, we can connect the use of these allusions in this hymn to the singer's self-description as "a simple man," incapable of understanding Indra's message (vs. 5). Indra is tailoring his instruction to the mental abilities of his hearer: rather than express himself in the usual mysteries of Ṛgvedic high style (as in the immediately preceding X.27), Indra packages his message in a series of beast fables. If this reading of the hymn's general scenario is correct, then we must assume already for the Ṛgvedic period not only the existence of a body of story literature, of animal fables, but also (more interestingly) a fairly organized functional role for this literature in an instructional setting, conforming to the same model that we find quite a bit later in Indic literature in general. And this in turn may lead us to reconsider the standard views of the history of Indian literature and especially the connections between Vedic and Classical genres.

For further discussion of this hymn, see Jamison (2004a; 2007: 80–83; 2008b).

1. [Sacrificer's wife:] While every other stranger has come here, only my father-in-law has not come here.
 He should eat the roasted grains and he should drink the soma. Well-fed he should then go home again.
2. [Indra:] The sharp-horned bull [=soma] continually bellowing has mounted to the height (of heaven), upon the expanse of the earth.
 In all communities I protect him who, having pressed the soma, fills both my cheeks.
3. [Singer/Sacrificer:] With a stone they press the exhilarating, powerful soma-drinks for you, Indra. You drink of them.
 They cook bulls for you. You eat of them—coming when you are summoned with nourishment, bounteous one.
4. [Indra:] Mark well this (speech) of mine, singer: The rivers carry the flotsam against their current.
 The fox crept up on the lion, his opponent; the jackal sprang on the boar from out of the underbrush.
5. [Singer/Sacrificer:] How shall I mark this (speech) of yours—I, a simple man, mark the inspired thought of you who are clever and strong?
 You who know will declare to us at the proper time toward which half your chariot-pole is to come to rest, bounteous one.
6. [Indra:] Because in this way they grow me strong, higher even than lofty heaven is my chariot-pole.
 Many thousands do I "grind down" all at once, for the begetter begot me as one without rival.

7. [Indra:] Because in this way they begot [/knew] me as strong and powerful, at every action (calling) "o Indra" (to me,) the bull—the gods (did this)—
   I smashed Vṛtra with the mace, while exhilarated; I opened up the enclosure through my greatness for the pious one.
8. [Indra:] The gods came; they carried axes; hewing the trees, they advanced with their clans toward (the ritual ground), depositing the good wood in the belly [=the hearth(s) of the ritual fires]. Where there is brushwood [?], they [=flames?] burn it up.
9. [Indra:] The hare swallowed the razor coming toward it. I split apart a rock with an earth clod from afar.
   Even a lofty one shall I weaken for a weakling. The calf, swelling up, will pursue the bull.
10. The eagle caught its talon just so, like a lion entrapped into a snare.
   The buffalo also got trapped, when it was thirsty. The monitor-lizard plowed this way for him.
11. The monitor-lizard will plow this way for those who taunt the brahmins with their food.
   The very same ones eat the released oxen, themselves breaking their powers, their own bodies.
12. But these (others) have become very fortunate by their ritual labors—the ones who urged themselves on at the soma(-pressing) with their hymns.
   Speaking manfully, measure out prizes to us; in heaven you have established your fame, your name as "hero."

X.29 (855) Indra

Vasukra Aindra
8 verses: triṣṭubh

Shorter than Vasukra's other two hymns, but no less daunting in the intricacy of its expression, especially in verse 1, which displays phonological, morphological, and syntactic tricks too numerous and too dense to discuss in detail here. (See Jamison [forthcoming c].) Suffice it to say that the verse manages to refer, by indirection and implication, to the five most important gods at the dawn ritual: Agni, Indra, Vāyu, and the Aśvins, though only Indra is named. (Dawn is the sole important divinity absent, but she appears in the first pāda of the next verse.) Besides the common Ṛgvedic habit of employing words applicable to two or more referents, the verse shows in embryo a device prized in later kāvya: that of allowing a single phonological sequence to be read in two of more different ways by means of variant word divisions. Add to this an unprecedented syntactic construction, which is also a syntactic pun, and dizziness ensues for the hearer/reader.

The structure and thematic contents of the hymn are less clear than in X.27 and 28, however. After the first two extremely opaque verses, which appear to treat the dawn ritual and the divine conjunction of Indra and Agni (and probably of the two Aśvins), the poet turns his hopes and attention to attracting Indra to show himself at the sacrifice, to produce an epiphany (see esp. vs. 4), through properly performed offerings. There are a number of obscurities in these verses as well, especially verse 5, and the lack of a perceptible structure hampers our efforts to clarify them. Much remains to be excavated from this rich poetic mine.

1. Whether he takes pleasure in the wood or not, he [=Agni] has been installed (as priest) [/been deposited (in the wood)]. The gleaming praise has waked you two, o bustling ones [=Aśvins, or Agni and Indra]—
   (the praise) in which Indra (took pleasure) on many days (as did) the Hotar [=Agni]—(each being) the manly one, best man among men, earth-protector.
2. At the forefront of this dawn here and of the later one, might we be at the manly prancing of you [=Indra], who are the best man of men.
   Triśoka [/the three-flamed one (=Agni)] brought a hundred men here (on the same chariot) with Kutsa—the chariot that will be victorious.
3. Which exhilarating drink is to be enjoyed by you, Indra? As powerful one, run to my hymns through the doors.
   When (will) the vehicle, (that is,) the inspired thoughts, (come) near to me? I would compel you here to highest generosity with (my offerings of) food.
4. When (will) the brilliance of one such as you (come) to our men, Indra? With which hymnic vision will you equip yourself? When will you come to us, (to be) actually present like an ally, o wide-ranging one, for our offering—though there could be inspired thoughts at anybody's food (offering)?
5. As the sun sends (each man) forth to his task, do you send forth, (like a boat) to the further shore, those who go, each to his own desire, as if going to the providers of wives, and those men who seek to empower their many hymns for you, powerfully born Indra, along with their (offerings of) food.
6. The two copious "measures," heaven and earth, are now well fixed by your might, by your poetic skill.
   Let the ghee-rich pressed soma-drinks be to your liking, let the honey-drinks be in sweetness for your drinking.

7. They poured out a tankard of honey for him, a full one for Indra, for he is one whose generosity is real.
   He has grown strong on the expanse of the earth, the manly one pre(eminent) through his will and his masculine powers.
8. The very powerful Indra has penetrated the battling hosts. The many (hosts) marshal themselves for him, for his comradeship.
   Mount upon the hosts like a chariot that you will spur on with auspicious benevolence.

Hymns X.30–34 are attributed to Kavaṣa Ailūṣa, though Oldenberg (1888: 234–35) entertains the possibility that this group should be joined with the Vasukra hymns that precede on the basis of shared phraseology.

X.30 (856) Waters or Apām Napāt

Kavaṣa Ailūṣa
15 verses: triṣṭubh

This hymn is very ritually determined, and in fact it tracks closely the ritual acts performed in the classical śrauta ritual at its recitation in the soma sacrifice. In verses 1–3 the Adhvaryu priests are sent to fetch water for the soma-pressing, but first make an offering to the waters and the Child of the Waters (Apām Napāt). The Adhvaryus then bring the waters to the sacrificial ground (vss. 4–9), with a reminder that they (the waters) owe a favor to Indra, the principal drinker of soma, because he freed them (vs. 7). More praise of the waters follows (vss. 10–12) as they approach the place of sacrifice. They arrive in verses 13–14, and the pressing can begin in verse 15.

The feminine and enthusiastically yielding nature of the waters (the stem áp being feminine in gender) and their relationship to various masculine forces, the Adhvaryus (vs. 2), Soma (vss. 5–6), and the gods (vs. 15), are also emphasized.

1. Let the course for our sacred formulation go forth to the waters that are among the gods, as if by the harnessing of mind, to the great wellspring of Mitra and Varuṇa. I will make the well-twisted (hymn) subject to that which possesses broad expanse [=waters?].
2. O Adhvaryus, since you have become provided with oblations, go to the eager waters, o eager ones—
   (the waters) upon which the ruddy eagle gazes down. Harness the wave today, o you of skillful hands.
3. O Adhvaryus, go to the waters, to the sea. Sacrifice with your oblation to the Child of the Waters.
   He will give you the well-purified wave today. For him press the honeyed soma,

4. (For him) who shines without kindling wood within the waters, whom the inspired poets call upon at the ceremonies.
   O Child of the Waters, give the honeyed waters by which Indra grows strong for his heroic deed,
5. By which Soma is delighted and becomes excited, like a young blood with lovely young women.
   Go forth to these waters, o Adhvaryu. When you will pour (them) in, then purify (them) with plants.
6. Just in that way young women accede to a young man, when he goes to them who are eager as he is eager.
   They are agreed in mind and they perceive alike—the Adhvaryus, the Holy Place, and the divine waters.
7. He who made wide space for you who were blocked, he who freed you from the great curse, to him, to Indra, propel your honeyed wave that exhilarates the gods, o waters.
8. Propel to him the honeyed wave, which is your embryo, o rivers, and is a fountain of honey—
   (the wave) with ghee on its back, worthy of invocation at the ceremonies. Rich waters, hear my call.
9. Rivers, propel the exhilarating wave providing drink to Indra, which rouses both (races? [=gods and men]),
   (the wave) arousing exhilaration, stemming from the uśānā-plant, born of a cloud, the fountain that spreads widely around the triple-threaded (sacrifice?).
10. Those whirling about in two streams, roving like cattle-raiders in teams, the begetters and masters of existence—the waters grown strong together sharing the same womb: o seer, now extol them!
11. Impel our ceremony by a sacrifice to the gods; impel our sacred formulation to gain the spoils.
   At the yoking of truth unloosen your udder. Grant us attentive hearing, o waters.
12. O rich waters, because you hold sway over the good, and you bring favorable resolve and the immortal (soma?), and you are masters of wealth that brings good progeny, let Sarasvatī establish this vital energy for the singer.
13. As the waters have just appeared in front—on their way here, bringing ghee, milk, and honey, allying in mind with the Adhvaryus, bringing the well-pressed soma to Indra—14. They have now arrived here, rich and bringing spoils for the living. O Adhvaryus, comrades, make them take their seats; set these down on the ritual grass, you (comrades) in soma, these who are allied with the Child of the Waters.

15. The eager waters have come here to this ritual grass. Seeking the gods, they have taken their seats at the ceremony.
  Adhvaryus, press the soma for Indra. The sacrifice to the gods has become easy for you to master.

X.31 (857) All Gods

Kavaṣa Ailūṣa
11 verses: triṣṭubh

An extremely obscure hymn. As in many such compositions, one of the major sources of obscurity is the uncertainty of the referents in many key verses and the possibility of multiple referents in such cases. The interpretation given here is tentative and uncertain, and even if correct, or partially so, it does not exclude other possible interpretations. In our view, the hymn speculates about the mystery of the sacrifice, about the relations between men and gods that the sacrifice encodes, and about Agni, the most conspicuous symbol of the sacrifice and the mortal–immortal partnership, as the foundational principle of the cosmos and the neutralization of the distinction between space and time. Although assigned to the All Gods, this is obviously not a conventional All God hymn (if such exist) but one for which the designation serves as a cover for mystic speculation. If it has a conventional deity, it is Agni.

The hymn begins innocently enough with four verses establishing the ritual scene. However, even in the first verse we encounter something unusual: the raw material of the sacrifice seems to be seeking us out, as if the gods themselves were assisting us in our duties toward them. Nonetheless, verse 2 asserts that the mortal sacrificer must exert his own inherent powers in order to perform a proper sacrifice and receive its benefits. The happy result of the mutual action of men and gods (note the latter are called "helpers" in 3b) is expressed in verse 3, and in verse 4 (particularly full of unidentified referents; see esp. pāda d) it seems that the central divine figure Agni is well pleased and that other gods have favored the sacrificer as well.

Verses 5–6 are roughly the center of the hymn (especially since vs. 11 is a pseudo-dānastuti); they are verbally responsive (note the asyá beginning 5c, 6a, and 6c, for example), and they introduce a larger cosmic dimension to the depiction of the sacrifice. They thus qualify as an omphalos. Most important in these two verses are the three words for "earth" that knit them together: kṣā́ḥ in 5a, bhū́man in 6b, and, by implication, pr̥thvī́, disguised in the feminine participle paprathānā́ in 6a, derived from the same root (prath) as pr̥thvī́ in 9a. (The three words—kṣā́ḥ, bhū́man, and pr̥thvī́—are reunited again in vs. 9, a good indication that the conjunction in vss. 5–6 was deliberate.) This emphasis on the earth in a ritual context seems to make an implicit claim that the sacrificial ground is the earth. In verse 5 the sacrificial context is more overt: this seems to concern the distribution of the dakṣiṇās or priestly gifts at dawn. Verse 6 is more opaque, but in our view refers to the benevolence of a well-pleased Agni radiating outward. The second half of verse 6 provides a transition to the cosmic speculations that follow: the "lord" of 6a seems still to be Agni, with his womb containing, on the one hand, his flames, and, on the other hand perhaps, the gods.

The speculations of verses 7–10 begin, as often, with an unanswerable question about the origins of the cosmos. Verse 7 also contrasts the stable and unchanging quality of heaven and earth (space) with the ever-changing and aging aspect of time. This opposition in a way provides the framework for the next few verses, although the direct connection between 7 and what follows is superficially dim. However, if, as we believe, the next three verses (8–10) concern Agni, he partakes of both space and time, and provides the foundation for both. He supports heaven and earth (8b)—there is no reason to look elsewhere (8a)—but he is also in constant motion (8cd, 9ab) and appears in many guises (9cd). He thus grounds the stability of the spatial cosmos while being in constant motion through it. In the same way (vs. 10), temporal aging is represented by his regular rebirth, but because of the paradox that he is born before his parents, temporal advance is negated. The space/time conundrum is solved! The last clause of verse 10, "if they should inquire" / "when they shall ask," is in our view the formal closure to the cosmic speculation opened by a question in verse 7 and not confined to the themes of verse 10.

The final verse (11) has all the trappings of a dānastuti, appended to the hymn, but it seems to refer to a very obscure saga also encountered in I.117.8, an Aśvin hymn.

1. Let the laud of the gods, the means of sacrifice, come in quest of us, to help us, along with all the overpowering ones [=gods].
   Might we come to have good fellowship with them. Might we be those who cross over all difficulties.
2. A mortal should await material wealth along the path of truth; he should seek to win it through reverence.
   And he should consult with his own resolve and grasp better skill with his mind.
3. The insightful thought has been set in place; the (sacrificial) portions have been sent surging. The helpers [=gods] come close to the wondrous one [=Agni] as if to a ford.
   We have attained the fortifying (hymn) for our good faring; we have become cognizant of the immortals.
4. Our own constant lord and master of the house [=Agni?] should find pleasure (in him [=sacrificer?]) for whom the god Savitar has given birth, or Bhaga and Aryaman should anoint him with cows. That one seems beloved to him, and so he should be.

5. Might this earth here be like (the place) of the dawns. When the possessors of livestock [=gods? patrons?] have assembled here with their strength, desiring to partake of the praise of this singer, let the powerful prizes approach us.
6. The good favor of just this one, spreading out, became the foremost cow throughout the land; in the womb of this lord are those of the same nest, being borne in the same burden.
7. What was the wood, and what the tree from which they carved out heaven and earth, the two that stand together, unaging and enduring? But the days, the many dawns, grow old.
8. There does not exist another of such kind beyond that. The ox bears heaven and earth.
   With a will of his own, he makes his skin into a purifier, when they convey him, as the tawny (horses) do the sun.
9. Like a snake [?], he passes over the wide earth; as wind (blows) away mist, he blows across the land, where, being anointed as Mitra and as Varuṇa, like a fire in the forest, he has let loose his flame.
10. When the barren cow [=kindling stick] gave birth all at once as she was being driven/anointed, she, though faltering, did so unfalteringly, since she has her own herdsmen [=priests].
    When the son [=Agni] was born before his two parents [=kindling sticks], the cow [=lower stick] swallowed the peg [=upper stick]—if they should inquire.
11. They say that Kaṇva is the son of Nr̥ṣad [/of the one who sits among men], and Śyāva [/the dusky], the prizewinner, took the stakes.
    The gleaming udder swelled for Kr̥ṣṇa [/the black one], but in there no one made the truth swell for him.

X.32 (858) Indra

Kavaṣa Ailūṣa
9 verses: jagatī 1–5, triṣṭubh 6–9

Although the Anukramaṇī assigns this hymn to Indra, in fact the hymn falls into two separate parts, defined by both meter and content. The first five verses in jagatī are indeed Indra's, but the last four verses (6–9) in triṣṭubh are more appropriate to Agni. However, these two parts fit together into a larger thematic whole.

The verses dedicated to Indra follow to some degree a conventional "journey" hymn trajectory: Indra's pair of horses bring him to the sacrifice in verse 1, with the journey further described in verse 2. Verse 4 appears to concern the focal point of the sacrifice, the sacrificial ground or, more precisely, the fire altar, to which all the sacrificial participants and substances make their way. A two-way journey is foreseen in verse 5, with Soma (if this identification is correct) on his way to the gods, and Indra and companion gods on the way to the sacrifice.

Several features disturb this simplistic sketch of the hymn. First, the journey is also conceived of as a wedding journey; in addition to verse 3 (to be discussed) see especially the "wooers" in verse 1 and the bridal procession in verse 4. Moreover, the middle verse of this portion of the hymn, verse 3, has a pronounced omphalos character. It announces itself as a wonder, and then produces three striking paradoxes: the son who knows his parents' birth (pāda b), the wife who conveys her husband on the bridal journey (pāda c), and the same role reversal seen from the husband's point of view, a bridal procession made for the man (pāda d). It is difficult to know exactly what to make of this, but it appears that Indra's journey to the sacrifice is being imagined as the wedding journey of a bride. The hyper-virile Indra is in some sense filling the passive role of bride—a fine conceit, though one that the poet does not over-emphasize.

The focus on the "seat" in verse 4, quite possibly the hearth, as well as the first paradox of verse 3, the son who knows his parents' birth, a typical Agni trope, turn our attention to that god in the second part of the hymn. The installation and kindling of the ritual fire are the subject, and the mythic model is the well-known tale of Agni's flight, concealment in the waters, and recovery (vs. 6ab). The narrator owes his knowledge of this to Indra (6cd); in verse 7 he makes a general statement about the value of instruction for the uninitiated. This short sequence is reminiscent of nearby X.28, in which Indra acts as the instructor of the callow. Verse 8 returns to Agni and describes the kindling of a dormant fire. The enigmatic verse 9 presents itself as a sort of reverse dānastuti, though with the identity of the speakers being somewhat unclear.

1. The two (horses) are come, those in the power of the one being conjured up by our insights [=Indra]—(they are come) to the wooers taking their seats in front along with (the other) wooers.
 Indra will find pleasure in both (offerings) of ours when he will take cognizance of the soma-stalk.
2. O much-praised Indra, you drive across the heavenly luminous realms and across the earthly ones through the airy space.
 Those who convey you in an instant right up to the ceremonies, let them vanquish the ungenerous ones who chatter.
3. Just this will appear to me as more wondrous than any wonder: that the son knows by heart the birth of his parents.
 The wife conveys the husband amid the uproar; just for the man an auspicious bridal procession has been made ready.

4. Just this dear seat do I ponder, to which the milk-cows will direct (their journey) like a bridal procession, as will the foremost mother of the flock, a wise counselor, and the sevenfold people of the music.
5. Seeking the gods (he [=Soma?]) has left a track on his way toward you. The one who alone surpasses [=Indra] drives with the Rudras, or among the immortals among whom old age is for giving. Pour honey all around for your helpers.

6. The protector of the commandments of the gods has announced to me that the one who was hidden in the waters [=Agni] is (now) being installed.
   Because knowing Indra kept you in his sights, instructed by him have I come here, o Agni.
7. Because the one not knowing the field asked the field-knower, he goes forth, instructed by the field-knower—this, truly, is the good of instruction—and he finds the straight course.
8. Just today did he [=Agni] breathe. He waited (all) these days; covered over, he sucked his mother's udder.
   Old age has reached the youth. No (longer) angry, the good one has become of favorable mind.
9. Might we do these auspicious things in giving bounties, o wooden vessel, o Kuruśravaṇa.
   Let this be a gift just for you, bounteous ones, and this soma here, which I bear in my heart.

X.33 (859) Lament of a Singer [Anukramaṇī: All Gods 1, Indra 2–3, Dānastuti of Kuruśravaṇa Trāsadasyava 4–5, Upamaśravas Mitrātithiputra 6–9]

Kavaṣa Ailūṣa
9 verses: triṣṭubh 1, br̥hatī 2, satobr̥hatī 3, gāyatrī 4–9

A poignant yet proud 1st-person lament of a poet whose patron has died, the hymn also serves as a sort of job application to his erstwhile patron's son. The progress of the poem is marked by changes in meter. In the first verse the poet remembers his former privileged position and, in its last pāda, the sudden advent of disaster. The next two verses (a pragātha) describes his present miserable state (in terms found also in part in I.105.8) and begs Indra for help. In the last six verses, in gāyatrī, the poet first recalls how he "chose" (a telling expression) his former patron Kuruśravaṇa (vss. 4–6). He then introduces himself to the son, Upamaśravas (vs. 7), but returns in the final two verses (8–9) to his helpless sorrow over the death of his patron and companion.

1. The advance teams of the peoples hitched me up in front. As always, I carried Pūṣan within.
   All the gods then guarded me. There was a shout, "The one of bad command has come."

2. They scorch me all about, like cowives, (like ailing) ribs.
   Inattention, nakedness, and exhaustion oppress me. Like a bird, my attention keeps fluttering here and there.
3. Like mice their tails, the cares gnaw at me, your praiser, o you of a hundred resolves.
   At once show mercy to us, bounteous Indra, and become like a father to us.

4. I chose Kuruśravaṇa of Trasadasyu's line as my king, most liberal to his cantors—I a seer—
5. (Saying,) "He whose three tawny (horses) convey me on his chariot along the straight way—
   I shall praise him at a (sacrifice) with a priestly gift of a thousand (cows)"—
6. (I chose) the father of Upamaśravas for whom there were sweet songs, delightful like a dwelling place for one at home in it.
7. Learn, o Upamaśravas, his son, o grandson of Mitrāthiti:
   I am the celebrant of your father.
8. If I could be the master of immortals or of mortals, my bounteous patron would still live.
9. No one lives beyond the commandment of the gods, even one with a hundred selves.
   And thus have I turned away from my yokemate.

X.34 (860) Gambler

Kavaṣa Ailūṣa or Akṣa Maujavant
14 verses: triṣṭubh, except jagatī 7

One of the most famous, most translated, and most anthologized hymns in the R̥gveda, this lively and vivid lament of the gambler depicts the sad lot of a man addicted to dicing but unsuccessful at it. This hapless speaker describes the intoxication that grips him when he is playing or even contemplating play and that leaves him helpless to resist (vss. 1, 5–9), as well as the toll this compulsion takes on his personal life and the self-pity this evokes in him (vss. 2–4, 10–11). At the end of the hymn the gambler vows to renounce play (vs. 12), and the god Savitar restores him to his former position (vs. 13). The final verse (14) is the gambler's address to the dice, urging them to leave him alone and find another victim. This portion of the hymn has the form of a ritual expiation, embodied especially in the last words of 12d, in which the gambler avows the truth of his speech.

Dicing was an important cultural feature of ancient India, especially associated with kings and the ruling class. Already in middle Vedic sacrifice, in the Rājasūya, the ritual of the consecration of the king, there is a ritual dicing match, rigged so that the king-to-be wins. Of course, the whole of the great epic, the Mahābhārata, is determined by the outcome of the dicing match between Yudhiṣṭhira and his cousins: Yudhiṣṭhira gambles away his kingdom, his brothers, his wife, and himself and must fight to regain his kingship. The much-loved story of Nala and Damayantī also involves the gambling away of a kingdom, this time by Nala. And the dharma texts consider gambling, along with hunting and womanizing, to be a characteristic pursuit—and vice—of kings (cf. Mānava Dharma Śāstra VII.47, 50; for condemnation of gambling in general see, e.g., MDŚ IX.220–28).

Ancient Indian dicing was quite different from the game that the word conjures up in the modern mind, and much scholarship has been devoted to figuring out what the play actually consisted of (see, e.g., Lüders 1907; Falk 1986). It seems to have involved a large quantity of a particular kind of nut (vibhīdaka /vibhītaka) as the dice; these had no markings on them. They were thrown into a hollow on the ground, and the players took turns pulling out a handful. The best "hand" was one divisible by four, and the other hands were ranked according to how many nuts were left over after a division by four, with a single leftover nut being the worst (see vs. 2c). For details, see Falk (1986: 73–133). Although it may be hard for us to imagine the passions enflamed by this kind of long division, our own games of chance probably will not stand up to scrutiny some millennia in the future.

The monologue form found here is almost unprecedented in the Ṛgveda, and the shifting play of emotions—guilty excitement, tender remembrance of his past life and family, scorn for his own weakness and the disgust he arouses in others, bitter anger at the inanimate dice that brought him low, to which he ascribes agency and malign intention and for which he still longs—is psychologically convincing and very moving. Showing our own biases, we might proudly deem it quite "modern."

1. The dangling (nuts) of the lofty (tree) exhilarate me, the ones born in a windy place, constantly whirling in the gaming hollow.
   Like a draught of soma from Mt. Mūjavant, the wakeful vibhīdaka nut has pleased me.
2. She did not oppose me, nor did she get angry; she was gracious to my comrades and to me.
   I, on account of one die too many, have pushed away my avowed wife.
3. Her mother-in-law [=my mother] hates me; my wife pushes me away.
   A man in distress finds no one to pity him.

"I find no more use for a gambler than for an old nag up for sale," (so they say).

4. Others fondle the wife of a man whose possessions the die with eyes on the prize has hungered for.
   Father, mother, brothers say about him, "We do not know him; lead him away bound."
5. When I resolve, "I will not play with them," I am bereft of my comrades, who go off (without me).
   And as soon as, scattered down, the brown (dice) have raised their voice, I just go to their appointed place, like a girl with a lover.
6. The gambler goes to the hall of play asking himself, "will I win?" puffing himself up with "I will win!"
   The dice run counter to his desire, conferring the winning throws on his opponent.
7. They are just "dice"—but hooking, goading, debasing, scorching, seeking to scorch, giving (temporarily) like a child, then in turn slapping down the victor, infused with honey, with power over the gambler.
8. The troop of them plays, three times fifty strong. Like god Savitar's, their ordinances hold true.
   Even to the battle fury of the mighty they do not bow; even the king makes his bow to them.
9. Downward they roll; up above they ricochet. Lacking hands, they overpower the man with hands.
   Heavenly coals scattered down in the gaming hollow, though they are cold they burn up the heart.
10. The wife of the gambler, abandoned, is scorched, and the mother of the child wandering who knows where.
    In debt, fearful, seeking money, he approaches by night the house of others.
11. It scorched the gambler to see a woman—the wife and well-ordered home of others.
    Since early in the day he hitched up his brown horses [=dice], the "little bullock" fell [=left off gambling and sought shelter] (only) at the end of the fire [=late at night].
12. [Gambler:] He who has become the general of your great throng, the foremost king of the troop, to him I put forth my ten (fingers): "I withhold no money. This truth I speak."
13. [Savitar:] "Don't keep playing with dice; just plow your own plowland. Be content in your possessions, thinking them much.
    There are your cows, o gambler, there your wife." In this way does Savitar here, protector of the stranger, watch out for me.

14. [To all the dice:] Make alliance (with us) now; have pity on us. Do not conjure against us boldly with your terrible (mind/eye).
    Let your battle fury now settle down, your hostility. Let another now be in the toils of the brown ones.

The next four hymns (35–38) form a group, though they are not all attributed to the same author (see Oldenberg 1888: 229 n. 2, 235). The first two, to the All Gods, are attributed to Luśa Dhānāka, while the other two were given fanciful poets' names derived from the contents of the hymn itself: 37 Abhitapas Saurya ("Scorching Heat, son of the Sun") and 38 Indra Muṣkavant ("Indra, possessing testicles").

X.35 (861) All Gods

Luśa Dhānāka
14 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 13–14

This is primarily a morning hymn, calling especially on the gods associated with the early morning sacrifice for aid and protection: the Sun, the Dawn, Agni, Indra, the Aśvins, as well as Heaven and Earth. The ten interior verses (3–12) have a pāda-length refrain dedicated to the kindled ritual fire, and the activities of Dawn occupy much of the hymn (esp. vss. 3–6). The hymn opens out toward its end, with special focus on the Ādityas (vss. 9, 11–12), but the later prominence of the Ādityas has been prepared by mention of "blamelessness" in earlier verses (2–3) and by the "proclamation of truth" in verse 8. This truth, formulated in 8c, is simply that "the Sun, as spy," rises every day, but we know from elsewhere in the Ṛgveda (nearby X.37 belonging to the same poetic group [see discussion there], as well as, e.g., VII.62.2, VII.63.1) that the Sun is the eye of the Ādityas, especially Mitra and Varuṇa, who attests to the innocence or guilt of the men whom he sees as he rises. Thus this brief truth formulation encapsulates our knowledge that our place in the moral order is mediated through the cosmic order of the daily rhythm of sunrise.

1. They have awakened—these fires accompanied by Indra, bringing light at the early brightenings of the dawn.
   Let great Heaven and Earth take cognizance of our work. Today we choose the help of the gods.
2. We choose the help of Heaven and Earth. The Mother Rivers, the Mountains filled with (soma-)reeds, the Sun, the Dawn we beseech for blamelessness. Let Soma, being pressed, make good for us today.
3. Heaven and Earth—let the two great mothers protect us, who are blameless, for our welfare.

Let Dawn, dawning, thrust away evil. – We beseech Agni, when he is kindled, for well-being.

4. This foremost ruddy one here, *this lovely goddess—let her, the rich lady, dawn richly for our gain.
   In the distance (from us) we would set the fury of the one who is bad to meet. – We beseech Agni, when he is kindled, for well-being.
5. Those who stretch forth with the rays of the sun, bringing light at the early brightenings of the dawn, do you dawn good things widely today for our fame. – We beseech Agni, when he is kindled, for well-being.
6. Let the dawns without affliction attend upon us; let the fires rear up loftily with their light.
   Let the Aśvins hitch up their thrusting chariot. – We beseech Agni, when he is kindled, for well-being.
7. The best portion, worthy to be chosen, impel to us today, o Savitar, for you are a conferrer of treasure.
   I call on her, the begetter of wealth, on the Holy Place. – We beseech Agni, when he is kindled, for well-being.
8. Let this proclamation of truth carry me through, the one that as sons of Manu we have thought up for the gods:
   "Through all the ruddy (dawns) the Sun, as spy, (always) goes up." – We beseech Agni, when he is kindled, for well-being.
9. Today at the strewing of the ritual grass, at the yoking of the pressing stones we beg for lack of hatred and for the realization of our thought.
   Standing in the shelter of the Ādityas, you are astir. – We beseech Agni, when he is kindled, for well-being.
10. Here is our ritual grass for the joint revelry. I reverently invoke the gods lofty in heaven. I will make the seven Hotars sit (on the ritual grass).
    (We beseech) Indra, Mitra, Varuṇa, and Bhaga, for our gain. – We beseech Agni, when he is kindled, for well-being.
11. Ādityas, come here for our wholeness; aid our sacrifice for us to grow strong, you who take pleasure together.
    (We beseech) Bṛhaspati, Pūṣan, the Aśvins, Bhaga. – We beseech Agni, when he is kindled, for well-being.
12. O gods, Ādityas, extend to us this shelter good to proclaim, of good support, protective of men, for our livestock, for our kith and kin to live. – We beseech Agni, when he is kindled, for well-being.
13. Let all the Maruts today all (be there) with aid, let all the kindled fires be (there with aid).
    Let all the gods come here to us with help; let all wealth, (every) prize be for us.

14. One whom you help, o gods, at the winning of prizes, one whom you safeguard, one whom you carry across narrow straits, one who knows no fear under your protection—may we be (all) those, to pursue the gods, powerful ones.

X.36 (862) All Gods

Luśa Dhānāka
14 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 13–14

This hymn is a clear companion piece to the preceding one, X.35. Both hymns consist of fourteen verses, all jagatī except the last two in triṣṭubh. Both have a refrain, and the refrain of X.36 (vss. 2–12) is a minor variant of the last pāda of the first verse of X.35. And there is some shared vocabulary. However, X.36 is not tied closely to the morning sacrifice, as X.35 is. The range of gods invoked in X.36 is wider than those in X.35, although there is a distinct Ādityan cast here as well (see vss. 1, 3–4, 12–13). The hymn seems somewhat loosely and inattentively constructed.

1. Dawn and Night, lofty, well-ornamented—Heaven and Earth, Varuṇa, Mitra, Aryaman—Indra I invoke, the Maruts, the Mountains, the Waters, the Ādityas, Heaven and Earth, the Waters, the Sun.
2. Both Heaven and Earth—let those two discerning truthful ones guard us from narrow straits, from harm.
 Let Dissolution, bad to meet, not gain mastery over us. – This help of the gods we choose today.
3. Let Aditi protect us from every narrow strait—the mother of Mitra and of Varuṇa the wealthy.
 Might we attain sun-filled light that keeps the wolf away. – This help of the gods we choose today.
4. Let the pressing stone as it speaks drive away demonic forces: the bad dream, dissolution, every devourer.
 Might we attain the Ādityan shelter and that of the Maruts. – This help of the gods we choose today.
5. Let Indra sit here on the ritual grass; let the refreshing drink swell. Let Bṛhaspati the chanter chant along with the melodies.
 We would compose a thought possessing good signs for our life. – This help of the gods we choose today.
6. O Aśvins, make our sacrifice heaven-touching and of lively ceremony, to seek favor—a sacrifice with its reins pointed eastward, bepoured with ghee. – This help of the gods we choose today.

7. I invoke the Marutian flock, (which is) good to invoke, (which is) pure, high, luck itself—for comradeship.
   Might we acquire the thriving of wealth in order to receive good fame. – This help of the gods we choose today.
8. We will bring (forward) the one swollen with the moisture of the waters, providing riches for the living, pursuing the gods, good to invoke, the glory of the ceremony.
   Soma, destined for Indra, with his good reins would we hold fast. – This help of the gods we choose today.
9. May we win this through easy winning with winners—we living and with living sons, blameless.
   The haters of the sacred formulation should take their own transgression off in all directions. – This help of the gods we choose today.
10. You who are worthy of the sacrifice of Manu, listen: what we beseech you for, gods, give that—resolve that brings victory, glory accompanied by wealth and heroes. – This help of the gods we choose today.
11. A great thing of the great ones we choose today: the help of the lofty gods without assault, so that we may attain the good born of heroes. – This help of the gods we choose today.
12. In the shelter of great Agni while he is being kindled (may we be) blameless to Mitra and Varuṇa for our well-being;
    may we be under the best impulsion of Savitar. – This help of the gods we choose today.
13. All (you) Gods who are under the commandment of Savitar, whose impulsion is real, and of Mitra and Varuṇa—establish well-portioned property in heroes and cows, brilliant wealth for us.
14. Savitar from behind, Savitar from in front, Savitar from above, Savitar from below—let Savitar impel wholeness to us; let Savitar bestow on us a long lifetime.

X.37 (863) Sūrya

Abhitapas Saurya
12 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 10

Some of the themes sketched in X.35 are developed in this hymn into a more satisfyingly shaped composition. Though the hymns are not ascribed to the same poet, the name of the supposed author of X.37, Abhitapas Saurya ("Scorching Heat, son of the Sun"), is an artificial one, derived from the hymn's subject matter.

In X.35 the daily rising of the sun, expressed as a brief truth formulation (X.35.8), was implicitly connected with the poet's desire for "blamelessness" and for the protection of the Ādityas, but these themes were scattered through the hymn, which focused primarily on the early-morning sacrifice and the various gods associated with it. Here the Sun is primary, and his role as the eye of Mitra and Varuṇa, and thus as the observer of mortals' guilt or blamelessness, is announced at the beginning (vs. 1a), and an expanded version of the truth formulation of X.35.8 is found in the second verse.

The benefits the Sun brings to us and the regularity of his return form the subject of the middle part of the hymn. The connection between our moral behavior and the Sun's daily round is asserted again toward the end of the hymn (vs. 9), which concludes (vs. 12) with a general expiation for faults unwittingly committed and a scapegoating of our enemies.

1. Homage to the eye of Mitra and Varuṇa. Do great service to this truth [=hymn] for the god.
   To the one seen from afar, the signal born of the gods, the son of heaven, to the Sun—recite!
2. Let this expression of reality protect me around on all sides, where(ver) Heaven (and Earth) and the days will extend:
   "Every other thing that stirs settles down. But always the waters (are in motion), always the Sun rises."
3. No godless one seeks the upper hand against you early in the day, when you drive your chariot with its flying steeds.
   The one (wheel) rolls eastward along the dusky realm; with the other one, the light, you drive upward, o Sun.
4. The light with which you thrust away the darkness, o Sun, and the radiance with which you rouse up every moving creature, with that drive away from us every want of nourishment, every lack of oblation, drive away disease, away the bad dream.
5. For impelled forth, you guard the commandment for all, when not being angry you proceed upward following your own customs.
   When today we will appeal to you, o Sun, the gods should give assent to our intention.
6. This call of ours let Heaven and Earth, this speech of ours let the waters, Indra, and the Maruts hear.
   Let us not be in want of the sight of the Sun. Living happily may we attain old age.
7. Always may we—of good mind, of good eye, rich in offspring, without disease, without blame—living a long time look upon you rising every day, o Sun who have Mitra's might.

8. Upon you, o wide-gazing one, bringing great light, luminous, a joy to every eye, mounting from the surface of lofty (heaven)—may we, living, look upon (you), o Sun.
9. You at whose signal all creatures both go forth and settle down at night—by reason of our blamelessness, o golden-haired Sun, rise up with ever better (fortune) for us day after day.
10. Be luck for us with your eye, luck for us by day, luck with your radiance, luck in the cold, luck in the heat, so that there will be luck on the road, luck at home. This brilliant wealth establish (for us), o Sun.
11. To both our breeds, o gods, to the two-footed and the four-footed, extend shelter.
    Eating, drinking, drawing nourishment, satiated: establish for us this luck and lifetime without flaw.
12. Whatever we have done to you, o gods, with our tongue or through absence of mind, whatever grave (offense) angering the gods, on the ungenerous one who brings misfortune to us, on him set down this offense, o good ones.

X.38 (864) Indra

Indra Muṣkavant
5 verses: jagatī

The fanciful name of the poet in the Anukramaṇī ("Indra possessing testicles") is extracted from the final pāda of the poem (5d); the hymn clearly belongs with the other compositions of Luśa (X.35–38). It is a martial hymn, calling on Indra to fight on our side in pitched battles, vanquishing our enemies and sharing the booty he acquires. The style is lively and at times slangy, especially in the final verse, with its surprise ending: depicted as all powerful in the rest of the hymn, Indra is revealed to be not entirely free, but in some unspecified thrall to Kutsa (otherwise a client of Indra's in the Ṛgveda), and the poet taunts Indra to break the bonds.

1. At this glorious battle charge, Indra, at the vehement battle cry, help us to win, when at the winning of cattle, when the bespangled (warriors) have been emboldened, the missiles fly in all directions at the time to conquer superior men.
2. Uncover for us at our seat wealth in livestock, flooding with cows, worthy of fame, o Indra.
   May we share the fat with you when you win, able one. As we want it, make it so, good one.

3. Whatever godless one, Dāsa or Ārya, will have in view to fight us, o much-praised Indra—let those rivals be easy to conquer for you along with us. With you may we vanquish them in the clash.
4. Who is to be invoked by the few and who by the many, who finds wide space in close quarters at the time to conquer superior men, him—the winner in the devouring (battle) today, the famous superior man—Indra may we make inclined toward us for help.
5. For I have heard of you, Indra, as tightly wound, unyielding, spurring on (even) the feeble, o bull.
   Release yourself from Kutsa! Come here! Will such a one as you stay tied by the balls?

From X.39 through X.56 the hymns are arranged in groups of three, each trio generally ascribed to the same poet by the Anukramaṇī. See Oldenberg (1888: 236).

The next three hymns, dedicated to the Aśvins, are attributed to a female poet Ghoṣā (X.39–40) and her son (X.41). Ghoṣā herself bears the patronymic Kākṣīvatī "daughter/descendant of Kakṣīvant," the exceptionally artful poet of I.116–126, who is especially devoted to the Aśvins: five of his eleven hymns are dedicated to them (I.116–120). Indeed the phraseology and mythological references of the Ghoṣā hymns share much with Kakṣīvant's Aśvin hymns, and whether we accept the Anukramaṇī's ascription of the hymns to a woman and her son (the latter identified by the metronymic Ghauṣeya), there can be no doubt that these hymns have a remarkably close relationship to the Kakṣīvant hymns in Maṇḍala I. It is worth remembering that Kakṣīvant shows a particular interest in women and marriage in his hymns.

All three of the Ghoṣā hymns begin with a verse invoking the Aśvins' chariot, but they diverge significantly thereafter. The final hymn (X.41) is a brief (three-verse) pendant to the series, straightforwardly describing the Aśvins' early-morning journey to the sacrifice and urging them to come to our offering in preference to other possible ones. The other two are more complex, with significant involvement of an apparent woman's voice, especially in X.40, which focuses on marriage.

X.39 (865) Aśvins

Ghoṣā Kākṣīvatī
14 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 13

This first hymn in the series is in most ways a standard Aśvin hymn, especially in the Kakṣīvant mode. After the first verse devoted to the chariot and a plea to the Aśvins for lavish gifts (vs. 2), the hymn settles into the familiar pattern of many Aśvin hymns, in a list form briefly mentioning good deeds performed and benevolent treatment meted out by those two gods. The first catalogue is fairly brief, consisting of the two verses 3–4, with a formulaic summary ("I shall proclaim your ancient heroic deeds . . . ") in verse 5. The poet promises to make the Aśvins "new" (5c), just as they famously made Cyavāna young again (4ab). A second longer catalogue of deeds, more formally constructed, occupies verses 7–11.

But these lists are interrupted (in vs. 6) by a surprising, 1st-person intrusion: a woman (the feminine pronoun iyám opens the verse and makes the gender of the speaker unmistakable) calls upon the Aśvins and begs them to serve as her parents and aid her in her plight, since she lacks friends and relations. The reason for her distress is not given, but the traditional view that she is asking them to find her a husband seems reasonable, given that an orphaned girl would have no marital prospects and would be quite vulnerable to mistreatment. Her verse closely echoes the first verse of the hymn: she uses the same verb "invoke" and uses a paternal image like that in verse 1d.

This heartrending verse seems to have no sequel in the hymn. Although it is not impossible that the following catalogue verses are also her speech, it seems unlikely because of their strict conformity to Aśvin-hymn diction. While it is certainly true that the next verses mention several females helped by the Aśvins (the wife for Vimada, the aid given to Vadhrimatī and to Puraṃdhi, vs. 7; to Viśpalā in vs. 8), males are just as often recipients of their favor in those verses, and the most striking female figure, the spinster growing old in her parents' house in verse 3, who is identified with the woman in verse 6 and indeed with Ghoṣā by many commentators, is not in a verse that our female speaker could be saying.

The female speaker in this hymn foreshadows and complements the female speaker, explicitly identified as Ghoṣā, in the next hymn (X.40.5–8), and the speaker in this hymn is often said to be that same Ghoṣā. However, in the opinion of one of us (SWJ) this is quite unlikely because our speaker bemoans her lack of kin, while Ghoṣā in X.40.5 is said to be a king's daughter. Instead, the two female speakers seem meant to contrast with each other and to reflect extreme poles of women's status in a marital context. The other of us (JPB) sees the speaker's lament in 39.6 that she has no friends or relatives as a metaphorical and hyperbolic characterization of her unhappy life rather than a literal description of it. In that case the speaker in X.39 could the woman called Ghoṣā in X.40.

Another, enigmatic reference to a woman is found in verse 11, which ends the catalogue. The verse declares that no trouble afflicts a man if the Aśvins put his chariot and his wife (pátnī) "in front." What exactly is meant here is unclear, but we suggest that this is yet another fleeting reference to the introduction of the Sacrificer's Wife (pátnī) into the ritual in late R̥gveda; the chariot and the wife leading the way remind us of the Mudgala/Mudgalānī hymn (X.102), in which Mudgala's wife, Mudgalānī, serves as successful charioteer in a chariot race—a hymn we have also interpreted as a reference to the new ritual institution of the Sacrificer's Wife. (For further discussion, see the introduction to X.102.)

The hymn ends with a return to the Aśvins' chariot drive (vs. 13), with a few more incidental good deeds, and a summary verse announcing our own praise hymn (vs. 14).

1. Your earth-encircling, smooth-rolling chariot, to be invoked at evening and at the dawns by the man who offers oblation—that (chariot) of yours do we now invoke, (we) as the latest of those who constantly do so—the (chariot) good to invoke like the name of one's father.
2. Stimulate liberal giving; swell our insightful thoughts; rouse profusions—we are eager for that.
Make us a glorious portion, o Aśvins; make it dear to our generous patrons like soma.
3. You become good fortune even for the woman growing old at home, the helpers even of the one lacking speed, even of the one furthest behind.
Even of the blind man, o Nāsatyas, even of the starving, even of the broken—they say just you are their healers.
4. You two fashioned old Cyavāna, like a chariot, into a youth again, (for him) to move about.
You pulled the son of Tugra out from the waters. All these (deeds) of yours are to be proclaimed at the pressings.
5. I shall proclaim your ancient heroic deeds before the people. And you were also healers, embodiments of joy.
Now we shall make you new (for you) to help us, o Nāsatyas, so that this stranger will place his trust (in us?).
6. [A woman:] "It's I who invoked you: hear me, o Aśvins. Like parents for their son, do your best for me.
I am without friends, without kin, without blood relatives, and heedless: rescue me in the face of this shame."
7. You two with your chariot carried down to Vimada the sleek maiden of Purumitra (to be his wife).
You two came to the call of Vadhrimatī. You two made an easy birth for Puraṃdhi.
8. You two made youthful vigor again for the inspired poet Kali, who was approaching old age.
You two dug Vandana out from the antelope snare. You two in an instant made Viśpalā go.
9. You two raised up Rebha, set in hiding and already dead, o bullish Aśvins.
You two made the earth-cleft and the heated (pot) comfortable for Atri, for Saptavadhri.
10. You two gave to Pedu a white horse, a prizewinner with nine and ninety prizes, o Aśvins, (a horse) to be celebrated, one setting its comrades to running, to be invoked by men like good fortune, and the embodiment of joy.

11. O you two kings and Aditi—not from anywhere does distress or difficulty or fear reach him for whom you arrange that his chariot, along with his wife, will be in front, o Aśvins good to invoke, you who follow the course of the Rudras [=Maruts].
12. Drive here with your chariot swifter than thought, which the Ṛbhus made for you, o Aśvins, and at whose hitching up the Daughter of Heaven [=Dawn] is born and both bright-lit day halves of Vivasvant.
13. You drove your course with your victorious (chariot) through the mountain. You made the milk-cow swell for Śayu, o Aśvins.
 With your powers you two freed the quail, which had been swallowed, even from within the mouth of the wolf.
14. We have made this praise song for you, o Aśvins. We have fashioned it, like the Bhṛgus a chariot.
 We have clasped it to ourselves like a dashing youth a maiden, holding it close like our own son who continues our lineage.

X.40 (866) Aśvins

Ghoṣā Kākṣīvatī
14 verses: jagatī

As suggested in the introduction to X.39, we two translators have different interpretations of the ritual context for this pair of hymns. Accordingly we have contributed contrastive, signed discussions of the hymn's context in this introduction.

SWJ

As already noted, the hymn begins with a mention of the Aśvins' chariot journey (vs. 1) and indeed continues with speculations on their whereabouts (vss. 2–3) and a description of our attempts to attract them to our sacrifice (vs. 4). These verses contain vivid imagery, especially the contrastive pictures of sexual pairing in verses 2–3 (see also X.39.14c, which is a mirror image of 40.2d).

These erotic images prepare the way for the scenes of apparent betrothal and marriage that follow (vss. 5–11). These verses open with the speech of a woman identified as Ghoṣā, whose status as king's daughter contrasts with that of the bereft, unnamed woman who speaks in X.39.5 (see the introduction to that hymn). Ghoṣā boldly addresses the Aśvins themselves and demands to know if they will "be there" for her (vs. 5). The scene sketched is, in my opinion, a Svayaṃvara or woman's "self-choice" marriage. The stage has been set for this in verse 3d, where the Aśvins are described as coming to soma-pressings "like kings' sons" (rājaputrā́).

This tatpuruṣa compound is found only here in the R̥gveda and would neatly identify the Aśvins as appropriate suitors coming to a Svayaṃvara, where the woman making the choice would likewise be a king's daughter (5b). Her unabashed speech, questioning them about their suitability as husbands and supporters, would be fitting in a Svayaṃvara context.

The next verses (6–8) seem to depart from the marriage theme, and it is not possible to be certain that they are spoken by Ghoṣā. I believe they are, however, because the marital theme continues beneath the surface: verses 5–7 contain four somewhat problematic instances of the preverb pári "around" (5a, 6a, 6c, 7c), in the same metrical position, but in awkwardly unidiomatic verbal lexemes. The problems they cause for the translator are seen in the somewhat "off" English that represents them. This intrusive pári is, in our opinion, an insistent reminder of the wedding context, evoking one of the important parts of the wedding ceremony, the *circum*ambulation of the fire, and also evoking the consummation of the marriage, the embrace of the bride, found close to the end of these wedding verses, in 10d "the wives are to be embraced (pariṣ*vajé*)."

Ghoṣā's likely speech ends with verse 8, ostensibly praising the Aśvins for "giving freedom/wide space" to various individuals and opening up an enclosure with all the characteristics of the Vala cave, a deed not usually attributed to the Aśvins. The wide space created and the opening up of the enclosure can (perhaps fancifully) be taken metaphorically here, in this wedding context, for the deflowering of the virgin bride.

The following two verses (9–10) return to the narrator/poet and describe the wedding itself, but develop the theme identified in the previous verse. In the first pāda of verse 9 the maiden is born—presumably born into womanhood, after the "opening up" just performed. The "little lad" in flight in the same pāda may be her bridegroom, or even a pet diminutive for his penis. The next two pādas (9bc), with sprouting plants and flowing rivers, are generally interpreted as expressing nature's approval of the marriage; in contrast we again consider them metaphorical, expressing the advent of sexual maturity and sexual awakening. The sprouting sprouts of pāda b remind us of the maiden Apālā's prayer that her pubic hair would grow along with the plants in the fields (VIII.91.5–6); the rivers of pāda c might either be her first menstrual blood, the blood from her deflowering, or sexual fluids produced by arousal. This verse ends with the same phrase that Ghoṣā used in her question to the Aśvins, "be there for the day," but with a reversal of genders (the bride will be there for her husband, as Ghoṣā asked the Aśvins to be there for her), followed by the triumphant "this is marriage!" While verse 9 treats marriage as an intimate exchange between the two principals, verse 10 brings us back to the social aspects of marriage: the exchange relation created between the families and the effort required to bring it about. The mysteries of sex are, mysteriously, touched on in verse 11.

The hymn ends with three verses (12–14) more conventionally addressed to the Aśvins with requests for goods and aid, though the final verse (14) echoes the questions about the whereabouts of the Aśvins that began the hymn.

JPB

An alternate view of the ritual context of X.39–40 is that both hymns find a place in an Atirātra, an Overnight Soma Sacrifice, in the morning rites that conclude the ceremony. In these rites, which are a continuation of the rites of the Third Pressing from the previous evening, the Aśvins return in the morning of the second day to receive a last offering of soma. The references to the night between evening and morning oblations (e.g., X.40.2), to the soma offerings (X.39.4, 40.13, 14), and, of course, to the Aśvins, to whom both hymns are dedicated, accord with the ritual context of an Atrirātra.

One of the themes of the Third Pressing in the classical soma rites is the fertility of the sacrificing couple. Since this is a relatively late hymn, the Wife of the Sacrificer may already have been a participant in the rite for which these hymns were composed. Therefore, the hymns might have been an appeal to the Aśvins to help make the marriage of the sacrificing couple a success by giving them a son. Thus, the "little lad" who "has taken flight" in the puzzling verse 9 might be the hoped-for child, whose birth marks the success of their marriage. His "flight" can refer to his conception; the image of an embryo "flying" to the womb also occurs in X.162.3. For a detailed study of the hymn that reflects this interpretation, see Brereton 2013.

1. Your chariot that is driving where—who attends to that brilliant one for its good progress, o men—the (chariot) driving early in the morning, extending to every clan, traveling at every dawn—(who attends to it) with insightful thought and labor?
2. Where in the evening, where at dawn will the Aśvins make their evening meal? Where did they spend the night?
   Who takes you to bed, like a widow her brother-in-law, or to a rendezvous like a maiden a dashing youth?
3. You awaken early in the morning like a pitiable [?] old couple; at every dawn you, deserving the sacrifice, come to the house.
   For whom do you become occulted, or for whom do you descend to his soma-pressings like kings' sons, o men?
4. Like hunters on the track of wild elephants, we call you down in the evening and at dawn with our oblation.
   You two bring refreshment to the man who pours the libation in proper order, you superior men, you lords of beauty.
5. Circling around you two, o Aśvins, Ghoṣā, the daughter of a king, said, "I ask you, o men:
   Will you be there for me for the day and be there for the night? Will you exert your abilities (for me, as if) for a steed (to win the prize) of horse and chariot?

6. "You two poets circle around your chariot, o Aśvins; you arrive at the clans of the singer, as Kutsa (arrived at the poet/Kavi Uśanā).
   The bee holds the honey of you two encircled with her mouth, o Aśvins, as a young woman (holds) a tryst (within her mouth) [=keeps quiet about it].
7. "You two came to Bhujyu, o Aśvins, you to Vaśa, you to Śiñjāra, to Uśanā.
   The hostile man will circumvent your comradeship, but I find pleasure in your benevolence along with your help.
8. "You two make wide space for Kr̥śa, you for Śayu, o Aśvins, you for the worshiper and the widow.
   You two open up the thundering enclosure with its seven mouths for the sake of gain, o Aśvins."
9. The maiden has been born, and the little lad has taken flight. And when sprouts have sprouted according to (the Aśvins') wondrous powers, the rivers flow for him as if into a valley; (she) is there for him for the day (and for the night): this is marriage!
10. They cry over the living; they make a mutual exchange at the rite. The men [=relatives of the couple] have been devising (the marriage) for a long stretch:
    It is a precious thing for the fathers, that they brought (the couple) together; a joy for husbands that their wives are to be embraced.
11. We do not know this—proclaim it to us—how a young man dwells peacefully in the womb of a young woman.
    Might we go to the house of the seed-laden bull who has a ruddy cow as his beloved, o Aśvins. We are eager for this.
12. Your benevolence has come here, you Aśvins whose goods are prize mares. Our desires have held themselves down firmly in our hearts, Aśvins.
    You have become the paired herdsmen, the two lords of beauty. Dear to Aryaman, might we reach his porticos.
13. Reaching exhilaration in the dwelling of Manu, provide wealth along with heroes to the eloquent one.
    Make a ford that offers good drink, o lords of beauty. Smash away the post standing in our path, the malevolence.
14. Where today and among which clans do the wondrous Aśvins, the lords of beauty, find exhilaration?
    Who has held them down? To the house of which inspired poet or sacrificer have they gone?

X.41 (867) Aśvins

Suhastya Ghauṣeya
3 verses: jagatī

As we already noted in the introduction to this group of hymns, this brief appendix is a conventional journey hymn. Nothing in this hymn, save the treatment of the chariot in verse 1, makes its relationship to the two preceding Ghoṣā hymns evident. The poet is identified as a son of Ghoṣā by the metronymic Ghauṣeya; his first name, Suhastya "Good-handed," is extracted from verse 3.

1. This your common three-wheeled chariot—much invoked and worthy of praise, going again and again to the soma-pressings, earth-encircling and worthy of the rites—do we invoke with well-twisted (hymns) at the break of dawn.
2. O Nāsatyas, you mount the early-yoked, early-driving, honey-bringing chariot, by which you go to the sacrificing clans, o men, and to the sacrifice even of a weak man, with its Hotar, Aśvins.
3. Whether you are going to an Adhvaryu of good hands with honey in his palms, or to an Agnidh of steadfast skill, a domestic leader, or to the soma-pressings of an inspired poet, from there drive here to honey-drinking, o Aśvins.

Kr̥ṣṇa Āṅgirasa is said to be the poet of the next three hymns (42–44), all dedicated to Indra and showing clear verbal connections.

X.42 (868) Indra

Kr̥ṣna Āṅgirasa
11 verses: triṣṭubh

The usual mutually beneficial relationship between Indra, giver of bounties and aid in battle, and the singer/sacrificer offering poems and oblations in exchange is the theme of this hymn. However, the hymn is scarcely run-of-the-mill, for the poet has captured the relationship in a series of deftly fashioned images, and the balance between giving god and offering mortals is maintained throughout.

1. Like an archer in ambush who shoots farther, like a busy attendant, bring forth the praise song for him.
   With your speech, o inspired poets, surpass the speech of the stranger.
   Bring Indra to rest at our soma, o singer.

2. Try to entice your comrade here, (like) a cow with milking. Singer, awaken Indra (like) a lover.
   Bestir the champion to the giving of his bounty, like a full bucket overflowing with goods.
3. Do they not call you the benefactor, bounteous one? Sharpen me: I hear that you are the sharpening.
   Let my insight be profitable, able one. Bring Bhaga, the goods-finder, here to us, Indra.
4. The peoples, taking their stand in conflict together, separately call upon you in the struggle for "what's mine."
   Whoever offers an oblation makes (you) his yokemate here: the champion wants no fellowship with a non-presser.
5. Whoever, providing a pleasing offering, presses for him sharp soma drops, ample like streaming wealth (on the hoof), for him (Indra) makes a team of his rivals, easily spurred, easily goaded, in the early morning of the day. He smashes the obstacle [/Vṛtra].
6. Indra, upon whom we have set our laud, the bounteous one who has fixed his desire upon us—let his rival, though he is far away, take fright, and let the peoples' brilliant things bow down to him.
7. Thrust the rival far away into the distance with that mighty śamba-pole of yours, o you who are much invoked.
   Set (a mass of) barley and cattle on us, Indra. For the singer, make his insight possessed of prizes as its ornaments.
8. Indra, within whom the bullish pressings, the sharp soma drops, have gone, ample to the end—the bounteous one will certainly not hold back his giving. He carries down much of value to the presser.
9. And having overplayed his hand, he will win the jackpot, when the (gambler) with the best throw pulls out the perfect ("hand" of dice) at the right time.
   Whoever has desire for the gods, he does not withhold the stakes; just him does the autonomous one [=Indra] unite with wealth.
10. With cows we would overcome neglect that goes ill, and with barley we would overcome all hunger, o you who are much invoked.
    With our kings and our community might we be the first to win the stakes.
11. Let Indra, lord of the formulation, protect us all around, from behind and from above and from below, from him who wishes ill—from in front and from the middle. Let him, as comrade, create wide space for his comrades.

X.43 (869) Indra

Kr̥ṣṇa Āṅgirasa
11 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 10–11

This second of Kr̥ṣṇa Āṅgirasa's three eleven-verse Indra hymns has very clear ties to the previous one, X.42. They share the last two verses (10–11), as well as lexicon and phraseology. Yet the two hymns are thematically distinct, and X.43 lacks the carefully balanced reciprocity of X.42. The focus here is on liquids—on nourishing streams of water (vss. 3, 6–8) as well as on soma (vss. 2, 4, 6–8)—and on finding the sun or the light (vss. 1, 4, 5, 8). These themes together evoke the triumphant progress of the Ārya, conquering rivers and finding sunlit space, which is mythically embodied in Indra's release of the waters confined by Vr̥tra indirectly reflected in verse 8b. This recourse to the mythic model accounts for the references to Manu, the primal Ārya sacrificer (vss. 4, 8).

One can point to a nice index of the different uses even shared elements are put to in the two hymns X.42 and X.43: identical or almost identical phrases assign roles to exactly opposite personnel. Thus, the phrase "fix desire on someone" (√śri kā́mam LOCATIVE) is found in both X.42.6b and X.43.2b; in the former Indra has fixed his desire on us, while in the latter I have fixed my desire on Indra. Similarly, in the elaborate gambling simile found almost identically in X.42.9abc and X.43.5ab it is the mortal who is the subject in X.42 and Indra in X.43.

1. My thoughts—sun-finding, all directed to a single goal, eager—have bellowed to Indra.
   They embrace him as wives do their husband, embrace the bounteous one like a sleek young blood, for help.
2. Directed toward you, my mind does not lose the track: just on you have I fixed my desire, o much invoked one.
   Like a king, wondrous one, sit down upon the ritual grass. Since there is soma here, let there be drinking for you.
3. Indra, warding off from diverse directions neglect and hunger—just he, as bounteous one, will be master of wealth and goods.
   Just his vitality do these seven rivers, in their torrent, increase—the vitality of the tempestuous bull.
4. Like birds on a leafy tree, the soma drops—exhilarating, sitting in the cup—have settled down on Indra.
   Their countenance, powerfully flashing forth again and again, found the sun, the light of the Ārya, for Manu.
5. Like a (gambler) with the best throw he pulls out the perfect ("hand" of dice) in the game, when the bounteous one wins the sun as his takings.
   No other will be able to match this heroic deed of yours, neither one of the past, o bounteous one, nor of the present.

6. Clan after clan does the bounteous one encircle, as the bull keeping watch over the nourishing streams of the peoples.
   In whose soma-pressings the able one rejoices, that one vanquishes, with his sharp soma juices, those doing battle.
7. When the soma juices have flowed together into Indra, like waters into a river, like brooks into a pond, the inspired poets at the (sacrificial) seat increase his greatness, like rain the barley, with the heavenly gift [/drop].
8. Like an angry bull he flies among the airy realms—he who made these waters here to have an Ārya as their husband.
   The bounteous one found light for the presser possessing lively gifts [/drops], for Manu who offered oblation.
9. Let the axe [=fire] arise, together with its light. The (cow) of truth, yielding good milk, should come into being as of old.
   Let the ruddy, blazing (fire) shine out with its radiance. The master of settlements should blaze like the blazing sun.
10. With cows we would overcome neglect that goes ill, and with barley we would overcome all hunger, o you who are much invoked.
    With our kings and our community might we be the first to win the stakes.
11. Let Indra, lord of the formulation, protect us all around, from behind and from above and from below, from him who wishes ill—from in front and from the middle. Let him, as partner, create wide space for his partners.

X.44 (870) Indra

Kr̥ṣṇa Āṅgirasa
11 verses: triṣṭubh 1–3, jagatī 4–9, triṣṭubh 10–11

This last in the trio of Kr̥ṣṇa Āṅgirasa's Indra hymns shares its final two verses (10–11) with the previous two hymns, though it otherwise has little in common with them. The hymn bristles with difficulties in the details, but its overall trajectory is clear: it is a journey hymn, inviting Indra to drive to our sacrifice (vss. 1–3) to take his place on the ritual ground and partake of our soma (vss. 4–5). The poet then contrasts evil-minded non-sacrificers with their generous counterparts (vss. 6–7). The poet gives a brief précis of the heroic deeds Indra accomplished in the past after drinking soma (vs. 8), and in verse 9 urges Indra to defeat the poet's enemies, while making himself at home at the soma sacrifice.

1. Let Indra, our own lord, drive here for exhilaration—he who, forceful, thrusting according to his own principle, is projecting his vigor over all powers with his boundless, great bullishness.

2. Your chariot provides a good standing place and your fallow bays are easy to control. Your mace is attached to your fist, o lord of men.
   Along a good path, o king, drive swiftly in this direction. We will strengthen your bullish powers when you have drunk.
3. Let the conveyors of Indra convey him here, the lord of men in whose arm is the mace; mighty and forceful, let them convey him, the mighty, the bull who projects his vigor, possessing real unbridled power; let his feasting companions convey him here among us.
4. Just in this way you drench yourself in the lord [=soma], the companion of the cup, the like-minded one, the prop of nourishment upon its support.
   Make it your might; take it entirely within you, so that you will be powerful for the strengthening of those who keep watch (over us) nearby [=patrons?].
5. Good things shall come to us, for I have expressed my prayer. Drive here to the soma-possessor's offering, which is accompanied by good prayers.
   You are master. Take your seat here on this ritual grass. Your cups cannot be ventured against, on (ritual) principle.
6. The first invocations to the gods went forth each separately. They brought themselves fame difficult to surpass.
   The *non-protectors [?], who were not able to board the ship of sacrifice, sank down in stillness.
7. Just exactly in this way let the ones of evil intent, whose horses have been badly yoked, be behind and facing backward; correspondingly, those who are nearer and facing forward, they are (ready) to give, when the many (ritual) patterns and nourishments are (in place).
8. He gave foundation to the trembling mountains and plains. Heaven cried out and made the midspaces quake.
   He props apart the two Holy Places [=Heaven and Earth] that were conjoined. Having drunk of the bull, he recites the solemn words in his exhilaration.
9. I bring this well-made crook to you, with which you will break the hoof-breakers, o generous one.
   Let there be a home for you in this soma-pressing. Become a sharer in our pressed soma and in our quest, bounteous one.
10. With cows we would overcome neglect that goes ill, and with barley we would overcome all hunger, o you who are much invoked.
    With our kings and our community might we be the first to win the stakes.

11. Let Indra, lord of the formulation, protect us all around, from behind and from above and from below, from him who wishes ill—from in front and from the middle. Let him, as partner, create wide space for his partners.

Although the Anukramaṇī names Vatsaprī as the poet of only the next two hymns (45–46) to Agni, the following (47) to Indra clearly belongs here as well, as Oldenberg argues (1888: 236).

X.45 (871) Agni

Vatsaprī Bhālandana
12 verses: triṣṭubh

The hymn begins with Agni's triple birth, in heaven, on the earthly sacrificial ground, and in the waters (vs. 1), and the next verses touch on Agni's several forms (vss. 2–3). The cosmic aspects of Agni (vss. 4–6, 8) are thus marshaled in service of the ritual Agni, installed as fire-priest in verse 7, and it is therefore easy to believe in the good things that will come to the mortal who sacrifices to Agni (vss. 9–12).

1. From heaven was Agni born first; from us was he born second as Jātavedas.
 (Born) a third time in the waters, the inexhaustible one—kindling him, the manly minded, very attentive (mortal) sings to him.
2. We know your threefold triads, Agni; we know your domains dispersed in many places.
 We know your highest name, which is hidden; we know the wellspring whence you have come here.
3. In the sea, in the waters has the one with a manly mind (kindled) you; the one with manly eye kindled (you) in the udder of heaven, o Agni.
 The buffaloes strengthened you, who were standing in the third realm, in the lap of the waters.
4. Agni has roared like thundering heaven, constantly licking at (heaven and) earth, anointing the plants, for as soon as he was born kindled, he surveyed them. He radiates with his radiant beam between the two world-halves.
5. Rouser of beauties, buttress of riches, propeller of inspired thoughts, with Soma as herdsman, good one, son of strength, king in the waters, he radiates forth, being kindled at the forefront of the dawns.
6. Beacon of all creation, the embryo filled both world-halves while he was being born.

He split even the solid rock in leaving it, when the five peoples sacrificed to Agni.

7. The fire-priest, pure circlet, very wise—Agni has been installed as immortal among the mortals.
He raises reddish smoke, as he carries it here and there, seeking to reach up to heaven with his blazing flame.
8. Seen as a bright ornament, he has flashed forth widely, alight for beauty through a lifetime hard to forget.
Agni became immortal through his vital powers, when Heaven of good seed begat him.
9. Whoever will make for you today a ghee-covered cake, o god Agni of fortunate flame, lead him further forward, toward a better state, toward favor apportioned by the gods, o youngest one.
10. Give him a portion in (ritual acts) deserving good fame, Agni; give him a portion in every solemn speech being pronounced.
He will become dear to the Sun, dear to Agni. He will burst out with (offspring already) born, burst out with those to be born.
11. Sacrificing to you, Agni, through the days, they have acquired all desirable goods.
Together with you the fire-priests, seeking wealth, have opened up the pen full of cows.
12. Agni has been praised by the seers—Vaiśvānara, well-disposed to men, having Soma as his herdsman.
We would invoke Heaven and Earth, the two without hatred. O gods, establish wealth rich in heroes for us.

X.46 (872) Agni

Vatsaprī Bhālandana
10 verses: triṣṭubh (and virāj)

Attributed to the same poet as X.45, this hymn is clearly a companion piece to the previous hymn, sharing much of the same specialized lexicon (e.g., uśíj "fire-priest") and an interest in the various forms and births of fire and their relation to the ritual fire. However, X.46 is, for the most part, more rhetorically driven and more obscurely phrased than X.45, with images pushed to the edge of intelligibility (and beyond; see, e.g., vs. 7). The trickiness of its phraseology is matched by its meter, a shifting combination of triṣṭubh and virāj lines, with a number analyzable as either. Nonetheless, the emphasis on the installation of the ritual fire is manifest throughout: the original installation (vss. 4, 8–10), the reinstallation of the disappearing Agni (vss. 2–3), and the current installation (vss. 5–6).

1. Forth (he goes) when just born—the Hotar, the great cloud-finder; seated among men, he sat down in the lap of the waters.
   He who has been established establishes vital powers for you; he is the extender of goods to the man who does honor and he is the protector of bodies.
2. This one here—having done honor to him in the seat of the waters, they followed him along his tracks like a vanished cow.
   With reverences seeking him who was hiding in secret, the fire-priests, the insightful Bhr̥gus found him.
3. This one here—Trita Vaibhūvasa, much seeking, found him on the head of an inviolable cow.
   Growing strong with kindness when just born here in the habitations, the youth becomes the navel of the luminous realm.
4. The fire-priests with their reverences made him the gladdening Hotar, the leader of the ceremonies, and made the sacrifice advance, made him the pure circlet of the clans, when they established him as the oblation conveyor among the sons of Manu.
5. Forth (they lead him), *glittering, great, conferring poetic inspiration, splitter of strongholds, no fool—(even) fools (do so).
   Leading him, the embryo of the trees, the gold-bearded one, like a steed for whom a verse is the prize, they have set forth an inspired thought.
6. Trita [= the "third" fire], standing fast in the dwelling places, surrounded, sits down inside the womb.
   From there the domestic leader of the clans [=Agni], having amassed (goods?), with his reinless (horses) speeds to the superior men through the spreading expanse.
7. His are the unaging oars of the houses, the pure fires with singing smoke, bright, swelling, bustling, sitting on the wood like winds (in trees), like soma-drinks (in the wooden cups).
8. Agni displays his own pulsing excitement with his tongue, (displays) the patterns of the earth with his appearance.
   Him, blazing and pure, have the Āyus established as gladdening Hotar, most worthy of sacrifice.
9. Agni, whom Heaven and Earth begat, whom the Waters, Tvaṣṭar, and the Bhr̥gus begat with their powers, the one first to be reverently invoked—Mātariśvan and the gods fashioned him as the means of sacrifice for Manu.
10. You whom the gods established as conveyor of the oblation, whom the sons of Manu, craving much, established as means of sacrifice, o Agni, establish vital power for the praiser on your course. One who seeks the gods ad(vances), for glory gets the girls.

X.47 (873) Indra

Saptagu Āṅgirasa
8 verses: triṣṭubh

Though the Anukramaṇī attributes this hymn to a different poet from the last two, structural considerations make it clear that it belongs with X.45–46, as Oldenberg convincingly argues (1888: 236); the Anukramaṇī has simply extracted the name Saptagu Āṅgirasa from verse 6, where it is properly applied to the god Bṛhaspati. Nonetheless, the subject matter of this hymn is quite distinct from the two Agni hymns that precede it: it is a naked demand to Indra for wealth. The hymn has a superficially monotonous structure consisting of attributes in the accusative: verses 2–5 form a single sentence dependent on the second hemistich of 1. But this monotony conceals, or rather reveals, the poet's cleverness, for it is entirely ambiguous whether the accusatives modify Indra or the "wealth" of the refrain found in all the d-pādas. In the former case, the adjectives would agree with the accusative tvā in the verb phrase found in 1c vidmā́ hí tvā "for we know you (as)," punctuated and interrupted by the syntactically unconnected refrain; in the latter case with the accusative rayím in the refrain. The semantics of the predicate adjectives in these verses would allow either, sometimes slightly tipped toward one or the other. It may seem that the question is settled finally in verse 5, where we encounter the first noun—vā́jam "prize"—in this sea of adjectives, since "prize" might seem a more likely synonym of "wealth" than of Indra. However, in the rhetorical universe of the Ṛgveda it would certainly be possible to refer to a god as a prize. We think it highly likely that the poet intended the audience to consider both possibilities throughout the sequence.

The last three verses (6–8) more conventionally state that praises are being offered, to Bṛhaspati (vs. 6) and to Indra (vss. 7–8), in return for favors.

1. We have grasped your right hand, Indra, seeking goods, you goods-lord of goods, for we know you as cow-lord of cows, o champion. – To us give bright, bullish wealth.
2. Possessing good weapons, good help, good guidance, supporting four seas worth of riches, ever to be celebrated, praiseworthy, bringing abundant things of value. – To us give bright, bullish wealth.
3. Accompanied by good sacred formulations, accompanied by the gods, lofty, wide, deep, broad-based, o Indra, accompanied by famous seers, powerful, vanquishing hostility. – To us give bright, bullish wealth.
4. Winning prizes, having poets as heroes, overwhelming, gaining the stakes, swelling with strength, of good skill, Dasyu-smashing, stronghold-splitting—(above all) real, o Indra. – To us give bright, bullish wealth.

5. Rich in horses, in chariots, in heroes, a thousandfold, hundredfold prize, o Indra, having beneficial troops, having poets as heroes, sun-winning. – To us give bright, bullish wealth.
6. To the one with seven cows [/Saptagu], whose poetic vision is truth, to Bṛhaspati of good wisdom my thought goes forth, to him, the Āṅgirasa, who is to be reverently approached with homage. – To us give bright, bullish wealth.
7. My eager messengers, my praises, proceed to Indra, begging for favors, touching the heart, intertwining with the mind. – To us give bright, bullish wealth.
8. What I beg you for, give that to us, Indra—a lofty dwelling place without equal among the peoples.
   Let Heaven and Earth applaud this. – To us give bright, bullish wealth.

The next three hymns (X.48–50) are both ascribed to and dedicated to Indra Vaikuṇṭha. Given the supposed identity of poet and dedicand, the first two of these are appropriately cast as Indra's own self-praise.

X.48 (874) Indra Vaikuṇṭha

Indra Vaikuṇṭha
11 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 7, 10–11

As noted immediately above, X.48 and 49 present themselves as Indra's self-praise (ātmastuti, on which see Thompson 1997). They are spoken in the 1st person, with insistent 1st-person pronouns and verbs. In this hymn only verse 10 lacks an explicit 1st-person form, and the first verses especially establish the pattern: each pāda of verse 1 begins with a 1st-person pronoun (ahám, ahám, mā́m, ahám), as does each half-verse of verse 2 (ahám, ahám), and again, each pāda of verse 3 (máhyam, máyi, máma, mā́m). (Of the 1st-person singular pronominal paradigm, only instrumental máyā and ablative mát are absent from this hymn, and both are poorly attested in the Ṛgveda [three and twelve times respectively].)

The contents of the self-praise range over Indra's many accomplishments, but especially focus on his victories in battle and what he has won thereby—a warrior's boast, in other words. Some of the exploits are obscure, indeed mentioned only here (e.g., vs. 8).

The only verse lacking 1st-person reference, verse 10, appears to be a riddle, with a balanced opposition between the good or successful man (?), who has soma within, and his opposite number, whose failure is exposed by his lack of soma. But this interpretation must remain tentative, given the puzzles in that verse.

1. I was the foremost lord of goods. I win the stakes over and over.
   Upon me do the creatures call, like kinfolk their father. I apportion food to the pious man.
2. I am Indra, the bulwark and breast(-plate) of the Atharvan. For Trita I begat the cows from the serpent.
   I took the manliness from the Dasyus, through my abilities seeking to win their cowpens for Dadhyañc and Mātariśvan.
3. For me Tvaṣṭar fashioned the metal mace. To me have the gods bent their will.
   My face, like that of the sun, is difficult to surpass. They recognize me by what has been done and is to be done.
4. I (win) livestock in cows and horses, overflowing and golden, with my weapon.
   Many thousands do I "grind down" for the pious man, when the soma drops accompanied by hymns have brought me to exhilaration.
5. I am Indra: only I have not had the stake won away, and never have I given way to death.
   Just when you are pressing soma, beg me for good things. You will not suffer harm in partnership with me, o Pūrus.
6. I (struck down) by twos those, snorting heavily, who caused Indra and his mace to fight (them);
   I struck down with my stroke those who were challenging (me), while I, unbowable, was talking tough to those to be bowed.
7. One against one here, I am the utter victor—and against two. What can three do?
   I strike against a multitude, like sheaves on a threshing floor. Do my rivals, who have no Indra, scorn me?
8. I restored Atithigva to the Guṅgus like a restorative, and I upheld the obstacle-overcomer among the clans, when in the smashing of Parṇaya and in the smashing of Karañja, (as) in the great smashing of Vṛtra, I spread my fame.
9. Namī Sāpya came to the fore for me in order to enjoy restorative refreshment, and in the quest for cows he made partnerships (with me?) once again.
   When I readied the arrow for him in the clashes, just then did I make him one to be praised and hymned.
10. Soma is visible in the one, (even) when it is within (him); the herdsman exposes the other by its absence.
    Whoever tries to fight the sharp-horned bull remains bound within the thick (fetter) of deception.
11. I, the god of gods, do not violate the ordinances of the Ādityas, Vasus, and Rudriyas.
    For auspicious power they have fashioned me—invincible, indestructible, unconquerable.

X.49 (875) Indra Vaikuṇṭha

Indra Vaikuṇṭha
11 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 2, 11

Like the preceding hymn (X.48), this is an ātmastuti or self-praise spoken by Indra, with relentless repetition of 1st-person singular pronouns and verbs. For the former, note that of the twenty half-verses (excluding the final summary verse 11), sixteen begin with ahám "I" and one with mā́m "me." Only three (6c, 7c, and 10c) lack such an initial pronoun, and 7c has the enclitic mā "me" in second position (yán mā), while 10c begins with spārhám, a rhyme form to ahám.

As for verbs, the hymn is dominated by the injunctive, with nearly twenty such forms. This morphological skewing contrasts with the patterns in the preceding hymn, which has a wider range and more balanced selection of tenses and moods. The reasons for the prominence of the injunctive are not clear to us and, somewhat surprisingly, Hoffmann fails to treat this hymn systematically in his monograph on that verbal form (Hoffmann 1967).

Like X.48 this hymn particularly celebrates Indra's martial successes and the aid he gave various mortal clients in subduing their enemies. Several of these vignettes are little known, if at all, and others are quite obscurely phrased (e.g., vs. 3, though it treats the well-known saga of Kutsa, Śuṣṇa, and, probably, Uśanā Kāvya; vs. 6). The hymn also emphasizes, more than X.48, the importance of the sacrifice in strengthening Indra and securing his help: verse 1 announces this theme quite clearly, and verses 4–7 treat the relationship between sacrificer and Indra as well, though not as clearly.

The final verse (11) summarizes Indra's own speech, before addressing him directly and assuring him that the deeds he himself boasted of will also be praised by singers.

1. I gave the foremost good to the singer. I made the sacred formulation a strengthener for me.
   I became the inciter of the sacrificer. I have vanquished the non-sacrificers in every contest.
2. Upon me they conferred the name Indra among the gods—the creatures of heaven and earth and of the waters.
   I (took as my own) the two quick fallow bays, the bulls, who follow a separate commandment; boldly I took the mace for power.
3. I pierced the cloak for the poet with my thrusts; I helped Kutsa with this help:
   I, as the piercer of Śuṣṇa, held the deadly weapon—I, who did not give the Ārya name to the Dasyu.
4. I was like a father to the Vetasus for them to prevail; I made Tugra and Smadibha subject to Kutsa.
   I came to be under the direction of the sacrificer: when I brought myself to the fore for Tuji, his dear things were not to be assailed.

5. I made Mṛgaya subject to Śrutarvan, when he yielded to me when the ritual patterns were in due order.
   I made the vassal submissive for Āyu, and I made Paḍgṛbhi subject to Savya.
6. I am the one who (aided?) Navavāstva of the lofty chariots—I, the smasher of Vṛtra [/obstacles], shattered the Dāsa like obstacles [/Vṛtras]— when he [=Navavāstva] was causing (me) to grow strong and spread out according to due ritual order. I made the realms of light on the distant far shore of airy space.
7. I drive around with the swift (horses) of the Sun, being conveyed forth in my might by the Etaśas.
   When the soma-pressing of Manu says to me (that it [=soma] is) for my raiment, I will sideline (even) the effective Dāsa with my thrusts.
8. I am the smasher of the seven, a greater Nahus than Nahus. I made Turvaśa and Yadu to be famed through my power.
   I put down the one, his might with my might; I strengthened the nine and ninety (others) (to become) proud.
9. I, the bull, held fast the seven streams that were flowing and racing upon the earth.
   I of good resolve traverse the floods. Through fighting I found the way for Manu to seek.
10. I held fast in them that which the god Tvaṣṭar never held fast in them: the gleaming, eagerly sought (milk) in the udders, in the bellies of the cows, the honey of honey, the swelling soma, and its milk-mixture.
11. Thus in this way Indra sought to attract the gods and men to him; with his stirring (action) he be(stirred them)—the bounteous one whose generosity is real.
    All these (deeds) of yours do the powerful ones sing, you able master of the fallow bays, whose glory is your own.

X.50 (876) Indra Vaikuṇṭha

Indra Vaikuṇṭha
7 verses: jagatī 1–2, abhisāriṇī 3–4, triṣṭubh 5, jagatī 6–7

A much more conventional Indra hymn than the preceding two of this series (X.48–49). Here Indra is praised in the context and at the occasion of a soma sacrifice, and the usual reciprocal obligations of sacrificer and god are set forth.

1. Chant forth to the great one who finds exhilaration from the soma-stalk, who is common to all men and is present to all, to Indra, whose good-battling strength, great fame, and manliness the two world-halves respect.

2. And now he is praised by his comrade as manly and forceful: Indra is worthy of celebration for a man like me.
   Amid all the chariot-poles and at the getting of prizes, o master of settlements, or at an obstacle [/Vṛtra] or among the waters, you find exhilaration, o champion.
3. Who are those men, Indra, who are for your refreshment, who will strive to attain your favor as their traveling companion?
   Who spur themselves on for your lordly prize; who (spur themselves on) when waters, their own fields, or masculine power is at stake?
4. You will become great through our sacred formulation, Indra.
   You will become the worthy recipient of the sacrifice at all the soma-pressings.
   You will become the stirring of men in every contest and the supreme mantra, o you who are common to all domains.
5. Right now, as the superior one, help those eager for the sacrifice. The peoples know your great succor and protection.
   Right now, (so that) you will be unaging and you will make (us) strong, we have made all these soma-pressings powerful, to draw (you) here.
6. We have made all these soma-pressings powerful, to draw (you) here—which you have (now) taken into your own self, o son of strength.
   To your liking and for your support, are, in succession, the cup, the sacrifice, the mantra, and the upraised sacred formulation and speech.
7. Those who craft sacred formulations for you when the soma is pressed, for you to give of goods and of good, o inspired one, through the thought of your favor they will go forward along the path, at your exhilaration on the pressed soma-stalk.

The next three hymns (X.51–53), attributed to Agni Saucīka, treat the well-known story of the flight and disappearance of Agni, who wished to avoid the ritual role of conveying the oblations and the fate of his brothers. The gods find him hidden in the waters and entice him back by promising him a share in the sacrifice.

X.51 (877) Dialogue between Agni and the Gods

Agni Saucīka
9 verses: triṣṭubh

The classic dialogue between Agni and the gods (or one or more gods: he addresses Mitra and Varuṇa [vs. 2] and Varuṇa alone [vss. 4, 6]). Agni appears still to be in the waters (or just emerged), and the gods have only recently discovered his hiding place. The first question is which god spotted him (vss. 1–3). Agni then describes the fear that drove him from his sacrificial role, in responsive language that defines an omphalos (vss. 4, 6, esp. 4a and 6c). In the omphalos verse (5) the gods make the argument that Manu, a human and the first sacrificer, deserves to have his sacrifice completed by Agni's conveyance of the oblations. It is striking that the gods, perhaps disingenuously, do not argue for their own deserving state. In the last three verses (7–9) the gods propose rewards for Agni's returning to his task, and he accepts them.

1. [Gods:] Great was that caul and sturdy it was, enveloped in which you entered the waters.
   All your bodies in their multiple forms, o Agni Jātavedas, did a single god see.
2. [Agni:] Who saw me? Which one was that god who fully saw my bodies in their multiple forms?
   Where indeed, o Mitra and Varuṇa, are all the kindling sticks of Agni lying, which lead to the gods?
3. [Gods:] We sought you in multiple places, o Jātavedas, you who had entered into the waters, into the plants, o Agni.
   Yama espied you, o bright-beamed one, shining out farther than (a distance) of ten stages.
4. [Agni:] I went in fear of the Hotarship, Varuṇa, lest the gods yoke me to it.
   My bodies settled down in multiple places. I, Agni, do not attend to this business.
5. [Gods:] Come here! Manu, devoted to the gods, has desire for sacrifice, having properly prepared it. Yet you dwell in darkness, Agni.
   Make the paths leading to the gods easily passable. Convey the oblations, showing your benevolence.
6. [Agni:] The brothers of Agni earlier kept rolling along after this business, like a charioteer along the road.
   In fear of this, Varuṇa, I went far away. I flinched from it like a buffalo from the bowstring of an archer.
7. [Gods:] We will make a lifetime for you, which is free from old age, Agni, so that yoked (to your task) you will not suffer harm, Jātavedas.
   Then will you, showing your benevolence, convey their portion of the oblation to the gods, o well-born one?
8. [Agni:] Give the fore-offerings and the after-offerings exclusively to me, the nourishing portion of the oblation, and the "ghee" of the waters and the "man" of the plants, and let there be a long lifetime for Agni, o gods.
9. [Gods:] Yours be the fore-offerings and the after-offerings exclusively, the nourishing portions of the oblation;
   yours, Agni, be this whole sacrifice. To you let the four quarters bow.

X.52 (878) Address to the Gods from Agni

Agni Saucīka
6 verses: triṣṭubh

This hymn logically follows the preceding one. Agni has agreed to accept the Hotarship, which he had originally fled. He ceremonially requests guidance from the gods about how to perform his new duties in verses 1–2.

The middle verse (3) seems not to be spoken by Agni, but rather by a mortal attending or officiating at the sacrifice and catching sight of the newly installed Agni. In the first half of the verse he expresses some anxiety about this fire's connection to Yama; at issue is the possible confusion between, or identity of, the new ritual fire with the cremation fire, which conveys the dead to Yama's realm. (Similar anxiety is treated in the funeral hymns, especially X.16.) Reassurance seems to be dispensed in the second half of the verse; it may be (following Lanman 1884: 388) that the daily rebirth is that of the Agnihotra fire, while the monthly rebirth is for the Śrāddha, or ceremony in honor of the dead—allowing separation of the two fires and their functions.

In verses 4–5 Agni quotes the gods' words as they install him (4cd), and promises to fulfill his duties in exemplary fashion. The final verse (6) sums up the gods' installation of Agni.

1. [Agni:] All you gods, instruct me how, chosen here as Hotar, I shall conceive it [=task] upon being installed.
   Proclaim to me how, by what path I shall convey your share, your oblation to you.
2. [Agni:] I have sat down as the better sacrificing Hotar. All the gods, the Maruts spur me on.
   Every day, o Aśvins, the Adhvaryu-ship is yours. The kindling stick becomes the Formulator; this is the poured offering for you two.
3. [Sacificer?:] This one here who is the Hotar—who is he to Yama? Whom am I calling upon when the gods anoint (him)?
   Every day he is born, every month. And so the gods have installed him as conveyor of the oblation.
4. [Agni:] The gods have installed me as conveyor of the oblation—I who had slipped away, undergoing many troubles:
   "Agni, the knowing one, will arrange the sacrifice for us, with its five courses, three turns, seven threads."
5. [Agni:] Through sacrifice I will win you immortality rich in heroes, so that I can make wide space for you, o gods.
   Might I place the mace in Indra's arms. Then he will win all these battles.
6. [Poet:] Three hundred, three thousand, and thirty-nine gods revered Agni.
   They sprinkled him with ghee; they strewed the ritual grass for him. Just after that they installed him as Hotar.

X.53 (879) Agni ["Opferlied"]

Agni Saucīka
11 verses: triṣṭubh, except jagatī 6–7, 9–11

This hymn begins from the situation depicted in the last two hymns, but turns into a mystical meditation on the sacrifice. The first three verses are apparently spoken by mortal sacrificers, who have installed the recovered Agni as Hotar and are pleased (vs. 3) with the resulting success of their sacrifice.

In verses 4–5 Agni responds, inviting both gods and men to take pleasure in his application to this ritual role. Verse 4 also contains one of the few R̥gvedic references to the enmity between the gods (Devas) and the Asuras. Although this persistent rivalry dominates middle Vedic mythology, it only begins, very tentatively, to appear in the late R̥gveda, to which period this hymn belongs.

The next three verses (6–8) are again the speech of human priests, addressed both to Agni and to fellow celebrants, urging them to carry on the ritual work. In verse 7 the sacrifice, as often, is metaphorically identified with a chariot, and the puzzling beginning of verse 8 may refer metaphorically to a river crossing, taking the sacrificers to a better state.

The most enigmatic verses of the hymn are the last three (9–11), in jagatī meter (as opposed to the prevalent, but not ubiquitous triṣṭubh). They begin with the god Tvaṣṭar, the "Fashioner" of the gods: he has fashioned drinking cups for the gods, and now sharpens a hatchet for Brahmaṇaspati to use. Since Brahmaṇaspati has a transparent name, "Lord of the Sacred Formulation," he is almost surely going to use the hatchet to hew a sacred formulation, the mystical verbal embodiment of cosmic truth. In verse 10 the poets are urged to use the same types of tools, presumably to fashion the same things: sacred formulations. Or, in another common metaphor, to create "hidden tracks" (that is, mystical verbal compositions). Verse 11 may be an example of such a hidden track: it is certainly impenetrable enough, with riddling and paradoxical images that several millennia of study have not solved.

1. The one whom we sought with our mind, this one has come here just now, knowing the sacrifice, attentive to its articulation.
   He will perform sacrifice for us in the divine assemblage as superior sacrificer, for he will sit down (as Hotar) close by, in front of us.
2. He has been realized as Hotar, as superior sacrificer by his installation.
   Since he watches over the well-placed pleasurable offerings, we shall sacrifice to the gods deserving the sacrifice—yes! We will reverently salute those worthy of salutation with ghee.
3. He has made our pursuit of the gods successful today. We found the tongue of the sacrifice in hiding.
   He has come here, sweet smelling, clothing himself in life. He has made our invocation of the gods fortunate today.

4. [Agni:] Might I today devise this as the foremost of speech, by which we gods will overcome the Asuras.
   You nourishment eaters and you worthy of the sacrifice, you five peoples, take pleasure in my Hotarship.
5. [Agni:] Let the five peoples take pleasure in my Hotarship—and the cow-born and those who are worthy of the sacrifice.
   Let Earth protect us from earthly constraint; let the Midspace protect us from heavenly (constraint).
6. Stretching the thread (of the sacrifice), (o Agni,) go following the radiance of the airy realm. Protect the paths of light made by insightful thought.
   (You priests,) weave a work without knots for the ever-praising ones. Become Manu, (o Agni). Generate the divine race.
7. Bind the axle-straps, you comrades in soma [=priests], and set the reins in order, and ornament (the chariot).
   Drive the eight-seated chariot all about, the one with which the gods led a dear thing to (us?).
8. The stony (stream) is flowing. Pull yourselves together! Stand up! Advance, comrades!
   There let us leave behind those who were unfriendly. Might we cross over and upward to friendly ones, to prizes.
9. Tvaṣṭar knew (his own) magic powers, as the best worker of workers, bearing the cups, the most beneficial drinking vessels of the gods.
   Now he sharpens the hatchet of good metal, with which the "(chariot-) steed," Brahmaṇaspati, will hew.
10. Now, poets, sharpen up (the hatchets) that are (here), the axes with which you carve for the immortal.
   As knowing ones, create hidden tracks, (like the track) by which the gods achieved immortality.
11. They have placed the "maiden" in the embryo [=Agni?], have placed the "calf" in his mouth, with cryptic mind and tongue.
   He, always benevolent, eager to gain, with the yoking strings wins the victory just at the decisive moment.

The next three hymns (54–56) are attributed to Bṛhaduktha Vāmadevya.

X.54 (880) Indra

Bṛhaduktha Vāmadevya
6 verses: triṣṭubh

This short hymn begins by announcing (somewhat cryptically) that Indra's fame or reputation is what prompted a frantic call on him from Heaven and Earth (vs. 1cd), and it ends (6cd) with the poet's summation of his own praise hymn. In between there is both standard praise of Indra's well-known deeds (e.g., vss. 1cd, 3) and more ambiguously phrased assessment of his accomplishments. In verse 2bc, for example, Indra's victories seem almost dismissively characterized as a magic trick (māyā́, the word later famously used of the "illusion" of reality) produced by his own boasts. The four names of Indra in verse 4 are presumably his famous epithets, such as vr̥trahán "Vr̥tra-smasher," but the poet also seems to be slyly implying that Indra's deeds are reducible to words. These deprecatory hints are slight and could be otherwise interpreted, but in any case the poet has avoided a conventional recital of Indra's exploits. Instead he seems to be saying that Indra's great deeds and the words that express them are essentially the same: his reputation is equivalent to himself (vs. 1ab); his own proclamation of his powers is taken by the world as identical to "battles" (vs. 2); his epithets are the power that produces his deeds (vs. 4). Although this poetic ploy is, in one sense, the usual message that mortals' praises strengthen Indra for his deeds, the poet here seems to be claiming something more: that the poet's formulations are Indra's essence.

In the very last pāda of the hymn the poet seems to be doing something similar with his own name Br̥haduktha ("having/producing lofty speech"), as Jesse Lundquist has suggested to me (personal communication). The pāda (6d) reads brahmakŕ̥to br̥hádukthād avāci ("...has been spoken...from Br̥haduktha, the crafter of sacred formulations"), with his name positioned between the other two words in the line. The first half of his name, br̥hát, is a close phonological match to the first half of the first word, brahma "sacred formulation"; the last half of his name, uktha "(solemn) speech," is etymologically related to the verb avāci. Thus his very name can be, as it were, transformed into the verbal products that are his reason for being.

1. It was to your reputation in its greatness, o bounteous one, that the two frightened world-halves called upon you.
   You furthered the gods, you overcame the Dāsa might, as you did your best for the other progeny, Indra.
2. When you roamed, having grown strong in body, proclaiming your own powers among the peoples, o Indra, that was just your magic trick, which they call battles: neither today nor before have you discovered a rival.
3. What seers before us have reached the end of your whole greatness, in that you begot your mother and father [=Heaven and Earth] at the same time from your own body?
4. There exist four lordly names for you, the unfalsifiable names of the buffalo.
   You surely know all these, through which you have done your deeds, o bounteous one.
5. You have made those good things yours alone, both those in the open and those that are hidden.
   Do not pass over my desire, bounteous one: you are the one who takes heed and gives, Indra,

6. Who placed light within the light, who joined the honeys with the honey.
   So, a dear fortifying thought has been spoken to Indra from Bṛhaduktha, the crafter of sacred formulations.

X.55 (881) Indra [or the All Gods?]

Bṛhaduktha Vāmadevya
8 verses: triṣṭubh

A puzzling and enigmatic hymn, with close ties to the previous hymn, especially at the beginning. The first puzzle is that this, the second of the three Bṛhaduktha hymns (X.54–56), is assigned Indra as its deity in the Anukramaṇī, but is longer (eight verses) than the previous hymn (X.54, six verses), which is also dedicated to Indra. Bergaigne (per Oldenberg 1888: 226) suggests that the ascription is incorrect, and that this is really an All God hymn, as is the next one (X.56, seven verses). Although Oldenberg rejected this suggestion (1888: 238–39) on grounds of content, we are inclined to accept it. Although Indra is the clear or likely deity of most of the verses (1–3, 7–8), the center part of the hymn (vss. 4–6) is not, in our view, Indraic. Moreover, the numerology (see esp. vss. 2–3, 5) and the riddling phraseology throughout, without expressed referents, are quite reminiscent of a certain type of speculative All God hymn.

The first verse of the hymn exactly matches that of X.54 in structure (with X.55.1 somewhat clearer syntactically), and their second pādas are almost identical. Both concern the call that Heaven and Earth issued to Indra in fright, and go on, in the second hemistich, to recount other of Indra's deeds. And this verse also takes up the theme of the "hidden name" found also in X.54.4. But already in X.55.1 we meet an unidentified referent: "the sons of your (or a?) brother," especially puzzling because, as far as we know, Indra has no brother.

The name theme continues in verse 2, but introduces a light, into which five unidentified dear ones merge. Nothing further is made of this merger, but the same lexeme "merge into" (sáṃ √viś) is used in the next hymn (X.55.1) for the merger of the body of the dead with light in some unspecified distant place, and it seems likely that our passage touches on the same theme of death and transfiguration. Though verse 3 begins with a conventional deed of Indra, filling the world-halves, it pursues both the numerology of verse 2 and the light, now both fragmented and unified. Although various identifications of the referents here have been proposed, none is entirely convincing; moreover, the poet seems more interested in keeping us guessing than in providing a clear roadmap.

What does seem clear is that the cosmic context of Heaven and Earth and the focus on light(s) have led us to astronomical imagery, which occupies the next three verses of the hymn. We begin (vs. 4) with Dawn, explicitly identified, and celebrated in a formulaic final pāda that is modeled on the refrain of a famous mystical All God hymn,

III.55, where the "one and only lordship" is that of the gods. The next verse (5) has no identified referents at all, and the language is difficult and cryptic. Nonetheless it seems to refer to the moon traveling among the stars, until swallowed up by a gray one—perhaps the gray twilight of dawn or the smoke of the ritual fire kindled at dawn. The poet seems to recognize the hyper-"poetic" quality of this description (5c) and provides a simply phrased (though not simply interpreted) gloss in pāda d. Verse 6 is most easily interpretable as referring to the sun, who is called a "ruddy eagle" elsewhere in the R̥gveda, but it could also be Agni or Indra; if the latter, it provides a transition to the final two verses (7–8), which belong more clearly to Indra.

1. Far away in the distance is that hidden name which the two, frightened, called you, to grant them vigor.
   You propped up Earth and Heaven at the critical moment, when you were sparking the sons of your brother, bounteous one.
2. Great is that hidden, much-coveted name by which you begat what has been and by which (you will beget) what is to be.
   The light born of old that is his—that dear light do the five dear ones merge into.
3. He filled the two world-halves and their middle. The five (groups of) gods in their proper sequence, seven by seven, does he survey with the thirty-four (lights) in their multiplicity, (which are one) light having a single form but following various commandments.
4. In that, o Dawn, you dawned as the foremost of the radiant ones, because you begat the thriving of the thriving, in that you have nearer kinship with the more distant (Dawn)—great is the one and only lordship of great (Dawn).
5. The solitary (moon?) running in the crowd of many (stars?)—though he was young, the gray one swallowed him—behold the poetic skill of the god in his greatness. (In simple language:) today he died; yesterday he was (still) utterly breathing.
6. Through his power he is the powerful, ruddy eagle, who, as the nestless champion from of old, (has power) over the great.
   What he perceives, that is truly real, not false. He is both the winner and the giver of the eagerly sought good.
7. He acquired his bullish manly powers through these, through whom the mace-bearer grew strong for the Vr̥tra-smashing, the gods who, because of the greatness of the deed being done, came into being without (their own) doing.
8. Giving rise to his deeds with (them as his?) yokemate, he who possesses all might and all mind, the smiter of taunts, the overcomer of the powerful, having drunk of the soma, having grown strong, the champion blew the Dasyus forth from heaven in battle.

X.56 (881) All Gods

Bṛhaduktha Vāmadevya
7 verses: triṣṭubh 1–3, 7; jagatī 4–6

Traditionally this hymn was interpreted as Bṛhaduktha's funeral hymn for his son Vājin (the name extracted from vājín- "prizewinner" in vss. 2–3). More recently it has been taken as the funeral hymn for a horse, either the horse sacrificed in the Aśvamedha (Oldenberg) or simply a particularly distinguished racehorse (Geldner). We find all these interpretations unduly restrictive. Though it is undoubtedly a funeral hymn, or, to be more general, undoubtedly refers to what happens after death, there are no particularly equine features in it, since vājín can be used of humans and gods as well as horses. Nor is there any trace of the personal grief a poet might express for his son. Instead the hymn has taken some of the cosmic speculation of the last hymn (esp. X.55.2) and directed it to the more focused topic of the afterlife.

The first two verses urge the dead to merge his body with a light in an unspecified but very distant place, presumably even beyond heavenly lights like the sun, but associated with the gods. This merger is considered a kind of birth (see vs. 1d). The distance traveled on this good journey is treated in verse 3.

The meter changes in the next three verses (4–6) and so, to some extent, does the topic. Verse 4 is quite unclear and quite disputed, in part because the referent of the pronoun "their" (eṣām) is not specified. In our opinion the verse asserts that the ancestors ("forefathers") do not control the fate of the recently dead: "their" greatness (i.e., that of the recently dead) is not in the power of their predecessors, the ancestors (4a); rather, the gods transfer the mental spirit of the dead to the realm of the gods (4b), where they, the dead, incorporate animating motion (4c) and re-enter their bodies (4d). In other words, the verse is an attempt to describe the mechanism whereby the dead regain their bodies, joining mental power with physical activity within the envelope of the old body. As such, it is more detailed than the simple, reassuring command to the dead in the funeral hymn X.14.8 "Unite with your body in your full luster," which gives no directions as to how to go about it.

The happy result of this heavenly reincarnation is expressed in the first half of verse 5, but in the second half a more certain, because more visible, means to life after death is depicted—the familiar one of extending one's own life in the lives of one's progeny. This Ṛgvedic truism is, in our view, developed in the following very difficult verse (6) in two complementary ways. On the one hand, sons can make their "lord" (in our view, their father) into a "finder of the sun"—here we take "sun" to be equivalent to the light in verse 1, with which the dead are to merge—in two ways. The father can merge with the highest light by being provided with a proper funeral, and he can have further life on earth, continue to see the sun, as it were, by being propagated in his children and grandchildren. Viewed from the opposite direction, the forefathers, already in the heavenly afterlife, established their paternal dominion by placing descendants in later generations.

The final verse, returning to triṣṭubh meter, simply sums up in simpler language Bṛhaduktha's understanding of this process. For a more detailed interpretation of this hymn as a funeral hymn, see Brereton (forthcoming a).

1. Here is one (light) of yours, and far away is another one. Merge with the third light.
   At the merging of your body, be one cherished and dear to the gods at this highest means of begetting.
2. Let your body, o prizewinner, leading the body, establish a thing of value for us and protection for you.
   Unswerving, in order to uphold the great gods, you should exchange your own light as if for the light in heaven.
3. You are the prizewinner with a winning spirit. You are well gone to the (dawns?), the good trackers, well gone to the praise, well gone to heaven, well gone according to the foremost foundations that hold true, well gone to the gods, well gone along your flight.
4. Even the forefathers are not masters of their greatness. The gods placed their mental force among the gods, and they enveloped those things that were in vibrant motion. They entered into their bodies again.
5. With their powers they strode around the whole airy realm, measuring the ancient, unmeasurable domains.
   All living beings are held down within their bodies, but they have extended themselves multiply through their offspring.
6. Sons set up their lord [=father] as a finder of the sun in two ways by a third action.
   And their forefathers have established their own offspring as their paternal power, as their "stretched thread" among the later generations.
7. As if with a boat across the swell through all the earth's directions, (having gone) beyond the difficult places with blessings, Bṛhaduktha by his greatness has placed his own offspring both among later ones and among those previous.

After the sequence of hymn trios beginning with X.39, the next group (57–60), of four hymns, seems out of place, but Oldenberg (1888: 236) suggests that the whole has been arbitrarily divided into four hymns and could conceivably be resolved into three. The hymns share a theme—that of healing and returning to life—and are ascribed to "the four Gaupāyanas." Perhaps the division into four hymns was suggested by the four supposed authors.

X.57 (883) All Gods

Bandhu, Subandhu, Śrutabandhu, and Viprabandhu, the four Gaupāyanas or Laupāyanas
6 verses: gāyatrī

On its surface this hymn contains a simple revivifying spell seeking the return of "mind" to a person or persons in some distress—prefaced by two verses seeking to avoid ritual wrongdoing and to attain the help of Agni. This hymn is closely linked with X.58, a patterned litany calling for the return of mind. In both, "mind" has a broader semantic range than it generally does in English, encompassing not merely thought and mental processes, but what we might want to term "spirit."

Traditionally this hymn and the following three (X.57–60) are considered the poetic representations of an itihāsa (traditional explanatory story) concerning the king Asamāti, who dismissed his purohitas (house-priests), the four Gaupāyanas (supposedly the poets of these very hymns), and hired several Asuras instead. The latter deprived one of the Gaupāyanas, Subandhu, of his life, and in this hymn the three remaining brothers call his mind to return. The anachronistic details in this story—the king's house-priest, the evil nature of Asuras—mark it as a secondary confection, invented for or adapted to hymns composed for other purposes.

1. Let us not depart from the path, nor from the sacrifice of the one who has soma, Indra.
 Let hostilities not stand between us.
2. He who assures the success of the sacrifice, who is the thread stretched to
 the gods,
 him [=Agni], bepoured, might we attain.
3. We now call mind hither, with soma dedicated to Naraśaṃsa and with the composed thoughts of our forefathers.
4. Let your mind come here again, for will, for skill, for life, and to see the sun for a long time.
5. O fathers, let the divine race give us mind again.
 May we keep company with the troop of the living.
6. Under your commandment, o Soma, bearing mind in our bodies, may we, along with our offspring, keep company with it.

X.58 (884) The Return of Mind (Manaāvartaṇam)

The four Gaupāyanas or Laupāyanas (as for X.57)
12 verses: anuṣṭubh

This hymn is a continuation of X.57, the spell to bring the return of "mind" to a dead or dying person. But the monotonous patterned repetition in this piece contrasts with the varied ways in which X.57 seeks the return of mind. In fact, we might consider this the performative verbal material, the incantation itself, referred to in X.57.3 "we now call mind hither."

The structure is simple: each verse envisions a distant location where mind may have gone, and calls for it to return from that place. The first verse is perhaps the most crucial, for Yama is the ruler of the dead, and if mind has gone there, the person in question has presumably died. Yama's realm is also probably alluded to in the middle verse (6): the first verse of the Yama hymn, the first funeral hymn (X.14.1), refers to Yama as the one "who has departed along the great slopes," using the same word, pravát, as here. The other destinations are generally features of heaven or of earth; the range seems like an elaborated version of the disposition of the body and its parts in the funeral verse X.16.3 "Let your eye go to the sun, your life-breath to the wind. Go to heaven and to earth as is fitting. Or go to the waters, if it has been fixed for you there. Take your stand in the plants with your limbs," and it is also reminiscent of similar dispositions of the body in the Upaniṣads.

1. If your mind has gone to Yama Vaivasvata far away,
   we will make it turn hither to you, here to live and dwell.
2. If your mind has gone to heaven, if to earth far away,
   we will make it turn hither to you, here to live and dwell.
3. If your mind has gone to the four-cornered land far away,
   we will make it turn hither to you, here to live and dwell.
4. If your mind has gone to the four quarters far away,
   we will make it turn hither to you, here to live and dwell.
5. If your mind has gone to the flooding sea far away,
   we will make it turn hither to you, here to live and dwell.
6. If your mind has gone to the light-beams, the sloping paths (to Yama) far away, we will make it turn hither to you, here to live and dwell.
7. If your mind has gone to the waters, if to the plants far away, we will make it turn hither to you, here to live and dwell.
8. If your mind has gone to the sun, if to the dawn far away,
   we will make it turn hither to you, here to live and dwell.
9. If your mind has gone to the lofty mountains far away,
   we will make it turn hither to you, here to live and dwell.
10. If your mind has gone to this whole moving world far away,
    we will make it turn hither to you, here to live and dwell.
11. If your mind has gone to the distant distances far away,
    we will make it turn hither to you, here to live and dwell.
12. If your mind has gone to what has been and what will be far away, we will make it turn hither to you, here to live and dwell.

X.59 (885) Nirr̥ti (1–3), Nirr̥ti and Soma (4), Asunīti (5–6), Assorted Divinities (7), Heaven and Earth (8–10), or Indra (10a)

The four Gaupāyanas or Laupāyanas (as for X.57)
10 verses: triṣṭubh, except paṅkti 8, mahāpaṅkti 9, paṅktyuttarā 10

Although the themes in this hymn conform to the healing and restorative tone of the other Gaupāyana hymns, neither the structure of the hymn nor the particular application of the verses is entirely clear. Geldner treats it as a unified composition, with verses 1–3 and 8–10 wishing long life and health to Subandhu, and the middle verses 4–7 extending these wishes to other beings.

But structural considerations call this view into question. For one thing, Subandhu is mentioned only in the last part of the hymn (vs. 8), not the first. Moreover, the first four verses are marked by an apotropaic refrain addressed to Nirr̥ti "Dissolution" and should be considered as a group. The first of these verses does concern the restoration or lengthening of the lifetime of an unnamed person, compared to the Aśvins' mythical restoration to youth of Cyavāna; the last of the verses (4) is a conventional prayer to avoid death and attain old age. The two middle verses (2–3) lie further from the theme of restored life, treating success in sacrifice (2) and in combat (3).

The next two verses (5–6) are addressed to Asunīti "the leader to (the other) life," a word found also in the funeral hymns (X.12.4, 15.14, 16.2), calling for the restoration not only of mind (vs. 5a), the concern of X.57–58, but also of other senses and powers. The following verse (7), in the same meter, invokes other gods to join in this restoration.

The final three verses (8–10) are in different, but related meters (variants of paṅkti, assemblages of eight-syllable lines), and share a three-pāda refrain. The first two (8–9) call on Heaven and Earth to provide remedies and remove maladies; the last (10), outside of its refrain, is completely opaque: Indra is asked to "restore the . . . ox that drew the wedding-cart of Uśīnarāṇī," a female figure appearing nowhere else in the R̥gveda, or indeed in Sanskrit (though the masculine uśīnara is found as the name of a people in middle Vedic and later) and whose relevance here cannot be fathomed—efforts to do so only demonstrating the ingenuity, but not necessarily the good sense, of the scholars who proposed them.

1. His lifetime has been extended further anew, as the two mounters of the chariot [=Aśvins] (extended) the lifetime (of Cyavāna) with their resolute (power/speech).
   And then (like) Cyavāna he applies his force to his task. – Let Dissolution move herself farther away.
2. When the sāman (is sung), for wealth we shall equip ourselves with food affording treasures (of honey) and with measures of fame in quantity.
   Let the singer rejoice in all these of ours. – Let Dissolution move herself farther away.

3. May we surmount (the manly powers) of the stranger with our manly powers, as Heaven does Earth, as the mountains the plains.
   The singer perceives all these of ours. – Let Dissolution move herself farther away.
4. Do not hand us over to death, Soma. May we now look upon the sun as it rises.
   Throughout the days let our old age be secured for us. – Let Dissolution move herself farther away.

5. You leader to (the other) life, keep our mind firm in us. Lengthen our lifetime, for living.
   Find pleasure in our seeing the sun; strengthen your own body with ghee.
6. You leader to the (other) life, again put sight in us, again breath in us here, for our use.
   For a long time may we look upon the sun as it rises. O Concord, be gracious to us with well-being.
7. Again let Earth give us life-force, again let goddess Heaven, again Midspace.
   Again let Soma give us our body, again let Pūṣan give us the path that is well-being.

8. (Let) the two world-halves (be) luck for the one of good lineage [/Subandhu], the two youthfully exuberant mothers of truth.
   – Let the two bear away whatever malady there is. O Heaven and Earth, to ground (let) malady (go). Let nothing whatsoever plague (him).
9. Down come the pair, down the trio—down the remedies from heaven. To ground is the single (remedy) coming.
   – Let the two bear away what(ever) malady there is. O Heaven and Earth, to ground (let) malady (go). Let nothing whatsoever plague (him).
10. Indra, restore the cart-drawing ox that drew the (wedding-)cart of Uśīnarāṇī hither.
   – Let the two bear away what(ever) malady there is. O Heaven and Earth, to ground (let) malady (go). Let nothing whatsoever plague (him).

X.60 (886) Asamāti (1–4, 6), Indra (5), Spell to Heal Subandhu (7–11), Praise of the Hand (12)

The four Gaupāyanas or Laupāyanas (as for X.57)
12 verses: anuṣṭubh 1–5, anuṣṭubh 6–7, paṅkti 8–9, anuṣṭubh 10–12

Another hymn that invites decomposition. The first six verses are a sort of praśasti or royal encomium of Asamāti; indeed, the first four form a single sentence. There is no obvious connection to the themes of healing and restoration to life found in the other Gaupāyana hymns, and one can see how the lack of thematic integration invited the explanatory itihāsa (see introduction to X.57) that provides a tale relating King Asamāti to the suffering Subandhu.

The second part of the hymn (vss. 7–12) is a spell to heal Subandhu and restore his mind. It first recalls him to life (vs. 7), then provides models from the constructed and natural worlds (vss. 8 and 9 respectively) for securing Subandhu's mind within him. The return of his mind is announced in verse 10, while his sickness is banished in verse 11, again with models from the natural world. Finally the healing hand is praised in verse 12. Thus, this final segment of the Gaupāyana collection returns us to the first two hymns, X.57–58, and their concentration on the return of the mind of a sick person. Note especially that the first verse of X.58, which envisions the departure of his mind to Yama Vaivasvata in the realm of the dead, is triumphantly completed here by verse 10, "I have brought the mind of Subandhu here from Yama Vaivasvata."

1. To the man of the Māhīnas, with glittering appearance, approached with praise, we have come, bearing homage—
2. To Asamāti [/the incomparable], the lavishly overflowing, glittering, downward coursing chariot, master of settlements of Bhajeratha,
3. Who dominated the peoples like buffaloes, both those with metal weapons and those without, in battle,
4. Under whose commandment Ikṣvāku, the wealthy possessor of grain-stores, is radiant like (the sun) in heaven, (as are) the five peoples.
5. O Indra, uphold the lordly powers in the Asamātis, the Rathaproṣṭhas, to be seen like the sun in heaven.
6. For the descendants of Agastya you yoke a ruddy paired team.
   You have trodden down the niggards, trodden on all the ungenerous ones, o king.

7. Here is the mother, here the father; here a means of life will come.
   Here is a way to slither forth for you. Subandhu, come here, come out!
8. Just as they tie a yoke with a strap to make it fast, even so does he hold fast your mind, for living, not for death, but for invulnerability.
9. Just as this great earth holds fast these trees here, even so does he hold fast your mind, for living, not for death, but for invulnerability.
10. I brought the mind of Subandhu here from Yama Vaivasvata, for living, not for death, but for invulnerability.

11. Downward does the wind blow; downward the sun gives heat.
    The cow gives milk that goes downward; downward let your malady go.
12. Here is my hand that brings good fortune; here is my (other hand) bringing better fortune.
    Here is my all-healing one; here the one of propitious touch.

The next twenty-four hymns, X.61–84, are paired hymns, generally attributed to the same poet and showing signs of internal connection.

The first pair (61–62) are the Nābhānediṣṭha hymns to the All Gods, the first devilishly complex, the second far less so.

X.61 (887) All Gods

Nābhānediṣṭha Mānava
27 verses: triṣṭubh

The near impenetrability of this hymn with all its poetic tricks and semantic evasions produces a certain despair in the translator, and it is no wonder that even sensible and thoughtful interpreters have clearly gone astray—as, no doubt, have the present ones. Much of what follows is tentative and provisional, but we have attempted to give an interpretation that is internally consistent and depends as little as possible on outside and post-R̥gvedic materials.

This hymn and the next one are attributed by the Anukramaṇī to Nābhānediṣṭha Mānava. Although the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa contains a story about Nābhānediṣṭha (AiB V.14), it is generally agreed that this later tale has little to do with this hymn and cannot explain its mysteries. We would go further and suggest that the supposed poet's name has simply been extracted from verse 18, where it is, in our view, the name or epithet of a different participant. We are inclined to ascribe the hymn rather to Kakṣīvant, the crafty poet of I.116–126, or a descendant or would-be epigone of his: Kakṣīvant is mentioned in verse 16, and the hymn has certain connections with Kakṣīvant's oeuvre, especially I.121.

The hymn consists of several different sections, but we believe that these are all linked through the dawn sacrifice and the participants therein, particularly Dawn herself, Agni, the Aśvins, and Indra. Two mythological sections treat different myths about Dawn, and these are sandwiched between sections apparently depicting and meditating upon an early-morning sacrifice and the dakṣiṇās, or priestly gifts, distributed there.

The first four verses concern a man called Tūrvayāṇa, who in a verbal contest produces a supremely effective verbal formulation, which brings the Aśvins to the sacrifice and which also prompts liberal gifts to himself and which rescues or otherwise provides help to his parents and priests. His effective speech is contrasted with that of Cyavāna (a client of the Aśvins in other circumstances), who produces only "sweet dregs" (vs. 2), while Tūrvayāṇa's speech is likened to gushing semen. His invocation to the Aśvins is given verbatim in verse 4.

The next four verses treat the shocking story of Heaven's incest with his daughter, Dawn. This is a favorite myth of the middle Vedic period (see Jamison 1991: 294–96), but nowhere is it as graphically, if fragmentarily, treated as it is here. She finally escapes (vs. 8), but before this happens, some of his semen is spilled on the ground (vs. 7), indeed on the ritual ground (vs. 6). From this semen the ritual fire is fashioned (vss. 7 and 9). Thus, though the rape of Heaven's daughter is depicted as brutal, it results in the creation of the central ritual substance—as so often, around the world, in myths of cosmic rape and incest the taboo sexual encounter is primally creative. It seems likely that the comparison of Tūrvayāṇa's verbal production with semen, in conjunction with the overall theme of dawn sacrifice, prompted the telling of this story in just this place.

Verse 9 and the birth of fire form the transition to the next mythological section, the freeing of Dawn from the Vala cave by the Aṅgirases and Navagvas (vss. 9–13). Verses 9–11 all begin "right away" (makṣū́). As noted, verse 9 treats the newly created fire. In verse 10 (at least in our reading of it) the Navagvas attempt to free Dawn from her "protector," the Vala cave. In verse 11 the mythic motifs of the Dawn cow and her milk and of Agni, the product of Heaven's semen, are brought together—the motifs that are sacrificially found together in the dawn sacrifice. The Aṅgiras story is continued in the two following verses (12–13), though the dramatic high point has already been reached.

The subject changes abruptly with the next verses (14–15), back to the ritual fire and the sacrifice to which the Aśvins will come. There then follows a section that has led many commentators (see especially Oldenberg and Geldner) to construct elaborate family trees and "back-stories" for the poet, who is supposed to be seeking either a new, adoptive father (Geldner) or a new varṇa (Oldenberg). In our view these ingenious constructions are unnecessary and misguided. Instead the poet, perhaps Kakṣīvant (16c), is presenting his patron with what appears at first to be a praśasti, an encomium, but which then gently mocks him for his pretentions and for perceived stinginess. Verse 16 is a fine straightforward piece of praise, attributing grand titles and qualities to the king, in our view the poet's patron. Verse 17 is more equivocal. The king, the sacrificer, is "of two lineages": this is the term that provoked the family-tree constructions of Oldenberg and Geldner. We think rather that the poet is suggesting that the king is kin to both the human and divine races—or that the king so believes (see the next verse). But the poet also says that the king ought to milk the cow that yields sap but does not give birth—which may be an allusion to the king's slowness to produce dakṣiṇās for his poet, who points out in the second half of the verse that he himself is doing his job in producing poetry. Verse 18 seems to us to embody the pretensions of the patron-king. His name or epithet is Nābhānediṣṭha, "nearest to the navel": "navel" is a standard metaphor for origin and close kinship (especially the point of origin of two disparate groups), as well as for the focal point of the sacrifice or indeed the world itself. (This epithet must be very old, as the same word is found in Younger Avestan nabānazdišta "closely related, next of kin.") And in the second half of the verse he wonders aloud how high his "navel" is, relative to an unidentified other, then boasts of the unbroken chain of generations that links him to the original navel. He gets his comeuppance in the next verse (19), where the god Agni lays claim to the real navel, the gods, the two births, and the cow and her products.

With the patron put in his place, the hymn now turns to a depiction of the dawn sacrifice, or rather its conclusion, in five verses (20–24), each beginning with the word ádha "(and) now." The dakṣiṇās are now properly given (see 21ab), and the poet therefore calls on the gods for honor and protection for the patrons (vss. 22–23). In the final verse of this sequence (24) the poet and his colleagues appear to be poised to express their final prayers (24b), prayers found in the final verse (27). In between are two verses (25–26) that ascribe "good lineage" to an unidentified subject, who both takes pleasure in a praise hymn and performs ritual service. The "good lineage" reminds us of the patron's claims to distinguished kinship earlier in the hymn, which were trumped by the god Agni. In these two verses we believe that the poet deliberately left the subject unidentified and that he meant the verses to be read with both Agni and himself (the poet) as potential subjects, thus associating himself with the fine family and divine relations that the patron craved.

Needless to say, this is a very speculative reading of the poem, and many details remain unaccounted for. It is to be hoped that further progress can be made in its interpretation, within a R̥gvedic context.

1. Here is a Rudrian formulation right to the point, (which) he whose speech is welcome (produced) with his mental force at a contest in skill,
   (a formulation) that, standing ready for liberality, will effectively guide across his two parents and, on the fifth [?] day, the seven Hotars.
2. Just he, as the winner (at the contest), (stands ready) for the man who can be outwitted to give: Cyavāna measured out his altar with "sweet" (dregs), but Tūrvayāṇa, whose speech is the most welcome, poured enduring semen like a gush—
3. (Tūrvayāṇa)—to whose invocations you two [=Aśvins] run and win inspired words, (produced) by his skill, that are like sharp thinking, he who, powerfully manly, with arrows in his hand, brought his aim to fulfillment.
4. "When black (Night) is sitting among the ruddy cows (of Dawn), o Aśvins, I call upon you two, the sons of heaven.
   Pursue my sacrifice, come here to my food, like winners to refreshment, as the two of whom no deception can be remembered."

5. He whose (penis,) which performs the virile work, stretched out, discharging (the semen)—(that one,) the manly one, then pulled away (his penis, which had been) "attending on" (her).
   Again he tears out from the maiden, his daughter, what had been "brought to bear" on her—he the unassailable.
6. When what was to be done was at its middle, at the encounter when the father was making love to the young girl—as they were going apart, the two left behind a little semen sprinkled down on the back and in the womb of the well-performed (sacrifice).
7. When the father "sprang on" his own daughter, he, uniting (with her), poured down his semen upon the earth.
   The gods, very concerned, begat the sacred formulation, and they fashioned out (of it?) the Lord of the Dwelling Place, protector of commandments.
8. Like a bull in a contest he threw off foam. Heedless, she went away, hither and yon.
   Twisting away, she hastened like the Gift-Cow on foot. [The father:] "Now those caresses of mine have not grasped (her)."

9. Right away, like a chariot-horse (came) the trampling of the offspring [=Agni], and he took his seat at the udder, as one naked in the cold takes a seat close to the fire.
   He gained the kindling wood and he gained the prize; he was born as the upholder, ever doing battle with his strength.
10. Right away the Navagvas came to the fellowship of the maiden [=Dawn] and, speaking the truth, to the yoking of truth.
    Those who approached the protector [=Vala?] of doubly exalted (Dawn?), though they lacked the Gift-Cow, strove to milk the immovable ones [=Vala rocks?].
11. Right away they hastened anew to the fellowship of the maiden and to the semen, which was like a bounty, which is just truth—your blazing legacy, which they gained through sacrifice, and the milk of the ruddy female who gives sap as milk.
12. When afterward they became aware of their separation from the livestock, he [=Bṛhaspati or Indra] speaks thus, while bestowing (gifts) at the speaking:
    "Through the goodness of the good one, the bards are blameless. He exerts control over all movable property, all the way up to cattle."
13. They came just then as its besiegers; sitting (a session) for many (days), they strove to split (the fortress?) of Nṛṣada.
    The unassailable one disclosed what was knotted together, what was hidden, of Śuṣṇa, who was propagated in many ways.

14. "Luster" is the name (of him), to whom the gods belong, who have set him down in his triple seat like the sun, and "Agni Jātavedas" is his name. Hear us, o Hotar, as our Hotar of truth, free of deception.

15. And these two sons of Rudra, the Nāsatyas who possess the chant, are to be greeted and offered sacrifice by me, o Indra—the two who give (gifts) to him who, like Manus, provides the twisted ritual grass; the delightful pair for whom pleasing offerings are set out; and the two that seek sacrifice among the clans.

16. This king praised here has been extolled as a ritual adept, and as inspired poet he crosses the waters, creating his own bridge.
 He sets Kakṣīvant atremble and also Agni, as the swift-running wheel of a steed does its wheel-rim.
17. He of two lineages, the son of Vitaraṇa, the sacrificer, is to milk the milk-cow, which is sap-yielding but not giving birth, when I enmesh Mitra and Varuṇa with hymns and Aryaman with preeminent defenses.
18. The patron whose lineage this is, setting your insight in heaven, Nābhānediṣṭha [/nearest to the navel], murmurs as he quests:
 "Is this navel of ours highest or is his? I was the so-many-eth after that one."
19. [Agni:] "This, here, is my navel, and here is my seat. These gods here are mine, and here am I—the whole—having two births, first born of truth. This (earth?) here did the cow give as her milk as she was being born."

20. Now among these (clans) the gladdening, far-radiant spoked wheel [=Agni] unhitches, the one having a double track, victorious within the wood.
 When the child of the house is like an upright line, right away the mother gives birth to the sturdy one, who grows strong with kindness.
21. And now the cows of the maiden [=Dawn] have gone forth, following the distribution (of goods) of someone swollen (with wealth).
 Listen to us, o you possessing good movable property; you, perform sacrifice! I have grown strong through the liberal gifts of Āśvaghna [/son of the horse-killer].
22. And now you, Indra—know us for the sake of great wealth, o lord of men with the mace in your arms, and guard those generous to us and protect our blameless patrons in your charge, o possessor of fallow bays.
23. And now, o you two kings [=Mitra and Varuṇa, or the Aśvins], when in the quest for cattle the hastening one, awakening, makes haste for the bard, the dearest inspired poet [=Agni?], because he has become theirs [=patrons'], will carry them away and will bring them across.

24. And now at the thriving of him [=Agni] who is well born—we, rasping at will, now beg this: [see vs. 27]— you, his son, are a hastening horse and an inspired poet—as also at the winning of fame.
25. If for the sake of companionship with you two [=Mitra and Varuṇa, or the Aśvins], for us who are his troop, he [=Agni/poet], receiving [/providing] reverence, finds pleasure in his praise hymn—he in whom songs in all places come together, like a route with many parts—and he does ritual service for the sake of liberality, 26. He, being sung by the waters and with the gods on his side, is thus "of good lineage." With reverence and hymns, with solemn words and speeches, he strengthens (the gods?), for now (he has) arrived. The (ceremonial) course departs from the "milk" of the ruddy one [=Dawn].
27. (. . . we now beg this:) "O gods worthy of the sacrifice, become joined together for great help for us, you who, (now) departing, led prizes (here), and who are observers who are never fooled."

X.62 (888) All Gods

Nābhānediṣṭha Mānava
11 verses: jagatī 1–4, anuṣṭubh 5, bṛhatī 6, satobṛhatī 7, anuṣṭubh 8–9, gāyatrī 10, triṣṭubh 11

Attributed to the same poet as X.61, this hymn takes up some of the same themes as the previous hymn, but in much more straightforward fashion. The Aṅgirases, who figured in verses 10–13 of X.61, are the subject of the first seven verses of this hymn, with blessings heaped upon them in verses 1–4. Their lineal descent from Agni is clearly indicated here (vss. 5–6), while in X.61 it was present primarily by implication (vss. 9–10). The Vala myth is treated in verses 2 and 7, and in verse 3 the Aṅgirases are credited with cosmogonic deeds more appropriate to Indra.

The "navel" of X.61.18–19 is also encountered in verse 4 of this hymn (loc. nā́bhā, pāda a). Although some (e.g., Geldner) consider the navel in that verse to be a truncation of the (supposed) poet's name Nābhānediṣṭha, we consider it to a reference to the sacrificial ground or the ritual fire, as in X.61.19.

The first four verses end with the refrain "Accept the descendant of Manu (mānavá)." Geldner, who believes that the hymn conforms to the story told in Aitareya Brāhmaṇa V.14 about Nābhānediṣṭha Mānava, considers this refrain to be a self-reference by the poet and supplies "me" with mānavám as its appositive ("accept me, the descendant of Manu"). But we follow Oldenberg in considering the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa story secondary and, like many Brāhmaṇa explanations of R̥gvedic hymns, based on misunderstanding. Given that our poet's patron is named Manu (see vss. 8 and 11), it seems more likely that in this refrain the poet is commending his patron and/or his family to the protection of the Aṅgirases.

The final four verses (8–11) are a dānastuti of this patron, Manu Sāvarṇi, with the final Aṅgiras verse (7) serving as a transition to this praise of magnanimity.

1. You who, anointed with the sacrifice and the priestly gift, achieved the fellowship of Indra and immortality, for you, o Aṅgirases, let there be good fortune. – Accept the descendant of Manu, o you of good wisdom.
2. The fathers who drove up the goods consisting of cows and with truth split the Vala cave at the turning of the year, let there be long life for you, o Aṅgirases. – Accept the descendant of Manu, o you of good wisdom.
3. Who with truth caused the sun to mount in heaven and spread out Mother Earth, let there be good offspring for you, o Aṅgirases. – Accept the descendant of Manu, o you of good wisdom.
4. This one here at the navel (of the sacrifice) speaks to you agreeably in the house. O you seers whose sons are gods, listen to this.
   Let there be good sacred formulation for you, o Aṅgirases. – Accept the descendant of Manu, o you of good wisdom.
5. Just these seers are the Virūpas [/of various forms]; just they possess profound inspiration.
   They are the sons of the Aṅgiras; they were born from Agni.
6. The Virūpas [/those of various forms] who were born from Agni and from heaven, Navagva, Daśagva, the best of the Aṅgirases: in company with the gods, (each) is generous.
7. With Indra as their yokemate, the cantors set loose the pen filled with cows and horses.
   Giving me a thousand (cows) with cut-branded ears, they made fame for themselves among the gods.
8. Now let this Manu be propagated and let him grow like a sprout—he who is magnanimous in giving all at once a thousand (cows) along with a hundred horses.
9. No one succeeds in taking hold of him any more than the back of heaven.
   The priestly gift of Sāvarṇya spreads out like a river.
10. And also two barbarian-slaves to perform service, each with his allotted (gear), along with an abundance of cows, have Yadu and Turva (each) magnanimously bestowed.

11. Let Manu, giver of thousands, leader of the horde, not suffer harm. Let his priestly gift come, aligning itself with the sun.
    Let the gods extend the lifetime of Sāvarṇi, under whose auspices we, unwearied, won the prize of victory.

The next two hymns to the All Gods (63–64) are attributed to Gaya Plāta.

X.63 (889) All Gods

Gaya Plāta
17 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 16–17

The signature word of this hymn is svastí "well-being": in the dative s^{u}vastáye it provides the last four syllables of verses 3–14, and its nominative opens five consecutive pādas in the verses after that refrain (15–16a). The gods from whom the poet solicits well-being are primarily the Ādityas and their mother Aditi, who especially dominate the first half of the hymn. Beginning with verse 9 other gods are also invoked, though the Ādityas keep their prominence. Not surprisingly in a hymn devoted to well-being, the emphasis is on positive thoughts, though some worries about potential dangers do intrude (see vss. 11–12). More surprisingly in a hymn with such a strong Ādityan cast, our potential moral flaws are barely mentioned (vs. 8c).

1. Those from afar who seek to establish friendship, who, gratified by Manu, (seek to establish) the races of Vivasvant, the gods who sit on the ritual grass of Yayāti Nahuṣya—let them speak on our behalf.
2. For all your names, o gods, are worthy of homage, worthy of praise, and they are worthy of the sacrifice.
   You who were born from Aditi or from the waters, who from the earth, listen to my call here.
3. Those for whom their mother swells the honeyed milk, (for whom) Aditi, (like) unbounded heaven, massive as a stone, (swells) the beestings, those whose gusts are hymns, bullishly bearing, rich in property—applaud those Ādityas—for well-being.
4. Having their eyes on men, unblinking, as their due the gods have achieved lofty immortality.
   Having light as their chariot, snake-sly, blameless, they wear the height of heaven as their garment—for well-being.
5. The very strong sovereign kings who have come to the sacrifice, who, undeviating, have established their own dwelling in heaven—seek to entice them here with reverence, with well-turned (hymns)—the great Ādityas and Aditi—for well-being.

6. Who brings to success for you the praise that you will enjoy, all you gods of Manu, however many you are?
   Who will properly prepare for you, powerfully born ones, the ceremony that will carry us across difficult straits—for well-being?
7. You for whom Manu, with his fire kindled by mind, along with the seven Hotars, first attracted Hotrā (Libation) with sacrifice, you Ādityas, hold out fearlessness as shelter. Make easy passages, easy pathways for us—for well-being.
8. The forethoughtful counselors who are masters of the world, of everything stationary and moving—o gods, rescue us today from transgression done or not done—for well-being.
9. In the raids we call on Indra easy to call, on the divine race of good action that releases from difficult straits, on Agni, Mitra, Varuṇa, Bhaga, for winning, on Heaven and Earth, the Maruts—for well-being.
10. Upon Earth of good protection and faultless Heaven, upon Aditi of good shelter, of good guidance,
    (as) upon a divine boat with good oars, without defect, not leaking, may we mount—for well-being.
11. All you worthy of the sacrifice, speak for us, for help; rescue us from the crooked ill-going way.
    With an invocation to the gods that comes true we would invoke you as you listen, o gods, for aid—for well-being.
12. Away with disease, away with all lack of oblation, away with the ill-met hostility of the malicious.
    Gods, keep hatred at a distance from us. Extend broad shelter to us—for well-being.
13. Every mortal thrives unharmed and is propagated with progeny forth from his foundation, whom, o Ādityas, you lead with your good leading across all difficult passages—for well-being.
14. Which one, o gods, you help at the contest for prizes, which one, o Maruts, you help at the contest of champions when the stake is set, that early-traveling, winning chariot, which suffers no harm, might we mount, o Indra—for well-being.
15. Well-being for us on the pathways and in the wastelands, well-being in the waters, in the precinct of the sun, well-being for us in the wombs at the making of sons—well-being confer (on us) for wealth, o Maruts.
16. For it is just well-being that is best on the path forward—that, (already) rich in inheritance, sets out toward something valuable.
    Let it keep guard over us at home and in a foreign place; with the gods as its herdsmen let it be easy of access.

17. In just this way has the son of Plati of inspired thought strengthened you, all you Ādityas and Aditi.
    The over-mastering superior men, the divine race, has been praised by Amartya Gaya.

X.64 (890) All Gods

Gaya Plāta
17 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 12, 16–17

Making up for his restrained focus on the Ādityas in the preceding All God hymn (X.63), the poet Gaya Plāta here produces an expansive litany of almost every god and goddess he can think of, major or minor. He begins with rhetorical questions (vs. 1): which god would it be best to address? Having suggested that all of them are potentially his targets (vs. 2), he runs through a long list of possible individuals (vss. 3–12), sometimes listing the bare name, sometimes offering further characterization.

Only in verses 13–14 do we reach something more interesting. In verse 13 he expresses his hope that the Maruts will recognize their "common birth" with him, presumably on the basis of their shared role as singers and poets (on this see also I.87.5), as they meet at the "navel" (the loaded word of X.61–62, hymns attributed to a different poet). The navel here must be both the sacrificial ground of the here-and-now and the mythical point of their joint origin, before their division into mortals and gods. In verse 14 he suggests Heaven and Earth as a model for this kinship. Perhaps the idea is that Heaven and Earth are not divided, with Heaven taking the gods' side and Earth that of mortals, but they work as partners—both being related to the gods and both accepting the sacrifice of men. In any case the kinship that the poet has suggested he has with the Maruts as poets he asserts in another way in verse 16, where he describes himself as a "powerfully roaring poet" (kavís tuvīrávān), the exact phrase with which he identified Bṛhaspati, the wordsmith par excellence of the gods, in verse 4.

The final two verses (16–17), in a different meter from the rest of the poem, are the poet's summary verses, both beginning with evā́ "in this way" and both mentioning the poet by name. The second of the two is also found at the end of X.63.

1. How shall we contemplate—of which one of the gods shall we contemplate the name that is good to contemplate, as they listen to my plea?
   Who will be merciful; which one will create joy for us? Which one will turn hither with help?
2. Our intentions are intent (on them), the insights in our hearts. Our trackers follow their track and fly to (all) directions.
   No dispenser of mercy other than them is found. My desires have fastened upon the gods.

3. (Shall it be) Narāśaṃsa, Pūṣan, Agohya (the Unconcealable), or Agni kindled by the gods that I address with a hymn, or the Sun and Moon, (the new and) bright [=full] Moon, Yama in heaven, Trita, Wind, Dawn, Night, the Aśvins?
4. How will the powerfully roaring poet Bṛhaspati grow strong, through what hymn with its well-twisted (ornaments)?
   Let Aja Ekapād with the chanters who are easy to call, let Ahi Budhnya harken to my call.
5. Or, o Aditi, at the birth of the skillful one [=Agni] under your commandment, will you seek to entice here the two kings Mitra and Varuṇa?
   (Or will it be) Aryaman, whose path is not to be transgressed, who possesses many chariots, who possesses seven Hotars, at his births in diverse forms?
6. Let the steeds who heed the call heed our call—all the prizewinners of measured pace, who by themselves win thousands as if at the winning of wisdom, the ones who have greatly borne away for themselves the spoils in the encounters.
7. Set in front with your praises Vāyu, who hitches up the chariot, Plenitude, and Pūṣan, for comradeship, for at the impulsion of god Savitar they follow his will—those of one mind (follow the will) of him who is of one mind (with them).
8. The thrice seven flowing rivers, the great waters, the trees, the mountains, and Agni do we call upon for help—and upon the archers in their seat—Kṛśānu, Tiṣya (the Dog Star), and Rudra the Rudrian among the Rudras.
9. Sarasvatī, Sarayu, Sindhu with their waves—let the great strengthening ones come here greatly with their help—the divine waters, the sweetening mothers. Sing their ghee-rich, honey-rich milk for us.
10. And let the mother Bṛhaddivā hear our speech, and Tvaṣṭar with the divine ones, (namely) the Wives (of the Gods), and the Father, Ṛbhukṣan, Vāja, Lord of the Chariot, Bhaga. Let the delightful laud of the one who labors protect us—
11. Delightful to the sight like a peaceful dwelling abounding in food. Auspicious is the praise invocation of the Rudras, the Maruts.
    May we be glorious among the peoples with our cows. May we always be accompanied by refreshment, o gods.
12. The insight that you gave me—you gods, Maruts, Indra, Varuṇa, Mitra—make it swell like a milk-cow with milk. Surely you will convey the hymns on your chariot?

13. Surely in some way you will take notice of this common birth of ours, Maruts?
    At the navel where we first come together, there let Aditi establish our relationship.
14. For Heaven and Earth, the two great mothers, the goddesses worthy of the sacrifice, proceed by virtue of their kinship with the gods.
    Both support both (breeds [=gods and men]) with their supports, and with the Fathers they sprinkle much seed.
15. Hotrā (Libation) reaches through to everything of value—as do Bṛhaspati and Aramati [/Devotion], the very admirable.
    Where the honey-pressing pressing-stone is given lofty voice, the inspired thinkers have bellowed with their thoughts.
16. In just this way the powerfully roaring poet, knowing the truth, seeking goods, desiring goods, the inspired Gaya here with hymns and compositions has swelled the divine races.
17. In just this way has the son of Plati of inspired thought strengthened you, all you Ādityas and Aditi.
    The overmastering superior men, the divine race, has been praised by Amartya Gaya.

Hymns X.65–66 are attributed to a Vasukarṇa Vāsukra, who is otherwise unknown in the Ṛgveda. But his patronymic links him to Vasukra Aindra, poet of the fiendishly challenging and immensely clever X.27–29, as well as another poet with the same patronymic, namely Vasukṛt Vāsukra, one possible author of X.20–26, another set of well-crafted hymns. Moreover, the final verse of X.65 (15) and the final two of X.66 (14–15) mention Vasiṣṭha and the Vasiṣṭhas, and both hymns end with the Vasiṣṭha clan refrain familiar from Maṇḍala VII.

X.65 (891) All Gods

Vasukarṇa Vāsukra
15 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 15

The poetic pedigree sketched above gives us high expectations for the hymn, which, however, begins unpromisingly with a simple enumeration of gods. Nonetheless, although the style never achieves the same distinction as that of the poet's putative relatives, there are many nice touches and twists and turns of syntax, particularly in verses 2–8, treating the cosmogonic deeds of the gods and the praise and sacrifice offered to them by mortals.

The hymn seems to begin anew with verse 9, which contains another straightforward listing of gods, continued in verse 10. A brief account of cosmogony (vs. 11) is followed by a sketch of the Aśvins' deeds (vs. 12). Minor gods join the undifferentiated mass of All Gods in verses 13–14, and the hymn ends with Vasiṣṭha's summary verse.

1. Agni, Indra, Varuṇa, Mitra, Aryaman, Vāyu, Pūṣan, and Sarasvatī, of one accord, the Ādityas, Viṣṇu, the Maruts, the lofty Sun, Soma, Rudra, Aditi, Brahmaṇaspati,
2. Indra and Agni, the two lords of the settlement, spurring each other on mutually in the smashing of obstacles, sharing the same home—they (all) filled the great midspace with their might, as did Soma, glorious with ghee, rousing their greatness.
3. For by the greatness of these, the great and unassailable, I, recognizing the truth, rouse my praises for those who grow strong through truth.
   Let those who are bringing brilliant bounties (across) the watery flood grant them to us. I magnify the (heavenly clans) well allied (to us).
4. They propped up (the region) of solar glory, the midspaces, the realms of light, Heaven and Earth, the Broad One, with their might.
   Magnifying (them), bringing lovely gifts like strengthening nourishments, the gods are praised as patrons to the race of Manu.
5. Try your utmost for Mitra and for Varuṇa who does ritual service, the two sovereign kings who do not stay distant in their thought, whose lofty domain shines by reason of their ordinance, for whom the two world-halves are two opposing troops in need of help.
6. The cow [=offering ladle?] that goes around the (ritual) track to the appointed place, giving her milk, leading at the commandment (of Varuṇa), not by choice, she, being announced, will do ritual service to Varuṇa who (also) serves, to the gods, and to Vivasvant with the oblation.
7. Those ruling over heaven, with Agni as their tongue, growing strong through truth, sit stroking the womb of truth.
   Having propped up heaven, they brought the waters here by their might. Having given birth to the sacrifice, they clasped it to themselves.
8. The two parents born of old, encircling, sharing the same home, rule in the womb of truth:
   Heaven and Earth, who obey the same commandment to Varuṇa, swell the ghee-filled milk for Varuṇa, the buffalo.
9. Parjanya and Vāta, the two overflowing bulls, Indra and Vāyu, Varuṇa, Mitra, and Aryaman—we summon the gods—the Ādityas and Aditi (also)—who are earthly, heavenly, and in the waters.
10. O R̥bhus, (we beseech) Tvaṣṭar and Vāyu, who vaunts himself, the two divine Hotars, and Dawn, for well-being;
    we beseech Br̥haspati of good wisdom, the gnawer of Vr̥tra, and Soma, destined for Indra—we who win the stakes.

11. Those of good gifts, begetting the sacred formulation, the cow, the horse, the plants, the trees, the earth, the mountains, the waters, causing the sun to mount in heaven, loosing the Āryas' commandments upon the earth.
12. You rescue Bhujyu from difficult straits, o Aśvins. You gave life to Śyāva, the son of Vadhrimatī.
    You carried Kamadyū to Vimada. You let loose Viṣṇāpū for Viśvaka.
13. The daughter of Pavīru, Thunder, and Aja Ekapad, the supporter of heaven, the river, and the waters of the sea—all the gods will hear my words: (they and also) Sarasvatī, along with insights [/Dhī] and with plenty [/Puraṃdhī].
14. All the gods, along with insights and with plenty, worthy of Manu's sacrifice, immortal, recognizing the truth, the Escorts and the Gift-Escorts, finding the sun, should take pleasure in the sun, the songs, the sacred formulation, and the hymn.
15. Vasiṣṭha has extolled the immortal gods, who stand out over all living beings.
    Let them grant us wide-ranging space today. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

X.66 (892) All Gods

Vasukarṇa Vāsukra
15 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 15

The listing impulse found in the previous hymn is here carried further. The gods in general, groups of gods such as the Ādityas, Vasus, and Rudras, and individual gods both major and minor are invoked here, with conventional descriptors and predicates and with standard prayers for help and blessing. There is little to catch the attention in this hymn, though it is certainly competently done.

1. I call upon the gods of lofty fame for well-being—the makers of light, attentive to the rite, who, having all possessions, have grown even stronger, the immortals having Indra as their chief, grown strong through truth—
2. Who, thrust forth by Indra, directed forth by Varuṇa, attained a share of the light of the sun.
   We would set our thoughts on the community having the Maruts as their troop. In their generosity, they begot the sacrifice as its patrons.
3. Let Indra with the Vasus protect our livelihood on every side. Let Aditi with the Ādityas extend shelter to us.
   The god Rudra with the Rudras shall be merciful to us. Let Tvaṣṭar with the Wives (of the Gods) enliven us for good faring.

4. Aditi, Heaven and Earth, great truth, Indra and Viṣṇu, the Maruts, and the lofty Sun—we call upon the gods for help—the Ādityas, Vasus, Rudras, and well-skilled Savitar.
5. Sarasvant along with insights, Varuṇa whose commandments are upheld, Pūṣan, Viṣṇu, the Greatness, Vāyu, and the Aśvins, the creators of sacred formulations, immortal, having all possessions, they will extend to us shelter providing threefold defense from difficult straits.
6. Let our sacrifice be a bull and those belonging to the sacrifice bulls, the gods bulls, and those making the oblation bulls; truthful Heaven and Earth bulls, Parjanya a bull, and those praising the bull bulls.
7. I entreat the bulls Agni and Soma in order to win the prize, those two bulls lauded by many.
   Those two to whom the bulls have sacrificed through their sacrifice to the gods, those two will spread out shelter providing threefold defense for us.
8. The rulers whose commandments are upheld, who bring forth the sacrifice, heaven-lofty ones, the full glory of the rite, whose Hotar is Agni, who serve the truth without deceit—they let loose the waters following on the triumph over Vr̥tra.
9. They begot heaven and earth to their commandments, and the waters, the plants, and the trees belonging to the sacrifice.
   They filled the midspace and the sun to give help. The gods clasped their will to themselves.
10. Let the upholders of heaven, the R̥bhus with skilled hands, let Vāta and Parjanya, (masters?) of Thunder the buffalo, let the waters and plants advance our songs. Let Bhaga, Gift, and the prizewinners come to my call.
11. The sea, the river, the dusky realm, the midspace; Aja Ekapad, Thundering, the flood, and Ahi Budhnya will hear my words, (also) all the gods and my patrons.
12. Might we (all) be Manus [=like Manu] for you, to pursue the gods. Lead our sacrifice forth toward the east straight to the goal.
    O Ādityas, Rudras, and Vasus, of good gifts, give life to these sacred formulations as they are being recited.
13. The two divine Hotars, the first two set in front, do I follow along the path of truth straight to the goal.
    We beseech the lord of the field, our neighbor, and all the immortal gods, who do not stay distant.

14. The Vasiṣṭhas have made speech in the manner of their father, invoking the gods in the manner of that seer for well-being.
    Like pleased kinsmen, coming here at our desire, shake good things down upon us, o gods.
15. Vasiṣṭha has extolled the immortal gods, who stand out over all living beings.
    Let them grant us wide-ranging space today. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

The two hymns of Ayāsya Āṅgirasa (67–68) are particularly noteworthy treatments of Bṛhaspati and the Vala myth.

X.67 (893) Bṛhaspati

Ayāsya Āṅgirasa
12 verses: triṣṭubh

This is perhaps the clearest treatment of Bṛhaspati's role in the Vala myth and of his identity with Indra, the usual hero in the Vala story. As discussed above (see especially the introduction to IV.50), Hanns-Peter Schmidt (1968) has clearly shown that bṛ́haspáti was originally an epithet of Indra in his role as priest and formulator, a role that is highlighted in the Vala myth—since Indra opens the Vala cave and frees the cows not with his normal power and violence but with song and correctly crafted verbal formulae. In this hymn Bṛhaspati is credited with the deed, but in equivalence with Indra. The names are essentially superimposed upon each other, an equation made more obvious by their positioning: the name Bṛhaspati opens the second half-verse of verses 3, 4, 5, 8, 9, 10, and the more transparent version of his name, Brahmaṇaspati, is in the same position in verse 7. In the midst of this sequence, in the middle verse 6, we find Indra in initial position in the verse and credited with the same deed. The poet could hardly have made their identity clearer. (The final verse of the hymn [12] begins with the word Indra, here as hero of other stories, especially the Vṛtra myth.)

The hymn begins (vs. 1) with the primal finding and production of a true insight; the unidentified "fourth one" in the second half of the verse probably refers to the fourth, inaudible portion of speech, or the fourth formulation, which figures prominently in Vedic speculations on the nature and power of speech (see Jamison 1991: 251–57). The second verse introduces the Aṅgirases, the crucial partners of Bṛhaspati/Indra in the opening of the Vala cave; they too find the truthful word. The next five verses (3–8) narrate the dramatic opening of the cave and the freeing of the cows. One notes a certain irony in the poet's treatment of Vala: though the cave is first depicted as a fetter (vs. 4) and a stronghold (vs. 5), it is described with the ambiguous term "guard" in verse 6 (a term as ambiguous in Sanskrit as it is in English), and then with a more sarcastic tone "cow-nurturer" in verse 7 and "cow-herd" in verse 8.

The hymn ends with four verses celebrating the god and asking for blessings. Most interesting in this section is the final pāda of verse 10 (if we have rightly interpreted it), which alludes to the different poetic skills and styles of the mortal celebrants.

1. This seven-headed insightful thought here, born of truth and lofty, did our father find.
   The fourth one indeed did the irrepressible one, belonging to all men, generate as he was pronouncing a solemn speech for Indra.
2. Pronouncing the truth, thinking straight, the sons of heaven, the heroes of the lord, the Aṅgirases, establishing their inspired word [/laying their inspired track], pondered the first foundation of the sacrifice.
3. Along with his comrades, who were constantly gabbling like geese, while he was throwing open the fastenings made of stone, while he kept roaring to the cows, Bṛhaspati both started the praise song and struck up the melody, as knowing one.
4. With two (gates) below, with one above, the cows standing hidden in the fetter of untruth—
   Bṛhaspati, seeking light in the darkness, brought up the ruddy ones, for he opened up the three (gates).
5. Having split apart the stronghold (from front) to back, (having split apart) the lairs, at one blow he cut out the three [=dawn, sun, cow] from the reservoir.
   Bṛhaspati found the dawn, the sun, the cow, (found) the chant while he was thundering like heaven.
6. Indra cut apart Vala, the guard over the milkers, with a roar like a tool.
   Seeking the milk-mixture with (his comrades) anointed with sweat, he made the niggard wail: he stole the cows.
7. With his trusty comrades blazing, with the winners of spoils, he cleaved apart the cow-nurturer.
   The Lord of the Sacred Formulation reached through to the treasure with his bulls, his boars, with their hot sweat [/sweating over the gharma pot].
8. With trusty mind begging the cowherd for the cows, they compelled him with their insightful thoughts.
   Bṛhaspati loosed the ruddy ones upward, with his own yokemates who protect each other from fault.
9. With our propitious thoughts strengthening him, ever roaring in his seat like a lion, we would celebrate Bṛhaspati the bull, victorious at the contest of champions, victorious in every raid,

10. When he won the prize of all forms and mounted to heaven, to the higher seats.
    Bṛhaspati the bull (would we celebrate), strengthening him—though each (of us) brings light with our mouth in our own way.
11. Make our hope come true, our hope for the conferring of vigor. For you help even the weakling in your own ways.
    Let all slighters be off, be behind (us). You two world-halves, who set all in motion, hear this.
12. Indra with his greatness split apart the head of the great flood, of Arbuda.
    He smashed the serpent. He let flow the seven streams. O Heaven and Earth, along with the gods, further us.

X.68 (894) Bṛhaspati

Ayāsya Āṅgirasa
12 verses: triṣṭubh

A wonderful hymn, which takes the fairly straightforward (though artful) narrative of the Vala myth in the preceding hymn (X.67) and embroiders each part of it with imaginative and studied imagery and verbal constructions. Most striking is the blizzard of similes, many having two and even three points of comparison (see, e.g., 5ab), or with simile piled on simile (see, e.g., 1c), or with complex social content (vs. 2). By contrast X.67 contains only four similes (3a, 5d, 6b, 9b), each with only one point of comparison—a number essentially reached in the first verse of this hymn.

As a particularly elaborate example consider the underlying content of verse 2, whose role in the mythic narrative is simply to state that Bṛhaspati reunited the Aṅgirases with their cows. But this reunion is compared to the ceremony of marriage and the participants are compared to the married couple and to the divinities who preside over marriage. (If we understood Vedic marriage ceremonies better, we might understand the verse better.) In the first half of the verse Bṛhaspati leads the unnamed Aṅgirases to reunion with the cows, just as Bhaga (Fortune or Good Fortune) leads Aryaman, the "civilizing" god of custom, one of whose roles is patron of marriage, to the marriage ceremony in order to preside. The ceremony itself is performed at the ritual fire, and in the third pāda of the verse Bṛhaspati is compared to Agni, under the designation "ally among the people" (several times used of Agni elsewhere). Just as Agni anoints the marrying couple with milk, so Bṛhaspati "anoints" the Aṅgirases (compared to the couple) with cows. The fact that the word for "ally" (mitrá) is identical to the divine name Mitra simply introduces another complication into this complicated verse. Since, as the next verse (3) makes clear, the cows are embodiments of civilization, of the social bonds that unite the Ārya peoples, this remarkable verse is not just a poetic tour de force, but also an assertion of the centrality of social custom.

Another complex simile worth exploring is in the second half of verse 6, where the poet exploits the ambiguity of two words (páriviṣṭam and ā́dat) to deploy two distinct three-term comparisons simultaneously. The past passive participle páriviṣṭam can belong to either of two roots, √viś "enter," in which case the idiom means "surrounded, trapped," or √viṣ "work," in which case the idiom means "served." The verb ā́dat can belong to √dā "give," with preverb ā́, in which case the idiom means "take," or to √ad "eat." Combining these possibilities, we can interpret the image as that of the tongue worrying food caught between the teeth, or as the tongue and the teeth eating food that has been served. Either image can be appropriate to the removal of the cows from the cave, though we are partial to the notion of Bṛhaspati winkling out cows from every interior crevasse.

There is no need, or space, to dissect every simile; we can only invite the reader to savor the exuberance, the precision, and often the everyday nature of the imagery throughout the hymn and to consider the construction of these similes as forerunners of the kāvya style in Classical Sanskrit.

1. Constantly gabbling like water birds watching out for each other, like the sounds of booming (thunder) emanating from a cloud, exulting like waves stiff-peaked (like) mountains, the chants bellowed toward Bṛhaspati.
2. (Bellowing) with the cows, (Bṛhaspati) Aṅgiras, coming near, led (the Aṅgirases) together with the cows, as Bhaga leads Aryaman.
   As the ally among the people [=Agni] anoints the household pair, he anoints (the Aṅgirases). O Bṛhaspati, incite them like swift (horses) in a contest.
3. (The cows—) thoroughly civilized, providing for guests, vigorous, cherished, of lovely color and faultless form—
   Bṛhaspati, having brought them through, strewed the cows forth from the mountains, like grain from sacks.
4. Spraying the womb of truth with honey, flinging (it=honey?) down like a firebrand from heaven when the chant (sounded), Bṛhaspati, when he brought the cows up out of the stone, split asunder the skin of the earth as if (just) with water.
5. With his light he drove away the darkness from the midspace as the wind drives the śīpāla-plant from the water.
   Bṛhaspati, having (just) stroked (the skin/womb) of Vala, as the wind does a cloud, brought the cows here as his own.
6. When Bṛhaspati split the feebleness of taunting Vala with his fire-hot chants, he took (the cows) as the tongue takes (food) trapped by the teeth [/he "ate" (the cows?) as the tongue along with the teeth eats served (food)], and he revealed the hidden treasures of the ruddy (cows).

7. For Bṛhaspati brought to mind this very name of these who were resounding (with)in the seat—(the name) that was hidden.
   Having split the womb of the mountain like the eggs of a bird, he drove up the ruddy ones by himself.
8. He caught sight of the honey enclosed by the stone, like a fish living in shallow water.
   He extracted it, like a (wooden) cup from a tree—Bṛhaspati having cut apart (the mountain) with an (ear-)splitting cry.
9. He found the dawn, found the sun, found the fire; he thrust aside the dark shades with his chant [/ray].
   Bṛhaspati extracted (the cows) of Vala, whose beauty was the cows, like marrow from a joint.
10. As the woods (lament) their leaves stolen by cold, Vala lamented for the cows (stolen) by Bṛhaspati.
    He performed an inimitable (deed), not to be repeated as long as the sun and moon will rise in alternation.
11. Like a dusky horse with pearls, the Fathers ornamented the heaven with stars.
    In the night they placed darkness and light in the day. Bṛhaspati split the rock and found the cows.
12. This act of reverence here we have performed for the one belonging to the storm cloud, who keeps bellowing after the many (cows?):
    Bṛhaspati—for he shall confer vigor on us with cows, with horses, with heroes, with superior men.

Sumitra Vādhryaśva is said to be the composer of the next two hymns (69–70), one to Agni, one an Āprī hymn.

X.69 (869) Agni

Sumitra Vādhryaśva
12 verses: triṣṭubh, except jagatī 1–2

This hymn is discussed at length and translated in full by Proferes (2007: 40–44), who calls it "perhaps the clearest example of a tribal fire and the ritual role of the clans in relation to this fire. It illustrates the existence of a central fire tended by multiple clans who affirm through it their mutual solidarity, and who see in it the source of their domination over others" (p. 40). This particular clan-fire is that of King Vadhryaśva (see vss. 1–2, 4, 10–12), a speaking name with a deprecatory sense: "possessing gelded horses," and in fact the fire itself bears the patronymic "son/descendant of Vadhryaśva" (see vss. 5, 9, 12). The current fire is also contrasted with fire or fires kindled previously (vss. 4–5), and toward the end of the hymn this fire present here is depicted as victorious over former fires, presumably belonging to other clans (vss. 10–11). Such victories are just an aspect of the victories over other peoples that the clan-fire brings Vadhryaśva and his allies, the men who kindle and tend this fire (vss. 5–6, 9–12).

One curious detail in the hymn is found in verse 7, where various possessions are ascribed to the fire (here called a craftsman), including "a thousand barren cows." The negative connotations of this property are immediately counteracted in the next verse (8ab), in which the fire is credited with having an abundantly fertile cow whose flow of milk is inexhaustible, but the great flock of barren cows is nonetheless odd. It finds its explanation in a semantic pun: just as the triumphant and successful Vadhryaśva bears the name "possessing gelded horses" so does his equally triumphant and successful fire "possess barren cows."

Stylistically there is much chaining of phraseology and repetition of syntactic patterns.

1. Auspicious are the manifestations of the fire of Vadhryaśva; his guidance is valuable; reverent approaches (to him) bring joy.
   When the clans that are good allies kindle him at the beginning, bepoured with ghee he awakens, flashing again and again.
2. The strengthener of the fire of Vadhryaśva is ghee; ghee is his food, ghee his fattener.
   Bepoured with ghee, he spreads out widely. He shines like the sun—his potion melted butter.
3. Which face of yours Manu kindled, which (did) the good ally, o Agni, that is this one here anew.
   Blaze richly; take pleasure in the songs. Break out the prize; confer fame here.
4. You whom Vadhryaśva, when reverently invoked, kindled formerly, o Agni, do you take pleasure in this (new face) here.
   Become the protector of our people and the protector of our own bodies. Guard the gift—whatever you have for us here.
5. Become possessed of brilliance, o son of Vadhryaśva, and our herdsman.
   Let the hostile intent of the peoples not overtake you.
   A rouser like a bold champion, a good ally—I shall now proclaim the name of Vadhryaśva's son.
6. The goods of the plains and the mountains, the Dāsa and the Ārya obstacles—you have conquered them entirely.
   A rouser of the peoples like a bold champion—you, o Agni, should dominate those who seek battle.
7. This fire here has a long thread and lofty oxen; the craftsman has a thousand barren cows and a hundred counsels.
   Brilliant among the brilliant (gods), being groomed by men, you will shine among the good allies who seek the gods.

8. O Jātavedas, in you is the milk-cow, yielding good milk, milking out nectar always in the same way, like the two [=Heaven and Earth] that never dry up.
   You, Agni, are kindled by men who receive the priestly gifts, by the good allies who seek the gods.
9. Even the immortal gods proclaimed your greatness, o Jātavedas, son of Vadhryaśva.
   When the clans of the sons of Manu came to negotiate, you conquered by means of the men whose strength is you.
10. Like a father his son, Vadhryaśva bore you on his lap as he served you, o Agni.
    And taking pleasure in his kindling, o youngest one, you vanquished the former (fires), even though they were greatly arrogant.
11. Over and over the fire of Vadhryaśva has conquered rivals by means of the men that provide the pressed soma.
    You burned even the (whole) crowd, o bright-beamed one; as strengthener you cut down even the greatly arrogant one.
12. Here is the fire of Vadhryaśva, the smasher of Vr̥tra, kindled from of old, to be addressed with reverence.
    Subjugate those, whether non-kin or estranged kin, who defy us, o son of Vadhryaśva.

X.70 (896) Āprī

Sumitra Vādhryaśva
11 verses: triṣṭubh

An eleven-verse Āprī hymn, with Narāśaṃsa in verse 2 (like II.3, V.5), where some Āprī hymns instead have Tanūnapāt (I.188, III.4, VII.2, IX.5, and X.110). There are otherwise few deviations from the standard Āprī hymn template, except that r̥tvíj "priest, orderly sacrificer" is substituted for the standard Hotar in verse 7. The trimeter meter gives more scope for elaboration than some of the more minimalist dimeter Āprī hymns (e.g., I.13). A signature word is uśánt "eager, desirous" (4d, 5c, 6c, 9d). As always in Āprī hymns, the key word or phrase in each verse is italicized.

1. Take pleasure in this kindling wood of mine, o Agni; delight in the ghee-covered (ladle) in the footprint of refreshment.
   On the height of the earth, on the brightest day of days, become upright, o very resolute one, together with our sacrifice to the gods.
2. As the lead driver of the gods, let Narāśaṃsa drive here with horses of every form along the path of truth; with reverence the foremost of the gods will sweeten the ritual meal for the gods.

3. The sons of Manu, offering oblations, time and again solemnly invoke Agni to act as messenger:
   "With the best-conveying horses and with a smoothly rolling chariot, convey the gods here. Sit down here as our Hotar."
4. Pleasing to the gods, let it be spread out crosswise; long in length let it be sweet smelling for us.
   O divine Ritual Grass, with a mind without anger sacrifice to the gods, having Indra as their chief, who are eager for it.
5. Touch the wider back of heaven, or gape open along the measure of the earth.
   Eagerly, seeking the chariot, o Doors, with your greatness and with the great (gods) hold fast the divine chariot.
6. Let the two goddesses, the handsomely adorned daughters of Heaven, Dawn and Night, sit down in the womb.
   Let the eager gods sit here in the wide lap of you two eager ones who possess a good portion.
7. The pressing stone is upright; the fire has been loftily kindled: their own dear domains are in the lap of Aditi [=ritual ground?].
   You two priests—placed in front at this sacrifice, win material wealth by sacrifice, as the two who know better.
8. You three goddesses—sit here upon this wider ritual grass: we have made a comfortable place for you.
   As in the time of Manu, they—Iḷā, the goddess with feet of ghee, (and the other goddesses)—take pleasure in our sacrifice and our properly placed oblations.
9. God Tvaṣṭar, since you have attained loveliness and since you have come to be in the company of the Aṅgirases, (convey the sacrificial animal) forth to the fold of the gods, as you know how; eagerly perform the sacrifice, as one possessing treasure, o giver of material wealth.
10. O Lord of the Forest, harnessing it with a halter, convey it into the fold of the gods, as you know how.
    The god will sweeten and prepare the offerings. Let Heaven and Earth aid my call.
11. O Agni, convey Varuṇa here to our liking, also Indra from heaven and the Maruts from the midspace.
    Let them all, worthy of the sacrifice, sit on the ritual grass. Let the immortal gods bring themselves to exhilaration at the svāhā-call.

The next two very well-known and often anthologized hymns are attributed to the legendary Bṛhaspati Āṅgirasa, with alternative, equally legendary, authorship suggested for X.72. According to the Anukramaṇī, X.71 is dedicated to Jñāna "Wisdom" or "Knowledge," but it is knowledge in the form of sacred speech (Vāc). (The word jñāna does not occur in the hymn, or indeed in the Ṛgveda.) Hymn X.72, dedicated simply to the gods (Devāḥ) according to the Anukramaṇī, is a cosmogony focused on the origin of the divinities.

X.71 (897) Wisdom

Bṛhaspati Āṅgirasa
11 verses: triṣṭubh, except jagatī 9

This hymn describes the mastery of sacred speech (vā́c), which is essential for the priests performing the soma rites. This mastery binds the priests together, establishing their "companionship" (vs. 2). The degree of mastery distinguishes one priest from another (vss. 4–5, 7–8), while the inability or unwillingness of some priests to employ sacred speech in performance marks them and their mastery as useless (vss. 6, 9). Using the language of horseracing, the poet speaks of the "competition" or "competitions" (vā́jina, vss. 5, 10) in which priests succeed through their mastery of speech. These "competitions" could be contests to determine which priests can best compose hymns or recite hymns and therefore which ones will be chosen to participate in a ritual performance. That kind of contest occurred and is likely described in verse 10ab. It is also true that the poem emphasizes the composer of the hymns: it begins with a reference to Bṛhaspati, the "Lord of the Sacred Formulation," and in the concluding list of priests, the brahmán, the "formulator," is the only one mentioned by name. But the "competitions" could also be the sacrifices themselves, which strive against one another for the attention and favor of the gods. If so, sacred speech is not contained just in the hymns, but constitutes all of the speech in the rite. This broader conception of sacred speech is implied in the reference to the "seven husky-voiced singers" (3d), who are likely the "seven Hotars," the seven priests of the sacrifice (cf. II.1.2), and the reference to four types of priests in the last verse.

The hymn begins by remembering the ancient seers (cf. vs. 3b, ṛ́ṣi), who first found the "hidden name." As Schmidt (1968: 124) suggests, the reference may be to the ancient seers who found the hidden name of the cows and so were able to release the imprisoned cows from the Vala cave (cf. X.68.7). Their concerted priestly action and effective priestly speech is then a model for contemporary priests, to whom the poet shifts in verse 2. These priests have also created the speech of the sacrifice, and their knowledge and their ability to articulate that speech bind them together as colleagues. Because sacred speech belongs to them, it carries their "mark" or "brand" (lakṣmī́, 2d). In verse 3 they found this speech by the sacrifice, for it was in the words of the ancient seers, who were their ancestors and forerunners. They have brought that speech into the present and dispersed it throughout the sacrifice. Not everyone who would recite or compose is capable of doing so (vs. 4). Or, as verse 5a puts it, there are those who are "stiff and swollen in their companionship." This description is open to various interpretations, but "stiff and swollen" could apply to a corpse and here metaphorically describe someone who is useless, similar to the American expression "the guy's a stiff." Their talent is unproductive, "no milk-cow," and their words are sterile, bringing no "fruit or flower" (5d). Likewise, the uncooperative priest betrays the speech he perceives because only the priests together can perform the rite (vss. 6, 9). In verse 9cd the poet compares the speech in the sacrifice to the warp-threads on which the sacrifice is woven. But someone who does not use his knowledge and ability in the rite offers nothing more substantial than a stream of water and produces nothing worthwhile.

This hymn and its concentration on vā́c invites comparison with the famous self-praise pronounced by the goddess Vāc herself (X.125), though the tone of the two hymns is very different.

1. O Bṛhaspati, (this was) the first beginning of Speech: when they [=the seers] came forth, giving names.
   What was their best, what was flawless—that (name), set down in secret, was revealed to them because of your affection (for them).
2. When the wise have created Speech by their thought, purifying her like coarse grain by a sieve, in this they recognize their companionship as companions. Their auspicious mark has been set down upon Speech.
3. Through the sacrifice they followed the track of Speech. They found her having entered into the seers.
   Having brought her here, they dispersed her in many places. The seven husky-voiced singers together cry her out.
4. And many a one who sees has not seen Speech, and many a one who hears does not hear her.
   And for another she has stretched out her body, like an eager, well-dressed wife for her husband.
5. And they say that another is stiff and swollen in his companionship: him they do not spur on at all in the competitions.
   He moves with an artifice that is no milk-cow, having heard Speech without fruit or flower.
6. Who has abandoned the companion joined (to him) in knowledge, for him there is no share in Speech at all.
   When he hears her, he hears in vain, for he does not know the path of the rightly performed (ritual).

7. Though all have eyes and ears, the companions are unequal in quickness of mind.
   Some seem like ponds reaching up to the mouth or up to the armpits, and others seem like ponds good to bathe in.
8. When, in the mind's quickness that is fashioned in the heart, brahmins perform the sacrifice together as companions, then they leave behind some by their knowing ways and others range widely with their lauds and formulations.
9. Who move neither close nor far away, who are not brahmins, and who do not perform in the soma-pressing, they, having fallen upon speech in a bad way, stretch streams of water as their warp-thread, producing nothing.
10. All his companions rejoice with a companion who has come in glory, who is overpowering in the assembly, for, rescuing them from their errors and winning sustenance for them, he is fittingly spurred onward to the competition.
11. The one [=Hotar] sits, blooming a blooming of verses; the other [=Udgātar] sings a song in śakvarī verses.
    The one, the formulator [=Brahman], speaks the knowledge born (in him), and the other [=Adhvaryu] measures out the measure of the sacrifice.

X.72 (898) The Gods

Bṛhaspati Āṅgirasa, Bṛhaspati Laukya, or Aditi Dākṣāyaṇī
9 verses: anuṣṭubh

Geldner remarks that the hymn almost seems as if the poet intentionally wanted to show the insolubility of the problem of the origin of things by setting incompatible theories of cosmogony alongside one another. While we find greater coherence than this, we recognize the complexities and uncertainties that caused Geldner to come to this conclusion. At least at a very general level, the hymn does show a cosmogonic progression from "what is not existing" to "what is existing" and finally to immortal gods and mortal humans.

The hymn also has thematic elements in common with the preceding hymn. The most obvious is that bráhmaṇas pátiḥ, the Lord of the Sacred Formulation (vs. 2), is Bṛhaspati, who is invoked at the beginning of X.71. Then too, while it has the appearance of a cosmogony, the hymn also makes repeated reference to sacrificial performance. One thematic strand of this hymn is that the sacrifice embodies the principles that gave rise to the world.

In verse 3 what Bṛhaspati "smelted" is the "births" of the gods, as Sāyaṇa already noted. Bṛhaspati brings them about by means of a sacred formulation (bráhman) expressing the origins of the gods. But such a formulation can also bring about the birth of the gods in a specific ritual place at the time of a ritual performance. In that way, words—or the thoughts behind words—can make beings real. Perhaps this is what the poet means when in verse 2d he says that "what exists," what are "things" (the world, the gods, and humans), was born from "what does not exist," what are not "things" (thoughts or words).

In verse 3cd "the one whose feet were opened up" gives rise to what exists, which in turn gives rise to the regions of space. But in 4ab "the one whose feet were opened up" gives rise to the earth, which gives rise to the regions. That is to say, between the two hemistichs, there is a shift in the middle term: "what exists" in verse 3 and "the earth" in verse 4. The key to the significance of this shift is the word bhū́ "the earth." "The earth" is only one possible translation; the word could also mean a "form" that something assumes (cf. III.55.13b=X.27.14d) or, etymologically at least, the act of "becoming." If the ambiguity is intentional, then the two verses together redefine "what exists" as that which has material substance—most broadly the earth or more specifically what has form.

The source of "what exists" or "the earth" is the principle or entity described as "one whose feet were opened up" (uttānápad). Falk (1994: 7–10) understands uttāná to describe something whose feet are "turned upward," perhaps the upside-down world tree with its roots above. We take the more common approach in seeing here an image of birth or possibly sexual availability. But then whose feet are these? If the answer is inside the hymn, then it might be the goddess Aditi, who appears in verse 4 and is a mother of the gods in verses 8–9. Or again, since "what exists" (sát) is said to have arisen from "what does not exist" (ásat) in verses 2 and 3, there is perhaps an implied identification of "the one whose feet were opened up" with "what does not exist." Whoever or whatever the uttānápad may be, the term also contains an oblique reference to the lower aráṇī, one of the pieces of wood used to kindle the sacrificial fire. See, for example, III.29.3ab addressing the priests, uttānā́yām áva bharā cikitvā́n, sadyáḥ právītā vŕ̥ṣaṇam jajāna "Attentive, bear down upon her who is opened up (uttānā́) [=the lower fire-churning stick]. Impregnated on this day, she has given birth to the bull [=Agni]." That is to say, the appearance of fire from the fire-churning wood replicates the emergence of "what exists" from "what does not exist."

In verse 4cd the poet describes the paradoxical birth of Aditi from Dakṣa and Dakṣa from Aditi. Aditi is not only a goddess, but also a principle, the principle of Innocence or Offenselessness against the gods. Likewise, Dakṣa can be a god personifying ritual Skill. Their birth from one another may signify the mutual dependence of freedom from offense against the gods and ritual skill, both of which are necessary to carry out the sacrifice. Similarly, there may also be reference to the sacrifice in verse 5d, in which the gods are said to be amŕ̥tabandhavaḥ. The compound can mean that the gods are kin of the "immortal" Soma or Agni or that they are kin "to immortality" or that they are connected to the immortal waters (Falk 1994: 13). There are possible references to the ritual or ritual mythology in the succeeding verses as well. Thus, in 6d tīvrá, "sharp" or "bitter," is a typical description of soma. Or again in 7a the Yatis are ritual priests, whose death resulted in the rains that swell "the living worlds" (cf. Jamison 1991: 111). And finally in 7cd the sun in the waters can be a figure describing soma (cf. Oberlies 1999: 164–65) or fire.

The last two verses describe the birth of immortals, Aditi's "seven sons," with whom she went to the ancient generation of gods (vs. 9ab), and the birth of mortals, who are born from a "dead egg" (Hoffmann 1976b [=1992: 723]), a divine miscarriage, both "for procreation" and "for death" (9cd).

As a cosmology the hymn invites comparison with X.129.

1. Now amid acclaim we will proclaim the births of the gods, so that one in a later generation will see (them) as the hymns are recited.
2. The Lord of the Sacred Formulation [=Bṛhaspati] smelted these (births) like a smith.
   In the ancient generation of the gods, what exists was born from what does not exist.
3. In the first generation of the gods, what exists was born from what does not exist.
   The regions of space were born following that (which exists)—that (which exists) was born from the one whose feet were opened up.
4. The earth was born from the one whose feet were opened up; from the earth the regions of space were born.
   From Aditi, Dakṣa was born, and from Dakṣa, Aditi.
5. Because Aditi was born—she who is your daughter, o Dakṣa—following her, the gods were born, the auspicious kin of the immortal one.
6. When, o gods, well clasped to one another, you stood there in the ocean, then the bitter dust [=spray] dispersed from you, like (the dust [=sweat?]) of those dancing.
7. When, o gods, just as the Yatis did, you swelled the living worlds, then you brought here the sun, which was hidden in the sea.
8. Eight are the sons of Aditi, which were born from her body.
   With seven she went forth to the gods. She cast away the one stemming from a dead egg.
9. With seven sons Aditi went forth to the ancient generation.
   For procreation but also for death, she brought here again the one stemming from a dead egg.

Two hymns to Indra (73–74) are ascribed to Gaurivīti Śaktyā; the first is quite complex, the second quite straightforward.

X.73 (899) Indra

Gaurivīti Śaktyā
11 verses: triṣṭubh

A dense and difficult hymn, with many cryptic allusions to Indra's birth and some of his exploits. The Anukramaṇī ascribes it to the same poet as V.29, the first Indra hymn in the Vth Maṇḍala, and indeed this hymn has links to some of the fragmentary narratives in the early Indra hymns of V, especially V.30 and 31.

The hymn begins and ends with the birth of Indra; the unusual and difficult nature of that birth was also the subject of IV.18. In verses 1–2ab it seems that Indra's mother was beset with some trouble at the time of his birth. Nonetheless, he was successfully born but required strengthening by the Maruts. The account of his birth at the beginning of the hymn is quite straightforward when compared to the one given in verse 10, where several alternative sources of Indra are suggested. The common opinion seems to be that he "came from a (male) horse," though "I" (the poet) have a different view. And the last word (or non-word) is Indra's: "whence he was born, only Indra knows that."

The material immediately after the birth story is extremely cryptic, and our interpretation is quite speculative. We believe that verses 2cd–5ab combine two motifs: a ritual situation, the early-morning sacrifice, and a mythological one, the image of Indra as cosmic begetter and tender parent. The dawn ritual is suggested by the Aśvins' journey to the sacrifice with Indra (3d, 4b) and the apparent mention of early morning in 2d. The mythological material is harder to evaluate and to bring into a coherent schema. In 2cd it seems that something, quite possibly the worlds, were covered, perhaps sexually, by a "great foot(print)," and from the darkness there came embryos, presumably engendered in this encounter. Since Indra's feet are mentioned in the next verse (3a), it seems likely that the "great foot" in verse 2 is Indra, covering the worlds and begetting the embryos.

Verse 4 brings us the curious image of Indra with a thousand hyenas in his mouth. Though Geldner, for example, considers this simply a measure of how big a mouth Indra has and specifically denies that it has anything to do with the widespread Brāhmaṇa stories of Indra and the hyenas, this seems disingenuous. Since the hyena word appears only twice in the R̥gveda and only once in conjunction with Indra, it seems perverse not to explore the possible connection with these later tales. The Brāhmaṇa narratives and the light they may shed on this passage are discussed at length in Jamison (1991: pt 1). Suffice it to say that hyenas carry their young around in their mouths like cats, and the image here suggests that Indra is functioning as an attentive parent to his brood. Another aspect of Indra's parental role may be found in the next verse (4cd), where Indra "makes fast" thousands in an otherwise unidentified female: "make fast" seems a reasonable euphemism for impregnate or implant embryos. This section concerning Indra's fatherhood seems to come to an end in 5ab.

After this we turn to Indra's great deeds, especially the slaying of Namuci (5cd–7), a deed also treated in the related hymn V.30.7–8. Why the abrupt switch from Indra as parent to Indra as killer? The answer probably lies in the early-morning context of this hymn. Indra famously vowed not to kill Namuci by day or by night, or with a weapon dry or wet. The weapon, according to later accounts, was foam (also glancingly alluded to in VIII.14.13), and the time of slaughter the morning twilight—the exact time depicted in the hymn. We also consider the "darkening mists and darkness" of 5d to be the weapon used for the slaughter (rather than the later foam), since mist, too, counts neither as wet nor as dry. This mist, diffused like smoke, though directed at Namuci, settles "even on the two of the same name," whom we identify as the Aśvins, mentioned several times previously in the hymn, who make their journey during the early morning twilight.

Verse 8 summarizes Indra's accomplishment of his deeds by way of his epithets and acknowledges the applause of the gods, but it ends (8d) with a cryptic allusion to another of Indra's deeds, continued, in our view, in the first pāda of verse 9. Another tale favored in the early Indra hymns of Maṇḍala V is the chariot race between Indra and the Sun, in which Indra steals the Sun's wheel and puts his chariot in front of the Sun's, though it had been behind (see, e.g., V.31.11). The "topsy-turvy" outcome of 8d and the stuck wheel of 9a are suggestive of this myth. The rest of verse 9 simply celebrates Indra's fructifying of the plants and animals, which may remind us of his parental role earlier in the hymn, and with verse 10 we return to his mysterious birth. In the final verse (11) the poets ask Indra for aid in their plight.

1. You were born as the strong one for powerful might, the gladdening strongest one with manifold designs.
   It was just the Maruts who strengthened Indra then, when his mother, best at pushing (in childbirth) [/running], was going to set the hero to running.
2. She, even though caressing (him), was sunk down because of the activities of (demonic?) deceit. They [=Maruts] strengthened Indra much with their laud.
   These (worlds) were as if covered over [/sexually "covered"] by a great footprint [=Indra]. From the dark, from the early morning, embryos arose.
3. Lofty are your feet when you go forth. The Vājas and whatever (others) were there strengthened (you).
   You, Indra, took a thousand young hyenas in your mouth. You should turn the Aśvins hither.
4. In the same way—swiftly—you drive to the sacrifice; convey the Nāsatyas hither for fellowship.
   Indra, you made fast thousands in the wife of the good one [=impregnated her?]; the Aśvins gave bounties, o champion.

5. Becoming exhilarated, to produce progeny from truth, Indra (went) to the goal with his vigorous comrades.
   Because with these (wiles of his) he came right up to the Dasyu [=Namuci], to his wiles, he scattered forth darkening mists and darkness.
6. You sent the smoke for him [=Namuci] down even on the two of the same name [=Aśvins]; you smashed (him) down, Indra, like the cart of Dawn.
   You went with your lofty, avid comrades; at one blow you smashed his heart's foundations.
7. You smote Namuci who sought combat, rendering the Dāsa without wiles, for the seer.
   You made the paths comfortable for Manu, as if they went straightaway to the gods.
8. You have fulfilled your names completely; showing mastery, you have taken (them) in your fist.
   The gods cheer you on in your vast power. You turned the wooden things [=chariots?] topsy-turvy,
9. When his wheel was sunk down in the waters. And that should seem just honey to him, the udder bound tight onto the earth, the milk that you placed in the cows and in the plants.
10. When they say, "he came from a horse," I think of him rather as born from strength:
    he came from (battle) fervor; he stayed in a secure house [=womb?]. But whence he was born, (only) Indra knows that.
11. The fine-feathered birds have flocked to Indra—the Priyamedhas, seers in need.
    Open up the dark (place); fill our eye. Free us who are bound as if by a snare.

X.74 (900) Indra

Gaurivīti Śaktyā
6 verses: triṣṭubh

Although attributed to the same poet as the last hymn and also dedicated to Indra, this hymn fortunately lacks the challenges that X.73 poses—and in fact takes awhile to get to Indra. The first three verses simply announce the poet's intention to praise the gods and ask them to travel to the sacrifice with goods to bestow. The last three verses (4–6) turn to Indra exclusively, suggesting first in verse 4, via an allusion to the Vala myth and, possibly, to the Maruts' mother Pṛśni, the sacrificers' desire for cows and sons. More praise for Indra follows in verses 5–6, with the final pāda (6d) expressing the expectation that Indra will fulfill our desires.

1. Seeking to gain (their favor), I pay tribute to the Vasus or to the two world-halves, by inspired thought or by sacrifices, or to the steeds that become rich at the (occasion for) winning, or to those who hear well [=gods] who set the eager one to find good hearing.
2. At the invocation to them the lordly one [=Agni] will reach heaven; with a mind seeking fame he will kiss the earth, at the time when the gods, looking for easy passage, will equip themselves with their own choice things, like heaven (with stars).
3. Here is the song for these immortals, who in their entirety long for (it as their) treasure.
   Bringing to success both inspired thought and sacrifice, let them establish a mass of goods for us, and not by halves.
4. The Āyus admire this (greatness?) of yours, Indra—they who will wish to drill through to the enclosure full of cows [=Vala], who wish to milk the great (cow [=Pṛśni?]) who gives birth only once but has many sons, the lofty one with a thousand streams.
5. Cause able Indra to help you—the unbowable one who subdues the battlers, the master of the Ṛbhus, liberal, who (receives) well-twisted (hymns), the possessor of many cattle who bears the mace appropriate to superior men.
6. When the previous victor won the latest of many, Indra the Vṛtra-smasher fulfilled his names:
   he appeared as the powerful lord of victory. What we wish him to do, that he will do.

The next two hymns (75–76) are attributed to different poets, at least the second quite fancifully, by the Anukramaṇī, but clearly form a dyad (Oldenberg 1888: 236 n. 3). The first is devoted to the rivers, the second to the pressing stones.

X.75 (901) Rivers

Sindhukṣit Praiyamedha
9 verses: jagatī

This hymn celebrates the headlong glories of rivers, especially the Sindhu, here presented as the principal river into which all the others flow (see esp. vs. 4). As with the hymns to Sarasvatī (VI.61, VII.95–96), this one contains both naturalistic, if hyperbolic, description of the river (vss. 3, 7) and depictions of her as a beautiful woman and a prizewinning horse. Especially notable in the hymn is the litany of river names in verses 5–6, which many scholars have mined for geographical information.

1. At the seat of Vivasvant [=ritual ground] the bard will speak forth your highest greatness, o waters, for forth they strode in three stages, seven each time; forth (strode) Sindhu with her strength, beyond that of the (other) flowing (waters).
2. Varuṇa dug out the paths for you to travel, when, o Sindhu, you ran to the prizes.
   You travel on a slope along the back of the earth, when you direct the front rank of these moving (beings).
3. Her sound takes its place in heaven, above the earth. She sends up snorting without end along with radiance.
   Like rains from a cloud her "rains" thunder forth, when Sindhu goes like an ever-bellowing bull.
4. To you, Sindhu, like mothers to their young, like milk-cows with their milk do they [=tributary rivers] rush bellowing.
   It's you who lead them as a battling king does the two "seams" (of the army), when you seek to reach the front rank of these sloping (waters).
5. Here, o Gaṅgā, Yamunā, Sarasvatī—attend on this praise of mine, o Śutudrī, Paruṣṇī.
   With the Asiknī, o Marudvr̥dhā, with the Vitastā, o Ārjīkīyā, harken, with the Suṣomā.
6. To travel first joined with the Tr̥ṣṭāmā, (then) with the Susartū, the Rasā, and this Śvetyā, you, o Sindhu, (come) with the Kubhā to the Gomatī, with the Mehatnū to the Krumu, on the same chariot (with all these), with which you go speeding.
7. Straight in her course, mottled, glistening, in her greatness she holds encircled the expanses, the dusky realms—the undeceivable Sindhu, busiest of the busy, dappled-bright like a mare, lovely to see like a beautiful woman.
8. Sindhu has lovely horses, lovely chariots, lovely garments; she is golden, well-fashioned, rich in prize mares;
   the young woman is rich in wool [=foam], in sīlamā (plants?); and the well-portioned one puts on (a garment/plant) increasing the honey.
9. Sindhu has yoked her own well-naved, horsed chariot; with it she will gain the prize in this contest here, for the great greatness of it invites admiration—it undeceivable, self-glorious, conferring abundance.

X.76 (902) Pressing Stones

The snake Jaratkarṇa Airāvata
8 verses: jagatī

Of the three hymns dedicated to the pressing stones (X.76, X.94, and X.175), X.175 is brief and minimalist. Hymns X.94 and X.76 have a number of phrases and images in common, but X.94 is more charming than X.76, with vivid and imaginative comparisons and a light tone, while X.76 is perhaps more rhetorically ambitious, with some mythological and cosmic resonances, as well as some challenging syntax. The stones are more often addressed in the 2nd person and with imperatives in X.76 (no imperatives are addressed to the stones in X.94). This implicit attribution of agency to the stones becomes more pronounced toward the end of this hymn, where they seem to supplant the human pressers. The word náraḥ "superior men" is found in verses 6–8; although the first two occurrences could be interpreted as referring to humans, the last is a vocative addressed to the stones—which makes it clear that in the previous two verses the "men" must be the stones as well.

1. I stretch straight toward you at the first dawn flushes of nourishment.
   Anoint Indra, the Maruts, and the two world-halves, so that both day and night, in partnership, will make every seat spacious for us as they break out.
2. Press this as the best pressing. Like a racehorse controlled by the hands, the stone is in (the control of) the presser.
   Because it finds the masculine power that is overwhelming to the stranger, for the sake of great wealth he [=presser] also attains to (that masculine power), which (comes) from the steed [=stone].
3. For it has labored at just this pressing, at its task. Just as previously (Indra) set the course for Manu to Tvaṣṭar's (wealth?), which was flooding with cows and arrayed in horses, they have set ceremonies upon ceremonies.
4. Smash away the demons with their wreckage. Block Dissolution. Repel heedlessness.
   Press out wealth in hale heroes for us. Carry a tune that pursues the gods, you stones.
5. To you, more formidable even than Heaven, swifter working even than Vibhvan, more soma-frenzied even than Vāyu, better food-preparers even than Agni—sing!
6. Let the glorious ones clatter for us—let it press (soma) out of the stalk—the stones with their voice, (which is) heaven-bound, heavenly, when the superior men milk the desirable honey for themselves, making (Heaven and Earth) heed all about as they [=stones] cross each other transversely.

7. The stones, the charioteers, press the soma. They milk out the juice of him who seeks the cows.
   They milk the udder, to pour it out. As superior men they groom (the soma), like oblations, with their mouths.
8. You superior men, you have become the good workers who press soma for Indra—you stones.
   Every thing of value of yours is for the heavenly domain; every good thing of yours for the earthly presser.

The next two hymns (77–78), attributed to Syūmaraśmi Bhārgava and dedicated to the Maruts, share an unusual metrical structure and a rhetorical scheme. Although according to the Anukramaṇī the meter is triṣṭubh, in fact in X.77 only the last three verses (6–8) really conform to that meter, and in X.78 only the last (8). Most of the rest of the verses have eleven-syllable pādas, as is diagnostic of triṣṭubh, but clear jagatī cadences, an even more diagnostic test. As Oldenberg has shown (1888: 92–95), most such pādas have an opening of five syllables, ending with a light syllable (regularly ná "like"), followed by two heavy syllables, the first of which seems to substitute for the double-light break usual after an opening of five. (There is also often a word-break after these two heavy syllables, seeming to produce a second caesura in the line.) The apparent equivalence of the heavy sixth syllable with two light syllables introduces a principle of substitution or responsion not otherwise found in Vedic, or most Classical Sanskrit, meters, a principle that only achieves prominence in the Āryā meter quite possibly deriving from Middle Indo-Aryan.

X.77 (903) Maruts

Syūmaraśmi Bhārgava
8 verses: triṣṭubh (and mangled jagatī)

On the metrical structure, see the introduction just above.

Rhetorically the hymn (through vs. 5) is dominated by similes, often studied and syntactically complex ones, with three or four similes in every verse. When the dense concentration of similes ends (beginning with vs. 6), the meter returns to conventional triṣṭubh and to conventional hymn-ending expressions of hope for favor.

Most of the descriptions of the Maruts, however contorted their syntax, belong to the familiar repertoire of Marut characteristics: their stormy nature, their association with Indra, their beauty and ornaments, their boisterousness. However, twice they are connected with the Ādityas (vss. 2d, 8b), a group of gods with which they generally have nothing in common. This connection is puzzling. Thieme (1938: 158) suggests that their common quality was "caring for the stranger" (if that is what the disputed word ríśādas, also found twice in the hymn [vss. 3, 5], means).

1. Like (the Maruts) showering (rain) from a cloud with their speech [=thunder], I will shower goods with my speech. The sacrifices of a discerning one [=poet] are like [=just as good as] those provided with oblations.
   I have praised the flock of them as if praising the Formulator [=Indra?], who is well provided with Maruts—have praised them for their worthiness (of soma), as if for their beauty.
2. For their splendor the young bloods have provided themselves with ornaments across the many nights, just as they have made (the Formulator) well provided with Maruts.
   The sons of heaven have taken their places like antelopes; (as) Ādityas they have grown strong like foals [?].
3. Those who by themselves project beyond heaven as beyond earth mightily, like the sun beyond the clouds, inviting admiration like heroes of (great) dimension, heaven-bound like young bloods who care for the stranger.
4. At your journey—as if (resting) on a base of waters, as if going with faltering step, the great (earth) becomes slack.
   There is a sacrifice consisting of all good things close by. It is for you. Like dispensers of ritual delight, come here to those who are concentrated (on you).
5. With your reins [/rays] you are like (horses) hitched up to the chariot-poles—like light-bearing (fires) at the early brightenings with your beam—self-glorious like falcons, caring for the stranger—when (just) launched, (you are) like water birds, showering (drops) all around.
6. When you drive yourselves forth from afar, Maruts, you (come as) the ones who know of the great enclosure of goods, of goods to be realized, o good ones. Even from a distance keep hatred far away.
7. The descendant of Manu who, like (Agni) standing up at the ceremony, will do ritual service to the Maruts at the sacrifice when the chant is raised, he will acquire rich vitality abounding in good heroes. Let him be in the protection of the gods.
8. For they are helpers worthy to receive sacrifice at the sacrifices, the best luck-bringers, by the Ādityan name.
   Let them aid our inspiration, (like a horse) that outstrips chariots, as they take pleasure in the journey of their great (host) and in the ceremony.

X.78 (904) Maruts

Syūmaraśmi Bhārgava
8 verses: triṣṭubh and jagatī

This hymn has the same unusual meter as X.77 and, like X.77, is structured as a series of similes. In fact, this hymn goes further than the previous hymn in both features. The only standard triṣṭubh verse is the final one (8), which also breaks the rhetorical pattern. And the similes not only continue throughout the hymn (until vs. 8) but are under more rigid syntactic control. It is worth discussing in some detail how the poet has crafted his hymn and how the apparently rigid repetitive structure, with each pāda containing exactly one simile, still allows the possibility of forward momentum and rhetorical climax. (See also Jamison 2007: 77–79.)

Each of the first seven verses of this eight-verse hymn contains four pāda-length similes, each marked with ná "like," and with the point of comparison almost always positioned at pāda-end. Since in runs of similes it is common to alternate between the simile-markers ná and iva, the complete avoidance of iva in this hymn is noteworthy and the regular repetition of ná contributes to the sense of regimentation. Furthermore, the ná is almost exclusively in second position in the pāda and is generally the last syllable of the opening (before an often irregular break: see the introduction to X.77).

All of these similes are in the nominative plural masculine, with the Maruts always the subject. This rigid syntactic structure, reinforced by its coinciding exactly with metrical units, has an almost claustrophobic effect—an effect significantly enhanced by the fact that the first six verses are entirely nominal in their syntax: in these twenty-four separate clausal similes there is not one finite verb or even predicated participle. (This exclusively nominal style cannot be entirely captured in translation.) This syntactic stasis contrasts markedly with the nature of the subjects being celebrated, for the Maruts are the most active gods in the R̥gveda. Moreover, many of the similes in this hymn concern the Maruts' uncontrollable energy, despite the motionless quality of the poetic form. The disjunction between content and form produces a remarkable aesthetic effect. Yet the effect is not of complete stasis even in these verses, for the subjects of the similes modulate from verse to verse, while the complexity of imagery increases gradually. For examples, the winds appear in verses 2 and 3 in different images, likewise bride-seeking young men in verses 4 and 5, with two types of stones and two types of mothers in verse 6.

And then finally in verse 7 the straitjacket of nominal style is broken: though this verse, too, contains four pāda-length similes, both hemistichs end with finite verbs, 7b vy àśvitan "they have shone forth," 7d mamire "they have measured." While maintaining the underlying structure that unifies the hymn, the poet manages, by strictly grammatical means, to build to a climax. The energy kept suppressed by the nominal style is finally released by the finite verbs of verse 7.

The last verse (8), which is, as noted, the only standard triṣṭubh, abandons the structure of the rest of the hymn, and in conventional terms asks the gods for the usual gifts, as so often in final verses. But it is noteworthy for containing the first and only occurrence of the name marút in the hymn. Retroactively we can see that the hymn also functions as a very long riddle, whose answer is given only in this last verse. This verse is linked to what precedes by a small and subtle verbal device. As noted, twenty-five of the twenty-eight preceding pādas begin X ná, with the simile marker in second position; verse 8 begins X no (i.e., naḥ "us"). The poet invites us to expect yet another simile, but substitutes the phonetically similar 1st-person plural enclitic pronoun in its place. Thus, though the verse is cast in entirely different stylistic terms from the rest of the hymn, its integral connection to what precedes is signaled by the playful naḥ. (Note that the naḥ is entirely unnecessary in this verse, since it redundantly doubles and anticipates the full pronoun asmā́n opening the second pāda.)

1. Rich in purpose like inspired poets with their thoughts, rich in profit like those who pursue the gods with sacrifices, lovely to look at like brilliant kings, unblemished like the young bloods of the settlements—
2. Who, with brilliants on their breasts, are like fire with their flash; like the winds, their own yokemates, bringing immediate aid; providing good guidance like elders who think ahead, providing good shelter like soma drinks to the one pursuing truth—
3. Who like the boisterous winds are always on the move, radiating like the tongues of fires, vehement like armored warriors, bringing lovely gifts like the lauds of the ancestors—
4. Who, like the spokes of chariots, have the same nave(l), heaven bound like victorious champions, showering ghee [=rain] as young bloods gone awooing shower (goods), of good rhythm like those who sound a chant—
5. Who are swift like superior horses, of good gifts [/drops] like charioteers seeking to acquire (brides), always on the move with their moisture like the waters with their depths, displaying all forms through their melodies like the Aṅgirases—
6. Like pressing stones, the patrons have a river as their mother; like rocks they always keep pounding.
   Playful like little children with good mothers, like a great host (of warriors) on their journey and with their turmoil—
7. Like the beacons of the dawns providing splendor to the ceremony, like those in pursuit of beauty they have shone forth with their ornaments—coursing like rivers, those with glinting spears have measured out the stages of their journey like the distant realms.

8. O gods, make us possessed of good portions, good treasures, strengthening us as your praisers, o Maruts, when you have been strengthened.
   Give study to our praise song, to our fellowship. For from long ago occasions for the conferring of treasures have been yours.

The next two Agni hymns (79–80) belong together.

X.79 (905) Agni

Agni Saucīka or Agni Vaiśvānara or Sapti Vājambhara
7 verses: triṣṭubh

This hymn begins with a 1st-person vision ("I have seen . . . ") and in its middle verse (4) announces a truth, again in the 1st person—though the speaker disclaims real discernment for himself, while ascribing it to the god Agni. Such rhetorical moves are typical of omphalos hymns, but the mystery in this hymn seems less profound than the structure in which it is embedded seems to promise. It is simply the common trope of Agni as an insatiable eater, with a nice twist in verse 6, where the poet commiserates with Agni for having, because of imagined sins, to eat without teeth. Although the supposed enigma of this hymn is not particularly enigmatic, the style is lively and the images sharp.

1. I have seen the greatness of him, the great one, of the immortal one among the mortal clans.
   His jaws are alternately opened up and closed together again. Insatiable, gnawing, they eat amply.
2. His head is deposited in hiding; his eyes set apart. Insatiable, he eats the wood with his tongue.
   With their feet they [=priests] collect things for him to eat, their hands outstretched with reverence among the clans.
3. Questing further and further for the hidden place of his mother like a child, he creeps through the wide plants.
   He [=priest?] found him, gleaming like ripened grain, licking within the lap of the mount [?].
4. I proclaim this truth to you, o you two World-Halves: while being born, the embryo eats his two mothers [=kindling sticks].
   As a mortal, I do not discern the god, but Agni certainly discerns afar and discerns ahead.

5. Whoever sets out dry food for him, pours oblations with melted butter and ghee for him, and prospers (him), for that (man) you gaze afar with your thousand eyes. Agni, you face in every direction.
6. What sin of omission or commission have you done before the gods? I now ask you, Agni, since I do not know.
   Whether at play or not, tawny (Agni) has to eat without teeth. You have cut apart (the wood) piece by piece, as a knife does a cow joint by joint.
7. Born in the wood, he has yoked his own horses that face in all directions, controlled by reins that stretch straight.
   Our well-born ally has carved up (the meal) together with the good (gods); he has come together with (all) his parts, having grown strong.

X.80 (906) Agni

Agni Saucīka or Agni Vaiśvānara
7 verses: triṣṭubh

The most salient feature of this hymn is the form of the word agní that begins every pāda. In the first half of the hymn (vss. 1–4) the form is almost exclusively nominative singular (save for the genitives in 2a and 4d), while the second half has primarily the accusative. As so often, the final verse breaks the pattern: the first trisyllabic form (dat. agnáye in 7a) is followed by two vocatives (ágne) in the last hemistich (7cd), a simple grammatical switch that turns the insistently descriptive 3rd-person cast of the rest of the hymn into a direct, 2nd-person plea to the god for help and wealth.

The actual contents of the hymn are subordinated to this formal structure. Most of the first half of the hymn is devoted to detailing the gifts and aid that Agni generally provides, though verse 3 briskly mentions four mythological precedents where Agni has aided specific individuals, somewhat in the style of the catalogues of good deeds in Aśvin hymns. (In fact, the only reasonably well-known figure in vs. 3 is Atri [3c], whose rescue is usually attributed to the Aśvins.) Verses 5–6 establish Agni as the target of all creatures in need. In the final verse (7) the poet both announces his hymn, produced on the model of the R̥bhus, and states what he wants in return.

1. Agni gives a prize-bringing team; Agni (gives) a hero, worthy of fame, outstanding through his work—
   Agni roams widely through the two world-halves, anointing them completely—Agni (gives) a woman with a hero in her belly, Plenitude (herself).

2. Let Agni's kindling be auspicious and of profit. Agni has entered the two great world-halves.
   Agni propels the one in battles; Agni divides up the many obstacles.
3. Agni helped this Jaratkarṇa [/ear of the old man]; Agni burned Jarūtha out from the waters.
   Agni gave freedom to Atri, (who was) within the hot vessel; Agni brought Nr̥medha together with offspring.
4. Agni gives wealth whose ornament is heroes; Agni (gives) a seer who wins thousands.
   Agni stretches the oblation to heaven; Agni's domains are dispersed in many places.
5. It's Agni whom seers vie in calling upon with their recitations; Agni (do) men when hard-pressed on an expedition;
   Agni (do) birds flying in the midspace. Agni encircles thousands of cows.
6. It's Agni whom the clans stemming from Manu invoke; Agni (do) those born variously from Manu and from Nahus.
   Agni (has found) the Gandharvan path of truth; Agni's pasture-land is set down in ghee.
7. For Agni did the R̥bhus fashion their formulation; to Agni have we spoken a great, well-turned (hymn).
   O Agni, youngest one—further the singer; o Agni, win great wealth by sacrifice.

Two hymns (X.81–82) to Viśvakarman are attributed to the dedicand himself.

X.81 (907) Viśvakarman

Viśvakarman Bhauvana
7 verses: triṣṭubh

Viśvakarman, the "Maker of Everything" (or literally, "who has the making of everything"), is the carpenter (vs. 4ab) and smith (vs. 3cd) of creation, who fashioned the world. But he is also both an ancient seer (ŕ̥ṣi) and Hotar (vs. 1) and a present companion (vs. 5cd) and help (vs. 7) to the sacrificers, for his priestly work has continued from the ancient past into the present (vs. 1cd). This priestly work is closely connected with his creative work. He wins heaven and earth by a sacrifice that he carries out for his own sake (vs. 6ab), and his ritual work is dedicated to the benefit of the realms he surveys (vs. 5). In the first line the poet speaks of Viśvakarman's "pouring" beings "in oblation" (júhvat). It is not clear exactly what he means by that phrase, but it likely describes a process by which Viśvakarman sustains the living world through time or continues to make living beings his own.

The phrase must be significant, since the poet verbally recalls it in the last verse, when he anticipates that Viśvakarman will enjoy the "oblations" (hávanāni) offered to him. In 1c the description "seeking wealth with hope" refers to Viśvakarman's ritual activity, which carries the hope of prosperity for the sacrificer.

The first and last verses of the hymn create a frame for the hymn. In the first verse, Viśvakarman is both a seer (ŕ̥ṣi) of hymns and a Hotar, who pours oblations (júhvat). In the last he is the vācás páti- "Lord of Speech," who "will take pleasure in oblations (hávanāni)." That is, within the hymn, Viśvakarman begins as the model of a priest who both speaks and makes offerings, and concludes as the master of speech and the recipient of offerings, who supports the sacrificers. This movement from divine priest to priestly divinity exalts poets and priests, who are closely associated with him and whose words and deeds follow his.

One of the stylistic characteristics of the hymn is the echoing of Viśvakarman's name through the frequent use of víśva "every, all" (vss. 2d, 3ab, 7cd). Even more striking is the repeated use of words containing the v-sound also extracted from his name. Over a third of the words of the hymn contain that sound. Its repetition is especially obvious in 5cd śíkṣā sákhibhyo havíṣi svadhāvaḥ svayáṃ yajasva tanvàṃ vr̥dhānáḥ and 6ab víśvakarman* havíṣā vāvr̥dhānáḥ svayáṃ yajasva pr̥thivī́m utá dyā́m*, two pādas that together have a string of twelve words containing v. The invocation to Viśvakarman and his presence thus persist even when his name is not explicitly mentioned.

1. The seer who took his place as Hotar, pouring all these living beings in oblation—our father, seeking wealth with hope, entered the later (generations while) concealing the first ones.
2. What was the resting place? Which one was providing support? How was it?— that from which Viśvakarman, producing the earth, (also) uncovered the heaven by his greatness—he who has his eyes on everything.
3. Whose eyes and face are turned in every direction, whose arms and feet move in every direction, producing heaven and earth, he forges them together with his arms, with his fan(-bellows)—he, the god alone.
4. What was the wood? What was the tree?—out of which they fashioned heaven and earth.
   O you of inspired thought [=priests], in your thinking ask about that upon which he rested, giving support to living beings.
5. What are your highest domains, what your lowest, and these that are your midmost, Viśvakarman—do your best for them for the sake of your companions at the oblation, o you of independent will. Increasing your own person, by yourself sacrifice for yourself.

6. O Viśvakarman, since you are increased through the oblation, by yourself win earth and heaven by sacrifice.
   Let the other peoples all around be left in confusion; for us here let there be a generous patron!
7. We would today summon the Lord of Speech, Viśvakarman, swift as thought, for help in the contest.
   He will take pleasure in every oblation of ours—he who is luck for everyone, whose work succeeds—to give us help.

X.82 (908) Viśvakarman

Viśvakarman Bhauvana
7 verses: triṣṭubh

This hymn complements the preceding one and may be the more interesting of the two since it offers various hints about the various roles that Viśvakarman plays. The first words of the hymn, which call Viśvakarman the "father of the eye" (cákṣuṣaḥ pitā́), create the possibility of double reference. On the one hand, as Geldner and Renou (EVP XV: 170) rightly see and the subordinate clause "for he is insightful in mind" supports, the eye is the inspired vision of seers. On the other hand, the "eye" can be the eye of the sun, as frequently in the R̥gveda (e.g., I.164.14, V.40.8, 59.5, X.10.9). This double possibility is realized in the remainder of the verse, which describes both the sacrifice and the cosmos. In pāda b, the primary reference is to the sacrifice, evident in the ghee that the father produced. Because they are set in a sacrificial context, "the two that bob up and down" refer initially to the sacrificial ladles (juhū́), bending to the fire. But the two can also be heaven and earth, which rise and fall, a subsequent reading triggered by pāda d. In 1cd there is a shift to a cosmic context, which then becomes primary, and the sacrificial context is secondary. In 1c the phrase ántāḥ...pū́rve "ancient limits"—the beginnings of the world—can also mean the "eastern limits," the limits from which the sacrificial area is measured. The reference to "heaven and earth" in pāda d confirms the cosmic context of this hemistich but without excluding sacrificial reference, for on the sacrificial ground heaven is represented by the Āhavanīya or "offering fire" in the east and earth by the Gārhapatya or "domestic fire" in the west. (Though those terms, ubiquitous in middle Vedic śrauta literature, are not used in the R̥gveda of those two fires, the polarity of the two fires is clearly reflected in the R̥gveda.)

In verse 2a there is again an ambiguity: iṣṭá may mean what is offered in sacrifice or what is wished for, and here both meanings are possible. But whose are these "offerings" or "wishes"? The seers represented in the constellation of the Seven Seers (vs. 2b) are the closest and best possibilities. The frame of reference would then be the cosmos. Or those offering or wishing may be the "ancient seers," who appear in verse 4. In that case the frame of reference is the sacrifice. That is to say, the first verses describe both the creation of the sacrifice and the creation of the world and thereby link the creation of the sacrifice to the creation of the world.

Whatever it is that Viśvakarman represents is central to these creations. He is initially set beyond both the sacrifice and the cosmos as the "father" of poetic vision and of the sun. But then in verse 2 he spreads throughout the sacrifice and the world. Verse 2ab puns on his name *Ví*śvakarman, repeating its first syllable by the prefix vi- in vímanā "vast in mind," víhāyā "vast in power," and vidhātā́ "vast distributor"—the last, the one who distributes widely. The opposite of vi-, literally "apart," is sam- "together, completely," and the latter replaces vi- in 2bc in saṃdṛ́ś "full manifestation," a cosmic term, and sám √mad "fully invigorate," a sacrificial term. The lexical shifts create the sense that Viśvakarman first extends throughout the sacrifice and the cosmos and then condenses in a perceptible form.

In the latter part of the poem, in verses 5–7, the poet explores the manifest forms that Viśvakarman has taken. The best clue to the forms of Viśvakarman is the reference repeated in verses 5 and 6 to "the first embryo" that the waters received and in which all the gods were manifest and gathered. That first embryo can represent any or all of three realities. First, on the cosmic plane, it can be the sun, which rises out of the waters. Thus Viśvakarman would be initially the father of the sun and then, in manifest form, the sun itself. Second, on the sacrificial plane, the embryo can be fire, or more specificially the sacrificial fire, which is the "child of the waters" (apā́ṃ nápāt) and the form in which the presence of the gods at the sacrifice is manifested. And third, perhaps uniting cosmos and sacrifice, the embryo can be the king, who is reborn as the sun or as a sun-like being by means of the unction waters in the royal consecration rite. For a clearer reference to such imagery in the royal consecration rite, see X.121.

1. The father of the eye, for he is insightful in mind, gave birth to the ghee and the two that repeatedly bob up and down [=two ladles/heaven and earth].
   Only when the ancient [/eastern] limits were fixed, only then did heaven and earth spread out.
2. Viśvakarman is vast in mind and vast in power, the distributor—the vast distributor—and the highest full manifestation.
   Their offerings [/wishes] are fully invigorated by nourishment where, beyond the Seven Seers [=the Big Dipper], they say the one is.
3. To him who is our father and progenitor, who is the vast distributor, who knows the domains and living beings, all of them, who is the giver of names to the gods, the one alone—to him go the other living beings to make peace.
4. Like singers, the ancient seers together won for him wealth in abundance by sacrifice—
   they who together created these creatures after the airy realm, sunlit and unsunlit, took its seat.

5. Was it beyond heaven, beyond this earth, beyond lords and gods?
   What first embryo did the waters receive, where all the gods appeared together?
6. Just this first embryo did the waters receive, where all the gods gathered together:
   the one fitted upon the navel of the unborn, that upon which all living beings have taken their places.
7. You [=other priests] will not find him who gave birth to these things. For you another thing has come between.
   Covered by mist and muttering, feeding on life, they wander about, reciting their solemn speech.

The next two hymns are dedicated to Battle Fury (Manyú) and assigned to a poet whose name is transparently derived from the hymn itself, Manyu Tāpasa, or Battle Fury, son of Fervor (for Fervor, see 83.2d).

X.83 (909) Battle Fury

Manyu Tāpasa
7 verses: triṣṭubh, except jagatī 1

This hymn begins with four verses praising Manyu for his might and victory-bringing qualities and entreating him to use these qualities against our enemies. The following three verses (5–7) strike a more personal note, with a 1st-person speaker, apparently deserted by Manyu for some undetermined reason. The speaker begs Manyu to return to his side, so that together they can smite the enemy.

1. Who has done honor to you, o Battle Fury—you mace, you missile—he prospers in due order in all victorious might and strength.
   Might we be victorious over Dāsa and Ārya with you as yokemate, with victorious might, created by might, possessing might.
2. Battle Fury was Indra, just Battle Fury was (every?) god; Battle Fury was the Hotar, Varuṇa, Jātavedas.
   Battle Fury do the clans that stem from Manu reverently invoke. Protect us, Battle Fury, in concert with Fervor.
3. Attack, Battle Fury, stronger than strong. With Fervor as yokemate smite away our rivals.
   Foe-smiting, obstacle-smiting, and Dasyu-smiting, bring all good things here to us.
4. For you, Battle Fury, having overwhelming strength, are self-generated Wrath, victorious over hostility.
   Common to all domains, victorious, possessing victorious might, confer strength on us in battle.

5. Being without a portion, I have gone off far away, because of your intention, you forceful and discerning one.
   Unintentionally I have angered you, Battle Fury. In your own person come to me to give me power.
6. Here I am—yours! Come right up here near to me face to face, o victorious one who suckles all.
   Battle Fury, mace-bearer; turn here toward me—we two shall smite the Dasyus—and be mindful of your friend.
7. Go forth on attack: be on my right side. Then we shall keep smiting obstacles in abundance.
   I offer to you the foundation and the top of the honey. We two shall both first drink silently.

X.84 (910) Battle Fury

Manyu Tāpasa
7 verses: triṣṭubh 1–3, jagatī 4–7

Like the last hymn, this one is a simple address to Manyu "Battle Fury" asking for his aid in our battles, as well as in the division of the spoils. Rhetorically the hymn is characterized by verbal chaining: almost every verse ends with a word picked up by the very beginning of the next verse. Thus, "fire" in 1d/2a, "alone" 3d/4a, "victory" 4d/5a, "ready to hand" 5d/6a, "pour in" 6d/7a; only 2d/3a lacks this concatenation.

1. Let them go forth on attack on the same chariot with you, o Battle Fury, you Marut-friend—doing damage, bristling with excitement, emboldened, possessing sharp arrows, having honed their weapons—the superior men with fire's form.
2. Flaring like fire, o Battle Fury, be victorious. Be our army-leader, victorious one, when you are invoked.
   On smiting our rivals, share out their possessions. Showing the measure of your strength, shove aside the scorners.
3. Vanquish hostility for us, Battle Fury. Breaking, crushing, crushing out, advance on our rivals.
   Formidable is your dimension: they have never confined it. Exerting your will, you lead at will, you who are born alone.
4. You alone are reverently invoked by many, Battle Fury. Hone every clan for battle.
   O one of unbroken brilliance, with you as yokemate we raise our heavenly cry for victory.

5. Creating victory like Indra, without talking us down, Battle Fury, become our overlord here.
   We hymn your dear name, victorious one. We know the wellspring whence you came to be ready to hand.
6. Born together with readiness, you mace, you missile, you bear highest victorious might, o overwhelming one.
   (Born?) together with your resolve, share the fat with us, Battle Fury, at the pouring in of great spoils, o much-invoked one.
7. The spoils, both those that have poured in and those that have been collected, let Battle Fury and Varuṇa give to us.
   Let our rivals, having set fear in their own hearts, defeated, hide themselves away.

With X.85 begins the series of individual hymns that will last to the end of the Xth Maṇḍala.

X.85 (911) Wedding

Sūryā Sāvitrī
47 verses: anuṣṭubh, except triṣṭubh 14, 19–21, 23–24, 26, 36–37, 44; jagatī 18, 27, 43; urobr̥hatī 34

This first hymn of the single-hymn group, long and episodic, treats the domestic ritual of the wedding. Many of the verses are found also in the Atharvaveda (Śaunaka) wedding hymns (XIV.1–2) and are utilized in the gr̥hya sūtras (the protocols of the domestic rituals) in the wedding rite.

It begins (vss. 1–19) with a fairly coherent account of the wedding of Sūryā, the Daughter of the Sun, whose marriage serves as the prototype of human marriage. She is also named by the Anukramaṇī as the author of the hymn, a clearly fanciful ascription. The bridegroom is Soma, and the first five verses are devoted to asserting that this is not the familiar earthly soma, the ritual drink (see esp. vss. 3–4), but rather the celestial Soma—here identified for the first time as the moon, an identification that becomes standard later. The waning and waxing of the moon are referred to in verse 5, and probably cryptically in the first part of verse 4, in the puzzling adjective "those whose regulation is sheltering" (āchádvidhāna), using an idiom otherwise used for the regulation of the months and seasons (e.g., in vs. 18).

The next verses (6–12) employ a style familiar from the Atharvaveda and from middle Vedic prose, a structured series of identifications between cosmic and everyday entities; the everyday entities here are the different features of the wedding, and especially the wedding vehicle. Much in these verses is unclear for several reasons. For one thing, workaday language is seldom found in these high-culture texts, and so the words for the members of the wedding party and the pieces of the bridal finery and wedding cart are unfamiliar. Moreover, the cosmic comparanda are difficult to penetrate as they seem to refer to unidentified astronomical bodies and movements. Verses 13–16 focus on a single episode in the marriage ritual, the "wooing." Judging from later practice, the bridegroom's party sends several males to the potential bride's home, to ask her father and other male members of the family for her as bride for the man they represent. This part of the ceremony begins with the wooers identifying themselves by name and lineage—the "pointing out" of verse 15. In this hymn the Aśvins are the wooers, arriving on their characteristic three-wheeled chariot, whose wheels provide the topic for a series of (presumably astronomical) riddles (vss. 15–16). (For further discussion see Jamison 1996a: 222–24.) After a verse of homage (17), this part of the hymn ends with two further verses of riddles about the sun and moon (18–19).

After this long, more-or-less self-contained mythological and cosmological opening the hymn continues with verses more appropriate to the current, human wedding. Verses 20–27 contain a somewhat jumbled treatment of the wedding, from the wooing to the arrival in the new home, beginning with an invitation to mount the wedding vehicle (vs. 20), perhaps placed here because it has connections with the Sūryā section. Verses 21–22 are addressed to a Gandharva (a type of lubricious demigod, thought to target unmarried girls), declaring the new wife off-limits. Verse 23 seems to collapse the earlier journey to the wooing and the journey to the new home, while the following two verses (24–25) concern the ceremony itself: at least in the later ritual the wife is briefly bound with a cord, as a symbolic initiation parallel to the initiation of a young Ārya boy. (See Jamison 1996a: 42–48.) Finally, in verses 26–27 we reach the journey to the new home and good wishes for the new mistress of the household.

Verses 28–35 are a strange, sinister, and menacing interlude between the generally happy tone of the first part of the hymn and the blessings with which it closes. These, especially verses 28–30 and 34–35, are also the most discussed and disputed verses in the hymn. Let us dispose of the relatively unproblematic verses 31–33 first. These concern the possible dangers of the wedding journey: diseases emanating from the spectators of the procession (vs. 31) and robbers and other hazards (vs. 32). In verse 33 the spectators are allowed to look at the bride and wish her good luck, but then ordered home.

It is generally agreed that the three preceding verses (28–30) have to do with the deflowering of the bride, though there is much disagreement about details. Verse 28, it seems, begins with the announcement of the blood-stained sheet or garment, the all-important sign that the bride was a virgin. But the rest of this verse and the two verses following do not treat this as an altogether positive outcome, especially for the groom. Because the bride was a virgin, the marriage is valid, so her relatives are pleased (28c)—but the new husband is trapped. The bride becomes a noose (like the old sexist American slang expression "ball-and-chain" for a wife), and he is bound in her bonds. She also becomes witchcraft embodied (28b, 29c). In our view this refers to the unnerving and dangerous hold that sex, in the person of his wife, will exert over the husband. (Compare American English "that old black magic" for sexual attraction and desire.) He is not only legally but also mentally bound, and this hold is also expressed by the paradoxical "the wife enters her husband" at the end of verse 29. Though the sexual act of course happens the other way—husband enters wife—symbolically she enters him: she has penetrated his defenses, gotten "under his skin." The first half of verse 29 is unconnected with this emotional transformation; instead it simply continues the legal and social ramifications of the consummated marriage. With most commentators (pace Falk [1993], who thinks it is the sable pelt worn by the groom), we interpret the śāmulyàm of 29a as the stained garment of the bride, now to be disposed of. Pāda b treats the gifts to be given to the priests who officiated at the ceremony. In verse 30 we return to the groom's compromised physical and emotional state: sex, especially this first sex of marriage, is making him weakened and vulnerable, his naked flesh "glistening in an evil way," perhaps with sexual fluids. The theme of the garment found in literal terms in verses 28–29 acquires a somewhat shocking metaphorical twist in the second half of verse 30, where sexual intercourse is depicted as the husband dressing his penis in the "garment," that is, the body, of the bride.

After this emotional binge, the dangers of the road in verses 31–33 seem rather minor! (The journey verses may have been interpolated here because the diseases of vs. 31 are reminiscent of the groom's physical state in vs. 30.) But menace returns in verse 34, where an unidentified object is ascribed all sorts of harmful qualities. Only a brahmin can neutralize them. Similarly, in verse 35 various violent actions are depicted, which a brahmin can absolve. Most commentators have considered the object in verse 34 to be the stained garment of the bride, and the actions in verse 35 to have been performed on the garment to sanitize it. We think this unlikely; instead we consider these two verses to concern the wedding feast and in particular the cow killed for the feast. Just as the sex of verses 28–30 involved violence, surrender, and the breaking of taboos, so the slaughter of a cow to be eaten at the celebration requires the same ambivalently viewed actions and in a sense is a public representation of the private violation of deflowering. But brahmins who understand "Sūryā," that is, the nature of marriage, including its negative qualities, can safely eat the offered cow.

Verses 36–37 depict a far more benign husband than the tortured one of verses 28–30 and one more uncomplicatedly eager for sex. These verses lead into the famous series (38–41) about the previous, divine husbands of the wife. The final six verses (42–47) are simply expressed blessings of the married couple and of the new wife.

1. By reality is the earth propped up; by the sun is heaven propped up.
   By truth do the Ādityas stand, and Soma is fixed in heaven.
2. By Soma the Ādityas are strong; by truth is the earth great.
   And in the lap of these heavenly bodies Soma is set.

3. A man thinks he has drunk the soma when they crush the plant.
   But the Soma that the formulators know—no one at all consumes that.
4. Protected by those whose regulation is sheltering, guarded by those belonging to heights, o Soma, you just stay listening to the pressing stones. No earth-dweller consumes you.
5. When they take their first drink of you, god, after that you swell up again.
   Vāyu is the guardian of Soma. The moon is the model of the years.

6. Raibhī was (the female attendant) to be given along (with the bride), Nārāśaṃsī the in-dweller.
   Sūryā's auspicious garment goes adorned with a song.
7. Perception was the pillow, the eye was the adorning salve, Heaven and Earth were the bucket (seat), when Sūryā drove to her husband.
8. The praise songs were the crossbars, meter the veil and headdress.
   The Aśvins were the wooers of Sūryā and Agni was the leader.
9. Soma was the bridegroom; the Aśvins were both wooers, when Savitar gave Sūryā to her husband, as she pronounced (her vow) with her (whole) mind.
10. Mind was her wagon, and heaven was her canopy.
    The two glowing ones [=sun and moon] were the draft-oxen, when Sūryā drove to her (new) home.
11. Your two oxen, harnessed by verse and tune [/ṛc and sāman], went of one accord.
    The ear was your two wheels. The path to heaven meandered back and forth.
12. The two gleaming ones [=Heaven and Earth?] were your two wheels as you drove. Breath was hammered in as the axle.
    Sūryā mounted the wagon made of mind, as she went forth to her husband.
13. Sūryā's wedding proceeded, when Savitar set it going.
    In the Aghā's the cows are killed; in the two Arjunī's she is conveyed (to her new home).
14. When, o Aśvins, you two drove with a three-wheeled (chariot) to the wedding of Sūryā to ask for her, all the gods then gave assent to you two. The son Pūṣan chose you as his two fathers.
15. When you drove, you two lords of beauty, to Sūryā to woo her, where was your single wheel; where did you stand for the pointing out?
16. Your two wheels, o Sūryā—the brahmins know (them) according to their season.
    But the one wheel that is hidden—that just the experts know.

17. To Sūryā, to the gods, to Mitra and Varuṇa—those who are forethoughtful of creation—to them I have made this obeisance here.
18. First in front, then behind, these two roam by their magic power. As two playful children, they travel around their ceremonial course.
The one [=Sun] watches over all creatures; the other [=Moon] is born again (and again) as he portions out the seasons.
19. He becomes ever new as he is born; as beacon of the days he goes at the forefront of the dawns.
He portions out their share to the gods as he comes here. The Moon extends his lifetime long.

20. Lovely with kiṃśuka flowers, (made of) śalmali wood, having all forms, of golden color, well-turning, well-wheeled—mount, o Sūryā, the world of immortality. Make your wedding procession a comfortable place for your husband.
21. "Rise up from here, for this woman has a husband." I call on Viśvāvasu with reverence, with hymns.
"Seek some other girl sitting in (the house of) her father, adorned (for marriage) [/smeared (with menstrual blood)]. That is your share by nature. Know this."
22. "Rise up from here, Viśvāvasu." With reverence we invoke you.
"Seek some other burgeoning maiden. Send the wife to join with her husband."
23. Let the paths be straight and harmless to men, by which the comrades go to the wooing.
Aryaman and Bhaga should lead us all together. Let the united household be easy to hold fast, o gods.
24. I release you from the fetter of Varuṇa, with which well-disposed Savitar bound you.
In the womb of truth, in the world of the well-performed (sacrifice?) I place you unharmed along with your husband.
25. I release (her) from here, not from yonder. I have made her well bound yonder, so that, o Indra the rewarder, this woman here will have good sons, good fortune.
26. Let Pūṣan lead you from here, having taken you by the hand. Let the Aśvins convey you forth in their chariot.
Go to the house, so that you will be mistress of the house. Exerting your will you will announce the ceremonial distribution.
27. Here let your heart's desire be realized through children; here in this house be vigilant for the ruling of your household.
With this husband merge your body. Then (even) as an elderly couple you two will announce the ceremonial distribution.

28. It [=bride's garment] becomes dark red. [She=bride] becomes witchcraft, a noose. She is smeared (with blood).
    Her relatives are elated; her husband is bound in bonds.
29. Hand over the stained garment; to the brahmins parcel out the goods.
    She herself has become walking witchcraft: the wife enters her husband.
30. His body loses its splendor—glistening in that evil way—when the husband is about to put on his own member the "garment" of the bride.

31. The diseases from the people that follow after the glittering wedding procession of the bride, those let the gods worthy of the sacrifice lead back again whence they came.
32. Let highwaymen who lie in wait not find the married couple.
    Let them cross over the hard place by easy roads. Let hostilities run away.
33. Of good omen is this bride here: together approach her, behold her.
    Having given good luck to her, then scatter away home.

34. This is rough; this is sharp, barbed, poisonous: it is not for eating.
    The brahmin who would know Sūryā, only he deserves this thing associated with the bride(groom).
35. Carving up, carving open, and then cutting apart:
    behold the forms of Sūryā! But the brahmin makes them clean.

36. I grasp your hand for good fortune, so that with me as your husband you will reach old age.
    Bhaga, Aryaman, Savitar, Plenitude—(all) the gods—have given you to me for the ruling of the household.
37. Pūṣan, rouse her, most kindly disposed—(she) in whom humans scatter their seed,
    (she) who will willingly spread apart her thighs for us, (she) in whom we can willingly thrust our penis.
38. To you at first they conveyed Sūryā along with her wedding procession.
    Give the wife back to her husbands, Agni, along with progeny.
39. Agni has given the wife back, along with lifetime and luster, (to him) who as her husband will live, long-lived, through a hundred autumns.
40. Soma acquired (you) first; the Gandharva acquired (you) next.
    Agni was your third husband. The fourth was human-born.
41. Soma gave (her) to the Gandharva; the Gandharva gave (her) to Agni.
    Agni has given both wealth and sons to me, and also this woman here.

42. Stay just here, (you two); don't go apart. Attain your entire lifespan, playing with your sons and grandsons, rejoicing in your own house.

43. Let Prajāpati generate progeny for us. Let Aryaman anoint (you?) till old age.
    Without ill-omen enter the world of your husband. Be weal for our two-footed, weal for our four-footed.
44. Be free from the evil eye, not husband-smiting, kindly to the livestock, of good mind and good luster, hero-bearing, god-loving, comfortable. Be weal for our two-footed, weal for our four-footed.
45. Make this woman here, o Indra the rewarder, possessed of good sons and of good fortune.
    Confer ten sons on her: make her husband the eleventh.
46. Become sovereign queen over your father-in-law; become sovereign queen over your mother-in-law.
    Become sovereign queen over your sister-in-law, sovereign queen over your brothers-in-law.
47. Let all the gods jointly and jointly the waters anoint our two hearts.
    Together Mātariśvan, together the Disposer, together the Director—let them join us two together.

X.86 (912) Vr̥ṣākapi (Conversation of Vr̥ṣākapi Aindra, Indrāṇī, and Indra)

Indra (1, 8, 11–12, 14, 19–22), Indrāṇī (2–6, 9–10, 15–18), Vr̥ṣākapi Aindra (7, 13, 23) [per the Anukramaṇī]
23 verses: paṅkti

This dialogue hymn was called by Renou "the strangest poem in the R̥gveda" ("le poème le plus étrange du RV," 1956: 246). The three participants in the dialogue are Indra, his wife Indrāṇī, and his raffish monkey pal Vr̥ṣākapi, who is making sexual advances to Indrāṇī. The hymn contains startlingly explicit sexual discourse, as well as a dazzling array of apparent non-sequiturs, all embedded in an exaltation of Indra, signaled by its consistent refrain.

Not surprisingly its meaning and web of references have been the subject of much controversy; we cannot discuss the many conflicting interpretations here. However, in our opinion many of the puzzles can be solved if it is interpreted as an oblique treatment of the Aśvamedha (Horse Sacrifice) ritual, a royal ritual in which, according to the middle Vedic ritual texts, the chief queen copulates with the sacrificed horse to increase and magnify the power of the king, her husband. In this reading, the monkey represents the horse, with whom Indrāṇī must have sexual relations. She both indignantly rejects and also encourages Vr̥ṣākapi's advances in the course of the hymn, and after their ritual copulation she is called "wife of Vr̥ṣākapi" (vs. 13). The power of her husband Indra, the king, is extended by the performance of this ritual, though he has been, in effect, cuckolded. Hence the paradoxical announcement in verse 17, which proclaims the sexual "loser" the real master. For a detailed discussion of the hymn in the context of the Aśvamedha, see Jamison (1996a: 74–88).

The hymn begins with Indra's complaint that he is no longer receiving honor or soma, a statement echoed by his wife (vss. 1–2). The falling off of ritual observance sets the stage for the performance of an Aśvamedha, for Indra to regain his position. The topic then shifts to Vṛṣākapi (vss. 3–6), whose friendship with Indra is clearly a bone of contention between the married couple. Indrāṇī reveals in annoyance that he has made advances to her, but then, in a startling descent into vulgar speech, boasts of her own sexual prowess (vs. 6). Vulgarity is matched by vulgarity in Vṛṣākapi's first entry into the conversation (vs. 7), where he responds to her implicit invitation. These two verses may well verbally signal the sexual activity between them, the climactic moment of interspecies pairing that mimics the Aśvamedha. The next two verses (8–9), presumably spoken by Indra and Indrāṇī, may well be a humorous reflection of this intercourse, which may appear to Indra as spectator more like vexation than pleasure.

In our view, the next two verses (10–11) are spoken by the narrator, proclaiming Indrāṇī's important new ritual status, as the queen ensuring the life and prosperity of her husband Indra. (The Anukramaṇī assigns them to Indra.) Indra then laments the loss of his friend (vs. 12), who is going to the gods as sacrificial offering, but rejoices in the renewed sacrificial offerings he himself is receiving (vss. 13–14). In these verses he addresses his wife both as Indrāṇī ("wife of Indra," vs. 12) and Vṛṣākapāyī ("wife of Vṛṣākapi," vs. 13), for by her copulation with the monkey she became his temporary ritual wife. The narrator affirms the renewal of soma offering to Indra in verse 15, rectifying the lapse in ritual attentions noted in verse 1.

The two responsive verses that follow (16–17) are the heart of the hymn and the best support for and justification of the Aśvamedha. The first contains what would be a universally accepted truism: the sexually successful male is the master and has the power. But this is trumped by the paradoxical reversal: the sexually successful male does not have the power; it's the unsuccessful one who is master. This statement is beautifully applicable to the Aśvamedha: the king is cuckolded by a horse (or, in this case, a monkey) and is witness to this humiliating act, but the king also receives all the benefit from the ritual, which increases his power, while the sexual partner of the queen is sacrificed.

With this pair of verses the hymn has reached its high point and conveyed its message. The remaining verses are something of a letdown. The next five (vss. 18–22) are an extended pun, relating the yearlong journey of the horse/monkey before the sacrifice with its journey to the gods after its sacrifice. The final puzzling verse (23) superficially has nothing to do with the rest of the hymn, but relates a miraculous birth from the daughter of Manu, who has the speaking name "Rib." The deeper connection must be the explosive fertility that the performance of the Aśvamedha should confer on its participants. For discussion of this verse in an Indo-European context, see Watkins (2004).

The Aśvamedha is treated more directly in two hymns in Maṇḍala I, I.162 and 163.

1. [Indra:] "Because they have left off pressing (soma), they have stopped honoring Indra as god,
   (in the places) where my comrade Vr̥ṣākapi was getting high on the goodies of the stranger."
   – Above all Indra!
2. [Indrāṇī:] "But although, o Indra, you run away, beyond the wayward course of Vr̥ṣākapi, you do not find anywhere else for soma-drinking."
   – Above all Indra!
3. [Indra:] "What has this tawny beast Vr̥ṣākapi done to you—or to the thriving goods of the stranger—that you are jealous of him?"
   – Above all Indra!
4. [Indrāṇī:] "This dear Vr̥ṣākapi of yours that you protect, o Indra—the boar-hunting dog will snap at his ear."
   – Above all Indra!
5. [Indrāṇī:] "The monkey has spoiled my dear (well-)fashioned and decorated (private parts).
   I will break his head. I will not be easy-going for a bad actor."
   – Above all Indra!
6. [Indrāṇī:] "No woman has a better bottom than me or gives better sex.
   None is better at thrusting back than me, nor raises her thighs higher."
   – Above all Indra!
7. [Vr̥ṣākapi:] "Hey mama, you easy little lay, I get how it's, like, really gonna be.
   My bottom, mama, my thigh, my 'head' are gettin', like, excited."
   – Above all Indra!
8. [Indra:] "Why, o well-armed, well-fingered, broad-braided, broad-backsided one—why, o wife of a champion, do you vex our Vr̥ṣākapi?"
   – Above all Indra!
9. [Indrāṇī:] "This noxious creature has designs on me, as if I lacked a man [/hero].
   And I have a man [/hero]—with Indra as husband and the Maruts as companions."
   – Above all Indra!
10. Up till now the woman has (just) been accustomed to come down to the joint offering or to the festive gathering.
    Now she is magnified as the Adept of Truth, as one having a hero, with Indra as husband.
    – Above all Indra!

11. I have heard of Indrāṇī as (most) fortunate among these women.
for never, even in the future, will her husband die of old age.
– Above all Indra!
12. [Indra:] "O Indrāṇī, I find no pleasure without my comrade Vr̥ṣākapi, whose own dear watery oblation goes here and now to the gods."
– Above all Indra!
13. [Indra:] "O wife of Vr̥ṣākapi [=Indrāṇī], rich, having good sons and daughters-in-law, Indra will eat your oxen and the dear oblation that brings about whatever (you want)."
– Above all Indra!
14. [Indra:] "For they cook fifteen, twenty oxen at a time for me.
And I eat only the fat meat. They fill both my cheeks."
– Above all Indra!
15. Like a sharp-horned bull constantly roaring within the herd, the "stirred" (soma libation), which the one desiring prosperity presses for you, is weal for your heart, o Indra.
– Above all Indra!
16. [Indra:] "He is not master, whose penis hangs (limp) between his thighs.
He is master, for whose (penis) the hairy (vulva) gapes when it [=erect penis] has sat down."
– Above all Indra!
17. [Indrāṇī:] "He is not master, for whose (penis) the hairy (vulva) gapes when it [=erect penis] has sat down.
He is master, whose penis hangs (limp) between his thighs."
– Above all Indra!
18. O Indra, this Vr̥ṣākapi found a slaughtered ass, a knife, a basket, a new pot, and a wagon piled with firewood.
– Above all Indra!
19. [Vr̥ṣākapi:] "Here I go earnestly looking, distinguishing between Dāsa and Ārya.
(While) I drink (the offering) of the guileless presser, I kept looking for the wise."
– Above all Indra!
20. [Indra:] "Wasteland and chasm—how many yojanas (of distance) are they away (from here).
Vr̥ṣākapi, come home, to the nearer houses."
– Above all Indra!
21. [Indrāṇī:] "Come here again, Vr̥ṣākapi. We two will arrange easy passages (for you), who, as sleep-destroyer [/-attainer], go home again (to death) along the path."
– Above all Indra!

22. When, o Vr̥ṣākapi, o Indra, you (all) went upward toward home, where was this beast of many misdeeds, to whom did the effacer of men go?
    – Above all Indra!
23. Manu's daughter, Parśu ("Rib") by name, gave birth to twenty at once.
    (Good) fortune indeed was there for her whose belly (labor-pain) vexed.
    – Above all Indra!

X.87 (913) Agni Demon-Smiter

Pāyu Bhāradvāja
25 verses: triṣṭubh, except anuṣṭubh 22–25

A departure from the usual themes of Agni hymns (though quite reminiscent of the second half of I.36 and to a lesser extent X.118), this long hymn is entirely devoted to Agni as "demon-smiter" (rakṣohán), the first word of the hymn, and especially to his violent pursuit of "sorcerers" (yātudhā́na). The language is gleefully and creatively bloodthirsty, crediting Agni with a large arsenal of weapons, mostly based on the shape of his flames, and of means of violent destruction of the enemy (piercing, crushing, shattering, disemboweling, etc.). The vividness of the language is enhanced by the fact that, after the first verse, Agni is always addressed in the 2nd person and almost always with imperatives. (Only vss. 15 and 18 lack direct address to Agni, though he is lurking in the background. These two verses are also the only ones in which any other gods are allowed a part of the action.)

Agni's connection with ritual is barely mentioned in the hymn. In verse 1 the poet sprinkles him with ghee, addresses him, and kindles him, in order to ensure his protection, and in verse 4 it is made clear that the murderous power of Agni's weapons comes from the sacrifice and the associated ritual speech. That Agni's fierce and aggressive protection of us stems from our ritual behavior toward him should be kept in mind—though it must be admitted that the poet seems to forget this fact for long stretches of the hymn.

Lexical repetition and phonological figures, both simple and complex, are important features of the style of the hymn. To mention only one of the complex figures, the unusual participle sphūrjáyan "sizzling" (the only occurrence of this verb in the R̥gveda) in 11c is echoed phonologically by śaphārújam "hoof-breaking" in 12b (and to a lesser extent by dhū́rvantam "damaging" in 12d).

The sheer exuberance of the hymn is contagious, at least to its translators.

1. The demon-smiter—I besprinkle him as the prizewinner; I beseech him as Mitra [/an ally] for broadest shelter.
   Agni, sharpening himself, fully kindled according to (our) intentions—let him protect us from harm by day, let him by night.

2. Possessing jaws of metal, (first) brush the sorcerers with your flame, o Jātavedas, when fully kindled.
   (Then) with your tongue seize hold of those who have fools for gods. Having wrenched the flesh-eaters, stick them in your mouth.
3. You who have (teeth) in both, bring both jaws close together, the upper and the lower, as you sharpen (them), with murderous intent.
   Encircle (them) in the midspace, o king, and set upon the sorcerers altogether with your fangs.
4. Fitting your arrows to the bow with sacrifices, o Agni, and smearing their shafts along with their points with speech, with these pierce the sorcerers in the heart. Break their arms, turned against (us), in turn.
5. Agni, split the skin of the sorcerer. Let the murderous (arrow-)point smite him with its blaze.
   Cleave his joints, Jātavedas. When he is hewn apart, let the flesh-eater, craving his bloody flesh, open him up.
6. When now you see him standing still or moving about, o Agni Jātavedas, or flying along the paths in the midspace, as archer pierce him with your missile, sharpening it.
7. And, Jātavedas, with your spears recover what was seized, from the sorcerer who seized it.
   Constantly blazing in front, o Agni, smite him down. Let the mottled vultures that eat raw meat eat him.
8. Proclaim here, o Agni, whichever is the one who is the sorcerer who does this.
   Seize him with your firebrand, o youngest one. Make him subject to the eye of the one with his eye on men.
9. With your sharp eye, Agni, guard the sacrifice. Lead it forth to the east for the good (gods), o forethoughtful one.
   Let the sorcerers not deceive you, ever blazing against the demonic powers with your murderous intent, o you with your eye on men.
10. With your eye on men, look all over for the demonic among the clans. Shatter his three points.
    Agni, with your blaze cleave his ribs, and hew the root of the sorcerer into three parts.
11. Three times let the sorcerer who smites truth with untruth meet your onslaught, o Agni.
    Sizzling him with your flame, o Jātavedas, wrench him down for the singer before his very eyes.
12. O Agni, in the hoarse-voiced (singer) fix that eye with which you see the hoof-breaking sorcerer.
    Like an Atharvan fire-priest, with your divine light burn down the unobservant (sorcerer) who injures the true.

13. What today two opponents will utter as curses (at each another), o Agni, what harshness of speech those with hoarse voices will give birth to, what missile is born from the mind's fury, with that pierce the sorcerers in the heart.
14. Pound away the sorcerers with your heat; pound away the demonic with your blaze, o Agni.
    Pound away those who have fools for gods with your flame and away those who steal life, ever blazing against them.
15. Let the gods pound away the crooked man today, and let his harsh curses come back on him.
    Let their missiles reach the man thieving with speech at his vulnerable spot. Let the sorcerer meet the onslaught of every (god).
16. The sorcerer who anoints himself with the bloody flesh of men, who (does so) with horseflesh, who carries off the milk of the fertile cow—chop off their heads with your blaze, o Agni.
17. A year's worth of the milk of the ruddy cow: let the sorcerer not eat of that, o you with your eye on men.
    Whoever seeks to gorge himself on [/steal] the beestings, with your flame pierce him face-to-face in his vulnerable spot, o Agni.
18. Let the sorcerers drink cows' poison. Let those of evil ways be cut down before Aditi [/Innocence].
    Let the god Savitar hand them over. Let them be despoiled of their portion of plants.
19. From of old, Agni, you crush the sorcerers; demonic powers have never conquered you in battles.
    Burn up the flesh-eaters together with their roots [/with their fools (for gods)]. Let them not escape your divine lance.
20. Guard us from below and from above, Agni, from behind and from in front.
    Let these unaging, hottest (flames) of yours, ever blazing, burn against the man who speaks evil.
21. From behind, from in front, from below, and from above—as a poet with your poetic skill protect us all around, o king.
    O comrade, (protect) your comrade, as an unaging one (protect him to attain) old age. O Agni, as an immortal (protect) us who are mortal.
22. We would set you, the inspired poet, all around (us) as our fortress, o mighty Agni, displaying bold color every day, smiter of (the demonic powers) along with their wreckage—
23. With poison (smite) them along with their wreckage. Burn against the demons with your sharp flame, Agni, and with your spears with their scorching tips.

24. Burn against the pair of sorcerers, the two worm-eaters.
 I sharpen you, the undeceivable—awaken!—with my thoughts, o inspired poet.
25. Shatter his blaze with your blaze in all directions, o Agni.
 Break apart the strength of the demon sorcerer and his manliness.

X.88 (914) Sūrya and Vaiśvānara

Mūrdhanvant Āṅgirasa or Vāmadevya
19 verses: triṣṭubh

Two simultaneous superimpositions structure this hymn. On the one hand, the present-day sacrifice involving the establishment of the ritual fire and the pouring of oblations into it is contrasted with the primal production of the sacrificial fire by the gods. The present-day sacrifice begins (vs. 1ab) and ends (vs. 19) the hymn, and periodically surfaces throughout (vss. 3, 5, 14). However, the dominant strain is the primordial one, which begins in the second half of verse 1; the role of the gods in creating the original sacrifice and "begetting" the sacrificial fire is especially emphasized in verses 4 and the long sequence of 7–13, where the phrase "the gods begot" appears four times (vss. 8–10, 13), alongside similar expressions. This thematic strain is especially striking because the gods are also regularly identified as "worthy of the sacrifice" (vss. 3, 6, 11, 13; see also 5, where Agni is so called), that is, worthy of receiving the sacrifice, while they are in fact performing the sacrifice.

The other theme of superimposition is the identification of Agni, especially under the epithet Vaiśvānara "belonging to all men," with the sun. At first the sun's dependence on and complementarity with Agni is mentioned (vss. 1b, 2, 6): the sun only becomes visible and begins to shine when Agni is also visible. But the cosmos-filling radiance and heat of Agni (see vss. 3, 5, 7, 9) leads gradually to the premise that the gods created Agni as the sun, expressed clearly in verses 10–13. The poet then acknowledges Agni as the sun (vs. 14) and in enigmatic language describes the two paths between heaven and earth along which the sun / cosmic fire moves (vss. 15–16).

The last three verses (17–19) seem to provide a simultaneous transition from the cosmic and primordial elements in the superimposed structures to the present-day everyday—by way of a dialogue between two unnamed participants. Most interpreters (e.g., Geldner and Renou) identify the speakers as two priests, probably the Brahman and Hotar who are explicitly mentioned in the last pāda of the last verse (19d). But the words that introduce the speakers in verse 17, ávara and pára, are ambiguous. They can mean "nearer" and "farther" (referring to the positions of the priests on the sacrificial ground), but they can also mean "lower" and "upper" / "below" and "above," as derivatives of these words do in verse 14. In verse 17 they can therefore refer to cosmic elements. It is our view that in verse 17 the dialogue is first presented as a debate between Earth and Heaven (which appear at the end of vs. 15 as the defining poles of the cosmos) about their roles in sacrifice, but the dialogue participants unobtrusively become transformed into present-day priests.

The final verse anchors us firmly in the here-and-now of the sacrifice, but also asserts that as long as the morning fire will be kindled and the dawns will dawn, the sacrifice as we know it will be performed. This assertion may involve a bit of propaganda. The term brāhmaṇá as the technical designation of a priest appears in this verse; this term was only introduced in the late R̥gveda (as opposed to the earlier brahmán "formulator"), presumably as part of a codification and partial reorganization of the sacrificial system. The poet may then be claiming a long future for the new system, and implicitly suggesting its long history, stretching back to the origins of the world—cloaking a religious innovation in a garment of imagined tradition, as so often.

1. The oblation, the drink, unaging and delightful, has been poured into Agni, the one who finds the sun and touches heaven.
   For him to bear and support the world, the gods spread out (the world) by their autonomous power.
2. The world was swallowed and hidden away by darkness; (then) the sun became manifest when Agni was born.
   The gods, Earth and Heaven, and the waters and plants took pleasure in the fellowship of this one, of him.
3. Now urged on by the gods worthy of the sacrifice, I shall praise Agni, unaging and lofty, who with his radiance stretches through earth and this heaven, through the two world-halves and the midspace.
4. He who was the first Hotar, delightful to the gods, whom they anointed with melted butter upon choosing him (as priest), he made what flies and what goes (on foot), the still and the moving, to wax strong—Agni Jātavedas.
5. When, o Agni Jātavedas, you stood at the head of the world together with your light, we spurred you on with thoughts, songs, and recitations. You became worthy of the sacrifice as the one filling the two world-halves.
6. Agni becomes the head of the world by night; thence is the sun born, rising early in the morning.
   (Behold) this artful contrivance of those worthy of the sacrifice, that the swift one pursues his work, knowing the way.
7. He who shone brightly, beautiful to see in his greatness when fully kindled, the radiant one whose womb is in heaven—in him, in Agni did all the gods, the protectors of bodies, pour the oblation with well-spoken speech.

8. The gods first begot well-spoken speech, after that the fire [/Agni], after that the oblation.
   This became their sacrifice, the protector of bodies. That does Heaven know, that does Earth, that the waters.
9. The fire [/Agni] whom the gods begot, in whom all beings poured oblations, aiming straight, he heated earth and this heaven with his flame in his greatness.
10. For with a praise song, with their powers the gods begot in heaven the fire [/Agni] that fills the world-halves.
    And, for the sake of the world, they made him threefold. He ripens the plants of all forms.
11. When the gods worthy of the sacrifice set him in heaven as the Sun, the son of Aditi, when the wandering pair [=Sun and Moon?] came into existence, only after that did all living beings see in front of (them).
12. For the sake of the whole world the gods made Agni Vaiśvānara the beacon of the days.
    He who extends through the radiant dawns uncovers the darkness as he goes with his flame.
13. The gods, poets worthy of the sacrifice, begot unaging Agni Vaiśvānara, the primordial star, wandering but not confounding (the divine commandments), the mighty and lofty overseer of the wondrous apparition.
14. With mantras we address the poet Agni Vaiśvānara shining everywhere, the god who by his greatness encompasses the two wide (worlds) from below and from above.
15. I have heard from the forefathers that there are two routes, (that of) the gods and (that of) mortals.
    Along those two everything that moves goes together, whatever is between the father [=Heaven] and the mother [=Earth].
16. Conjoined, the two carry the one that wanders, born from the head, stroked by mind.
    He stands facing all beings: not keeping his distance, as, gleaming, he makes his transit.
17. When the lower [/nearer] one and the higher [/farther] one debate with each other, (they ask) "Of the two leaders of the sacrifice, which of us two knows it through and through?"
    Have our comrades been able to achieve joint revelry? Have they realized the sacrifice? Who can proclaim this here?
18. "How many fires are there and how many suns? How many dawns, and how many waters?
    O forefathers, I am not saying something two-faced to you: o poets, I am asking you in order to know."

19. For as long as the fine-feathered (mares [=flames?]) clothe themselves as if in the face of Dawn, o Mātariśvan, for that long the Brahmin establishes (the fire), approaching the sacrifice and taking his seat near to the Hotar.

X.89 (915) Indra

Reṇu Vaiśvāmitra
18 verses: triṣṭubh

The poet's patronymic links him to the Viśvāmitra clan of the IIIrd Maṇḍala, and indeed the final verse (18) is the Viśvāmitra refrain, found in many of the Indra hymns of III (III.30.22, etc.). The penultimate verse (17d) mentions the Viśvāmitras, though that half-verse seems to have been borrowed from the Bharadvājas (VI.25.9). The poet appears to take his legacy quite seriously, for the hymn strikes one as self-consciously old-fashioned, a well-crafted Indo-Iranian praise poem, celebrating Indra's high cosmogonic deeds in carefully balanced rhetoric and beginning classically with the 1st-person subjunctive announcement "I shall praise Indra" (índraṃ stavā). The poet has also inherited the verbal cleverness appropriate to a proper ṛṣi: his similes and figures of speech are aptly deployed, and he knows how to mislead his audience and withhold information for surprise effect. This particular skill is clearest in verse 5, which appears to continue the praise of Indra, until we encounter as the first word of the second hemistich sómaḥ, the real subject of the verse.

In the second part of the hymn, beginning in verse 8, we encounter another theme dear to the Indo-Iranians: the punishment to be meted out to those who break or play false to their alliances or have no alliances at all. The word mitrá "alliance, ally, deified Alliance," alone or in compounds, appears seven times in verses 8–15, and is, of course, an element of the poet's ancestral name. Indra is repeatedly urged to punish the transgressors on behalf of the gods whose task is to maintain the proper relationships among men, namely Mitra, Varuṇa, and Aryaman (see vss. 8–9). It is striking that, unlike in many Indra hymns, we don't simply call for Indra's aid in battle against whatever enemies oppose us; in this hymn our enemies are characterized as moral failures.

There is another way in which the poet appears to show his consciousness of his tradition—one that we might hesitantly call "intertextuality." In verse 14 the poet seems to be consciously citing, with some variation, the famous Indra-Vṛtra hymn I.32. He asks that after Indra's exercise of vengeance the enemies "will lie" in a certain way: pṛthivyā́ āpṛ́g amuyā́ śáyante "will lie there . . . in the (same) way (as) the embracer of the earth." It is difficult not to see this as a deliberate conflation of two famous phrases describing Vṛtra from I.32: 5d . . . śayata upapṛ́k pṛthivyā́ḥ "will lie as the embracer of the earth" and 8a . . . amuyā́ śáyānam "lying in that way." This quotation and conflation of phrases from a particular, and no doubt well-known, poem seem quite different from the standard formulaic variation of our traditional poets, and it is perhaps not surprising to encounter it in the Xth Maṇḍala, as the practice of traditional poetic composition was drawing to a close.

1. I shall praise Indra, the most manly, who by his greatness forced apart the realms of light, apart the ends of the earth, who, maintaining their boundaries, filled (them) in their expanses, projecting beyond the rivers in his greatness.
2. (As) the sun (turns) around the wide expanses, Indra should cause to turn here, like chariot wheels, the one [=the sun?] that like a busy surge never stands still. He has smashed the black shades of darkness with his flaring.
3. Chant to him in the same old way a new sacred formulation that never turns away, without equal on earth and in heaven—to Indra, who has distinguished the races of the stranger, like the (straight and crooked) backs (of horses), and need not seek (further for) a comrade.
4. For Indra I have raised my songs, (like) waters in restless surges from the depths of the sea, for him who propped asunder earth and heaven with his powers, like wheels with an axle.
5. He who provides battle fury in his drink, whose first impression is sharp, the boisterous, vehement one with his arrows, who possesses the silvery drink—
   Soma! All the bushes and trees have not deceived Indra as near-equivalents (of soma).
6. (To him [=Indra]), of whom neither heaven and earth, nor the dry land, nor the midspace, nor the mountains (are the equal), soma has flowed.
   When his battle fury is being drawn forth, he cleaves the hard and shatters the firm.
7. He smote Vr̥tra, like an axe the trees. He shattered the fortresses. He dug channels as if for rivers.
   He split the mountain, just like a new pot. Together with his own yokemates, Indra made the cows his own.
8. It's just you, Indra, who are the insightful requiter of debts. As a knife does joints, you cleave the crooked (ways of those) who violate the ordinances of Mitra and Varuṇa, as people violate a bound alliance.
9. Those of evil ways who transgress against Mitra [/an alliance] and against Aryaman, against agreements and against Varuṇa—grind your bulging bullish ruddy weapon of death down on those without alliance (to us), o bullish Indra.

10. Indra is master of heaven and Indra of earth, Indra of the waters and Indra of the mountains, Indra of the strong and Indra of the wise; Indra is to be called upon in peace and Indra in war.
11. Indra, the strong, projects beyond the nights and beyond the days, beyond the midspace and beyond the wellspring of the sea, beyond the spreading of the wind and beyond the end of the earth, beyond the rivers and beyond the settlements.
12. Like the beacon of the ever-blazing dawn, let your insatiable missile go rolling forth, Indra.
 Like a stone being launched from heaven, pierce with your hottest weapon those whose alliances are deceitful.
13. The months gave way to (him), the trees gave way, the plants gave way, the mountains gave way;
 the two world-halves eagerly gave way to Indra; the waters gave way to him as he was being born.
14. When will vengeance be yours, Indra, such that you will rend the demonic power of the evil one, which besets (us), and that those who bloody their allies will lie there like cows at slaughter, in the same way as (Vr̥tra), embracer of the earth?
15. Those who, seeking to rival us, have battered at us, being greatly arrogant and powerful, o Indra—let those without alliance (to us) keep company with blind darkness. The nights with their good lights should prevail over them.
16. Because the many soma-pressings of the peoples and the sacred formulations of the singing seers exhilarate you, heeding this common call, with your help drive nearby, across all (others) as they chant.
17. In just this way, Indra, might we know your new favors that bring benefits.
 And with your help, Indra, might we Viśvāmitras know this, as we sing just now at dawn.
18. – For blessing we would invoke bounteous Indra, most manly, at this raid, at the winning of the prize of victory, the strong one who listens, (we would invoke) for help in battles, him who smashes obstacles, the winner of prizes.

X.90 (916) Puruṣa

Nārāyaṇa
16 verses: anuṣṭubh, except triṣṭubh 16

This is one of the best-known and most influential hymns of the R̥gveda. Its central symbol is the púruṣa, the “man,” “person,” or “human being.” On the surface, this hymn tells of the sacrifice of a giant man, from whose parts the world was created. The theme of creation through a cosmic sacrifice is widespread, but this hymn is not simply the retelling of an ancient tradition. The púruṣa here serves as a symbol of the sacrifice itself, which especially in the middle Vedic tradition is a locus of creative power. The púruṣa is thus similar to the later divine figure Prajāpati, who in the Brāhmaṇas personifies the sacrifice. Indeed this late hymn represents a verse commentary on the sacrifice that prefigures the prose commentaries of the Brāhmaṇas. This hymn is also notable because it is the only R̥gvedic mention of the four varṇas, the hierarchical division of the social order that forms the theoretical basis for the caste system. One reason that the hymn may have been included in the R̥gveda to provide a R̥gvedic charter for such a division of society.

The identity of the Man and the sacrifice is established in the opening verse, for his thousand heads, eyes, and feet recall Agni, the sacrificial fire, and his macrocosmic equivalent, the Sun (cf. Brown 1931: 109–10). The Man comprehends the earth and extends beyond it. As Mus (1968: 549) has pointed out, the "ten-fingers' breadth" by which he exceeds the world measures from the Man's hairline to his mouth. The Man's mouth represents speech, which marks the boundary between the imperceptible world of thought and the perceptible world created by speech. His mouth is also associated with eating, and in verse 2 the Man rises beyond the world "through food," that is, by making the world his food. In later texts the "eater" is the master and the "eaten" is one who benefits the master (cf. Rau 1957: 34–35). The image may therefore reflect the Man's dominance over the world. See also X.125, in which the mouth is similarly both the locus of speech and the locus of eating.

This theme of dominance or rule continues also in verse 5 in the mutual generation of the Man and the Virāj. The word virā́j can mean either "brilliant" or "ruling, rule." The latter is the more likely sense here, and therefore this word connects the hymn to Vedic ideals of the king, who in his consecration encompasses the world in a similar way that the Man does here (Proferes 2007: esp. ch. 3). Since the term virā́j is grammatically feminine, it complements púruṣa, which is masculine in grammar and connotation.

The Man is the "offering" (vs. 6), the sacrificial victim (vs. 15), but more especially he is the sacrifice itself that the gods, the Sādhyas, and seers performed (vs. 7). Through this sacrifice the elements of subsequent sacrifices emerged: the "clotted-mixture" (vs. 8), the verses, chants, meters, and sacrificial formulae (vs. 9), and the sacrificial animals (vs. 10). The parts of the sacrifice also became the three upper varṇas (vss. 11–12): his mouth the brahmins, masters of knowledge and speech; his arms the rulers, the possessors of power; and his thighs the freemen or clansmen, who are the productive support of society. These three classes form parts of the sacrifice because they can participate in the sacrifice. The śūdras or "servants" are not part of the sacrifice but rather emerge from the feet of the Man, a symbol of their low social status and their exclusion from the sacrifice. Finally, the elements of the cosmos and gods themselves come forth from the sacrifice (vss. 13–14). This primeval sacrifice thus establishes the "first foundations" for the performance of the sacrifice or even for the ritual, social, divine, and visible worlds more generally (vs. 16ab), and it creates access to heaven (16cd).

The identity of the Sādhyas (in vss. 7 and 16) is not clear. Their name means "those to be brought to success," and they appear to be ancient sacrificers whose proper ritual performance has "perfected" them and who have attained god-like status or the status of gods.

1. The Man has a thousand heads, a thousand eyes, and a thousand feet.
   Having covered the earth on all sides, he extended ten fingers' breadth beyond.
2. The Man alone is this whole (world): what has come into being and what is to be.
   Moreover, he is master of immortality when he climbs beyond (this world) through food.
3. So much is his greatness, but the Man is more than this:
   a quarter of him is all living beings; three quarters are the immortal in heaven.
4. With his three quarters the Man went upward, but a quarter of him came to be here again.
   From there he strode out in different directions toward what eats and what does not eat.
5. From him the Virāj was born; from the Virāj the Man.
   Upon his birth, he reached beyond the earth from behind and also from in front.
6. When, with the Man as the offering, the gods extended the sacrifice, spring was its melted butter, summer its firewood, autumn its offering.
7. On the ritual grass they consecrated that sacrifice, the Man, born at the beginning.
   With him the gods sacrificed, (also) the Sādhyas and those who were seers.
8. From that sacrifice, when it was offered in full, the clotted-butter mixture was collected.
   It [=the sacrifice] was made into the animals: those of the air (and both) those that belong to the wilderness and those that belong to the village.
9. From this sacrifice, when it was offered in full, the verses and chants were born.
   Meters were born from it. The sacrificial formula—from it that was born.
10. From it horses were born and whatever animals have teeth in both jaws.
    Cows were born from it. From it were born goats and sheep.
11. When they apportioned the Man, into how many parts did they arrange him?
    What was his mouth? What his two arms? What are said to be his two thighs, his two feet?

12. The brahmin was his mouth. The ruler was made his two arms.
    As to his thighs—that is what the freeman was. From his two feet the servant was born.
13. The moon was born from his mind. From his eye the sun was born.
    From his mouth Indra and Agni, from his breath Vāyu was born.
14. From his navel was the midspace. From his head the heaven developed.
    From his two feet the earth, and the directions from his ear. Thus they arranged the worlds.
15. Its enclosing sticks were seven; the kindling sticks were made three times seven, when the gods, extending the sacrifice, bound the Man as the (sacrificial) animal.
16. With the sacrifice the gods performed the sacrifice for themselves: these were the first foundations.
    These, its greatness, accompanied (it) to heaven's vault, where the ancient Sādhyas and the gods are.

X.91 (917) Agni

Aruṇa Vaitahavya
15 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 15

This hymn is reminiscent of X.89 in style: a well-crafted, self-consciously rhetorical praise of the god utilizing standard tropes and traditional images. The poet of this hymn is especially fond of etymological figures (especially in the first few verses) and chaining between verses (note, e.g., vss. 8d/9a, 10/11).

The hymn covers many familiar themes, contrasting the physical fire (e.g., vss. 5–7) with the deified fire and his ritual roles, but it is the latter aspect of Agni that is dominant.

1. Awakening, he is kindled by the wakeful ones, the household master in the house, becoming refreshed in the footprint of refreshment, the Hotar of every oblation, worthy to be chosen, far-ranging, far-radiant, a good comrade to one who acts as comrade.
2. He, with beauty lovely to see, a guest in every house—in every (piece of) wood he is set like (a bird) of swooping pursuit in the woods.
   Belonging to the people, he does not overlook any people. Belonging to the clan, he dwells among the clans—each and every clan.
3. Very skillful through your skills, through your will you are strong-willed. O Agni, you are the all-knowing poet through your poetic craft.
   As good one, you alone hold sway over goods, which both Heaven and Earth foster.

4. Foresightful, o Agni, you have settled down seasonably to your ghee-rich womb, in the footprint of refreshment.
   Your arrivals show brightly like those of the dawns, your reins spotless like the rays of the sun.
5. Your beauties, brilliant like the lightning flashes of a rain-bearing (cloud), show brightly like the beacons of the dawns, when, set loose toward the plants and woods, you encompass them yourself as food in your mouth.
6. The plants conceived him as their embryo at the proper season; the waters as his mothers begot this Agni.
   Both the woody (plants) and the sprouts (become) pregnant and give birth to him who is just the same everywhere.
7. When whipped up by the wind, aroused, you spread yourself out, constantly worrying the dry food at will, your unaging troops [=flames] take up their places separately like charioteers, as you go burning, Agni.
8. Creator of wisdom, furtherer of the rite, Agni, the Hotar, best encompassing thought, just him at the small oblation, just the same for the great one—just him they choose—no other than you.
9. Just you do they choose here—the ritual adepts devoted to you—as Hotar at the rites, o Agni, when seeking the gods they provide pleasurable offerings for you—the men with their oblations, with their twisted ritual grass.
10. Yours, Agni, is the office of Hotar; yours that of Potar in its turn; yours that of Neṣṭar; you are the Agnidh [=fire-kindler] of the one who follows truth.
    Yours is the office of Praśāstar; you act as Adhvaryu; you are both the Brahman-priest and the Houselord in our home.
11. The mortal who for you, the immortal, o Agni, will perform pious work with the kindling stick or by the preparation of the oblation, for him you become the Hotar; his mission do you undertake. You speak on his behalf; you perform sacrifice, you act as Adhvaryu for him.
12. These here—the thoughts, speeches, verses, songs, and good praises from us—have come together for him, for Jātavedas the good one—goods-seeking (praises) in which he will take pleasure as their strengthener, though they are (already) strong.
13. I would proclaim this good praise here, a newer one, to him, the age-old, who is eager for it: let him hear us.
    May it come very close, to touch his heart, like an eager wife, richly dressed, to her husband.

14. (For him) into whom horses, bulls, oxen, mated cows, rams, once released, are poured out [=offered], for the kīlāla-drinker who has soma on his back, for the ritual adept I generate with my heart a pleasing thought—for Agni.
15. An oblation has been poured into your mouth, Agni, like ghee into a ladle, like soma into a cup.
    Place in us prize-gaining wealth, rich in heroes, celebrated, glorious, lofty.

X.92 (918) All Gods

Śāryāta Mānava
15 verses: jagatī

A generally disorganized and often puzzling hymn, it nonetheless begins with three well-turned verses to Agni, using some of the same lexicon and imagery as the preceding Agni hymn. This initial similarity may account for the placement of the hymn in the maṇḍala. Two Agni verses also close the hymn (14–15) in a ritual context.

What lies between seems to lack structure and logical progression. Some verses contain an odd assortment of divinities and semi-divinities (e.g., vss. 4–5, 11–13); Rudra and/or the Maruts recur in several verses (5–6, 9). Fragments of familiar myths appear without further development—for example, Indra's interference with the horses of the Sun in verse 8—and other verses contain apparent references to other stories of which we know nothing (e.g., vs. 10). In short, despite some pleasing passages, the hymn mostly yields frustration.

1. (I invoke) for you the charioteer of the sacrifice, the clanlord of clans, the Hotar, the guest by night, rich in radiance.
   Blazing in the dry (sticks), flickering in the golden (plants), the bullish beacon, worthy of the sacrifice, has reached heaven.
2. This one here, who drinks directly, have both (sides [=gods and men]) made their own: Agni the supporter, the furtherer of the rite.
   The dawns kiss the youthfully exuberant one like the night, the one set in front, the descendant of himself, of ruddy (fire).
3. Yes indeed! we discriminate between his counsels and those of a niggard. Twigs have been bepoured for his eating.
   When the fearsome ones [=Aṅgirases] reached immortality, just after that did they pay tribute to the divine race.
4. For heaven, the broad expanse, is the trajectory of truth. (There there is) Reverence and great Devotion, the very admirable.
   (There) Indra, Mitra, Varuṇa perceive with like mind, and Bhaga and Savitar—(all) possessing refined skill.

5. The rivers go forth with the journeying Rudra; across great Devotion they have run—those with which the earth-circling one [=Parjanya?], going around the broad expanse, constantly rumbling in his belly, besprinkles everything.
6. Busy are the Rudras, the Maruts belonging to all communities, the falcons of heaven, nestlings of the lord.
   Through them Varuṇa, Mitra, Aryaman make their observations, and Indra hastening with the hastening gods.
7. Having labored to exhaustion, they have obtained their benefit in Indra, in the sight of the sun, and in the masculine nature of the bull—the bards [=Aṅgirases?] who fashioned as his due the mace, his yokemate, at the sessions [=sacrifices] of men.
8. He [=Indra] brought to a halt even the golden (horses) of the Sun, his very own. Anyone feels fear before Indra the stronger, before the snorting from the belly of the fearsome bull. Day after day the victorious one thunders, unrepellable.
9. With reverence show forth your praise today to Rudra the skillful, who rules over heroes,
   (and to those [=Maruts]) with whom he, the well-disposed, very helpful, self-glorious one, keeps company—with those of heaven who travel their ways, the avid ones.
10. Because they disseminated their fame to their progeny—Bṛhaspati, the bull, and those akin to Soma—the first Atharvan (priest) distributed it through sacrifices. The gods and the Bhṛgus perceive with like mind through their skills.
11. For Heaven and Earth of abundant seed, Narāśaṃsa, the four-square, Yama, Aditi, god Tvaṣṭar, treasure-giver, the masters of the Ṛbhus, Rodasī [/the two World-Halves], the Maruts, Viṣṇu are deserving.
12. And of us, the fire-priests, our sage poet [=Agni?] (is) widely (perceptible). Let Ahi Budhnya listen to his call;
    let Sun and Moon, the heaven dwellers wandering separately. O you two Nahuṣī [=Manu and Nahus?], through visionary thought and ritual labor take cognizance of this one.
13. Let Pūṣan, belonging to the All Gods, let the Child of the Waters, let Vāyu help us forward to seek our movable (goods=livestock).
    Chant to Vāta, the lifebreath, all the more. O Aśvins, easy to invoke, hear this on your journey.
14. Him who presides over these fearless clans, the self-glorious one, we hymn with hymns;
    Aditi without assault, along with all the Wives (of the Gods), and the youthful lord of the night (do I?), the manly minded, (hymn).

15. Here crackles the foremost Aṅgiras [=Agni] from birth. The pressing stones, aloft, look upon the ceremony, (those stones) by which the wide-gazing (soma) became widely extended. The (livestock) pen is well-grounded, the axe in the wooden (tree).

X.93 (919) All Gods

Tānva Pārtha
15 verses: prastārapaṅkti, except anuṣṭubh 2–3, 13, paṅkti? 9, nyaṅkusāriṇī 11, purastādbṛhatī 15 [per Anukramaṇī]

Even more so than the previous hymn, X.92, this hymn to the All Gods poses more challenges to the interpreter than it yields rewards. This opinion seems to be almost universally shared (see, e.g., Geldner, Renou, Gonda [1975: 212]), and it is generally agreed that some of the problems may be due to faulty transmission.

The poem is composed in a variety of meters, with verses of mixed twelve/eleven- and eight-syllable pādas, at least in principle—though often these pādas do not conform, by syllable count, caesura, or cadence quantities, to their models. (On the meter see Oldenberg 1888: 101, 117.) The syntax of the hymn is also quite sketchy, with many verbs missing and with nominal forms often apparently merely juxtaposed rather than being linked by normal case relations, and the identity of the referents in many verses is obscure.

The reasons for the choice of the gods honored and their sequence are also not clear. The hymn begins with a verse to Heaven and Earth, who recur in verse 10. Verses 2–3 treat the gods in general, while verse 4 begins to name names, starting with the Ādityas. The next three verses (5–7) form a relatively well-organized unit, with a focus on the Aśvins and a shared opening (utá naḥ "and us"). The end of verse 7 provides a transition to verse 8, with the Ṛbhus and their master, Indra, who also appears in verses 9 and 11. The poet summarizes his poem in verse 12 (with more pride than we would perhaps allow him). Verses 13–15 constitute a dānastuti, mentioning a number of patrons. Note that the name that the Anukramaṇī supplies for the poet has simply been extracted from the name(s) of one or more patrons in verse 15.

1. Become greatly wide, o Heaven and Earth; the two world-halves are always like exuberant young women for us.
With these (gods?) protect us from one more powerful; with them protect us when (he is) swollen with strength.
2. At every sacrifice that mortal honors the gods who, of longest fame, seeks to entice them here with benevolent thoughts.

3. O you who have control over them all, the shield of the gods is mighty, for they all possess all might; all are worthy of the sacrifice at the sacrifices.
4. The kings of immortality are gladdening: Aryaman, Mitra, Varuṇa, and the Earth-Encircler [=Wind?]— and what about Rudra praised of men?—the Maruts, Pūṣan, Bhaga.
5. And for us by night (and by day), o you two of bullish goods [=Aśvins], the Sun and Moon are our joint guides toward the seat of the waters, when in company with them Ahi Budhnya [/the Serpent of the Deep] has been set in the depths.
6. And for us let the two gods, the Aśvins, lords of beauty, let Mitra and Varuṇa make broad space through their domains.
He hastens toward great riches, across difficulties as if across wastelands.
7. And to us let the Aśvins, though Rudras, be merciful—and all the gods, the Lord of the Chariot, Bhaga, R̥bhu, Vāja, o Masters of the R̥bhus, the Earth-Encircler, o you who afford all possessions.
8. Craftsmanly is the Master of the R̥bhus [=Indra]; craftsmanly is the exhilarating drink of the one who does honor—(let) your two prizewinning fallow bays (come) hither, as you speed—of the one whose melody is also difficult to surpass, (whose) separate sacrifice is like (a sacrifice) stemming from Manu.
9. Make for us immoderation (of wealth), god Savitar. I will praise (you?) in company with our patrons.
Along with his draft-horses, Indra keeps hitching up (wealth) for these (patrons) of ours and keeps hold of "the wheel of the domains" like a rein.
10. On them, o Heaven and Earth, confer great fame reaching to all domains, and on the heroes among us, (and confer) strengthening nourishment for the winning of the prize, strengthening nourishment for victory through wealth.
11. O Indra, inclined toward us, (come?) to this laudation, wherever it may be, for our dominance, mighty one.
Always protect (us) for our dominance. Let our acquisition fatten, o good one.
12. This praise of mine for the superior men, the praise whose course is dazzling as if by its stretching to the sun, they have strengthened, as a carpenter strengthens a horse-"conciliator" [=piece of horse tack?], (so) it cannot be budged.
13. They whose (priestly gift) comes rolling, their (priestly gift) is golden, yoked with wealth—(it is) like manly forces when facing the other side, like one whose ends have been accomplished [?] at will.

14. I proclaim this in front of Duḥśīma, Pr̥thavāna, Vena, in front of Rāma the lordly, in front of the patrons who, having yoked five hundred, (sent) them along the path, destined for us, (so that) their (priestly gift) has become widely famed.
15. In addition here and now seven and seventy at once did Tānva assign (to us), at once did Pārthya assign, at once did Māyava assign.

X.94 (920) Pressing Stones

The snake Arbuda Kādraveya
14 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 5, 7, 14

This second hymn to the pressing stones (for the relations among the three pressing-stone hymns, see the introduction to X.76) is a playful and imaginative praise of these implements for extracting the soma juice from the plant. The stones are animatized throughout—as human workers, as hungry bulls, as birds, as antelopes, as horses. But there is special emphasis on them as speakers. The first four verses begin with "speaking" verbs (and often continue with them), with a variant phrase beginning verse 5, and the last two verses (13–14) echo these verbs. These last two verses treat the unhitching of the stones, their task completed, and the last pāda of verse 14 rather poignantly not only releases them but de-animatizes them: they are now perceived as just stones.

1. Let them speak forth; let us speak forth. Speak a speech to the pressing stones that are speaking, when, o stones, o mountains, all together you swift ones possessed of soma bear your signal-call, your cry to Indra.
2. They speak as if in hundreds, in thousands. They roar with their golden mouths.
Having toiled at their good work, the good workers, the stones, have achieved the eating of the oblation even before the Hotar.
3. They speak; in this way they found the honey. They growl over the cooked flesh.
Gnawing at the branch of the reddish tree, the gluttonous bulls have bellowed out to it.
4. They speak loftily by reason of the delighting delightful (soma). Shrieking to Indra, in this way they found the honey.
(Fit) to be clasped by the sisters [=fingers], the clever ones have danced, making the earth heed with their trampling.
5. The eagles have raised their speech up to heaven. In their lair the black antelopes have danced vigorously.

Down they go downward to the rendezvous with the lower one. They have themselves produced much semen from the sun-bright one.

6. Like powerful draft(-horses), they have held fast, yoked together, the bulls bearing the chariot-poles.
   When panting and gulping they have bellowed, their snorting sounds like that of chargers.
7. To those who possess ten tracks, ten girthbands, ten yoking cords, ten yokes, ten reins—sing to the unaging ones pulling ten chariot-poles, ten yoked ones [=fingers?].
8. These swift stones have ten fastening straps. Their delightful harness encircles (them).
   They have taken as their share the beestings of the pressed somian stalk of the first plant.
9. The soma-eaters kiss the two fallow bays of Indra. Milking the plant, they sit on the cow(hide).
   Having drunk the somian honey milked by them, Indra grows strong, spreads out, plays the bull.
10. Your plant is a bull. You will certainly not suffer harm. You are always possessed of nourishment, (well-)fed.
    You are pleasing to him whose ceremony you have enjoyed because of your grandeur, as if because of a richly endowed (daughter, given to him in marriage?), o pressing stones.
11. Drilled or undrilled, you stones are unwearying, unslackened, immortal, unailing, unaging, unbudgeable, very stout, unthirsty, unthirsting.
12. Firmly fixed are your fathers [=mountains] in every age. Desirous of repose, they do not hitch themselves up from their seat.
    Undecaying, companions of the golden (soma), (like) golden trees, they have made Heaven and Earth listen by their bellowing.
13. Just so do the stones speak at their unhitching, *or on their course they speak with their tramplings—the stones as they drink (the soma) directly.
    Like grain-producers [=farmers/millstones] strewing seed, strewing their “seed” [=semen] they engorge the soma. They do not diminish him though they gnaw at him.
14. When (the soma) was pressed in the ceremony they raised their voice, like playful (boys) jostling their mother.
    Unhitch (the stones) that have pressed it and release the inspired thought of the (priest) who has pressed it. Let them roll away, being (now) perceived as (just) stones [/the stones no longer being held in harness].

X.95 (921) Purūravas and Urvaśī

Dialogue between Purūravas Aiḍa and Urvaśī
18 verses: triṣṭubh

This very famous and much-discussed hymn contains the dialogue between the Apsaras Urvaśī and her discarded mortal husband Purūravas. He accosts her on her journey (presumably back to her fellow Apsarases) and demands that they discuss what went wrong with their marriage (vs. 1). He reminisces about her beauty (vs. 3) and her good wifely ways (vs. 4), while she impatiently dismisses him (vs. 2) and provides her own view of her service as wife (vs. 5). The next verses (6–11) primarily concern the crowd of Apsarases who attended Urvaśī when she gave birth to her and Purūravas's son Āyu. Purūravas evinces some jealousy about (as well as some physical attraction to) these females with whom he competed for Urvaśī's attention and to whom she is returning, while Urvaśī here implies that Purūravas should have his mind on more manly matters than love, such as military protection (esp. vss. 7 and 11; see also the ironic vocative "hero" in 5).

Urvaśī attempts to dismiss Purūravas again (vs. 11). He tries another tack to keep her from leaving: how can she separate him from his loving son (vs. 12)—to which she briskly replies that she'll send him the kid, chillingly referred to in the neuter, back to him (vs. 12). The second half of this verse forms a ring with the second half of verse 2, her first speech: she seems thus to be trying to bring the conversation to a close. But Purūravas raises the stakes: with masterfully expressed self-pity he then suggests that he may disappear or die (and won't she be sorry then…?, vs. 14). Urvaśī wearily talks him out of it (vss. 15–16). He tries one more time (vs. 17), using a grander and more solemn linguistic register. The hymn ends with a somewhat enigmatic summary verse (18) containing the gods' address to Purūravas at the end of this affair. Because Purūravas's connection with the immortal Apsaras (note that Apsarases are called "immortal" in vs. 9) was severed and his son was returned to him, the mortal, he is bound to death, and his offspring will relate to the gods as mortals do, by sacrifice. But he will nonetheless later receive a joyous afterlife in heaven. (It is noteworthy that this is the only occurrence of the word svargá "heaven" in the R̥gveda.)

One of the many extraordinary features of this brief masterpiece is the way it replicates the shifting emotional logic, the abrupt changes of tone and subject, and the twisting of the other's words characteristic of a genuine marital quarrel of whatever era and culture, while presenting us with pictures of great beauty, however difficult the language is to interpret in many places. It is also uncompromising in its depiction of a resolute and hard-hearted female, unmoved by the abject pleas and emotional blackmail of her former lover who is still in love with her, anxious to return to her carefree life with her fellow Apsarases, and happy enough to abandon her child in order to get free.

There are several well-known later versions of this story. The Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa XI.5.1 embeds many of the R̥gvedic verses into a prose narrative, which seems to have misunderstood, deliberately or not, several of the crucial verses. And one of the three surviving plays of the great Classical Sanskrit poet Kālidāsa is a much expanded treatment of the pair's love affair. No subsequent version can tolerate the radical portrait of the emotionally detached Urvaśī found in the R̥gveda; in all cases the separation of the former lovers is not the result of the female's decision, but of a curse. In the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa, a creative misreading of verse 3—involving bleating pet lambs tied to a bedpost, a thunderstorm, and the provision that Urvaśī never see Purūravas naked—results in Urvaśī's disappearance. In Kālidāsa's play the curse has no connection to anything in the R̥gvedic hymn: a love-besotted Urvaśī brings it on herself by uttering her beloved Purūravas's name at the wrong time. (In both versions the portrayal of Purūravas does retain his own passion for Urvaśī; in fact in Kālidāsa's play he goes mad after she disappears and asks birds, beasts, and trees, in the late Middle Indo-Aryan language variety Apabhraṃśa, about her whereabouts.) It is an interesting commentary on the changing fortunes of female figures that the hard edges of the R̥gvedic Urvaśī must be softened to make her acceptable in later literature.

1. [Purūravas:] "Woe, wife! Thoughtfully—stand still, fearsome woman!— let us two now exchange words.
   These thoughts, if unuttered, will not bring us joy even on a distant day."
2. [Urvaśī:] "What shall I do with this speech of yours? I have marched forth, like the foremost of the dawns.
   Purūravas—go off home again. I am as hard to attain as the wind."
3. [Purūravas:] ". . . as an arrow from the quiver of beauty, a shot winning cows, as a charge winning hundreds.
   Under the will of no man, she will keep flashing forth like (lightning); like a lamb its bleating, so are her tumultuous (tempests) displayed."
4. [Purūravas:] "She was (always) imparting energy, a good thing, to her father-in-law—every dawn, whenever he wants it, from the house opposite.
   She attained a home in which she took pleasure; day and night she was pierced by my rod."
5. [Urvaśī:] "Three times a day you used to pierced me with your rod, and you 'filled it up' [=had an erection] for me, who did not seek it.
   Purūravas, I followed your will. You were then the king of my body, you 'hero.'"
6. [Purūravas:] "The beautifully glowing rank (of Apsarases), friends in good favor, interlaced like a pond's-eye [=lotus], (always) on the move—these flowed like reddish salves; like milk-cows they bellowed for beauty."
7. [Urvaśī:] "When this one [=the son of Purūravas and Urvaśī] was being born, the women were in attendance, and the rivers, gurgling to themselves, strengthened him, (just) as for great battle, for the smiting of Dasyus, the gods made you strong, Purūravas."

8. [Purūravas:] "When I, a human, drew near to those nonhuman women when they were taking off their robes, like a shy antelope they shied away from me, like horses that have brushed against a chariot."
9. [Urvaśī:] "When a mortal, going to caress immortal women, mingles (with their bodies) amid their cries, as if by his intentions, like ducks they preen their own bodies, like horses playful and constantly nipping."
10. [Purūravas:] "She who in her flight kept flashing like lightning, the watery (maiden) bringing me the delights of love—
(a son) belonging to men, nobly born, was born from the water—Urvaśī extends Āyu his lifetime long."
11. [Urvaśī:] "You were born just so: to afford protection. (But instead) you have exerted this force on me, Purūravas.
I, knowing, instructed you on that very day. You did not listen to me. Why will you speak without profit?"
12. [Purūravas:] "When will my begotten son seek his father? (When) will he let a tear roll like a wheel, on recognizing (him [=his father])?
Who keeps apart a married couple joined in mind as long as the fire will (still) blaze in (the house of) the parents-in-law?"
13. [Urvaśī:] "I'll give him an answer when he lets his tear roll. Like a wheel he screeches for kindly care.
I will send it [=child] to you, that thing of yours that's with us. Go away home. For you will not attain me, you fool."
14. [Purūravas:] "And if the gods' pet should fly away today, never to return, to go to the most distant distance…
Then he might lie in the lap of Dissolution. Then again the ravening wolves might eat him…"
15. [Urvaśī:] "O Purūravas, don't die. Don't fly away. Don't let the unkindly wolves eat you.
There exist no partnerships with women: they have hyenas' hearts."
16. [Urvaśī:] "When in different form I roamed among mortals and spent the nights (with you?) for four autumns, once a day I ate a drop of ghee. Just from that I continue to be sated now."
17. [Purūravas:] "She who fills the midspace, who is the measurer of the dusky realm, Urvaśī—I, the best (of men?), seek to bring her under my sway.
Since the granting of a good deed will stand you in good stead, turn back: my heart is scorched."
18. Thus these gods here say to you, Aiḍa [=Purūravas]: "As it (turned out) this way, you have a bond to death.
Your progeny will sacrifice to the gods with an oblation, but you will also rejoice in heaven."

X.96 (922) Praise of Indra's Horses

Baru Āṅgirasa or Sarvahari Aindra
13 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 12–13

Like III.44 the design of this hymn is an extended pun between the words hári/hárita "gold-colored, tawny" (used regularly for soma and for Indra's "fallow bay" horses) and the verb hárya "enjoy" and its derivatives. As in III.44 we have rendered the former as "golden," even in reference to the horses, and the latter as "gladden(ing)," as a close English equivalent of this play on words. A subsidiary pun is persistent through the hymn, involving the golden mace and the golden soma (see, e.g., vs. 3); the referent of the adjective is often not expressed, and the audience is free to fill in either or both. The context often allows either, and since they are identical in gender, there is no grammatical obstacle. Similar ambiguity is found between the golden horses and the golden soma (e.g., vs. 10). In other verbal twists the "wrong" qualifier is used, but the underlying pun evokes the "right" one. Thus in verse 4 the "gladdening" mace is compared to the sun, which should really be "golden."

1. I proclaim your two golden (horses) at the great rite of distribution.
   I prevail over the gladdening, exhilarating drink for you who are eager for it, the drink which, like ghee, drips with golden (drops). Let the songs enter you, whose form is golden.
2. For those who have cried out together toward the golden womb are the ones spurring on the two golden (horses) toward it as toward a heavenly seat.
   (To him) whom they fill with golden (soma drops) as milk-cows do with golden (drops of ghee)—to Indra chant a fortifying (hymn), accompanied by golden (soma).
3. This is his gold-colored mace, which is made of metal. The golden (mace/soma) is eager; the golden one is in his two fists.
   Brilliant and fair-lipped is he who has as the missile of his battle fury the golden (mace/soma). The golden forms are fixed fast in Indra.
4. Like the beacon in heaven [=sun], the gladdening (mace) has been set in place; the (golden) mace will take wide compass like a golden (racehorse) with its charge.
   The golden-lipped (mace), which is made of metal, thrust against the serpent. The bearer of the golden (mace) became thousand-flamed.
5. It was just you who were gladdened when you were praised by the ancient sacrificers, o golden-haired Indra.
   You are glad (now): yours is every bounty, complete and gladdening, worthy to be hymned, o golden-born one.

6. These two gladdening golden (horses) convey in his chariot the mace-bearing, exhilarating, praiseworthy Indra in his exhilaration.
   For him who is glad for the many soma-pressings, for Indra, the golden soma juices have run.
7. Sufficient for his desire, the golden ones have run; the golden ones spur on the surpassing pair of golden (horses) for the steadfast one.
   Who speeds as he pleases with his golden steeds, he has attained his desire that provides the golden (soma).
8. Golden-bearded, golden-haired, made of metal, who, drinking the golden (soma), has grown strong on the drink of surpassing, who with his golden steeds, rich in prizewinning mares, will deliver his two golden (horses) beyond all difficult ways, 9. Whose golden lips, which are like two (golden) spoons, have flown apart, as he sets his two lips to twitching for the prize, when, after the cup is done, he will groom his two golden (horses), upon drinking of the exhilarating drink, the gladdening stalk.
10. And the seat of the gladdening (soma) is in both dwelling places. The possessor of golden (horses/soma) has roared toward the prize like a racehorse.
    Because even the great (Earth), the Holy Place, was gladdened by your might, you took on lofty vigor—yourself also gladdening.
11. You, being gladdened, (filled) the two world-halves with your greatness. You now become glad at every new dear thought.
    O lord, reveal forth to the golden sun the gladdening dwelling place of the cow.
12. Let the advance teams of the peoples convey you here in your chariot—you, the golden-lipped, in your gladness, o Indra, so that you will drink of the honey that is offered, finding gladness in the ten-armed sacrifice at the joint revelry.
13. You have drunk of the earlier soma-pressings, o possessor of the golden (horses/soma), and this pressing here is yours alone.
    Find exhilaration in the honeyed soma, Indra. Rain it utterly into your belly, o bull.

X.97 (923) Plants

Bhiṣaj Ātharvaṇa
23 verses: anuṣṭubh

Atharvan in character, this hymn is addressed to the healing plants, which are praised for their lineage and their powers and implored to provide remedies for particular sick men. The 1st-person speaker is presumably not merely the poet but also the healer, and he calls on the plants to lend their power to his verbal healing spells (see esp. vs. 14).

1. The plants that were born earlier, the third generation before the gods—
   I shall now call to mind the one hundred and seven forms of those brown (plants).
2. One hundred are the forms of you all, o mother, and a thousand are your shoots.
   So then, o you all who possess a hundred strategies, make this (man) here to be free of disease for me.
3. Rejoice, o plants, since you are blooming and fruitful.
   Like victorious mares, the sprouts deliver.
4. O mothers, called "plants," o goddesses, I implore you in this way:
   "Might I gain a horse, a cow, a garment, (in gaining [=curing]) your very self, o man."
5. Your seat is in the aśvattha-tree; your nest is made in the parṇa-tree:
   you will surely get a share in the cow when you will gain [=cure] the man.
6. When the plants have come together, like kings at an assembly, that inspired poet is said to be a healer who smites the demons and banishes affliction.
7. The "horse possessor," the "soma-possessor," the "strengthener," the "overpowering one"— all these plants have I acquired for this (man) here not to be harmed.
8. The unbridled forces of the plants rise up like cows from the cowpen as they seek to gain the stake and your very self, o man.
9. Your mother is the "Restorer" by name, and you all are "Expellers."
   You are streambeds [=stalks] with wings [=leaves]. You expel what causes affliction.
10. They have stepped over the fences like a thief over a barricade.
    The plants have driven forth whatever malady of the body there is.
11. When I take these plants in my hand, invigorating them, the very self of the sickness perishes, as if before being captured alive.
12. Him whose every limb, every joint you slither over, from him thrust aside the sickness, like a mighty (man) lying in the middle.
13. Fly forth, o sickness, together with the cāṣa-bird and the kikidīvi-bird.
    Perish together with the swoop of the wind and together with the blizzard [?].
14. Let one of you help the other. Give help to one another.
    All of you, being in agreement—help this speech of mine.
15. Those that bear fruit and those without fruit, those without flowers and those that have flowers—impelled by Bṛhaspati, let them release us from distress.

16. Let them release me from (the shackle) of a curse, and also from (the shackle) of Varuṇa, and from the shackle of Yama—from every offense against the gods.
17. Flying down from heaven, the plants spoke:
 "The man whom we will reach (while he is still) alive, that man will not suffer harm."
18. The many plants, having a hundred appearances, whose king is Soma—of those you are the highest—sufficient for our desire, weal for our heart.
19. You plants whose king is Soma, spread wide along the earth—impelled by Bṛhaspati, jointly give heroic power to this one here [=medicinal plant].
20. Let your digger not suffer harm, nor him for whom I dig you.
 Let our two-footed and four-footed all be free of affliction.
21. Both those who hear this nearby and those who have gone far into the distance — all of you, having coming together, o sprouts—jointly give heroic power to this one here [=medicinal plant].
22. The plants come to an agreement with King Soma:
 "For whom the brahmin acts, him, o king, will we deliver."
23. You are the highest, o plant. The trees are your subordinates.
 Let him be subordinate to us, whoever assails us.

X.98 (924) Devāpi's Plea for Rain

Devāpi Ārṣṭiṣeṇa
12 verses: triṣṭubh

This hymn contains a prayer for rain, set in the context of a similar (successful) prayer in legendary time. The protagonists of this legend are Devāpi, a priest and poet, in fact the Hotar and Purohita (at this late stage in the Ṛgveda this latter priestly role seems to have become established) for Śaṃtanu, presumably a king, and the god Bṛhaspati. The first four verses consist of a dialogue between Devāpi (vss. 1, 3), Bṛhaspati (vs. 2), and, in our view, Śaṃtanu (vs. 4, though some scholars consider this verse the speech of Bṛhaspati). Devāpi requests Bṛhaspati to act as intermediary for him, asking the appropriate god to send rain. Devāpi must have made this request standing by the ritual fire, for in verse 2 Bṛhaspati identifies Agni as their go-between and then provides Devāpi with a speech, presumably a charm that can provoke rain. Devāpi acknowledges this gift in verse 3, and in verse 4 Śaṃtanu asks Devāpi to perform sacrifice.

The next three verses (5–7) summarize the successful outcome of this story. With verse 8 the hymn turns to present time and to the god Agni, who carried the original plea from Devāpi to Bṛhaspati. The present poet again asks Agni to send rain (vss. 8, 10, 12), while mentioning somewhat wistfully the many sacrificial gifts we might receive (vs. 9)—gifts that he then offers to Agni (vs. 10) to present in turn to Indra (vs. 11).

1. [Devāpi:] "Bṛhaspati, confront (the appropriate) divinity for me, (saying): 'whether you are Mitra or Varuṇa, or Pūṣan, or whether you are the companion of the Maruts [=Indra], or are with the Ādityas or the Vasus, make Parjanya rain for Śaṃtanu.'" 2. [Bṛhaspati:] "The quick messenger god [=Agni], taking cognizance, went from you, Devāpi, to me.
   Turn here, face to face in front of me: I place heaven-bright speech in your mouth."
3. [Devāpi:] "Place heaven-bright speech in us, in our mouth, o Bṛhaspati, speech that is invigorating and free from affliction, by which we two will win rain for Śaṃtanu. The honeyed drop of heaven has entered (me)."
4. [Śaṃtanu?:] "Let the honeyed drops enter us. O Indra, give a thousand (cows) with a chariot in addition.
   Sit down to the office of Hotar; sacrifice according to the ritual sequence. O Devāpi, honor the gods with an oblation."
5. The seer Devāpi, the son of Ṛṣṭisena, sitting down to the office of Hotar, cognizant of the favor of the gods — he sent the heavenly rainwaters gushing from the higher to the lower sea.
6. In this higher sea the waters stood still, confined by the gods.
   They ran, sent gushing by the son of Ṛṣṭisena, impelled by Devāpi in currycomb tracks [=rivulets].
7. When Devāpi, installed as Purohita for Śaṃtanu and chosen for the office of Hotar, reflected with longing, Bṛhaspati, bestowing, gave him speech audible to the gods, winning rain.
8. O Agni, you whom Devāpi kindled—the son of Ṛṣṭisena, belonging to Manu's line, himself blazing—cheered on by all the gods, rouse forth Parjanya who brings rain.
9. To you the ancient seers came with their songs; to you (now) all (come) at the ceremonies, o much invoked one.
   For us there are thousands (of cows), with a chariot in addition. Drive here to our sacrifice, o you of the chestnut horses.
10. These nine and ninety thousand, along with a chariot in addition, are offered in you, Agni.
    With them strengthen your many bodies, o champion. Aroused, grant us rain from heaven.

11. These ninety thousand, o Agni—present them to the bull Indra as his share.
    Knowing the paths leading to the gods in proper order, set Aulāna among the gods in heaven.
12. Agni, thrust away scorners, away difficult depths; ward off affliction, off demonic forces.
    From this sea of lofty heaven for us send an abundance of waters gushing upon us.

X.99 (925) Indra

Vamra Vaikhānasa
12 verses: triṣṭubh

In this very obscure hymn the exact contents and referents in each verse are almost impossible to interpret and identify, and much of the translation is therefore provisional. On the other hand, the structure and progression of the hymn are surprisingly clear. Although it is an Indra hymn, at least according to the Anukramaṇī, the name Indra does not appear until the very last verse, the poet's summary verse (12b), and then only once. In fact the hymn contains almost no divine names: Rudras (in the plural, perhaps of the Maruts, perhaps not, in vs. 5) and Varuṇa in a simile in verse 10. The first four verses contain no names at all, and though subsequent verses do contain a number of them, most of these are names of enemies or of mortals aided by the gods. As in many other difficult hymns the avoidance of names seems to be meant to keep the referents deliberately unclear, and the contorted phraseology and allusions to otherwise unknown stories, especially in the earlier parts of the hymn, seem designed to keep the audience guessing and in some cases to deliberately mislead them. As the hymn goes on, Indra's identity becomes clearer, as in verse 9 with the Śuṣṇa/Kutsa saga. (On this obscure verse see also Jamison 2009d [2013].)

The grammar mirrors this gradual progress toward the recognition and perhaps the epiphany of Indra. The hymn begins in verse 1 with questions about the identity of the referents, an indication of maximal uncertainty. The next seven and a half verses (2–9ab) display an advance toward certainty: almost every half-verse begins with the pronoun sá "he," suggesting that the poet has a definite referent in mind, however vague it may be to the audience. But sá is a discourse pronoun: it does not indicate where the referent is located. Starting with the second half of verse 9 the next four half-verses begin with a form of the deictic pronoun ayám "this one here," strongly pointing to a referent in the immediate vicinity of the speaker. These ayám forms may signal the actual presence, the epiphany, of Indra, arrived at the sacrificial ground.

1. Which bright bellower of ours do you, taking cognizance, send speeding along the broad earth for strengthening?
   What is his share of strength at the break of dawn? He fashioned the mace that overcomes obstacles; he made it swell.

2. For he pursues the melody with his flashing, with his lightning. He has taken his seat upon the broad womb through his lordliness.
   Together with the nest-mates and not without his brother, he is the one who prevails over the magic tricks of the seventh.
3. He is the one who drives to the prize, though going with a (horse?) whose "off" foot is lame [?]. At the winning of the sun, intending to win he laid siege to it, when, unassailable, smashing the phallus-worshipers, with his form he prevailed over the property of (the place?) with a hundred doors.
4. He pours out the youthful streams, while as charger running for the cows that are at stake, when those in harness, though lacking feet and chariots, having wooden cups as horses, move toward the ghee, the water.
5. Together with the Rudras, the Craftsman, whose wish is unpraiseworthy but who keeps disrepute at a distance, has come here, abandoning his house.
   This reminds me of the ant couple who were away from their lair, and (someone), approaching and stealing their food, made (them) weep.
6. Just he, the household lord, subdued the mightily roaring Dāsa, with his six eyes and three heads.
   Grown strong through his might, Trita smashed the boar with his metal-tipped poetic inspiration.
7. Rising up for Manu, he will propel his arrow at the deceitful Arśasāna.
   He, most manly, well-born from Nahus and from us, split the fortresses at the smashing of the Dasyus, as was his due.
8. He, like a storm-cloud streaming water upon the pasture-land, finds a way to a peaceful dwelling for us.
   When he reverently approaches the (soma-)drop with his limbs, the falcon with claws of metal smashes the Dasyus.
9. Along with his (men) swelling with strength, (he smashed) the arrogant ones. He handed Śuṣṇa over to Kutsa for the Karpan [?].
   This one here led the poet who was being praised, who won his cloak and was the winner among superior men.
10. This one here, showing his favor along with his manly (men), wondrous together with the gods, is a master of magic power like Varuṇa.
    This one here, the lad who drinks according to the ritual sequence, has been found. He gave his (full) measure against Araru, who was four-footed.
11. Auśija R̥jiśvan, through his praises to him, burst the cowpen of Pipru together with the bull.
    When the one worthy of the sacrifice possesses the pressed soma and the song will shine, (then), being implored, with his form he (will) prevail over the fortresses.

12. In just this way, o lord, for the increase of the great one, Little Ant [/Vamraka, the poet] on his many feet crept up to Indra.
He, being implored, will create well-being for him. Refreshment, nourishment, a good dwelling—all that has he brought.

X.100 (926) All Gods

Duvasyu Vāndana
12 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 12

The most salient characteristic of this hymn is its full-pāda refrain, found in the first eleven of its twelve verses: "we choose wholeness (sarvátātim) and innocence (áditim)." (Geldner takes the latter as the proper name of the goddess Aditi, from whom we wish to obtain our choice, but not only is there no Ādityan flavor to this hymn, but such a double accusative construction is otherwise unknown with the root √vr̥ "choose.") At first, with its abstract and somewhat moral cast, this refrain seems unrelated to the content of the verses in which it is placed, but as the hymn proceeds its relevance becomes clearer.

The hymn begins with a celebration of the soma sacrifice and the gods who partake of it, especially Indra (vs. 1) and Vāyu (vs. 2)—the latter marking the ritual as the Morning Pressing—with Savitar, the "Impeller," providing the impetus to the ritual activity (vss. 1, 3). But it slowly becomes clear that the sacrifice is not simply a physical procedure, but is intimately bound up with our emotional well-being (see esp. vss. 5c and 6c). Moreover, in verse 7 it becomes the site of our declaration of innocence before the gods, a sort of "truth formulation," though without all the formal marks of the truth formulation. At this point the refrain becomes an integral part of the verse to which it is attached. Having thus affirmed our blamelessness, we can now ask for the dangers that beset us to be banished (vss. 8–9) and for prosperity and healing to attend us (vs. 10). That the soma sacrifice is the setting for these pleas and that the elements of the ritual facilitate their fulfillment is shown by the prominence of the pressing stones (vss. 8–9) and the mixing milk for the soma (vs. 10).

The happy conclusion of the sacrifice is depicted in verse 11, the last verse with the refrain. The final verse (12), in a different meter, is a somewhat curious mixture. The first half is addressed to an unidentified referent—quite possibly Agni, since the compound "having bright radiance" is ordinarily used of him (though once of Indra and once of Savitar)—with a slightly sinister reminder slipped into the second pāda that there are still enemies around who are thriving. The second half looks like a fragment of a dānastuti, but there are no further clues as to how it might fit into the rest of the hymn.

1. O Indra, stand fast, bounteous one. A thing like you is to be enjoyed.
Praised as the soma-drinker, be here for our strengthening.
Let Savitar, along with the gods, further our (speech, so it is) heard. – We choose wholeness and innocence.

2. Bring forward for the taking a portion at the proper time, for Vāyu who drinks the pure soma, roaring in his quest, who has attained the drinking of the gleaming milk. – We choose wholeness and innocence.
3. May God Savitar impel vitality here to our sacrificer, the soma-presser who aims straight, so that we may attend upon the gods guilelessly. – We choose wholeness and innocence.
4. Let Indra be benevolent toward us always; let King Soma stay mindful of our welfare, in the same way that (pacts) concluded by allies bind (them [=allies]) together. – We choose wholeness and innocence.
5. Indra with his vast power has appropriated the articulation (of the sacrifice?) along with our hymn. O Bṛhaspati, you are the lengthener of lifetime.
   The sacrifice is Manu, for it is solicitude, is certainly a father to us. – We choose wholeness and innocence.
6. Indra's is the well-made divine might; Agni is the singer in the house, the wise poet.
   And the sacrifice has become our dear intimate at the rite of distribution. – We choose wholeness and innocence.
7. Neither in secret nor in the open have we done to you much ill-doing, angering to the gods, you good ones.
   Let no one of us be of the shape of untruth, o gods. – We choose wholeness and innocence.
8. Away and downward may Savitar impel affliction; even more widely let the stones drive it away, when the honey-pressing pressing-stone is given lofty voice. – We choose wholeness and innocence.
9. Let the pressing stone be upright when the soma-presser is there, o good ones; keep all hatreds away at a distance.
   God Savitar is to be reverently invoked as our protector. – We choose wholeness and innocence.
10. O Cows, eat nourishment in the pasture, eat fat, you who are anointed in the cup, at the seat of truth.
    Let just this body be medicine for the body. – We choose wholeness and innocence.
11. The singer bringing to fulfillment his conception is a help for each and every one; Indra himself is auspicious solicitude for those who have pressed the soma, whose heavenly udder is full for pouring. – We choose wholeness and innocence.

12. Bright is your radiance—your superiority brings your conception to fulfillment. (But still) there exist unassailable opponents who bring their own old age to fulfillment.
    The one offering friendship seeks to rush in the straightest line to round up the foremost of bovine stock.

X.101 (927) Priests

Budha Saumya
12 verses: triṣṭubh, except gāyatrī 4–6, br̥hatī 5, jagatī 9, 12

Addressed to the priests of the soma sacrifice, this charming hymn first likens their ritual activities to various kinds of manual labor, especially farm labor (vss. 3–4). The preparation of soma is then compared to raising water from a well (vss. 5–7) for livestock. The preparation of the soma advances through a series of changing images (vss. 8–10), ending with a surprisingly eroticized pair of verses (11–12).

1. Wake up of one mind, o comrades. Kindle the fire together, you who are many, but from the same nest.
   I call down Dadhikrā, Agni, and goddess Dawn, all accompanied by Indra, to aid you.
2. Make things delightful; stretch out your insightful thoughts (on the loom); make a boat that crosses (the water) with its oars.
   Set your weapons in order; prepare them right. Lead the sacrifice forth to the east, comrades.
3. Hitch up the plows; stretch the yokes across; in a prepared womb strew the seed here.
   If the hearing will be commensurate with our song, the ripe (grain) should come even closer to our sickles.
4. The poets hitch up the plows; they stretch the yokes across separately—the insightful ones in search of favor among the gods.
5. Bring out the buckets; fasten the cords together.
   Let us dip out the watery wellspring that is easy to dip, unfailing.
6. The wellspring with its buckets prepared, with good cords, easy to dip, watery, unfailing do I dip.
7. Make the horses happy: you will win the (prize that is) set. Just make your chariot one that brings well-being.
   Dip out the wellspring whose buckets are the wooden (soma) cups, its wheel the (pressing) stone, its cask the (sheep's fleece) sheathing, and which gives drink to men.
8. Make a pen (for it), for it gives drink to your men. Stitch (for it) (suits of) armor, ample and broad.
   Make (for it) fortresses, metal and unassailable. Let the beaker not leak: make it solid.

9. I turn toward you an insightful thought worthy of the sacrifice, for aid, o gods—a sacrificial goddess worthy of the sacrifice here.
   She should yield her milk to us like a great cow with her milk in a thousand streams who has gone to the pastures.
10. Pour out the tawny (soma) into the lap of wood. Fashion (it [=wooden cup]) with axes made of stone.
   Embrace (him [=Soma]) with ten girthbands. Yoke the draft-horse to the two chariot-poles.
11. The plodding draft-animal goes between the two chariot-poles like a man with two wives in bed [/into the vulva].
   Make the lord of the wood [=tree/soma] stand in the wood. Set (it) down well, without digging out the spring.
12. The penis, the penis—raise it up, men. Rouse (it), stick (it in), to win the prize.
   Hurry the son of Niṣṭigrī hither, for help, urgently (hurry) Indra here for soma-drinking.

X.102 (928) The Race of Mudgala and Mudgalānī

Mudgala Bhārmyaśva
12 verses: triṣṭubh, except br̥hatī 1, 3, 12

We two translators have differing interpretations of some of the details and more especially of the ritual application of this hymn. These contrasting views are set out in separate signed discussions in the following introduction.

SWJ

This famous and famously enigmatic hymn presents an intriguing scenario: a chariot race (or a chariot drive) in which a man named Mudgala decisively wins the stakes, with the help of Indra, despite using unorthodox equipment and personnel that seem destined to fail him. His charioteer is his wife Mudgalānī (see vs. 2) and the team drawing the chariot seems to consist of a boisterous and ill-controlled bull yoked with an inert piece of wood (see esp. vss. 9–10). Or so is our best guess; the depiction of the race is oblique and narratively shattered.

Not surprisingly the hymn has provoked much discussion, both about the bare "facts" of the chariot race and about the meaning and purpose of the hymn as a whole. There are two major and interconnected thematic strands motivating the hymn, and these converge in the figure of Mudgalānī and are expressed especially clearly in verse 11, where Mudgalānī recovers her husband, and the pair burgeon with apparent fertility—he "dripping" and she "swelling." She is there also identified as a "(once) avoided wife," in later śrauta ritual a technical term for one of the king's wives, avoided presumably because she failed to produce offspring. So, on one level the hymn depicts the recovery of fertility and the future production of offspring in Mudgala's line. The hovering presence and aid of the hyper-virile Indra and the emphasis throughout the hymn (see esp. vss. 4–6) on his animal stand-in, the bull pulling the chariot, reinforces this message. Mudgalānī's sexual nature is suggested by our first glimpse of her, with the wind lifting her garment (vs. 2a), and in a particularly startling verse (6) the droppings of the defecating bull keep hitting the woman who is driving him—an image that suggests, as it subverts, sexual contact between the bull and the woman. If this bull stands in for Indra, its yokemate, the wooden club, may represent an impotent Mudgala, and the announcement in verse 10 that the wooden club has now been "made to mount" may signal that Mudgala has, paradoxically, recovered his sexual potency by association with the bull/Indra.

The other thematic strand is a ritual one. In my opinion this hymn takes part in the disguised dialogue in the late Ṛgveda about the ritual innovation, the introduction of the Sacrificer's Wife, the ritual patnī, into solemn sacrificial practice. As we have discussed elsewhere, various hymns and sections thereof seem to favor or oppose this innovation, but always in the guise of another discourse. This hymn seems strongly in favor of the introduction of the patnī. It begins with a pun, whose implications are worked out through the rest of the hymn. The first pāda of the hymn introduces Mudgala's chariot, which is mithūkṛ́tam. This word is generally translated "wrongly functioning, falsely made" or the like, and that is surely one of its implications here: the chariot is defective. But it can also mean "making/forming a sexual pair," and this is a very apt description of the new ritual model, with the Sacrificer and his Wife the pair associated with the chariot, a common metaphor for the sacrifice. The rest of hymn can be read as an extended metaphorical treatment of the new ritual model, using the same image of the sacrifice as chariot—with the Wife is charioteer, not yokemate of the Sacrificer as in some other contributions to the discussion (see, e.g., VIII.33.18). The emphasis throughout the hymn on the unorthodox and makeshift nature of the equipment and the surprising outcome in victory signals that the ritual partnership between husband and wife is a new, untried model, which nonetheless brings even more success than the old one. The happy outcome of the hymn, the recovery of her husband and the swelling fertility of Mudgalānī (vs. 11), reminds us of the relentless stress on the Wife's raison d'être in classical śrauta ritual as representative of sexuality and fertility in all their forms (see Jamison 1996a: esp. ch. 3, sect. C–E).

JPB

Alternatively, the hymn may have been composed to accompany a rite of niyoga, in which a surrogate is appointed as a substitute for an impotent or dead husband. Mudgala is the dead or impotent husband, but Mudgalānī has been able win offspring for him by finding a "bull," a potent man, who can impregnate her and secure the continuation of Mudgala's lineage. In this interpretation, the "wooden club" in verse 9 is a symbol of the potency of the surrogate, rather than the impotence of Mudgala, especially if the "racecourse" in the middle of which it lies is a figure for the body of Mudgalānī. Verse 6 provides a possible clue to the application of this hymn. If the praise of Indra in verse 12 is taken as extra-hymnic, verse 6 is the center of the hymn, the place where the secrets of hymn are often disclosed (or buried even more deeply). It begins kakárdave vr̥ṣabhó yuktá āsīt. Unfortunately, as noted below, the meaning of kakárdave is uncertain. (It might be dative "for making kaka" as translated below, but it might also be locative "in the creaking one," referring to the cart driven by Mudgalānī.) But the rest of the pāda is simple and clear: "the bull was yoked." Again in pāda c, the poet repeats that the bull was "yoked." The reason for poet's insistence on this detail may be that yuktá "yoked" in this key verse points to the etymologically related "niyoga," the hymn's ritual context.

For further discussion of this hymn see Brereton (2002) and Jamison (2011 and forthcoming a).

1. Let Indra advance your chariot boldly (though it be) wrongly made [/forming a sexual pair].
   In this race in pursuit of fame and at the apportioning of spoils, help us, o much-invoked one.
2. The wind kept lifting up her garment when she won a thousand (cattle) and a chariot in addition.
   Mudgalānī was the charioteer in the quest for cattle; as "weapon of Indra," she pulled out the perfect ("hand" of dice) at the match.
3. Hold in check the mace of the assailant who seeks to smite (us), o Indra.
   Keep far away the murderous weapon, whether of the Dāsa or of the Ārya, o bounteous one.
4. Growing ever more excited, he drank a lake of water. The "hammer" kept going, crushing hostility.
   The (bull) with balls, seeking fame, striving to win, stretched out his forelegs vigorously.
5. Coming at him, they made him bellow; they made the bull piss in the middle of the race.
   (Yet) through him Mudgala won a thousand plus a hundred well-nourished cattle in the contest.
6. The bull was yoked for making "kaka" [=defecation] [?]. Its long-haired charioteer dodged and dodged, but the droppings of the frenzied bull, yoked and running with the cart, kept hitting Mudgalānī.
7. Understanding (the situation), he struck away the outer piece of its wheel, and he yoked up the bull there, working hard.
   Indra helped out the husband of the prized cows: the hump-backed bull sped with his strides.

8. Whip in hand, the man with braided hair achieved good fortune by binding the piece of wood to the strap.
   Performing manly deeds for the many folk, keeping an eye on the cows, he [=bull?] assumed his powers.
9. "Look at it here, the yokemate of the bull, the wooden club lying in the middle of the race course, with which Mudgala won a thousand plus a hundred cattle in the battle-drives."
10. "Troubles begone! Who has ever seen such a thing? The one whom they yoke, they (now) make him mount (the chariot/his wife?).
    They bring him neither grass nor water. The higher (end) of the chariot-pole draws (the chariot), directing (it) ever forward."
11. She has accomplished the recovery of her husband, like a (once) avoided wife: she swelling, he dripping, as if (working) with a poor (water) wheel.
    Might we also be victorious with a charioteer who is quicker than quick. Let the winnings bring good luck and possessions.
12. Indra, you are (the eye) of the entire moving world, the eye of the eye, when, a bull yourself, you strive to win the race with a bull, driving (him) with a steer as (his) yokemate.

X.103 (929) Indra (1–3, 5–11), Bṛhaspati (4), Āpva (12), Indra or the Maruts (13)

Apratiratha Aindra
13 verses: triṣṭubh, except anuṣṭubh 13

A martial hymn, dense with expressions of overwhelming power and victorious might. The early parts of the hymn present Indra as the unconquerable conqueror. Stylistically this part is marked by repetition and especially by the chaining of key lexical items from the end of one verse to the beginning of the next. Curiously, X.84, a hymn to "Battle Fury," also shows this type of concatenation, and so it may be that stitching verses together in this way creates a sort of magically impenetrable verbal armor.

In the course of the hymn the focus shifts from exclusive concentration on Indra to our warriors and the inspiration Indra's model should provide for them to perform heroically in battle. Our men are first addressed already in the second half of verse 2, but it is in verse 6 and then in verses 10–13 that the application of Indra's behavior to that of our men and the transference of his skills and courage to them really come to the fore.

1. Swift, honing himself as a fearsome bull (does its horns), smiting again and again, the agitator of the settled domains who makes them cry out together, the unwinking lone hero—he conquered a hundred armies all at once—Indra.

2. With him, who makes (them) cry out together, who is unwinking, conquering, combat-creating, difficult to shake, bold—with Indra now conquer, now overwhelm the combatants, o men—with the bull with arrows in his hand.
3. He together with those with arrows in their hands, he together with those having quivers, willful Indra, with his throng, who is the one to send the combatants surging together, conquering those sent surging together, drinking the soma, arrogant in his arms, the archer of mighty bow having his (arrows) aimed.
4. Bṛhaspati, fly around with your chariot, as demon-smasher repelling those without alliance.
Shattering the armies, pulverizing them, conquering in combat, be the helper of our chariots.
5. Recognizable by his power, stalwart, a hero at the fore, a prizewinner with overwhelming strength, overwhelming and mighty, a hero on attack, a warrior on attack, born of overwhelming strength—o Indra, mount the conquering chariot as the finder of cattle.
6. The splitter of the cowpen, the finder of cows, the one with the mace in his arms, winning the course, pulverizing with his might—show your heroism in imitation of that one, you kinfolks; pull yourselves together in imitation of him, you comrades.
7. Plunging toward the cowpens with overwhelming strength, the hero without mercy, Indra of the hundredfold battle-fury, difficult to shake, overwhelming in battle, impossible to combat—let him further our armies in the combats.
8. Let Indra (go in front) as their leader, let Bṛhaspati, the priestly gift, the sacrifice, the soma go in front;
let the Maruts go to the forefront of the shattering, conquering armies of the gods.
9. Of Indra the bull and of Varuṇa the king—mighty their troop of Ādityas and of Maruts—of the great-minded, earth-shaking, conquering gods the battle-cry has arisen.
10. Make our weapons bristle up, o bounteous one—up the minds of my own little warriors, up, o Vṛtra-smasher, the competitive spirits of the competitors. Up let the battle-cries of the conquering chariots go.
11. Ours is Indra when the battle flags clash. Our arrows—let them conquer.
Our heroes—let them have the upper (hand). Help us amid the calls (to you), o gods.

12. Confusing the perception of those yonder, seize their limbs, o Lady Panic, and go away.
 Go forth against them; with flames burn them in their hearts. Let those without alliance keep company with blind darkness.
13. Go forth and conquer, o men. Let Indra offer you shelter.
 Let your arms be mighty so that you will be unassailable.

Aṣṭaka Vaiśvāmitra
11 verses: triṣṭubh

The poet of this hymn is identified as a descendant of Viśvāmitra, and the hymn ends (vs. 11) with the Viśvāmitra refrain found in most of the Indra hymns of the IIIrd Maṇḍala (III.31.22, etc.). Like X.89, another Indra hymn of the Xth Maṇḍala ascribed to a Vaiśvāmitra and ending with the same refrain, this hymn seems like a self-consciously old-fashioned composition, falling squarely into the genre of "journey" hymn, in which Indra is invited to come with his horses to the soma-pressing. That praise poetry is at least equally important as soma at the sacrifice is made abundantly clear throughout the hymn. Toward the end (starting with vs. 8), the hymn turns to the topic of the Vr̥tra myth and, especially, Indra's freeing of the waters after his defeat of Vr̥tra.

1. The soma has been pressed for you, o much-invoked one. With your pair of fallow bays, drive swiftly to the sacrifice.
 The songs, having poets for heroes, making their way, have run to you, Indra. Drink of the pressed soma.
2. You of the fallow bays, drink here of (the soma) rinsed in the waters, pressed by our men—fill your belly!— which the stones have trickled for you, Indra. With these (soma drinks) increase your exhilaration, o you whose conveyance is hymns.
3. I rouse forth the drink of pressed soma, mighty and true, for the bull— for you to drive forth, o possessor of the fallow bays.
 Indra, make yourself exhilarated here with our nourishing streams, while being ably hymned with all our insightful thoughts.
4. By your help, able one, and your heroic might, the fire-priests who know the truth, acquiring the vigor that brings offspring, have taken their place in the house of Manu, o Indra, singing and sharing in the exhilaration.
5. Through your guidance—you of good praise, of good favor, and of much radiance, o master of the fallow bays—the peoples, your praisers, are acquiring your most bounteous help to bring them across—and through your liberal gifts, Indra.

6. O you of the fallow bays, drive near to our sacred formulations with your pair of fallow bays to drink of the pressed soma.
   Indra, the sacrifice has reached you, patiently waiting. You are the pious sign of the rite.
7. The bounteous one having a thousand prizes, vanquishing hostility, delighting in the pressing, (receiving) well-twisted (hymns)— unopposable Indra do the songs attend upon. In the singer's desire to do homage they express wonder at Indra.
8. Seven are the divine waters, very delightful and unharmable, by which you, Indra, the stronghold-splitter, crossed the boundary river, the ninety and nine streaming streams. You found the way for the gods and for Manu.
9. You freed the great waters from their curse, and you, the god, alone kept watch over them.
   Indra, those (waters) that you made at the overcoming of Vr̥tra, with these you should thrive in body throughout a whole lifetime.
10. The resolve proper to a hero—that's Indra, who (receives) good praises; (the good praise) as well as the (soma-)stream summon the much-invoked one.
    He shook Vr̥tra to pieces; he made wide space; as the able one, as superiority (itself), he vanquished the battle arrays.
11. – For blessing we would invoke bounteous Indra, most manly, at this raid, at the winning of the prize of victory, the strong one who listens, (we would invoke) for help in battles, him who smashes obstacles, the winner of prizes.

X.105 (931) Indra

Durmitra Kautsa or Sumitra Kautsa
11 verses: predominately uṣṇih (per Anukramaṇī)

The meter of this hymn is, to say the least, highly irregular and variable from verse to verse. Despite the Anukramaṇī analysis it is better analyzed as consisting mainly of verses with a seven-syllable middle pāda, and one or more triṣṭubh pādas before and/or after. See Oldenberg (1888: 158–59).

The hymn also poses many problems of interpretation, and the metrical and verbal anomalies have led many commentators to consider the text corrupt—a judgment by which we are tempted. Even if not corrupt, the text is stylistically abrupt, contorted, and compressed, and many puzzles remain unsolved. The hymn also appears to be jocular in places, making sly fun of Indra and cutting him down to size. This is especially clear in the section devoted to Indra's pair of fallow bay horses (vss. 2–5), where the poet implies that without his horses Indra is nothing much: it's the horses that give him prestige (see esp. vss. 3–4). The sections concerning his weapon (vss. 6–7) and the sacrifice (vss. 8–10) accord Indra more of his usual glory, but still in oblique phraseology.

1. When, o good one, for (you) who yearn for praise, will your beard descend to the water, to the (soma) long pressed for (you) whose friendship is sought [/befriended by the wind]?
2. You who pursue your two fallow bays, well yoked but possessing separate commandments, the steeds *with slender penises, the two with manes like two lines—you, the houselord—
3. Apart from which two Indra stays stock-still, like an exhausted mortal overcome by fear.
   (But) when he, the forceful, has yoked them for beauty,
4. Together with them Indra will ever be famed—(though) he's (just) their sidecar and providing (them) service—together with the two roarers with their separate commandments Indra (will be famed) as a champion.
5. He who has mounted on the maned pair, as if on the two of broad expanse [=Heaven and Earth?], to prosper, the fair-lipped one wins (the soma?) with his pair of lips.
6. He of lofty might has struck up the praise song with the lofty ones. The champion fashioned it with his swelling strength, like an artisan [/R̥bhu] in accord with his intentions, (like?) Mātariśvan.
7. Who made his own mace, to smash the Dasyu easily—he, golden-colored, golden, with unbroken jaw, is like the infallible airy realm [?].
8. Grind down the crooked things for us. By our verse might we vanquish those without verses.
   Not without sacred formulations is our individual sacrifice, while you are taking pleasure in it.
9. When the threefold one has become upright for you upon the yokepoles of the sacrifice, in its place, then, jointly with these two [=horses?], (make?/board?) a boat that has its own glory.
10. For splendor is your dappled pourer, for splendor your spotless ladle, with which you pour up into your own vessel.
11. Whether a hundred are counter(part) to you, lordly one, Sumitra has praised (you) in just this way, Durmitra has praised (you) in just this way, in that you helped Kutsa's son in the smashing of Dasyus, in that you furthered Kutsa's kid in the smashing of Dasyus.

X.106 (932) Aśvins

Bhūtāṃśa Kāśyapa
11 verses: triṣṭubh

There is no question that this is the most frustrating hymn in the R̥gveda. Structured like another Aśvin hymn, II.39, it presents a blizzard of similes—generally one each pāda, four to a verse—with the two gods compared to all manner of animals, people, body parts, and cosmic features. Unfortunately the style goes far beyond the recondite to the utterly incomprehensible, with impossible hapaxes of unusual morphological structure, seemingly in part driven by phonological play. These words may be archaic or dialectal or slang or belong to specific technical fields or borrowed/adapted from a substrate language or playfully generated from morphological templates—or, as has been suggested, the middle section may be written in a kind of code, with phoneme-by-phoneme substitution. Or all of the above, and more.

In any case, following the eminently sensible lead of Geldner (implicitly endorsed by Oldenberg and Renou), we have simply left the middle verses (5–8) untranslated, while attempting to wring sense from the outer frame. Although many ingenious attempts have been made to interpret the baffling lexical items in this hymn and more could have been made, such attempts remain just that—exercises in ingenuity. It seems more honest, as well as truer to the spirit of the hymn, evidently designed to challenge the decoding skills of the most proficient and experienced hearers, to acknowledge its impenetrable center. From this several observations emerge. First, this appears to be the ultimate omphalos hymn. In most omphalos hymns the center holds the mystery, but the mystery is expressed in words whose purport can be puzzled out. Here that mysterious center deliberately defies analysis by being expressed in words that are tantalizingly close to familiar word-types, but whose code cannot be cracked—and rendered all the more frustrating by the presence of real, analyzable words in the midst of the semi-gibberish. The hymn takes the notion of an omphalos and carries it as far as it can go, suggesting that many mysteries will remain beyond our apprehension, or at least our apprehension by verbal means.

The outer verses (1–4, 9–11) reveal further traces of poetic structure, especially when compared with II.39 mentioned above. The parallels between the two hymns seem to be deliberate and self-consciously generated. They begin almost identically: the first pāda of II.39.1 (minus the opening simile) reads... tád íd árthaṃ jarethe "you two awaken to just this aim," in sense and verbal expression almost identical to our ubhā́ u nūnáṃ tád íd arthayethe "Now you both have just this as your aim," with the "awaken" postponed until pāda c. The final verses of both hymns (II.39.8, X.106.11) are summary verses, announcing the hymn just completed (interestingly called a mantra in this hymn) and urging the Aśvins to drive to the hymn and the sacrifice. In between are a varying number of verses, constructed as webs of similes, most of which are more complex and clever than the general run of R̥gvedic similes. It thus seems that this hymn-type provides a template, which could generate within it an unlimited number of inventive comparisons. It is not hard to imagine this process as a competitive one, with poets vying to use the most outré words and over-strained and mannered images, all contained and controlled by the overall structure of the template. In our hymn we return to discipline from the unruly center via several verses of reasonably comprehensible similes (vss. 9–10) to reach, with some relief, the safe shore of verse 11. (It may not be entirely fanciful to suggest that the first simile in the return verses [9a] promises "firm standing in the depths"—something the audience has surely been seeking, in vain.)

1. Now you both have just this as your aim: you stretch out insights like workers their cloths.
   It has awakened you two to drive toward a common goal. You haul provisions here as you do the day-bright (days).
2. Like plow-oxen [?] you are fixed in [/to] the pharvara; like brawny lead-horses [?] you follow instructions.
   Because you are like messengers who acquire glory among the peoples, do not stay away like buffalo from a waterhole.
3. Joined together like the wings of a bird, conspicuous like livestock, come here to our sacrificial formula.
   Shining like the fire of a man who seeks the gods, like two encircling the earth you perform sacrifice in many places.
4. (I call upon you,) who are like friends to us, as sons do their parents—like powerful (Heaven and Earth) with their light, like kings for triumph, like energetic (herdsmen) for prosperity, like the two labia for enjoyment. Like obedient (servants), come here to my call.
5. vámͅsageva pūṣaryà̄ śimbā́tā mitréva r̥tā́ śatárā śā́tapantā vā́jevoccā́ váyasā gharmyeṣṭhā́ méṣeveṣā́ saparyà̄ púrīṣā
6. sr̥̥ṇyèva jarbhárī turphárītū naitośéva turphárī parpharī́kā udanyajéva jémanā maderū́ tā́ me jarā́yv ajáram marā́yu
7. pajréva cárcaraṃ jā́ram marā́yu, kṣádmevā́rtheṣu tartarītha ugrā
   r̥bhū́ nā́pat kharamajrā́ kharájrur, vāyúr ná parpharat kṣayad rayīṇā́m
8. gharméva mádhu jaṭháre sanérū, bhágevitā turphárī phā́rivā́ram
   pataréva cacarā́ candránirṇiṅ, mánar̥ṅgā mananyà̄ ná jágmī
9. Like the two lofty (world-halves) you will find firm standing in the depths, as his feet do for a man crossing a ford, for like two ears you will remember our instructions. Like Share and Portion, apportion to us a conspicuous reward.
10. Like āraṅgara you produce (the milk) in the cow whose opening is below, as bees produce honey, like plowmen sweating out their sweat. Like earth, (a cow) that feeds on good pasture, you are accompanied by nourishment.

11. Might we bring our praise song to fulfillment and might we win the prize of victory. Sharing the same chariot, drive here—you two—right up to our mantra and to the cooked honey within the cows, as if to glory. Bhūtāṃśa has fulfilled the desire of the Aśvins.

X.107 (933) Dakṣiṇā (Priestly Gift) or Its Givers

Divya Āṅgirasa or Dakṣiṇā Prājāpatyā
11 verses: triṣṭubh, except jagatī 4

These extravagant praises of the dakṣiṇā ("priestly gift"), which is given by the sacrificer to the various priests who officiate at his sacrifice, are clearly in the poet's interests, as he stands to receive a portion of the sacrificer's largesse. The hymn seldom strays from its point—that a dakṣiṇā, once given, brings untold benefits to the giver, both material and spiritual, far exceeding the value of the original gift. It is a persuasive, if somewhat monotone, piece of work.

1. Their great generosity has been revealed. All life has been freed from darkness;
 the great light, given by the forefathers, has come. The wide path for the priestly gift has become visible.
2. High above in heaven have they taken their stand—those providing the priestly gift. Those who give horses, they (come) together with the sun;
 those giving gold receive a share in immortality; those giving garments extend their own lifetime, o Soma.
3. The priestly gift is the divine bestowal, a sacrificial offering to the gods; it is not for the stingy, for they do not bestow.
 But many men who present priestly gifts bestow through fear of disgrace.
4. Those with manly sight see (it as) the wind with its hundred streams (of rain), (as) the chant that finds the sun; they see (it as) the oblation.
 Those who bestow and present at the (sacrificial) assembly, they milk the priestly gift with its seven mothers.
5. The provider of the priestly gift goes as the first invited; the provider of the priestly gift goes to the front as the leader of the horde.
 I think just he is the lord of peoples—the one who first sought out the priestly gift.
6. They say that just he is the seer, he the creator of sacred formulations, the leader of the sacrifice, the singer of chants, the reciter of solemn words.
 He knows the three bodies of the blazing one—he who first found success with the priestly gift.

7. The priestly gift gives the horse; the priestly gift the cow; the priestly gift the lustrous and what is golden.
   The priestly gift wins the food that is our very lifebreath. He who understands makes the priestly gift his armor.
8. The benefactors have not died, nor have they gone to a failed end; the benefactors are not harmed, nor do they falter.
   What is this whole world and the sun, all this does the priestly gift give to them.
9. The benefactors at first won the sweet-smelling womb; the benefactors won a bride who is richly dressed.
   The benefactors won the right to the inner drinking of liquor. The benefactors won (against those) who come forward uninvited.
10. For the benefactor they groom the swift horse; for the benefactor the maiden sits waiting, making herself beautiful.
   This dwelling of the benefactor is like a lotus-pond, adorned and shimmering like the palaces of the gods.
11. The steadily conveying horses convey the benefactor. Rolling easily, the chariot of the priestly gift rolls on.
   O gods, help the benefactor in the raids. The benefactor will win against his rivals at the encounters (with them).

X.108 (934) Saramā and the Paṇis

Saramā and Paṇis
11 verses: triṣṭubh

In the interpretation of this well-known and delightful dialogue hymn we follow the compelling study by Hanns-Peter Schmidt in his Bṛhaspati und Indra (1968: 185–89). This dialogue takes place in the midst of a narrative whose outlines are clear, even if its details are not. The Paṇis have entrapped cattle in a cave. Indra and the ancient Vedic seers wish to release the cattle. Therefore, Indra sends his dog Saramā to track down the Paṇis and to demand the release of the cattle. She crosses the Rasā, the river at the border of the world that separates heaven and earth, and finds the Paṇis. The Paṇis refuse to surrender the cattle, however, and at the end Indra and the seers—the Aṅgirases and Navagvas—themselves come to the place where the Paṇis have hidden the cattle. They break open the cave through the power of the hymns they compose and chant. Because Indra's weapon in this story is not the vajra, the mace with which he destroys Vṛtra, but the truth embodied in the hymns that Indra and the seers recite, Indra is here called Bṛhaspati, "Lord of the Sacred Formulation."

The story also tells of the coming of the dawns, since the power of Indra's and the seer's words lies in the secret truth that the cattle are the dawns. Note that at the end, the poet uses the power of this truth for his own ends: through the truth of his hymn, he should acquire or recover cattle.

Despite the seriousness of the theme, it is hard to believe that the audience did not relish the depiction of a talking dog, especially one as saucy and forthright as the faithful Saramā, who resists the offered blandishments of the Paṇis, to remain loyal to her master Indra.

1. [Paṇi:] Seeking what has Saramā arrived here, for far is the road, swallowing up (the traveler) in the distance?
   What is your mission to us? What was the final turn (bringing you here)? How did you cross the waters of the Rasā?
2. [Saramā:] Sent as the messenger of Indra I travel, seeking your great hidden treasuries, Paṇis.
   With a fear of leaping across—that helped us!—in that way I crossed the waters of the Rasā.
3. [Paṇi:] Of what sort is Indra, Saramā? What is his appearance?—he as whose messenger you raced here from afar?
   If he will come here, we will make an alliance with him, and then he will become the cowherd of our cattle.
4. [Saramā:] I know him not as one who can be deceived. He will deceive!—he as whose messenger I raced here from afar.
   Deep flowing rivers do not hide him. Smashed by Indra, Paṇis, you will lie still.
5. [Paṇi:] These cattle that you sought, Saramā, as you were flying around the ends of heaven, fortunate one—who will release them to you without a fight? And our battle weapons are sharp!
6. [Saramā:] Your words are no weapons, Paṇis! Let your evil bodies be impervious to arrows or let the path to you be impossible to follow—either way, Bṛhaspati will have no mercy on you!
7. [Paṇi:] This treasury with its foundation of rock is overflowing with cows, horses, and goods, Saramā.
   The Paṇis, who are good herdsmen, guard it. In vain have you come on an empty track.
8. [Saramā:] The seers, sharpened by soma, will come here to this place: Ayāsya [=Indra], the Aṅgirases, and the Navagvas.
   They will divide up this pen of cattle. Then will the Paṇis just vomit this speech (of theirs)!
9. [Paṇi:] Even though you have come in this way, Saramā, compelled by divine power,
   I shall make you my sister. Do not go back. We will give away a portion of the cows to you, fortunate one.

10. [Saramā:] I know no brotherhood and no sisterhood. Indra and the terrifying Aṅgirases, they know (these things).
They seemed to me desirous of cattle when I came. Go away from here, Paṇis, a very long way!
11. [Narrator:] Go far from here, Paṇis, a very long way! Exchanging places with the truth, let the cows come up which Br̥haspati found hidden—he and the soma, the pressing stones, and the inspired seers.

X.109 (935) All Gods

Juhū Brahmajayā or Ūrdhvanābhan Brāhma
7 verses: triṣṭubh, except anuṣṭubh 6–7

This short hymn has provoked much discussion, but, in our opinion, it has not been well served by its commentators. The topic of the hymn is the "Brahmin's wife," mentioned explicitly in verses 2–7, and in particular the "giving back" of the Brahmin's wife. The currently prevailing opinion about the hymn (see especially Geldner and Doniger O'Flaherty) is that it represents an early version of the story in the Viṣṇu Purāṇa (IV.6.5) in which King Soma abducts the wife of Br̥haspati, the guru of the gods, and ultimately is forced to return her. Needless to say, the chronological difference—the several millennia intervening between the R̥gveda and the Viṣṇu Purāṇa—should make this connection a disfavored one unless no other possible interpretations can be found. And it is also the case that the R̥gvedic hymn lacks almost all the salient features of the purāṇic story, including the abduction.

We instead believe that the hymn relates to the much-debated issue in the late R̥gveda about the introduction of the Sacrificer's Wife into ritual performance (see, e.g., nearby X.102), and that the poet both recognizes the perils of this new ritual practice and reassures his audience that all will be well. The hymn has an omphalos structure: the first and last verses (1 and 7) concern the "offense" (kílbiṣa) implicitly done to the Brahmin (husband of the woman in question) by separating him from his wife and placing her in the ritual arena, where she interacts with the gods and acts as conduit of the fearsome forces unleashed by the sacrifice. Her contact with the gods is potentially adulterous, and, given the power of the gods, there is also the danger that they will not want to release her at the end of the ritual. But these possible dangers do not arise: the inner ring of the hymn (vss. 2, 6) emphatically states that the gods have given her back without rancor, and the kílbiṣa is expiated in the final verse (7).

The middle verses (3–5) concern the wife's activities on the ritual ground and their importance. It is she who "places what is difficult to place in the highest distant heaven" (vs. 4), in our view a reference to her role in mediating between the earthly and divine realms especially in the animal sacrifice: she figuratively deposits the oblation in heaven by touching and ritually preparing the sacrificed animal. The most difficult verse is 5, which also contains the only R̥gvedic occurrence of the word brahmacārín (already in the Atharvaveda a word for "Vedic student" and later a standard way of referring to a man practicing chastity). Although the verse remains enigmatic, it is possible that it suggests that a single ritual performer (reciter of formulations) is necessary but not sufficient, and it is for this reason that the Wife has been introduced into ritual practice.

The hymn is also saturated with wedding vocabulary ("grasp the hand," "lead," etc.). This domestic ritual, in which man and wife participate jointly, provides a reassuring model for the wife's foray into the more solemn and serious realm of śrauta ritual.

For more detailed discussion, see Jamison (forthcoming b).

1. These were the first to speak at the offense against the Brahmin: boundless Ocean, Mātariśvan, powerful ascetic Fervor, staunch in rage but joy itself, the divine Waters, first born by their truth.
2. Soma the king first gave back the Brahmin's wife, without being angry.
   Varuṇa as ally was her escort; Agni, the Hotar, having grasped (her) by the hand, led (her) here.
3. The deposit is to be grasped only by her hand, just when they have announced: "Here is the Brahmin's wife."
   She does not stand for sending a messenger. In this way is the kingship of the ruler protected.
4. The ancient gods and the seven seers, who settled down to ascetic fervor, conversed about her:
   "Fearsome is the wife of the Brahmin, when she is led close [/initiated];
   she places what is difficult to place in the highest distant heaven."
5. The one who practices formulations keeps constantly laboring at his labors. He becomes (just) one limb of the gods.
   With him Br̥haspati discovered the (Brahmin's) wife, who was led by Soma, as (you found) the sacrificial ladle [/tongue (=Agni)], o gods.
6. The gods, verily, have given (her) back, and the sons of Manu (have given her) back;
   the kings [=Ādityas], making it come true, have given back the Brahmin's wife.
7. Having given back the Brahmin's wife, having made expiation of offense along with the gods, having shared in the nourishment of the earth, they reverently approach wide-ranging (space).

X.110 (936) Āprī

Jamadagni Bhārgava or Rāma Jāmadagnya
11 verses: triṣṭubh

One of the ten Āprī hymns in the R̥gveda, structured litanies to be recited at the animal sacrifice, each verse with its own key word. This hymn follows the standard Āprī pattern of course, but is notable for the amount of internal recycling of phraseology (see the echoes between vss. 2 and 10; 3 and 9; 4, 7, and 10; 4 and 8). As usual, the key words are italicized.

1. Kindled today in the dwelling of Manu, as god you sacrifice to the gods, o Jātavedas.
   And as observant one convey them hither, you possessing Mitra's might. You are the messenger, the prescient poet.
2. Tanūnapāt, anointing with honey the paths traveling to truth, sweeten them, you of lovely tongue.
   And bringing to fulfillment our mental concepts and our sacrifice through (your) hymnic visions, make our ceremony (be) among the gods.
3. Being libated, as one to be solemnly invoked and to be extolled, travel here in concert with the good ones, Agni.
   You are the Hotar of the gods, youthful one. Sacrifice to them when prompted, as superior sacrificer.
4. Facing east along the forward direction of the earth, the ritual grass is twisted at the dawning of this (dawn), in the vanguard of the days.
   It spreads out further, more widely, as a comfortable place for the gods, for Aditi.
5. Let the expansive ones gape open widely, beautifying themselves like wives for their husbands—you Divine Doors, lofty, setting all in motion, become easy for the gods to approach.
6. Richly fertile, worthy of the sacrifice—let Dawn and Night sit down here close together in the womb—heavenly maidens, lofty, with lovely ornaments, assuming brilliantly adorned splendor.
7. The two Divine Hotars, foremost, eloquent, measuring out the sacrifice of Manu to sacrifice it—the two bards at the rites, spurring on, directing the east-facing light along the forward direction (of the earth) [/at their direction].
8. Let Bharatī come straightaway to our sacrifice, and Iḍā, making (us) perceive here [=instructing us] as she did Manu.
   Let the three goddesses, (those two and) Sarasvatī, the good workers, sit here on this ritual grass, a comfortable place.

9. He who (adorned) Heaven and Earth, these two begetters, and who adorned all the creatures with their forms, to him today, to god Tvaṣṭar, o Hotar, superior sacrificer, perform sacrifice here when prompted, as the knowing one.
10. Send the oblations downward to the fold of the gods at the proper season, having anointed them by yourself.
    Let the Lord of the Forest, the Butcher, and god Agni sweeten the oblation with honey and ghee.
11. Just born, he measured out the sacrifice at once. Agni became the leader of the gods.
    At the direction of this Hotar, at his word of truth, let the gods eat the oblation, prepared with the svāhā-cry.

X.111 (937) Indra

Aṣṭrādaṃṣṭra Vairūpa
10 verses: triṣṭubh

On the one hand, this hymn simply recites, in straightforward but artful fashion, some of Indra's most celebrated deeds: the Vala myth and the freeing of the cows/dawns (vss. 3–4, possibly 2), the Vr̥tra myth and the freeing of the waters (vss. 6, 8–10), with several others glancingly referred to: the propping of heaven and fixation of the earth (vss. 4–5), the smashing of Śuṣṇa (vs. 5). As often, the Vala and Vr̥tra myths are sometimes superimposed upon each other, with the cows/dawns of the former conflated with the waters (also female) of the latter. For example, the first pāda of verse 8 seems to continue the travels of the Dawns found in verse 7, but the next pāda makes it clear that the referent is actually the waters of the Vr̥tra myth.

On the other hand, and especially in its first few verses, the hymn concerns itself with the interaction between poems and deeds. In verse 1 we poets rouse Indra by making his deeds real, that is, by celebrating them in poetry. In verse 2 the poetry almost seems to precede and stimulate the deed, and verse 3 provides us a picture of Indra whose knowledge of his own deeds seems to derive from hearing about them from poets. If our understanding of verse 4 is correct, the power of poetry to provoke the deeds it celebrates is put into the mythic past, with the Aṅgirases bringing Indra's feats to realization by their hymns. Although this theme disappears in the rest of the hymn, to a poetically acute audience its resonances would probably still be felt in the more conventional treatment of Indra's deeds that follows.

1. Inspired ones, bring forth an inspired thought, in whatever (manifold) ways men's thoughts are.
   We will rouse Indra here with his deeds made real [=as hymns]. For he is a hero known to long for song.

2. Because the hymnic vision flashed out from the seat of truth, the bull, born from a heifer, came together with the cows [=Dawns/hymns].
   He arose with a powerful roar. He entirely encompassed the dusky realms, though they are great.
3. Indra certainly knows of this, from hearing it. For he was the victorious path-maker for the sun, and after that, making a wife from a cow [=Dawn], he became the husband of the cow and lord of heaven, immovable, ancient born, unopposable.
4. Indra by his greatness confounded the commandments of the great Flood [=Vala], while being hymned by the Aṅgirases.
   He rooted the dusky realms, though they are many—he who buttressed their buttress by means of (their [=Aṅgirases'] poetic?) realization.
5. Indra is the counterpart of heaven and of earth. He knows all the pressings; he smites Śuṣṇa.
   With the sun he stretched through heaven, though it is great. He also propped it up with a prop, (himself) a better prop (than the prop).
6. Because with your mace as Vr̥tra-smiter you laid Vr̥tra low, (laid low) the wiles of the godless one swollen with strength, you then, bold one, boldly hewed him apart, and so you became arm-strong, bounteous one.
7. When the Dawns kept company with the Sun, their beacons found his glittering gift, the heavenly body that appeared here from heaven. No! No one really knows about its going (away) again.
8. Certainly the first of these females have gone into the distance, the waters that flowed at the impulsion of Indra.
   Where is their top, where their bottom? Waters, where is your middle, where now your end?
9. You let loose the rivers that had been swallowed by the serpent. Right after that they roiled forth at speed—those seeking release and those that had been released. Then they did not rest, once pointed down.
10. Converging, they went to the river like willing girls. From of old the stronghold-splitter has been acknowledged as their lover.
    To your house have come the earthly goods; to us your many liberalities, Indra.

X.112 (938) Indra

Nabhaḥprebhedana Vairūpa
10 verses: triṣṭubh

A conventional invitation to the soma-drinking, specifically that of the Morning Pressing (see esp. vs. 1). As usual, Indra is urged to travel to our sacrifice with his pair of horses (esp. vss. 2, 4) and to drink the soma, whose serving is described. Also as often, the rival sacrificers who try to tempt Indra to their soma are mentioned and the superior charms of our offerings are touted (vs. 7). The poet also promises a verbal performance celebrating Indra's deeds to accompany the soma offering (vs. 8, also vs. 1), and a very abbreviated précis of the Vala myth is given in the second half of verse 8. The final verse (10) expresses our hopes for Indra's reciprocal generosity.

1. Indra, drink of the pressed soma at your pleasure, for the Early-Morning Pressing, the first drink, is yours.
   Excite yourself, to smite the rivals, o champion. With hymns we shall proclaim your manly deeds.
2. Your chariot that is swifter than thought, Indra, with it drive here for soma-drinking.
   Straightaway let your fallow bays run forth here, with which bullish ones you drive while in exhilaration.
3. Cause your body to be touched by the golden luster of the sun, by its fairest forms.
   When you are invoked by us, your comrades, Indra, in common with us, become exhilarated upon sitting down—
4. You, in the raptures of exhilaration, whose greatness these two great world-halves did not encompass—Indra, drive here to this home with your yoked fallow bays, to the dear food with the dear ones.
5. Having drunk of it time after time, Indra, you have done in your rivals, have done inimitable joyous [/martial] (deeds).
   It rouses your plenitude and power; Indra, it is pressed for your exhilaration—the soma!
6. Here is your cup acquired of old, Indra: drink soma with it, you of a hundred resolves.
   The trough is full of exhilarating honey, which all the gods delight in.
7. Because the peoples, with their pleasurable offerings set forth, vie in invoking you in many ways, bullish Indra, ours will become the most honeyed ones for you—these pressings here. Delight in them.
8. I will proclaim your previous heroic deeds, proclaim now those first performed.

You, of real battle fervor, made the stone give way; you made the cow easy to find, for the sacred formulation.

9. Sit down, Lord of Throngs, amid the throngs. They call you the most inspired of the wise poets.
   Without you, at a distance from you, nothing whatever is accomplished. Chant a great brilliant chant, bounteous one.
10. By watching over us, who are in need, bounteous one, become a comrade to your comrades, o lord of goods.
    Do battle, you battle-doer [/make joy, you joy-maker] whose impetuous powers are real. Give us a portion of wealth, even in what is (as yet) unapportioned.

X.113 (939) Indra

Śataprabhedana Vairūpa
10 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 10

Indra's great deeds, especially the smiting of Vṛtra (vss. 2–3, 6–8), are once again the subject of this hymn, but the emphasis is on the other gods who contributed to the success of Indra's exploits: Heaven and Earth (vs. 1), Viṣṇu (vs. 2), Mitra and Varuṇa (vs. 5), and especially the Maruts (vss. 2–3, 6). In depicting these various partnerships between Indra and various gods, the poet is establishing the model for a similar relationship between Indra and the present poets and sacrificers. In verse 8 he attributes to "all the gods" the ritual strengthening of Indra by means of praise poetry and soma—an exact parallel to mortals' standard activity on behalf of Indra. In the first half of verse 9 in rather labored language he then addresses his fellow priest-poets, urging them to spell out to Indra their mutual acts of partnership—and providing in the second half of the verse a mythic example of Indra's aid to a mortal in return for hospitality. (Dabhīti's hospitality to Indra and Indra's requital of it by rendering Dabhīti's enemies Dhuni and Cumuri powerless are recounted elsewhere; see, e.g., VI.20.13 and VI.26.6.) Finally in verse 10 he addresses Indra directly, requesting goods from him. Interestingly, it seems that the poet is not asking for these goods for himself, but presumably for his patron, so that the patron in turn will consider the poet a successful wordsmith and reward him appropriately.

1. Heaven and Earth, of one mind with all the gods, assisted his impetuous force.
   Creating his own greatness and Indrian power as he went, upon drinking the soma the resolute one increased.
2. Viṣṇu with his strength (assisted) his [=Indra's] greatness, having run to the plant [=soma]. It teems with honey.
   Upon smiting Vṛtra with the gods [=Maruts] as fellow travelers, bounteous Indra became worthy to be chosen.

3. When, bearing weapons, you stood with Vr̥tra the serpent, for battle, to acquire a laud, all the Maruts together in person there increased your greatness and Indrian power, strong one.
4. On just being born, he thrust aside the challengers. The hero looked forward to his masculine power, to battle.
 He split the stone; he discharged the flowing streams downward. He propped the broad firmament with his skillful work.
5. Thereupon Indra was entirely master of his powers. He thrust apart more widely heaven and earth.
 Emboldened [/bristling with excitement], he brought down the metal mace, agreeable to Mitra and to pious Varuṇa.
6. The teeming ones [=Maruts] hastened there for the powers of Indra, for the battle fury of the mettlesome one, when the strong one split apart Vr̥tra with strength—Vr̥tra, who was holding the waters but was himself enclosed by darkness.
7. The two who together approached the heroic deeds first to be performed, taking their (battle) places with their great powers—smoky darkness dusted down on (the one), when he was smashed. Indra by his greatness became lord over the early invocation.
8. All the gods then increased your bullish powers with eloquence accompanied by soma.
 He ate the serpent Vr̥tra subdued by Indra's blow, as fire does dry food with his jaws.
9. With skillful words accompanied by chants, by reason of your (acts of) comradeship (for him), proclaim the many (acts of) comradeship (for us).
 Indra is famed as subjugating Dhuni and Cumuri for Dabhīti by reason of his [=Dabhīti's] mind of trust (in ritual hospitality).
10. You—bring hither many (gifts of) good horses, because of which I shall be considered one who pronounces efficacious enigmas.
 Along ways easy to travel may we traverse all difficult passages. Find a ford for us today in wideness.

X.114 (940) All Gods

Sadhri Vairūpa or Gharma Tāpasa
10 verses: triṣṭubh, except jagatī 4

A mystical treatment of the sacrifice, whose mysteries unfortunately remain for the most part unsolved, despite many attempts to identify the referents and relationships of the striking images presented. We will not here add another, most likely doomed, experiment in exegesis, although some possible referents are inserted in brackets below. What is clear is that the elements in the ritual and elements in the cosmic world are identified with each other (in the style of the bandhus, or mystical identifications, so characteristic of middle Vedic literature), but by way of a mediating esoteric image that can apply to both (at least to "those who know"). This style is especially evident in the first verses of the hymn, while numerology comes more and more to dominate the later verses. Indeed, significant numbers are found from the very beginning (the two heats of vs. 1, the three dissolutions of vs. 2, the four braids and two eagles of vs. 3), but the manipulation of numbers begins in earnest with verses 4–5. These same two verses contrast the poet with his "simple mind," who sees only one entity (vs. 4), with the inspired ones and sage poets (vs. 5), who use their words to make that single entity manifold. Even though many of the details of this enigmatic hymn remain obscure, we can see in this contrast the inherent message of the hymn, that insight and its verbal product, poetry, have the power to give shape and multiplicity to the perceptible world.

1. The two contiguous heat (sources) [=fire and sun/gharma pots/or chant and melody] have pervaded the threefold (world) [/Trivr̥t Stoma].
   Mātariśvan has come to enjoyment of the two.
   Seeking to acquire the milk of heaven, they have toiled: the gods know the chant provided with melody.
2. Three (Goddesses of?) Dissolution reverently approach to be pointed out, for the conveyors (of songs?) who hear from afar recognize them.
   The sage poets discern the connection of those (goddesses), (although they dwell) among the distant hidden commandments.
3. The well-ornamented, ghee-faced young woman with four braids [=vedi ("altar")/night sky?] clothes herself in the (ritual) patterns.
   Two bullish eagles have settled down on her, where the gods have acquired their share.
4. The eagle is (really just) one—it has entered the sea; it surveys all this creation.
   With my simple mind I saw it nearby: the mother licks it, and it licks the mother.
5. The inspired ones, the sage poets configure the eagle, though it is just one, in many ways with their words.
   And arranging their meters at the ceremonies, they measure twelve cupfuls of soma.
6. Configuring the four as thirty-six and arranging the meters up to twelve (syllables?), having measured out the sacrifice with their inspired thought, the poets make the chariot [=sacrifice] roll forth with r̥c and sāman [/verse and tune].
7. Fourteen are the other powers of this one [=chariot of the sacrifice].
   Seven wise ones [=priests] lead it forth with their speech.
   The opulent ford—who will here proclaim it: the path by which they take the first drink of the soma?

8. Thousandfold are the fifteen ukthas. As great as heaven and earth, so great is that.
 Thousandfold are the thousand powers. As far as the sacred formulation is spread out, so far is speech.
9. Who is the wise one who knows the yoking of the meters? Who has undertaken the holy speech?
 What champion do they call the eighth of the priests? Who indeed has discerned the two fallow bays of Indra?
10. Such ones circle around the end of the earth, (while) they have stayed yoked to the poles of the chariot.
 They [=gods?] distribute the legacy of their labor to them, when Yama becomes established in his secure habitation.

X.115 (941) Agni

Upastuta Vārṣṭihavya
9 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 8, śakvarī 9

This hymn mixes dense and syntactically contorted descriptions of Agni in his natural and ritual aspects with simple declarations of praise of the same god, such that the hymn gives the impression of ending several different times. For example, verse 5 appears to fit the type of a hymn-ending summary verse, calling on the god for aid, but it interrupts the two most complex verses (vss. 4, 6) characterizing Agni as fire, which appear to belong together, however unclear some of the details are. The last three verses of the hymn (7–9), each in a different meter, provide three alternative endings to the hymn, each with overt signals of a final summary verse: verse 7 (in the same meter as the first six verses) evā́... stave "thus he is praised"; verse 8... íti tvā... vandate... vā́k "so does the speech extol you"; and verse 9 íti tvā... avocan "so have they proclaimed you." It is difficult to know what to do with this overabundance of finales.

The descriptive verses (1–4, 6) repay attention, with bold images and multiple puns (e.g., druṣád in verse 3, literally "wood-sitting," which is equally applicable to Agni sitting on firewood and to the two associated similes: a bird sitting in a tree and the soma-drop sitting in the wooden cup). As noted above, verses 4 and 6 are especially complex, and they have been variously interpreted. In our view these two verses concern Agni and his flames. In verse 4 he is surrounded by his flames, cleverly compared both to the very active winds and to immovable mountains, and they urge him, here identified, as sometimes elsewhere, as Trita, to mount an expedition. But in verse 6 his own flame concedes to his superior power, even as he seeks food in inhospitable places. But other interpretations are certainly possible.

1. Brilliant is the waxing of the tender babe, though he does not approach his two mothers to suck.
   When the udderless one has begotten him, even then has he waxed strong in an instant, undertaking a great mission.
2. He has been established in the house, as “Agni” by name, as the best workman, who wrests together the (pieces of) wood with his gnawing tooth, with his grinding tongue—he of good ceremony, snorting like a powerful bull in a pasture.
3. Him (I invoke) for you—the god sitting on the wood like a bird in a tree, (like) the drop from the stalk in the wooden cup, snorting, shaving (the ground), undulating, the conveyor (of the oblations) with his mouth like a draft-horse, abundant with flame, like someone with a great commandment racing along the ways.
4. O unaging one, you whose (flames), as you spread out eager to burn, like winds, (like) immovable (mountains), encircle (you)— battle-lusty they reach Trita [=Agni] like combatants a consummate warrior, commanding him to seek.
5. Just this Agni, best of the Kaṇvas, comrade of the Kaṇvas, overcomer of the distant stranger and the one close by—let Agni protect the singers, Agni the patrons; let Agni give us their help.
6. O you of good ancestry, to the best prizewinner, the mightier one, to Jātavedas (does) the (flame?) stirring thirstily con(cede), to him who acts boldly when he is by choice even in a waterless place, to the greatest one, the one who seeks greedily for food even through a wasteland.
7. Thus is Agni praised along with the mortal patrons as the good one, the spirited (son) of strength by men—
   (the patrons) who, well-installed like allies, truth-seeking, like the heavens with their heavenly brilliance surmount the (other) descendants of Manu.
8. “O child of nourishment, mighty one”—so does the bullish speech of Upastuta extol you.
   We shall praise you—we who are rich in heroes because of you, establishing a longer lifetime further for ourselves.
9. So have the sons of Vr̥ṣṭihavya, the Upastutas, seers, proclaimed you, o Agni.
   Protect them—both singers and patrons. Saying “Vaṣaṭ, vaṣaṭ,” (standing) upright they have reached (you); saying “Homage, homage,” (standing) upright they have reached (you).

X.116 (942) Indra

Agniyuta (or Agniyūpa) Sthaura
9 verses: triṣṭubh

A fairly straightforward hymn that remains focused on its insistent themes: the invitation to Indra to drink the soma, and the expectations we have of him after he has done so. The first four verses issue the invitation; verses 5–6 ask Indra to use the strength imparted by our soma to defeat our enemies, while the invitation is reiterated in verses 7–8. The hymn proceeds in part by verses paired in theme and language, though verses 3–4 do not show the repetitions and patterned variation in the other three pairs. The final verse (9) summarizes the poet's work while ending with a striking image of the gods as dice, giving (and presumably also withholding) luck.

1. Drink the soma for great Indrian strength. Drink for Vr̥tra-smashing, most powerful one.
   Drink for wealth and for power while you are being called. Drink of the honey; drench yourself in it, to satiety, o Indra.
2. Drink of this pressed soma, presented along with the (sacrificial) animals, according to your wish, Indra.
   Giving well-being, bring yourself to exhilaration in your mind, being inclined our way for our rich good fortune.
3. Let the heavenly soma exhilarate you, Indra; let what is pressed among earth-dwellers exhilarate you.
   Let that exhilarate you by which you made wide space; let that exhilarate you by which you melt down your rivals.
4. Doubly lofty, undiminishing, let Indra the bull drive here with his two fallow bays to the stalk that is poured around.
   As smasher of the non-luminous, (smashing) the hammer utterly, drench yourself in the honey, pressed on the cow(hide) and brought forth.
5. Blunt the sharpened points, slacken the taut (bowstrings) of those incited by sorcerers.
   I give power and strength to you who are mighty. Confronting your rivals, hew them down amid the contesting voices.
6. Loosen the fame of the stranger, Indra, and his might and hostilities like the taut (strings) of a bow.
   Turning toward us, having grown strong in your powers, unblunted, make your body strong.
7. This oblation is given to you, bounteous one. Accept it, being without anger, o universal king.
   It is pressed for you, bounteous one, and cooked for you: eat and drink of it when it is presented, Indra.

8. Eat just these oblations presented here, Indra. Take your delight in the cooked foods and the soma.
   Bringing the pleasing offerings, we enjoy you. Let the desires of the sacrificer come true.
9. I send forth my eloquent speech to Indra and to Agni; like a boat upon a river I sent it forth with my chants.
   Like dice, the gods whirl around—they who give the stakes to us and get the lucky break.

X.117 (943) Praise of Generosity [dhanānnadānapraśaṃsā]

Bhikṣu Āṅgirasa
9 verses: triṣṭubh, except jagatī 1–2

Unusual in both subject matter and tone. This hymn has no divine dedicand, but in the Anukramaṇī is termed a "praise of the gift of wealth and food." There is, in fact, almost no mention of divinities or divine powers in the hymn, an almost unique situation in the R̥gveda; the gods figure only in the first verse and there only obliquely. The emphasis is instead on the mutual relations between humans (comradeship; see, esp., vss. 3–4, 6) and the obligation of the fortunate to provide for those in need. Insofar as the R̥gveda treats the ethical responsibilities of men, ethical behavior is ordinarily mediated through the gods, especially Mitra and Varuṇa, but here there is no such mediation: the admonitions to behave properly to one's fellow men are direct and no gods are represented as observing and judging human behavior.

The argument for generosity is twofold and is couched not in purely ethical terms, but in terms of self-interest. On the one hand, giving does not do the giver any harm, as his stores do not become depleted. This sentiment is expressed most clearly in verse 1c, but it seems also to underlie the maxim-like verses 7 and 8. Verse 7 seems to be a version of the slightly vulgar English expression "use it or lose it," while verse 8 suggests that sheer quantity isn't the measure of power and effectiveness: the more "feet" an entity has, the less its autonomy and power. On the other hand, not giving does the ungenerous man actual harm. In part, the harm is simply the isolation produced by not acting in a comradely manner. As verse 6 says succinctly, "who eats alone has only evil." But it is also the case that one's fortunes can change (see esp. vs. 5). Those who are rich and well fed today may find themselves in need in the future, and it is best to forge comradely ties by giving now, in case the situations of giver and receiver are reversed.

The tone of the hymn is colloquial and conversational. A number of verses deploy what appear to be old sayings or popular adages, distilled folk wisdom, whose pertinence to the topic at hand is indirect and requires some figuring out. Because of their rarity in the high-register texts of early Vedic, such expressions are very precious, though they can be hard to penetrate.

The Anukramaṇī identifies the poet as Bhikṣu (“beggar”) Āṅgirasa, a name presumably suggested after the fact by the subject matter, especially since the word bhikṣu, though very common and culturally important in later times, does not occur in the R̥gveda or indeed any Vedic text that we know of.

1. Truly the gods did not give hunger as the only deadly weapon, and the forms of death do come upon him who is well fed.
   Moreover, the wealth of one who gives does not become exhausted, and the non-giver finds no one to show mercy.
2. Whoever—when a man, weak and broken, has approached desiring nourishment—though he has food, hardens his heart, though he always used to be his friend, he also finds no one to show mercy.
3. Just he is a benefactor who gives to the beggar who, emaciated, goes roaming, desirous of food.
   He becomes sufficient for him at his pleading entreaty, and he makes him his companion in the future.
4. He is no companion who does not give of his food to a companion, who, being in his company, accompanies him.
   He should turn away from him; this is not a home. He should seek another who gives, even a stranger.
5. The stronger man should give to one in need. He should look along the longer path, for riches turn like chariot-wheels: they come up to one man after another.
6. The undiscerning man finds food in vain. I speak the truth: it is just a deadly weapon for him.
   He does not prosper in compatriot, nor in companion. Who eats alone has only evil.
7. It’s just when it plows that a plowshare makes a man well fed. It’s just when he goes that a man “wraps up” the road with his feet.
   The formulator who speaks is more a winner than the one who doesn’t; a friend who gives would be superior to one who doesn’t.
8. The one-footed [=sun?] has stridden farther than the two-footed [=man?]; the two-footed overtakes the three-footed [=old man?] from behind.
   The four-footed [=dog?] comes at the call of the two-footed ones as it watches over the fivefold ones [=herds?], staying by them.
9. Two hands, even though the same, do not accomplish the same. Even two (cows) with the same mother do not yield the same milk.
   The heroic deeds even of twins are not the same. Two men, even though they are kin, do not give the same.

X.118 (944) Agni Rakṣohan

Urukṣaya Āmahīyava
9 verses: gāyatrī

Although the Anukramaṇī assigns the hymn to Agni Rakṣohan "Demon-Smiter," this aspect of the god is very muted in the hymn—found only in verses 1, 7–8 and rather tamely even there. The exuberantly and ingeniously violent punishments envisaged in the other Rakṣohan hymn in X (X.87) are entirely absent. Instead the dominant picture is of a peaceful sacrificial hearth in which the fire responds happily to the attentions, and especially the butter oblations, of his worshipers. Stylistically the hymn is characterized by chaining: the repetition of a word or phrase from one verse in the next, with a different word or phrase from that verse repeated in the following one.

1. O Agni, you strike down the devourer as you shine here among mortals in your own dwelling place, o you of blazing commandment.
2. You stand up when you are well bepoured. You rejoice in response to the ghee, when the ladles have converged on you.
3. When bepoured, he shines widely. Agni is to be reverently invoked with a hymn;
   his face is anointed with the ladle.
4. Honey-faced Agni, when bepoured, is fully anointed with ghee, bringing radiant goods as he shines.
5. Awakening, you become fully kindled, o you who carry the oblations to the gods;
   upon you do mortals call.
6. O mortals, serve immortal Agni with ghee, the undeceivable lord of the household.
7. With undeceivable flame, o Agni, burn demonic power.
   Shine as the herdsman of truth.
8. With your face, o Agni, flame against the sorceresses, as you shine among those dwelling far and wide [/the Urukṣayas].
9. With their hymns those dwelling far and wide [/the Urukṣayas] have fully kindled you, the oblation-carrier, the best sacrificer among the people descended from Manu.

X.119 (945) Self-Praise of the "Lapwing" [laba]

Laba Aindra
13 verses: gāyatrī

A famous and often translated 1st-person account of the experience of soma-drinking. Who the 1st-person speaker is meant to be has generated much discussion. The Anukramaṇī calls this the ātmastuti "self-praise" of a laba (a word that does not appear in the hymn or in the R̥gveda), a particular type of bird, the lapwing—while commentators have generally identified the speaker either as the poet or as a particular god, usually Indra or Agni. We are inclined toward a version of the interpretation of George Thompson (2003). Thompson situates the hymn in the genre of ātmastuti, with its boastful self-assertion and the impersonation, or role-playing, by a poet of "a divine agent." Under this interpretation, the speaker is fundamentally the poet, but the poet consciously taking on the voice and identity of another entity or entities—in our view, both that of a bird and that of a god, indeed of Indra.

The presence of the poet is clearest in his claims about his mind and the thought that approaches him and that he shapes (vss. 1, 4–5). It is even possibly visible in the spirited refrain—"Have I drunk of the soma? Yes!"—in which the speaker interrogates himself and only after this internal verbal exchange asserts that he has consumed soma. (One might suggest, only partially in jest, that Indra would not need this verbal self-reassurance.) To characterize the soma-drinking experience the poet borrows the identity of a bird, suggesting that the overwhelming sensation is that of flight, lifting him up (vss. 2–3), making the people on the ground seem impossibly small and insignificant (vs. 6) and his own wings large enough to cover the cosmos (vss. 7, 11). But this prodigious creature cannot be only a bird, for the speaker boasts of his control of the cosmic spaces and his ability to move the earth at will (vss. 8–10). These boasts are most appropriate to Indra, who commonly manipulates cosmic entities, who is most likely to engage in self-vaunting ātmastuti (cf., e.g., X.48–49), and who is the archetypal soma-drinker among the gods. The hymn ends (or almost ends) with the apparent epiphany of Indra in verse 12, triumphantly announced by "here I am" (ahám asmi) and calling attention to his presence in the ritual arena.

The final verse (13) seems an anticlimax, and its contents also sit uneasily in the rest of the hymn. The identity that this 1st-person speaker claims, that of oblation-carrier (havyavā́hana), is responsible for the view that the speaker throughout the hymn is Agni, for havyavā́hana and its variant havyaváh are always epithets of that god. But the fact that Agni speaks this verse does not require that he be the speaker in the rest of the hymn. In our view this verse, like many final verses, marks a shift of subject or a coda. The speaker is indeed Agni. It seems possible that Indra's epiphany in the preceding verse has brought him face to face with the principal god of the ritual and the ritual ground, namely Agni, and that Agni borrows the rhetoric of Indra to make his own counter-boast and assert the importance of his own role—though his somewhat pedestrian self-comparison to a well-equipped household contrasts almost comically with the soaring and exuberant language of the rest of the hymn.

1. Yes for sure! Yes (says) my mind: I could win cow and horse—yes!
   – Have I drunk of the soma? Yes!
2. Forth like raging winds, the draughts have lifted me up.
   – Have I drunk of the soma? Yes!
3. The draughts have lifted me up, like swift horses a chariot.
   – Have I drunk of the soma? Yes!
4. A thought has come up close to me, like a bellowing cow to her dear son.
   – Have I drunk of the soma? Yes!
5. Like an artisan a chariot-box, I bend the thought around with my heart.
   – Have I drunk of the soma? Yes!
6. Because the five peoples have not appeared to me to be even a speck…
   – Have I drunk of the soma? Yes!
7. Because both world-halves are not equal to even one wing of mine…
   – Have I drunk of the soma? Yes!
8. By my greatness I have surmounted heaven and this great earth.
   – Have I drunk of the soma? Yes!
9. Blast it! I will set down this earth here—or over here.
   – Have I drunk of the soma? Yes!
10. I will keep smiting the earth to blazes—here or over there.
    – Have I drunk of the soma? Yes!
11. In heaven is one wing of mine; I have dragged the other below.
    – Have I drunk of the soma? Yes!
12. Here I am—greater than great, sped upward to the clouds.
    – Have I drunk of the soma? Yes!
13. As a household that is properly equipped, I journey as the carrier of the oblations to the gods.
    – Have I drunk of the soma? Yes!

X.120 (946) Indra

Bṛhaddiva Ātharvaṇa
9 verses: triṣṭubh

For most of its length this hymn is a fairly straightforward praise of Indra, his powers, and his victories. There is special emphasis also on the relation between Indra and his verbally active “helpers.” The relationship is hierarchal—Indra is supreme—but also reciprocal, in that the helpers cheer him on and fortify him for his exploits (esp. vss. 1–4). The helpers are not named; the two most prominent Indra myths, Vṛtra and Vala, both feature a troop aiding or encouraging Indra: the Maruts and the Aṅgirases respectively. It is thus possible that either or both groups are meant here, and, further, that human poets are assimilated to these divine choruses (see vs. 4).

The encouragement becomes more personal in verse 5, where a 1st-person speaker assumes the role of verbal inciter. This is surely the poet himself, but, we will claim, not a mere human poet. The last two verses of the hymn (8–9) summarize the performance context of the hymn. Verse 8 begins "Bṛhaddiva speaks these sacred formulations to Indra," and Bṛhaddiva is named again as the poet in verse 9 (as well as being so identified by the Anukramaṇī). But verse 9 introduces a puzzle or a surprise, for it begins, "In this way Bṛhaddiva addressed his own self—that is, Indra." It is difficult to read the sentence in any other way, though many have tried, but if Indra is the same as Bṛhaddiva, who is Bṛhaddiva?

A way to a solution to this conundrum has been presented by Hanns-Peter Schmidt, though he himself does not discuss this hymn. As Schmidt convincingly argues (1968), Bṛhaspati was originally an epithet and aspect of Indra, especially in the Vala myth, in which Indra uses not brute strength but verbal skill to open the Vala cave and release the stolen cows. Bṛhaspati becomes detached from Indra and treated as a separate god, but this process is a protracted one and can be observed happening in the Ṛgveda. We suggest that this hymn reflects an awareness of their original identity and their growing separateness, with the verbally adroit Bṛhaspati, master of sacred formulations (bráhman; see vss. 5d and 8a), praising his other self, the king and victorious warrior Indra. The name Bṛhaddiva (lit., "possessing lofty heaven") is reminiscent of Bṛhaspati, and the sacred formulations he addresses to Indra in verse 8 precisely concern the Vala myth, the locus of their identification.

1. Just this was the foremost among living beings, from which the mighty one of vibrant manly spirit was born.
   As soon as he is born, he melts down his rivals, while all his helpers cheer him on.
2. Having grown strong through his swelling power, he of much might, as rival to the Dāsa, creates terror for him.
   On your winning the animate and the inanimate, (your helpers) bellow to you together at the presentation (of the soma), at the revels.
3. All bend their will toward you, even when these helpers are twice or three times as many.
   "Send the sweeter than sweet surging together with the sweet. With honey, battle for that honey yonder."
4. For it is even in those words that at every revel the inspired poets cheer you on as you win the stakes.
   Stretch your mightier (bow) taut, bold one. Let the sorcerers of evil ways not deceive you.
5. Through you we have become exultant in our battles, as we see before us the many fights to be fought.
   I rouse your weapons with my words; I hone your vital powers with my sacred formulation.

6. (I praise) him who is worthy of praise, the craftsman possessing many forms, the strongest Āptya of Āptyas.
   He will shatter the seven Dānus with his swelling strength; he will overcome the many opposing forces.
7. You deposited this, both the nearer and the farther, in the house in which you helped with your help.
   You cause the two parents [=Heaven and Earth], who were in motion, to stay still, and then you spur on many deeds.
8. Bṛhaddiva speaks these sacred formulations fortissimo to Indra: "the first to win the sun, he has dominion over the great cowpen of the sovereign king, and he opened up all the doors that are his own."
9. In this way, great Bṛhaddiva, the Atharvan, addressed his own self—that is, Indra.
   The stainless sisters, who stay by their mother, speed him with swelling strength and make him strong.

X.121 (947) Ka "Who?"

Hiraṇyagarbha Prājāpatya
10 verses: triṣṭubh

This hymn takes the form of a cosmogony, but here the creative principle is unnamed or has no name. Rather than declaring its deity, the hymn's refrain is a question: "Who is the god to whom we should do homage with our oblation?" Although without a name, the deity has a form. In the first verse the poet calls it hiraṇyagarbhá "the golden embryo" (vs. 1a), the yolk of an egg (cf. Lommel 1939), thus anticipating later myths of creation from a world-egg (e.g., Vāmana Purāṇa Saromāhātmya XXII.17). But the "golden embryo" is also the sun, which here is born as the center of the cosmos. Toward the end of the hymn, in verse 7, the poet gives the still unnamed principle a second identity not just as a god but as "the life of the gods" (devā́nām… ásuḥ). The last verse finally attaches a name to the unnamed principle, but this verse is a later addition (Oldenberg 1888: 248), reflecting a redactional effort not to leave the mystery of this principle unresolved. In that verse the deity is revealed to be Prajāpati, the "Lord of Creatures," who in the Brāhmaṇas is both the creator god and the archetype of the sacrifice. Later tradition confirms the identity of this principle by understanding the constantly repeated ká "who?" to be a name of Prajāpati. Accordingly the Anukramaṇī designates Ka as the deity of this hymn.

In a very perceptive interpretation of the hymn Proferes (2007: 140–41) shows the relation of this hymn to the ideology of kingship. In the royal unction ritual the king is reborn by means of the unction waters as a being with the power and brilliance of the sun. This hymn reproduces the elements of that rite: the conception of an embryo (vss. 1, 7) and a ruler (vss. 1, 2, 3), the waters (vss. 7, 8, 9) that bear an embryo (vs. 7), and the birth of fire (vs. 7). The unnamed principle encompasses the entire world (vss. 4, 5, 10), and its power extends in every direction (vs. 4) and over every being (vss. 2, 3, 8), as the king (ideally) is the master of the world, whose power extends everywhere. Likewise, the unnamed principle supports the world—making it firm (vs. 5) and steady (vss. 5, 6)—and gives it life (vss. 2, 7), as the king maintains and preserves the world.

Structurally, the hymn is organized as an almost unbroken series of dependent clauses. The first series of relative clauses, hanging off the main clauses in verse 1, lasts from verses 2 through 6. Verse 7 then re-establishes the pattern, for it has a main clause, on which the relative clauses in verse 8 depend. The phrase "he alone existed" in verses 1b and 8c create a ring, which defines the boundaries of the main body of the hymn. Outside this ring and outside the main body of the hymn, verse 9 repeats in miniature the pattern of preceding verses. It has a main clause in 9a, which is followed by three more relative clauses and concluded by the refrain. The verse is an appeal to the unnamed deity to do no harm, making it also thematically distinct from the main body of the hymn. Like verse 10, it too may have been a later addition, as Thieme (1964: 69) has asserted.

1. The golden embryo evolved in the beginning. Born the lord of what came to be, he alone existed.
   He supports the earth and the heaven here— – Who is the god to whom we should do homage with our oblation?
2. Who is the giver of breath, the giver of strength; whose command all honor, whose command the gods honor; whose shadow is immortality, whose shadow is death— – Who is the god to whom we should do homage with our oblation?
3. Who became king of the breathing, blinking, moving world—just he alone by his greatness; who is lord of the two-footed and four-footed creatures here— – Who is the god to whom we should do homage with our oblation?
4. Whose are these snow-covered mountains [=the Himalayas] in their greatness; whose is the sea together with the world-stream, they say;
   whose are these directions, whose (their) two arms [=the zenith and nadir?]— – Who is the god to whom we should do homage with our oblation?
5. By whom the mighty heaven and earth were made firm; by whom the sun was steadied, by whom the firmament; who was the one measuring out the airy realm in the midspace— – Who is the god to whom we should do homage with our oblation?
6. Toward whom the two battle lines [=heaven and earth] looked, steadied with his help, though trembling in mind, (those) upon which the risen sun radiates. – Who is the god to whom we should do homage with our oblation?

7. When the lofty waters came, receiving everything as an embryo and giving birth to the fire, then the life of the gods evolved alone— – Who is the god to whom we should do homage with our oblation?
8. Who by his greatness surveyed the waters receiving (ritual) skill (as an embryo) and giving birth to the sacrifice; who, the god over gods, alone existed. – Who is the god to whom we should do homage with our oblation?
9. Let him not do us harm—he who is the progenitor of earth or who, with foundations that are real, engendered heaven, and who engendered the gleaming, lofty waters. – Who is the god to whom we should do homage with our oblation?
10. O Prajāpati! No one other than you has encompassed all these things that have been born.
 Let what we desire as we make oblation to you be ours. We would be lords of riches.

X.122 (948) Agni

Citramahas Vāsiṣṭha
8 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 1, 5

Attributed to a Vasiṣṭhid by the Anukramaṇī, this hymn ends (vs. 8) with a mention of the Vasiṣṭhas and with the Vasiṣṭha refrain from Maṇḍala VII. It is a fairly standard praise of Agni, deploying a wide range of his standard epithets and ritual roles and titles. The ritual is the complete focus of the hymn, and the rewards that the sacrificer will receive from properly performing it and serving Agni are also at the forefront. There is much recycling of vocabulary.

1. Him, of brilliant might like a Vasu, will I hymn—the precious, kindly guest, not to be despised.
 He will bestow all-nourishing riches—Agni the Hotar, the Houselord— and an abundance of heroes.
2. Taking pleasure, Agni, delight in my speech, knowing all the (ritual) patterns, o very effective one.
 You with your cloak of ghee—set the course for the sacred formulation. Following your commandment the gods begot (it).
3. As you, the immortal, circle the seven domains, as you do pious work for the pious, be generous to the one who performs (rituals) well with wealth rich in heroes ready to hand, o Agni. Whoever has reached toward you with a kindling stick, take pleasure in him.

4. The beacon of the sacrifice, the foremost one set in front do the seven (priests) offering oblations reverently invoke as prizewinner—Agni who hears them, the bull with ghee on his back, the god who gives to the giver an abundance of heroes.
5. You are the foremost messenger, worthy to be chosen. Being summoned for immortal (soma?), become exhilarated (on it).
   You did the Maruts groom in the house of the pious; you did the Bhr̥gus illuminate with praises.
6. In milking all-nourishing refreshment out of the good milker for the sacrificer who is pleasing to the sacrifice, o very effective one, and in making the circuit three times around the truths, around the sacrifice, while shining ghee-backed, o Agni, you well display your effective power.
7. Just to you, at the brightenings of this dawn, did the sons of Manu perform sacrifice, on making you their messenger.
   You have the gods strengthened to be magnified, rubbing melted butter down (on your body) at the ceremony, o Agni.
8. The Vasiṣṭhas have called you down, the prizewinner, as they hymn you, o Agni—the ritual adepts at the rites.
   Uphold among the sacrificers the thriving of wealth. – Do you protect us always with your blessings.

X.123 (949) Vena

Vena Bhārgava
8 verses: triṣṭubh

A famous and mystical hymn, whose opacity still defies complete comprehension although its main features are clear. The subject is announced in the first words of the first verse: "this Seeker" (ayám vénaḥ), and the Anukramaṇī also attributes the hymn to the same figure, or his multiform: Vena Bhārgava. This poet is also credited with the soma hymn IX.85 by the Anukramaṇī, and the last four verses of that hymn (9–12), which contain phraseology quite similar to X.123 and which we might term "Vena without Tears," help clarify X.123. What is at issue is the common identification of Soma and the Sun, united in the Seeker figure, who is also identified as a Gandharva (vss. 4 and 7) and as a bird (vss. 5–6). Most verses are applicable to either Soma or the Sun, and, as is common in hymns with such dual referents, the effort of fashioning phraseology that works for both referents accounts for many of the enigmas in the hymn, beginning with the birth and first appearance of the Seeker in verses 1–2.

It is noteworthy that the Seeker is also eagerly sought: the inspired poets pursue him (vss. 1, 4, probably 6), as do women seeking a husband (vs. 2) and mothers (vs.

3)—both feminine references probably standing for the hymns produced by these poets. Needless to say, both Soma and the Sun are regularly the object of such poetic attentions, and the intimate bond between poets and what they celebrate is a prominent theme in the hymn.

Less prominent, but perhaps not less important, is the theme of name-and-form. This first surfaces explicitly in verse 4, where it is their recognition of the form of the Seeker that inspires the poets' longing for him. In the same verse the Seeker, as Gandharva, finds "the immortal names." Later, in verse 7, this same Gandharva engenders his own names. These verses seem to adumbrate the later preoccupation with name and form as representing the creation of the multiplicity of objects in the world by the division of the formless into "forms" and the assignment of "names" to each in order to differentiate them. This theme is treated with great skill and subtlety also in III.38. In this hymn here the Gandharva's engendering his own names in the penultimate verse of the hymn leads to a climax of sorts in the final verse (8), though one that is quite downplayed. In that final verse the undifferentiated figure of Soma/Sun is actually divided into its two constituent parts, though neither is mentioned by name. The first half of the verse concerns the drop (drapsá), a word regularly used of Soma, while the second half has as its subject bhānú "radiance," which is especially characteristic of the Sun. Through the power of the poets' perception of the true "form" of things and their ability to assign them "names," Sun and Soma emerge at the end of the hymn as separate, though mutually dependent, entities.

1. This Seeker here spurs on those females whose embryo is the dappled one—he whose afterbirth is light—in the measuring out of the airy realm.
   At the union of the waters and the sun, the inspired poets lick him with their thoughts like an infant (calf).
2. The Seeker raises up a wave from the sea. The cloud-born one, the top of the delightful one has been sighted, as the glint on the back of truth, on its upper surface. (All) the "brides-to-be" have roared toward the same womb.
3. The mothers of the calf, who are many though stemming from the same nest, stand there bellowing [/yearning] toward the same (womb).
   Having stridden onto the back of truth, the voices lick at the immortal honey.
4. Recognizing his form, the inspired poets longed (for him). Because they came toward the cry of the wild buffalo, approaching with truth they mounted onto the stream. The Gandharva found the immortal names.
5. The Apsaras, the maiden smiling coyly at her lover, bears him in the highest distant heaven.
   He roamed among the wombs of the dear one [masc.], himself being dear; he sat on a golden wing—he is the Seeker—

6. When they, seeking with their heart, gazed upon you, an eagle flying to the vault, the golden-winged messenger of Varuṇa, the (omen-)bird fluttering in the womb of Yama.
7. The Gandharva stood erect upon the vault, facing outward, bearing his dazzling weapons; wearing a fragrant cloak, (lovely) to be seen like the sun, he engendered his own dear names.
8. When the (soma-)drop goes to the sea, seeing with the eye of a vulture in the spreading expanse, the (sun's) radiance with its bright blaze, finding pleasure (in it [=drop]), has created its own dear (names) in the third realm.

X.124 (950) Various Gods

Agni (2–4), Agni, Varuṇa, and Soma (1, 5–9)
9 verses: triṣṭubh, except jagatī 7

SWJ

This dialogue hymn may be one of the most discussed poems in the R̥gveda, and the number, variety, and contradictory nature of its interpretations are truly astounding—far too many and too diverse to be summed up here. (For a brief characterization of many of these treatments see W. E. Hale [1986: 86–92], and for a recent and intriguing interpretation see Proferes [2007: 121–27].)

The hymn begins with an address to Agni by Indra (vs. 1); Agni answers in verse 2 and, in many interpretations, continues to speak in verses 3 and 4—though I follow the opinion that Varuṇa and Soma are the speakers of those two verses. Indra returns as speaker in verses 5 and 6, addressed to Varuṇa and Soma respectively. The last four verses (7–10) appear to be the words of the poet.

In his speech Indra is attempting to coax the other gods addressed to join him in his new sacrifice, leaving behind their old ways and their old kin group. The gods need little persuasion. After Indra promises to make him the oblation-bearer in verse 1, Agni agrees with alacrity to go "as a god, from the non-god" and "from my own fellowship to an alien lineage" (vs. 2). In verse 3 Varuṇa (if he is the speaker; otherwise Agni again) echoes this proposed journey, in the expression "I go from the non-sacrificial to the sacrificial portion," while in verse 4 Soma (again, if he is the speaker) "chooses Indra" and "leaves the father," ending the verse with the ringing declaration: "the kingship has made a revolution."

Thus the subject of the hymn seems to be nothing less than a radical political and religious reconfiguration, with shifting alliances leading to a fundamental realignment of the major divinities and to a new sacrificial order and a new rule. What has intensified the scholarly debate about this hymn is the assumed identity of the losing side. In verse 3 we find "Father Asura" (or "the lordly father"), presumably the same father that Soma leaves after choosing Indra in verse 4. In verse 5 Indra asserts that the Asuras (or "lords") have lost their māyā or "magic powers," while the first divinity to leave, Agni, begins verse 2 with the emphatic ádevād deváḥ "from a non-god (I) a god..." It has thus been difficult not to consider this hymn in the context of the vexing question about the Asura–Deva rivalry so prominent in Vedic prose, mirrored in the Avestan Ahura–Daēuua split, but complicated by the R̥gveda, which shows almost no signs of such a rivalry or even of a defined group of Asuras distinct from the Devas. Despite these R̥gvedic lacunae it was still tempting to see in this hymn a depiction of the overthrow of the Asuras by the Devas and a number of scholars have done so, although there are important counterindications—not least the passage just cited where Agni asserts his identity as a god even as he is leaving his own kin-group, supposedly the Asuras.

I will not pursue this particular question further, for want of space (and a disinclination to engage in a debate unlikely ever to be satisfactorily resolved). I will, however, point out a striking feature of the hymn that seems not to have been sufficiently noted. Whoever the two opposing parties in this revolution were, the power shift from one to the other was remarkably peaceful, especially for the R̥gveda, where most conflicts have violence as their defining characteristic. This peacefulness is emphasized throughout the hymn. Agni refers to the non-god he left as "being kindly disposed" (śivá), apologetically describing himself as "unkind" (áśiva) in leaving (vs. 2c). Varuṇa seems to counter this in verse 3c by proclaiming to Father Asura that Agni was indeed kind (śéva) (in my interpretation: this pāda has been variously interpreted). In verse 7 Varuṇa is said to have released the waters "without an excess of power," and the waters thus released "make peace with each other." In verse 8 Indra "dwells peacefully" amid his subjects. The only violence in the hymn is prospective: the smashing of Vr̥tra foreseen by Indra in verse 6, once Soma has allied himself with Indra. The hymn is all about negotiation and a sort of sacrificial horse-trading: see Indra's offers of important roles to Agni (1c), Varuṇa (5d), and Soma (6d). Indra even begs Varuṇa to "love" him (5b). The principal figures "choose" their side and their ruler (Soma in 4b and even the female rivers in 8b) and make their own moves, as emphasized by the repeated verbs of motion ("come!" 1a; "going... I go,... I leave,... I go" 2; "I go" 3d; "I leave... they bestir themselves... (I) coming here" 4; "come!" 5d; "come forth!" 6c). The peaceful and voluntary nature of the change in alliances—the lack of retaliation by the deserted side, the lack of interest in pursuing their advantage and crushing their opponents by the winning side—distinguishes this episode not only from almost every other such situation in the R̥gveda but also from the perpetual conflict and reflexive hostility between Asuras and Devas in middle Vedic literature—an indication, perhaps, that that rivalry is not the context in which to interpret this hymn.

Although, given the apparent failure of so many R̥gvedic interpreters to identify the deserted party successfully, it is foolhardy to suggest my own candidate, I will make an unemphatic essay in that direction. Note first that the figure most clearly left behind by the deserting gods is a "father"—qualified once as Father Asura/lordly father (3c), once just as father (4b). Note also the first half of verse 6, where Indra points to the sun and its previous preeminence on the scale of value, but suggests that it is now eclipsed or rivaled by the light of the broad midspace. Let us also remember the heads of the pantheons in Greek and Roman mythology, Zeus Patēr and Iuppiter respectively, and the curious fact that the cognate figure in ancient India, formulaically transparent Dyaus Pitar "Father Sky/Heaven," has no comparable prominence in Vedic mythology though he is reasonably well attested in the texts. On putting these clues together, it seems possible that the old sky-centered religion focused on the inherited paternal divinity Dyaus quietly gave way to one located in realms closer to men, where divinities concerned themselves with issues important to mankind, such as the release of the waters (vss. 7–8), and actively sought the praise and sacrificial offerings of men (vs. 9 and, by implication, throughout the hymn). Dyaus Pitar remained a revered figure but played little role in the sacrificial system. There was thus no violent rupture in the social or religious fabric, just a peaceful fading into well-but-perfunctorily-honored irrelevance for Dyaus, displaced by ritual-centered gods like Agni and Soma and those deeply involved with men's affairs, ethically (Varuṇa) or martially (Indra).

JPB

In the introduction above, SWJ expresses well-considered doubt about the possibility of ever resolving the interpretive difficulties of this hymn. In trying once again to understand the narrative and situation behind it, I know I risk adding yet another not quite convincing interpretation to an already large stack of not quite convincing interpretations. But this hymn is difficult to avoid, because it is central to one of the more intriguing questions of Vedic religious history: When and how does the story of the conflict of Devas and Asuras develop? There is little possible evidence and still less likely evidence in the R̥gveda for this narrative staple of the later Vedic and classical traditions. We have pointed out several passages that might reflect it, but even these are not certain (see, for example, X.53.4 and 157.4). However, as my colleague pointed out above, a number of scholars have cited X.124 not only as evidence for the definition of the Asuras as a group of deities distinct from and in opposition to Devas but also as evidence—the only evidence—for an elaborate narrative in which former Asuras shift to the side of the Devas (see, for example, Brown 1919: 100, Kuiper 1975, Oberlies 1998: 391).

In Brereton (forthcoming b), I have proposed a different approach to the hymn. I try to show that this hymn asserts a human claim of succession after the death of a previous ruler. The hymn is indeed a dialogue, but I identify the speakers differently from their assignment below. Verse 1, I believe, is not in the voice of Indra, but in that of the sacrificer, in whose rite the hymn was recited. The first three pādas are a fairly standard invitation to Agni to come to the sacrifice. It is only in the last pāda that the verse takes an unexpected turn: "For a long time," it states, Agni has "lain in long darkness." That is to say, the ritual fire has been extinguished. The later Veda prescribes that the ritual fire be extinguished at the death of a sacrificer, and therefore at least one possibility is that this summons to Agni is a summons to return after such a death. Verse 2 is Agni's response: he has departed from one who was a mortal, a "non-god," but he now returns to his new life as the sacrificial fire of a living sacrificer. In verse 3 the new sacrificer welcomes Agni, who previously was the guest of the old sacrificer, to the "many domains of truth," the places where the new sacrificer has now installed the sacrificial fires. The sacrificer then proclaims a kindness for his "lordly father," the deceased sacrificer, thus identifying the old sacrificer as both his own father and a "lord," a ruler. The kindness he offers is the continuation of his father's ritual performance, which will guarantee his father's life in the realm of the ancestors, and in this way he converts Agni's "unkindness" in deserting his father to an act of kindness. In verse 4 Agni once again speaks. For many years he acted "within it"—if antár asmin refers to the sacrifice obliquely mentioned in verse 3—or "within him," within the sphere or authority of the old sacrificer. But now Agni chooses "Indra." As in IV.42, the coronation hymn of King Trasadasyu, "Indra" here is the new king. "The kingship has made a revolution," Agni declares, for there is a new king, and Agni promises to do what he can to help in the institution of that king's rule. To this the new sacrificer and king replies, now addressing Varuṇa, who has been made present by Agni. He says that rival lords lack the ability to rule, and therefore Varuṇa should come and govern with him and in support of him.

In my view the dialogue ends with verse 5. In verse 6 the sacrificer and new king makes a final declaration, in which he explicitly identifies himself with Indra, here by assuming Indra's most characteristic deed, the destruction of Vr̥tra. The final three verses are in the voice of the priestly narrator. In verse 7 he identifies the new king with Varuṇa by attributing to him the deeds of Varuṇa, and in verse 8 the new king once again becomes Indra. Finally in verse 9 the sage poets "discern" Indra. And where do they discern him? In the king, who acts in accordance with the praise that follows him!

Thus, the hymn parallels IV.42, in which Trasadasyu acts as both Varuṇa and Indra in peace and in war. Unlike Trasadasyu, however, the claimant here seems to have had opposition, which would have made the ritual affirmation of his rule all the more essential. In this interpretation, ásura "lord" or "lordly" dissolves as a designation for a group of gods. In its two occurrences, in the singular in verse 3 and in the plural in verse 5, ásura refers to human lords, not to gods or antigods or old gods. And not only does it refer to humans, but also to quite different humans: in verse 3 to the predecessor of the sacrificer and in verse 5 to the sacrificer's enemies or rivals.

1. [Indra:] Come right up to this sacrifice of ours here, Agni, with its five tracks, three circles, seven threads.

You will be our oblation-carrier and the one who goes in front of us. For a long time indeed you have lain in long darkness.

2. [Agni:] Going in concealment and hiding, I go, as a god, from the non-god, foreseeing immortality for myself.
   When I unkindly leave (him), though he is kindly disposed, from my own fellowship I go to an alien lineage.
3. [Varuṇa:] Seeing (him [=Agni]) as the guest of the other branch, I measure out the many domains of truth.
   I proclaim (him [=Agni]) as kindly to the lordly father [/Father Asura]. From the one without sacrifice I go to a sacrificial portion.
4. [Soma:] I have "done" many years within him. (Now) choosing Indra, I leave the father.
   Agni, Soma, Varuṇa—they bestir themselves. The kingship has made a revolution; I help it (along), by coming here.
5. [Indra:] These lords [/Asuras] have lost their magic powers. And if you, Varuṇa, will love me, sifting untruth out from truth, o king, come here to the overlordship of my kingdom.
6. [Indra:] Here is the sun—it alone used to be the thing of value. (But now) there is this coming to light—the broad midspace.
   Let us two smash Vr̥tra—come forth, Soma. We shall sacrifice to you with an oblation, though you yourself are an oblation.
7. The poet with his poetic craft has fastened the form (of the sun?) in heaven. Without excess of power Varuṇa released the waters.
   Making peace with each other like (co)wives, the rivers, (though) clear, each variously bear his color.
8. They follow his preeminent Indrian power. He dwells peacefully among them who delight in their independent power.
   They, on choosing him as clans choose a king, recoiling turned away from Vr̥tra.
9. They say that a goose is the yokemate of those who recoiled, a goose roaming in the fellowship of the heavenly waters.
   The one roaming hither and yon in pursuit of the verse of praise have the sage poets discerned to be Indra through their inspired thought.

X.125 (951) Speech

Vāc Āmbhr̥ṇa
8 verses: triṣṭubh, except jagatī 2

Another very famous hymn, to the goddess Speech (Vāc), it is couched as an ātmastuti or "self-praise," and this aspect is certainly quite insistent. The 1st-person speaker uses the word "I" (ahám) fifteen times (not counting other cases of this pronoun), along with numerous 1st-person present-tense verbs. With the fame of the hymn comes a certain carelessness on the part of its many translators, who have tended to smooth out the rough and puzzling places. See, for example, verse 3d, where a more fluent and expected expression might be "I have many stations and enter many things" (compare Doniger O'Flaherty's "I dwell in many places and enter into many forms" and Maurer's "with many a place and entering upon many a form"), but the undoubted causative verb form in the second phrase makes that easy rendering impossible. The praises that Speech heaps upon herself are not necessarily for the things that we expect her to boast about, and as translators and interpreters we must follow the lead of her own grammatical choices.

She begins by asserting her companionship with, indeed her support for, the primary gods and groups thereof (vss. 1–2), as well as for the mortal sacrificer. In verse 3 she sounds the common theme of the divisions of speech, though not in the usual way; in the phrase noted above (3d), she asserts that not only is she found in many places—that is, she has been much subdivided—but that many things enter her—that is, she also encompasses the many entities that make up the world. These contrastive, mirrored images are part of her totalizing project.

Verse 4 and 5 are the center of the hymn and its crux, defined as an omphalos by the framing forms of ā́-√viś "enter" in 3d and 6d and by the repeated vadāmi "I speak / tell" of 4d and 5a. In the first three pādas of verse 4 she depicts speech as that on which the other operations of life depend, but in a curiously oblique way—not through speech directly but through eating. She identifies eating as the central operation and herself as the instrument and facilitator of eating ("through me he eats food"), with the other senses ("who sees, who breathes, who hears . . . ") dependent on the eating. (Other translators tend to elide the distinction between the main clause "he eats food" and the subordinate clauses "who sees," etc., but the contrast is too marked to ignore.) What can she mean by this odd statement? If we are right, (at least) two different things. On the one hand, she is laying claim to the mouth, the organ that engages in both eating and speaking. The other sense organs—eyes (sight), nose (breathing), ears (hearing)—are not involved with either operation. Eating is essential to life: one can't see, breathe, or hear without being alive, which requires food, and so, by their joint location in the mouth, Speech can assert her primary role in eating and thus in staying alive. By this argument, all other sense activities depend on Speech. But we think there is also another, more pointed message here, about the poet, whom she is about to address. The poet makes his livelihood ("eats his food") by producing poetic speech from the inspiration of the goddess Speech, and his sense activity, including the ways in which he receives inspiration, by seeing and hearing especially, as well as his life depends on her.

In the final pāda of verse 4 she addresses the poet directly, with a tour de force of phonological play, much remarked upon in scholarly literature: śrudhí śruta śraddhivám̐ te vadāmi "Listen, o you who are listened to: it's a trustworthy thing

I tell you." The poet is the one who is "listened to" in the world: his verbal products have a privileged status, and she makes him a conduit of her own message. In the following verse (5) she explains how she chooses and anoints her choice as poet and what qualities she invests him with.

After the omphalos verses she returns (vss. 6–8) to a more general and wider focus, asserting her pervasion of Heaven and Earth, indeed of all the worlds, both horizontally and vertically, and even beyond them. Quite striking, and also superficially unclear, is her statement in verse 7a, literally "I give birth to the/a father on his head" (ahám̐ suve pitáram asya mūrdhán). In contrast to most interpretations of this statement, we interpret it in light of a common use of the phrase "the head of heaven" in the R̥gveda as an epithet for Agni (e.g., III.2.14 agním mūrdhā́nam̐ diváḥ). The father is "Father Heaven" (Dyaus Pitar), but "his head" is then actually a reference to fire, most particularly the ritual fire in its deified form Agni. If we are correct, Vāc is returning to the notion of sacrificial speech found earlier in the hymn, implying that speech produced on the ritual ground beside the sacrificial fire in a sense creates and sustains the cosmos. From this restricted space, namely the locus of the sacrifice, speech spreads across all realms and up to heaven. (Under this interpretation, the womb in the waters of 7b could refer to the waters of the soma sacrifice, though this is not necessary.)

In sum, our version of a beloved hymn to a beloved goddess is stranger and perhaps less lovable than its usual interpretations, but also reflects the crafty indirection of the goddess herself.

1. I roam with the Rudras and the Vasus, I with the Ādityas and the All Gods.
   I bear both Mitra and Varuṇa, I Indra and Agni, I both the Aśvins.
2. I bear the swollen soma, I Tvaṣṭar and Pūṣan and Bhaga.
   I establish wealth for the man offering the oblation, who pursues (his ritual duties) well, who sacrifices and presses.
3. I am ruler, assembler of goods, observer foremost among those deserving the sacrifice.
   Me have the gods distributed in many places—so that I have many stations and cause many things to enter (me).
4. Through me he eats food—whoever sees, whoever breathes, whoever hears what is spoken.
   Without thinking about it, they live on me. Listen, o you who are listened to: it's a trustworthy thing I tell you.
5. Just I myself say this, savored by gods and men:
   "Whom I love, just him I make formidable, him a formulator, him a seer, him of good wisdom."
6. I stretch the bow for Rudra, for his arrow to smash the hater of the sacred formulation.
   I make combat for the people. I have entered Heaven and Earth.

7. I give birth to Father (Heaven?) on his (own?) head [=Agni?]; my womb is in the waters, in the sea.
   Thence I spread forth across all worlds, and yonder heaven with its height I touch.
8. I, just like the wind, blow forth, grasping at all worlds, beyond heaven, beyond this earth here—of such size in my greatness have I come into being.

X.126 (952) All Gods

Kulmalabarhiṣa Śailūṣi or Aṃhomuc Vāmadevya
8 verses: upariṣṭādbr̥hatī, except triṣṭubh 8

A simple hymn whose contents are shaped in great part by its meter. The first seven verses are in upariṣṭādbr̥hatī, technically 8 8 8 12. But the last four syllables of the final pāda are a refrain, "beyond hatreds" (áti dvíṣaḥ), giving the impression of an anuṣṭubh verse (8 8 8 8) with a decorative flourish at the end. The principal dedicands of the hymn are the Ādityas, or rather the trio Varuṇa, Mitra, and Aryaman. These appear in scrambled order in verse 1cd, but for the rest of the upariṣṭādbr̥hatī verses (2–7) occupy the entire second pāda in fixed order. This punctuation of each verse with two fixed phrases, each at the end of its hemistich, subordinates the message of each verse to its structure. Fortunately the message is elementary: the gods in question should lead us out of difficulties and to shelter and safety.

A few other gods appear in the hymn: Rudra with the Maruts, and Indra and Agni in verse 5, and Agni in the appended and metrically distinct final verse (8), but their presence barely registers in the very Ādityan atmosphere.

1. O gods, neither narrow straits nor difficult passage reach that mortal whom Aryaman, Mitra, and Varuṇa lead of one accord—beyond hatreds.
2. For we choose that—o Varuṇa, Mitra, Aryaman—by which you rescue a mortal from narrow straits and lead him—beyond hatreds.
3. They are here to aid us now—Varuṇa, Mitra, Aryaman—the best leaders in leading us and the best deliverers in delivering us—beyond hatreds.
4. You protect everyone all around—Varuṇa, Mitra, Aryaman.
   May we be in the dear shelter of you, o you of good guidance—beyond hatreds.
5. The Ādityas (lead) beyond failures—Varuṇa, Mitra, Aryaman.
   We would call on powerful Rudra along with the Maruts, on Indra and Agni, for well-being—beyond hatreds.

6. They are our leaders across—Varuṇa, Mitra, Aryaman—beyond all difficult passages—the kings of the settled domains—beyond hatreds.
7. Let them extend blessing to us to aid us—Varuṇa, Mitra, Aryaman—and broad shelter—the Ādityas, when we implore them—beyond hatreds.
8. Just as then you released the buffalo-cow bound by the foot, you good ones worthy of the sacrifice, so release constraint from us. (Let) our lifetime be further lengthened, o Agni.

X.127 (953) Night

Kuśika Saubhara or Rātri Bhāradvājī
8 verses: gāyatrī

In contrast to the numerous hymns dedicated to the lovely and welcome Dawn, Night is barely celebrated in the Ṛgveda, only in this one hymn. The night described here is not that of the frightening and formless darkness so often mentioned in the text, but rather starry night, who has beauties of her own. In fact, she is described in places (see vss. 2 and 3c especially) with phraseology more appropriate to Dawn, whose own advent is anticipated in verse 7.

1. Goddess Night, while coming hither, has looked about in many places with her eyes.
   She has laid on herself all beauties.
2. The immortal goddess has filled the broad (midspace), its depths and heights; with light she repels the darkness.
3. She has expelled her sister, Dawn—she, the goddess, while coming hither—and darkness will race away.
4. (Be) here for us today—you at whose journey we have settled down, like birds on their nest in the tree.
5. Down have settled the roving bands, down the footed, down the winged, down even the falcons in their busyness.
6. Keep away the she-wolf and the wolf; keep away the thief, o Night.
   But for us become easy to traverse.
7. Darkness, fully ornamented, black, smeared all over (with stars), has approached me.
   O Dawn, settle it like debts.
8. Right up to you have I driven (this hymn), like cows (to their pen). Choose it, o Daughter of Heaven, o Night—like a praise song for a victor.

X.128 (954) All Gods

Vihavya Āṅgirasa
9 verses: triṣṭubh, except jagatī 9

Anxiety about rival sacrifices, a common preoccupation of the R̥gveda, begins and informs this hymn. The first two verses situate the performance of the hymn "at the competing invocation(s)" (vihavá, a derivative of which provides the poet's name, Vihavya, in the Anukramaṇī)—a moment when sacrificers all over the Ārya lands are inviting the same gods to their own separate sacrifices. The poet urges his own case with a series of emphatic fronted 1st-person singular pronominal forms ("mine," "to me," etc.) in the first four verses. The potential competing sacrificers in these early verses are transformed into even more threatening figures as the hymn progress—haters (vs. 5), violent challengers in battle (vs. 6), rivals (vs. 9). The poet then asks for the aid of the gods in repulsing them and in protecting him.

The grammar and diction of the hymn are straightforward and spring no surprises.

1. Mine be the luster at the competing invocations, o Agni. Might we thrive in our body as we kindle you in your body.
   To me let the four quarters bow. With you as our overseer might we win battles.
2. Mine be all the gods at the competing invocation: the Maruts together with Indra, Viṣṇu, and Agni.
   Mine be the midspace, providing a broad place. For me, at my desire, let the wind purify itself [=blow].
3. To me let the gods bring material wealth through sacrifice. In me be the prayer; in me the invocation to the gods.
   The ancient divine Hotars acted with zeal. Might we be free from harm in our body and possessed of good heroes.
4. For me let them sacrifice (with) the oblations that are mine. Let the purpose of my mind come true.
   Let me not fall into any kind of offense. All you gods, speak for us!
5. You six broad goddesses, create broad (space) for us. All you gods, act as heroes here.
   May we not be bereft of offspring, nor of our own bodies. May we not become subject to him who hates us, o King Soma.
6. O Agni, repulsing the battle fury of the others [=the enemy], as an undeceivable herdsman, protect us on every side.
   Let the challengers bearing down turn back: at home their intention will disappear when they awaken.
7. He who is the Ordainer of Ordainers, the lord of creation—him, the god Rescuer, who vanquishes hostility (do I invoke).

Let both the Aśvins and Bṛhaspati (protect) this sacrifice here; let the gods protect the sacrificer from failure.

8. The buffalo of broad expanse will offer shelter to us at this invocation— he who is invoked by many, who provides many cattle.
   Show mercy to our offspring, o you of the fallow bays. Do not harm us nor hand us over.
9. Whoever are our rivals, let them keep away: with Indra and Agni we will thrust them down.
   The Vasus, Rudras, and Ādityas have made me one who touches on high, a formidable observer, an over-king.

X.129 (955) Creation

Prajāpati Parameṣṭhin
7 verses: triṣṭubh

This is one of the most famous hymns of the Ṛgveda, and one of the most significant for later Indian cosmogonies. Because it is elusive and suggestive rather than directly narrative, it has given rise to a wide variety of interpretations. The interpretation we offer here follows the more extensive discussion in Brereton (1999), which also refers to earlier literature and alternate interpretations.

If this is a cosmogonic hymn, it is certainly a strange one, because the last verse does not come to a conclusion but ends with a question. This incompleteness is formally marked by both metrical and syntactic irregularities. The meter of verse 7b is two syllables short, leaving the its hearers to anticipate two beats that are not there, and the syntax of 7d is incomplete since the poem ends with a relative clause without a main clause. A close look at the rest of the hymn explains the reason for these poetic strategies.

In verse 1 there is a progression from negations—what existed was neither existing nor nonexisting and neither space nor heaven existed—to questions (1c) to possibilities (1d). Verse 2 also begins with negation, here the negation of death, deathlessness, and the signs of night and day. The only narrative progress is the greater specificity in verse 2 about what is negated: there are no mortals or immortals, there is no moon or sun. But whereas 1cd continued with questions and possibilities, 2cd provides an answer to the question of what existed: there existed "that One," which "breathed without wind." In 1c the poet asked what "stirred," or more literally what "moved back and forth," and in 2c the implicit answer is that the "breathing" of the One moves back and forth. If 2c answers the question of 1c and indeed if verse 2 defines what verse 1 suggests, then "that One" in verse 2 is the previously undefined thing that was neither existent nor nonexistent in verse 1.

Verse 3 sharpens the sense that nothing is happening, nothing material at least. It apparently starts over once again: 3a ends "in the beginning" (ágre) just as 1a ends

"at that time" (tadā́nīm) and 2a "then" (tárhi). But where verses 1 and 2 asked questions or only hinted at answers, 3a asserts that there was something, namely "darkness" covered by darkness, and 3c describes a "thing coming into being" (ābhú) covered by "emptiness." In verse 3, therefore, "that One" still does not have substance, but it is beginning to have shape, since there is something that is "covered" by something. As Thieme (1964: 66–67) has observed, that shape is the shape of an egg, and it is this egg-like shape that in 3d "was born" or hatched through heat.

Thus far there has been little development of substance, although there has been an evolution of concept. An unidentified subject that neither exists nor does not exist is introduced in verse 1. It has taken conceptual form as the "One" in verse 2, and finally assumed an egg-like shape in verse 3. In verse 4 there is a shift that apparently breaks the continuity of the hymn. According to 4ab, thought gives rise to desire, which is concretized as the "primal semen," the origin of beings. However, there is one thing that connects verses 3 and 4 and maintains the hymn's continuity: "desire" in 4a corresponds to "heat" in 3d. If so, then "thought" in 4b should correspond to the "One" in 3d. And so it does, for "thought" is the hidden metaphor in verses 1–3. In verse 1 it is thought that neither exists nor does not exist, because thought is something real but at the same time something not real, since it is not externally perceptible. Or, to put it another way, thought has shape but no substance, as verse 3 says. This hymn, therefore, shows an omphalos structure, in which the middle verse, in this case verse 4, contains the key to the hymn. Here that key is the revelation that thought is the One, which is the ultimate source of creation. It is not surprising, therefore, that the "connection" (bándhu) between "existing" and "not-existing," the connection that is thought, was discovered by poets "though inspired thinking" (manīṣā́, 4d). In verse 5 this "connection" also becomes a dividing "cord" (raśmí) and through it there emerges the distinction between males (the placers of semen and the offering) and females ("greatnesses," i.e., pregnancies, and independent will).

But even if thought is the ultimate and primal creative act, the origin of the world is still unknown, even by the gods (vs. 6c). If there is an overseer of the world, he might know, or he might not (vs. 7cd). The lack of an answer means that "thinking" will not come to an end. The poem ends with metrical and syntactic irresolution and with a question in order that its hearers are left thinking and in that way left repeating the fundamental act of creation, the act of thinking.

1. The nonexistent did not exist, nor did the existent exist at that time.
   There existed neither the airy space nor heaven beyond.
   What moved back and forth? From where and in whose protection? Did water exist, a deep depth?
2. Death did not exist nor deathlessness then. There existed no sign of night nor of day.
   That One breathed without wind by its independent will. There existed nothing else beyond that.

3. Darkness existed, hidden by darkness, in the beginning. All this was a signless ocean.
   What existed as a thing coming into being, concealed by emptiness—that One was born by the power of heat.
4. Then, in the beginning, from thought there evolved desire, which existed as the primal semen.
   Searching in their hearts through inspired thought, poets found the connection of the existent in the nonexistent.
5. Their cord was stretched across: Did something exist below it? Did something exist above?
   There existed placers of semen and there existed greatnesses. There was independent will below, offering above.
6. Who really knows? Who shall here proclaim it?—from where was it born, from where this creation?
   The gods are on this side of the creation of this (world). So then who does know from where it came to be?
7. This creation—from where it came to be, if it was produced or if not—he who is the overseer of this (world) in the furthest heaven, he surely knows. Or if he does not know…?

X.130 (956) Creation of the Sacrifice

Yajña Prājāpatya
7 verses: triṣṭubh, except jagatī 1

In its first three verses the hymn depicts the creation of the acts of the sacrifice through the image of weaving. The form of the sacrifice was instituted by the gods (vss. 1, 3) and first carried out by the "fathers," the ancient seers who were the ancestors of the current priests (vs. 6). Indeed, these fathers are at the present rite as well (1cd). In verse 2 it becomes complicated because it is difficult to know who the actors are. In 2ab the subject may not be "a man," but "the Man," a figure similar to the Puruṣa of X.90. That is how Sāyaṇa and others have understood it. But it might also refer simply to "a man" in the sense of "a human" and imply that humans have taken up the weaving of the gods and ancestors, and in doing so their activity reaches to heaven. Again in 2cd it is not clear who "they" are who have sat down to weave the sacrifice. They might be the fathers after 1cd, the human priests in continuation of 2ab, or the gods in anticipation of verse 3. Since any of these could have been so described, the ambiguity may be intentional.

Verse 3ab completes the weaving image, although the terminology reflects the ritual as much as it does weaving. The "model" and "image" could be for a woven cloth or a ritual performance. The nidā́na, a "connection" or a "rope," might fit weaving but does not fit the ritual very well. Since according to X.114.2 poets are able to see the hidden "connection," in a ritual context it may describe knowledge that a priest has. On the other hand "melted butter" and a "frame" could find a place in either weaving or ritual. In 3cd the imagery is all from the sacrifice. In 3c the poet mentions the Praügaśastra, which is the second recitation of the Morning Pressing in the classical Agniṣṭoma. The recitation comprises I.2–3, which names the deities who receive soma in the three pressings in an Agniṣṭoma, and may have been singled out because of that. The last line could also be translated "when all the gods sacrificed to the god," but we have understood it as an echo of 6d and X.90.16a (=I.164.50a) yajñéna yajñám ayajanta devā́ḥ "with the sacrifice the gods offered the sacrifice."

The ritual frame described in verses 1–3 is then filled with gods in verses 4–5, verses that link the various meters of Vedic poetry with the major gods of the sacrificial day. There are various associations between a particular meter and a particular god: The sacrificial fire, Agni, begins the sacrificial day, and the gāyatrī meter is associated with the morning soma-pressing. The name of the br̥hatī-meter is similar to the name of Br̥haspati, and Indra hymns are characteristically composed in the triṣṭubh meter. And, balancing Agni and the gāyatrī, the All Gods and the jagatī meter are associated with the evening soma-pressing.

The last two verses recall the ancient sages who ordered the sacrifice and affirm that the priests today follow the path that has been set for them. As Geldner notes, the "courses (of the ritual)" refer to the actions of the ritual to which the recitations are attached.

1. The sacrifice, which is extended in every direction by its warp threads and stretched out by a hundred and one acts of the gods—these fathers who have traveled here weave that. They sit at the warp, saying, "Weave forth, weave back."
2. A man extends it [=the warp] and pulls it up (with the heddles); a man has extended it out upon the vault of heaven here.
   Here are their pegs; they [=the gods?] sat down upon their seat and made the sāman-chants the shuttles for weaving.
3. What was its model, its image? What its connection? What was its melted butter? What was its frame?
   What was the meter? What was the Praüga-recitation, what the hymn?— when all the gods offered the god [=the Sacrifice].
4. The gāyatrī meter became the yokemate of Agni. Savitar has united with the uṣṇihā meter and Soma with the anuṣṭubh meter, gaining greatness through the hymns. The br̥hatī meter helped the speech of Br̥haspati.
5. The virāj meter is the full glory of Mitra and Varuṇa, and the triṣṭubh meter is here Indra's portion of the (sacrificial) day.
   The jagatī meter entered the All Gods. According to this did the seers, the sons of Manu, arrange (the ritual).

6. The seers, the sons of Manu, our fathers, arranged (the ritual) according to this, when the sacrifice was born in ancient times.
   Seeing with my mind as my eye, I think of the ancient ones who offered this sacrifice.
7. The courses (of the ritual were) joined with the praise songs, joined with the meters. The heavenly Seven Seers were joined with the model (of the rite).
   Looking along the path of the ancients, the insightful ones [=the present priests] have taken hold of the reins (of the sacrifice) like charioteers.

X.131 (957) Indra (1–3, 6–7), Aśvins (4–5)

Sukīrti Kākṣīvata
7 verses: triṣṭubh, except anuṣṭubh 4

The Anukramaṇī attributes this hymn to a descendant of Kakṣīvant, the clever wordsmith of I.116–26, and, although the poem is framed by conventional prayers for help to Indra (vss. 1, 6–7), there is more than a flash of Kakṣīvant's brilliance in the intermediate verses, especially 2–3. Moreover, almost half of Kakṣīvant's output consists of Aśvin hymns (I.116–120), indeed, more than half by verse count, and verses 4–5 of our hymn allude to a myth not otherwise found in the Ṛgveda but prevalent in later Vedic, in which the Aśvins figure prominently.

Verses 2 and 3 have a slightly folksy air, using homely images to provide a model for Indra's behavior toward us. In verse 2 the model is the harvesting and threshing of grain; if our interpretation is correct, the poet compares the threshing of the grain, which gets rid of the chaff and keeps only the wholesome grain, to decisions Indra should make about how to distribute goods he has acquired. The goods should come only to us [=the good grain], not to those [=the chaff] who neglect their sacrificial tasks. This image has the type of twist that Kakṣīvant enjoys: the audience thinks at first that the grain is being compared to the "goodies" to be distributed, and when that interpretation doesn't work, they must dig deeper to redistribute the metaphorical roles.

Verse 3 is not as conceptually complex, but it displays a virtuosic density. The first pāda contains the entire metaphorical model: a one-horse vehicle won't succeed, or in an expanded and more literal paraphrase, "there is nothing that, when drawn by a single animal, has traveled in the right way." The implications are then worked out: pāda b suggests that relying on oneself alone will not bring fame; the last half of the verse provides the solution: seek Indra as helper and yokemate.

This message, that everyone needs a helper, is then projected onto the mythological plane, indeed onto the greatest hero—often presented as acting triumphantly alone—Indra. The little snatch of the Aśvin story found in verses 4–5 emphasizes how they and Sarasvatī "helped" Indra in his need. This myth has been much discussed in the literature (see especially Bloomfield [1893] and Oldenberg [1893], as well as Jamison [1991: 98–103]), especially in its relationship to the later Sautrāmaṇī ritual, which in fact utilizes some of the verses in this hymn and which owes its name to the epithet of Indra found in verses 6–7, sutrā́man "of good protection." We will not pursue the issue in detail here. In brief summary, Indra became sick after drinking an excess of soma, and in order to heal him the Aśvins and Sarasvatī had him drink the usually forbidden alcohol surā, which they obtained in one way or another (the methods are different at different periods in Vedic) from the asuric Namuci. The surā was not pure but mixed, and both the Aśvins and Indra are here depicted as performing the singular feat of separating the two mixed liquids in the course of drinking them.

If even Indra occasionally needs helpers, we need feel no shame in seeking one ourselves, and in the last two verses (6–7) we express the hope that Indra will fill this role for us.

1. O overpowering Indra, thrust away all the eastern foes, away the western ones, away the northern ones, o champion, and away the southern ones, so that we might rejoice in your broad shelter.
2. Surely it is like barley-growers and their barley—how they cut it, threshing it according to the old ways—
   (so), here, just here (with us [=grain]) put the goodies of those [=chaff] who have not come for the reverent twisting of the sacred grass.
3. Because a "one-horse" carriage doesn't drive well, so fame has never been acquired (thus) at the encounters.
   Inspired ones, seeking cows, seeking horses, seeking prizes, (seek) the bull Indra for partnership.
4. O Aśvins, having separated the surā-soma by drinking it in company with the asuric Namuci, you helped Indra in his deeds, o lords of beauty.
5. Like parents their son, both the Aśvins helped (you), Indra, through their wondrous skills and sage words.
   When with your powers you separated the surā-soma by drinking it, Sarasvatī healed you, bounteous one.
6. Let Indra be of good protection, of good help with his help, very gracious, affording all possessions.
   Let him thrust away hatred; let him create fearlessness. Might we be lords of good heroes in abundance.
7. May we be in the favor of him who deserves the sacrifice, in his propitious benevolence.
   Let Indra of good protection, of good help to us keep hatred away even from a distance.

X.132 (958) Mitra and Varuṇa

Śākapūta Nārmedha
7 verses: nyaṅkusāriṇī 1, prastārapaṅkti 2, 6, virāḍrūpā 3–5, mahāsatobr̥hatī 7

This metrically messy hymn is, one must say, a mess in every other way as well. Given the serious disturbances in the meter, it is quite possible that many of the problems in the hymn result from faulty transmission, but we must translate what we have, not what we wish we had. At this point it is impossible to produce a satisfying account of the purport of the whole hymn and of its many puzzles of detail, but it is also not possible to supply even a tentative translation without having a prior hypothesis about the underlying aim of the composition. Geldner suggests that a specific political story lies behind it, full of sin, murder, and regal intrigue, but his sketch of this scenario is not convincing.

Our own hypothesis is less dramatic, though perhaps equally unconvincing. We believe that it reflects the ritual innovation happening during this late R̥gvedic period that split the earlier role(s) of sacrificing priest-poet into what in classical śrauta ritual are the "Sacrificer" (Yajamāna, lit. "the one sacrificing for himself"), who actually has little active participation in the sacrifice but provides the material support for it, and the working priests who are the actual physical and verbal performers of sacrifice. The new "Sacrificer" in part takes over the old role of "patron" (sūrí), but maintains a more organic connection to the sacrifice. In this hymn this new type of Sacrificer is celebrated, as is his largesse to us, the working priests. Divine models for this split role with complementary duties are provided in the hymn—primarily by Mitra and Varuṇa, the ostensible dedicands, but also by Heaven and Earth (vss. 1 and 6, with Heaven also paired with Varuṇa in vs. 4) and the Aśvins (vs. 1).

Perhaps the best support for our views is the first verse, which contains three fronted repetitions of the perfect middle participle ījāná "having performed sacrifice for himself," the perfect-stem equivalent of the present middle participle yájamāna "sacrificing for himself" that is substantivized to become the title Sacrificer. This figure is the object of the ministrations of both Heaven and Earth (ab) and the Aśvins (cd). The first half of verse 2 contrastively introduces "us," the priests who are sacrificing (in the active voice, yajāmasi) at the prompting, presumably, of the Sacrificer, who appears in the second half of the verse, in the guise of another middle participle, krāṇá "performing (ritual) for himself." Mitra and Varuṇa bestow their favors on both parties and assure their joint victory over demonic forces.

Verse 3 is particularly challenging and has received numerous clashing interpretations, but we believe that it continues the theme of complementary roles and in fact introduces the motif of the Sacrificer's gifts to the priests. In our view "we," in our priestly role, are seeking to attract Mitra and Varuṇa to the sacrifice (pāda a), while the Sacrificer is represented as the giver in pāda c, with pāda d expressing the hope or expectation that no one can disrupt his gifts to us. Complicating the interpretation is the rare and rather charged word réknas "legacy." However, réknas is several times used of what we gain from the gods at the sacrifice (e.g., I.31.5, 121.5, VI.20.7); in keeping with its etymology (from the root ric "leave"), it can be viewed as what was "left behind" by the gods at the sacrifice, and both the priests and the Sacrificer should receive it, as they both seem to in pādas b and c respectively.

Serious impediments to our (or anyone else's) interpretation arise in the following verses, especially the second half of verse 4 through the first half of verse 5. The first half of verse 5, in a twist on the classic "the one... the other" (anyá... anyá) construction typically used to depict the complementary functions of two individuals, posits the shared or successive kingship of Heaven and Varuṇa. In pāda 4c Varuṇa, addressed in the 2nd person, or Varuṇa or someone else, presented in the 3rd person (the verb is ambiguous), "takes pleasure in the chariot." The chariot could be the chariot of the sacrifice, found also in verse 7b, or the war chariot. The latter seems more likely in the context of the next pāda and the first hemistich of verse 5 and gains resonance from other features of the god Varuṇa. Pāda 5d states that "It is not by such a transgression that (a man) is (called) 'oath-breaker'" (following the reading āntakadhrúk of Eichner-Kühn [1982], who connected it to the seṭ root am "pledge, swear," rather than the previously standard interpretation antaka). What transgression? If it is what is found in the previous pāda, taking pleasure in the chariot, it might be a very oblique reference to Varuṇa's standard functions. It is well known that Varuṇa and Indra often share kingship (see the famous dialogue hymn IV.42), with Indra functioning as king in times of war, Varuṇa in times of peace. If Varuṇa is taking pleasure in the war chariot, his behavior is uncharacteristic and could indeed be considered transgressive, but, the poet tells us, it would not be sufficiently serious to constitute a breach of his normal duties, would not be an oath-breaking infraction. His unaccustomed behavior points to the theme of the hymn, by implication: each member of a pair has his own sphere and venturing out of that sphere may invite suspicion or even blame. (Alternatively, if the subject of pāda c is an unidentified third person, the pleasure that person/god takes in the war-chariot would not brand him as one who has violated his oath to Varuṇa.)

What would be a sufficient transgression is laid out in 5ab and attributed to an individual derogatorily named "Shit-purified" (Śakapūta)—namely, treacherously continuing to attack fallen warriors after a peace-treaty has been concluded. Even if our speculations about the meaning of 4cd–5ab are correct (and there are alternative interpretations; for example that 4ab refers to the passing of power from Father Sky [Dyaus Pitar] to gods such as Varuṇa and Indra possibly depicted in X.124), it is difficult to understand why this bitter little anecdote was inserted into the hymn at this point and just as quickly dropped. Note, by the way, that the Anukramaṇī attributes this hymn to Śakapūta, but it is almost certainly the case that this name was simply plucked from the hymn itself. The Anukramaṇī's patronymic Nārmedha has a better chance of conforming to fact, as the name Nṛmedha is found in the final verse, where poets typically name themselves, and a Nr̥medha Āngirasa is the supposed poet of several other hymns (VIII.89–90, 98–99; IX.27, 29; VIII.90 shows some parallels to our hymn).

The rest of verse 5 and all of verse 6 appear to concern the present sacrifice, where the pair Mitra and Varuṇa are to be found, as well as Heaven and Earth (in a simile)—in addition to Agni and Aditi, for good measure. Again, there are a number of difficulties in the details. The first half of the final verse (7) also takes place at the sacrifice, and it seems to reaffirm the split roles of Sacrificer and priest that we claim provide the subject for the hymn. The "two ruling over property" in pāda a are, of course, Mitra and Varuṇa, but they also represent the Sacrificer-patron figure, while the unnamed subject of pāda b is the actual priestly officiant who will direct the chariot of the sacrifice.

We would be perfectly happy if the hymn had ended with 7b, for the last hemistich presents yet another unsolvable challenge. As noted above, the poet (if that's who it is) Nr̥medha names himself in this half-verse, also under the punning designation Sumedha. But the nature of the exploit he boasts of—the rescue of a certain set of females (or feminine-gender items)—must remain opaque, because the word characterizing the rescued is an impossible hapax, a plural present participle to an apparent denominative verb meaning "seek/behave as/perform kaṇūka," a word with no etymology or apparent relatives. Following Sāyaṇa, most modern translators render it as "lamenting," but this was clearly a desperate, though contextually plausible, guess on the part of Sāyaṇa, and it seems better to leave the poet's punning wordplay or contemporary reference untranslated.

1. The man who has sacrificed for himself—Heaven with its welcomed goods (is occupied in tending) just to him; Earth is (occupied in) tending to him who has sacrificed for himself.
   The two gods, the Aśvins, with their favors have strengthened him who has sacrificed for himself.
2. By reason of the (ritual) prompt we sacrifice to you two, o Mitra and Varuṇa, who uphold the communities and offer good favors.
   By your comradeship for the man who performs (ritual) for himself might we prevail over demons.
3. And even now, when we seek to establish you two here, while coming into possession of our own dear legacy, or when the giver prospers with regard to his legacy, no one shall bring his bounties (for us) into collision [=destroy them].
4. The one, yonder Heaven, was consecrated (as king), but (the other, namely) you, lord Varuṇa, are (now) king of all.
   As head (of all), you take pleasure in the chariot [=war chariot? chariot of the sacrifice?]. It is not by such a transgression that (a man) is (called) "oath-breaker,"

5. But on this (man), on "shit-purified" Śakapūta, is this transgression: even though a (peace) alliance was concluded, he keeps smiting the heroes who have gone down.
   When the charger [=Agni?] has placed the help of *you two in his own dear bodies worthy of the sacrifice—
6. Because, o discerning ones, Aditi, the mother of you two is, like Heaven and Earth, (occupied) in purifying with her milk—
   (all of you,) allot things dear (to us); wash (us) with the rays of the sun.
7. Because you two who rule over property have taken your seats, he [=the priest?] has mounted, like a chariot, the one [=sacrificial fire] sitting at the chariot-pole (of the sacrifice), sitting on the wood.
   Those females of ours, seeking [/behaving like] kaṇūka [?], has Nṛmedha rescued from narrow straits, has "very wise" Sumedha rescued from narrow straits.

X.133 (959) Indra

Sudās Paijavana
7 verses: śakvarī 1–3, mahāpaṅkti 4–6, triṣṭubh 7

The most salient feature of this hymn is the refrain of the first six verses, "let the little bowstrings of the other squirts burst on their bows," an elaboration on the Nābhāka Kāṇva refrain of VIII.39–42 "let all the other squirts burst," though there is no apparent connection between the two poets. Our hymn is attributed to Sudās Paijavana; Sudās is the name of the leading king in the Battle of the Ten Kings, on whose side Indra fought, and it is perhaps not an accident that the first three verses in this hymn are in a form of śakvarī meter (here seven pādas of eight syllables). In VII.33.4 "a lofty cry in śakvarī" is what attracted Indra to fight on the side of Sudās in this battle. It is meter that also provides the possible connection with the Nābhāka Kāṇva hymns just mentioned: the rare śakvarī meter is also found in VIII.40.2, and the likewise rather rare mahāpaṅkti meter (six pādas of eight syllables) of the second three verses of our hymn (4–6) is also the meter of the Nābhāka hymns VIII.39, VIII.40 (save for vss. 2 and 12), and VIII.41.

The hymn celebrates the martial deeds and powers of Indra and urges the god to use his powers against our enemies, both within and without.

1. Chant forth to him a leading chariot (of a hymn), a fortifying (hymn) to Indra.
   As a maker of wide space even in close quarters, a Vṛtra-smiter in combat and conflicts, become our inciter.
   – Let the little bowstrings of the other squirts burst on their bows.
2. You sent the rivers surging downward; you smashed the serpent.

You were born without a rival, Indra; you foster everything of value. We embrace you.
– Let the little bowstrings of the other squirts burst on their bows.

3. All the hostilities of the stranger will disappear, while our poetic insights will reach beyond (those) of the stranger.
You are wont to shoot the murderous weapon at the rival who wishes to smite us, Indra. Your generosity—(that is just) giving goods.
– Let the little bowstrings of the other squirts burst on their bows.
4. Indra, the folk all about who, acting the wolf, will set their sights on us, set them beneath our feet. You are an overpowering oppressor.
– Let the little bowstrings of the other squirts burst on their bows.
5. Indra, whoever of the same lineage assails us and whoever outside the pale—bring his power low. (You are) like great Heaven in your own person.
– Let the little bowstrings of the other squirts burst on their bows.
6. We, seeking you, seize hold of your companionship, Indra.
Lead us along the path of truth, across all difficult passages.
– Let the little bowstrings of the other squirts burst on their bows.
7. O Indra, for us exert your power over her who will milk out a choice thing for the singer—so that the great cow with unsplit udder will swell with milk for us, in a thousand streams.

X.134 (960) Indra

Māndhātar Yauvanāśva (1–6a), Godhā (6b–7)
7 verses: mahāpaṅkti, except paṅkti 7

Although the Anukramaṇī assigns X.133 and X.134 to different poets, they seem to be companion pieces. The latter hymn shares its meter, mahāpaṅkti, with the second triplet (vss. 4–6) of X.133; both hymns are dedicated to Indra and share phraseology (e.g., 133.4bc and 134.2cd); and 134 also has a refrain in its first six verses, though one without the slangy sassiness of 133.1–6.

Like the last hymn, this one asks Indra for help against our enemies and also for bounties. These are of course standard requests, but the imagery toward the end of the hymn (vss. 5–6) is both precise and quirky, particularly the picture of Indra using his ability like a long crook to pull down a high branch and shake down its fruit, an image in turn compared to a goat doing the same with his forefoot. (Anyone familiar with goat behavior will recognize this picture instantly.)

1. When, Indra, you filled the two world-halves, as Dawn does, as the great sovereign king of the great domains did the goddess Begetter beget you, did the auspicious Begetter beget you.

2. Make slack the taut (bow) of the evilly angry mortal.
   Set him beneath our feet—whoever will set his sights on us.
   – The goddess Begetter begat (you), the auspicious Begetter begat (you).
3. Shake down these lofty all-glittering refreshments, you foe-smiter, through your abilities, able Indra, along with all your forms of help.
   – The goddess Begetter begat (you), the auspicious Begetter begat (you).
4. Since you shake down all these, o Indra of a hundred resolves, like wealth for the presser, together with thousandfold forms of help, the goddess Begetter begot (you), the auspicious Begetter begot (you).
5. Like beads of sweat let the missiles fly down, scattered all around like blades of dūrvā grass. Let malevolence go away from us.
   – The goddess Begetter begat (you), the auspicious Begetter begat (you).
6. Because you carry your ability like a long crook, you rich in counsel, you will hold (it) as a goat (does) a branch with its forefoot,
   bounteous one.
   – The goddess Begetter begat (you), the auspicious Begetter begat (you).
7. O gods, never do we confound, never do we efface (them):
   we practice obedience to your solemn utterances.
   We grab onto (you) here by the sides, by the shoulders.

X.135 (961) Yama

Kumāra Yāmāyana
7 verses: anuṣṭubh

Both baffling and deeply engrossing, this hymn has given rise to a multitude of interpretations, none of which produces a completely satisfactory reading. Without discussing previous interpretations in detail, we will add our own, with no expectation that it will meet with any more acceptance than those that preceded it.

It is generally (but not universally) agreed that it concerns a death, either that of a boy or that of his father, and the journey to (or from) the realm of Yama, the ruler of the dead (see, e.g., X.14). Both a boy (kumārá, vss. 3–5) and a father (vs. 1) are explicitly mentioned in the hymn, and we follow those who consider the dead man to be the father. The pleasant place over which Yama has domain is described in the first and last (7) verses; in the first verse the dead person is traveling there, while in the last he seems to have reached it successfully.

The first two verses appear to be spoken by the boy whose father has just died. He imagines his father's journey to Yama (vs. 1), and in verse 2 he displays a psychologically plausible ambivalence: he longs to see his father again, but recoils from even the thought of following him on his road to the realm of the dead. The solution to his psychological dilemma seems to be given in verses 3–4: the boy creates a mental chariot without wheels that he mounts without seeing it, and presumably this vehicle carries him to his father without the rigors of the journey. To us this mental conveyance suggests a dream, and many of us have experienced such reunions with the beloved dead in dreams. But the chariot can also be (and in vs. 4 more likely is) the ritual, quite possibly the correctly performed funeral service for his father.

The real problems in this hymn are found in verses 5–6 and in particular the word anudéyī, found in both verses (5d, 6a) in identical phrases. Although the word is a transparent gerundive, in the feminine, formed to the lexeme ánu-√dā "hand over, concede" and should therefore mean "to be handed over, conceded," its exact usage is completely unclear. Its only other occurrence is in the wedding hymn (X.85.6), where it appears to refer to a bridesmaid or female servant of the bride, who is to accompany her to her new home. Interpretations of the word in this hymn vary wildly, an indication of the problems it poses: Grassmann "Braut" (bride); Geldner "Amme" (nurse); Renou "viatique" (provisions for a journey; EVP), but "chargement" (cargo; Hymnes spéculatives [1956]); Oldenberg (following Caland) "Anustaraṇīkuh" (cow to be killed at the funeral rite); Griffith "funeral gift"; Macdonell "equipment"; Doniger O'Flaherty "gift for the journey." Our own interpretation is informed by the use of the lexeme ánu-√dā in an Atharvaveda passage (AVŚ VI.118.1–2), a passage found in various versions also in the Paippalāda recension of the Atharvaveda, in the Maitrāyaṇa Saṃhitā, and in the Taittirīya Āraṇyaka. In this passage the speaker asks for his offenses, his debts (ṛṇá), to be forgiven, using the verb ánu-dā (vs. 1: "let the two Apsarases forgive this ṛṇá of ours today"), and he seeks for this to happen before he enters "Yama's world." The part of the passage concerning Yama's world is read variously in the various texts and has clearly been subject to corruption, but in most readings the person in question fears entering Yama's world "with a rope on" (ádhirajju), a rope presumably imposed by his debts.

Reading our passage with these passages in mind, we may speculate that verses 5 and 6 find the father arriving at Yama's world with the same anxiety apparent in the passages just referred to: that he will be called to account for the debts he owes and must prove that they have been repaid or forgiven (ánu-√dā) before he enters that realm. The Taittirīya Saṃhitā (VI.3.10.5) already knows the three debts (also ṛṇá) with which a brahmin is born: studentship to the ṛṣis, sacrifice to the gods, and sons for his ancestors. Although we see no trace of studentship in this hymn, the two questions in the first half of verse 5 provide implicit answers about the other two debts: the dead man begat a son, and he (and/or the son) also sent forth the chariot of sacrifice. Satisfactory answers about these debts clear the way for the father to enter Yama's realm in verse 6, and it may in fact be Yama who is asking the questions.

Several questions remain, however. Since ṛṇá "debt" is a neuter noun, why is ánudeyī feminine in gender? There are no obvious feminine referents in this hymn that could underlie this adjective. For this problem the Atharvaveda passage provides a clue. As was noted above, the protagonist in that passage fears entering Yama's world "with a rope on," with the rope representing his unpaid debts. The word rájju "rope" is feminine, and we suggest that this symbolic representation is the referent of ánudeyī. A more literal rendering than that given in the translation below would be "(the rope/fetter of debt) to be forgiven."

Even in this interpretation verse 6 remains somewhat puzzling, though the overall impression made by the last three pādas is that of the enlargement of space. Here the clue is found in the final pāda, in the word nirāyaṇam "coming forth." The lexeme nír-√i (and closely related nír-ā́-√i) is almost entirely confined in the R̥gveda to birth contexts, to "coming forth" from the womb or a womblike container. In X.60.7 it is used not of an original birth, but of a symbolic rebirth, recalling a sick man to life. We suggest that here, too, a rebirth is at issue, but this time it is the rebirth into a happy life in Yama's world, where the dead man will be reunited with his body and partake of the pleasures hinted at in verses 1 and 7, as well as in, for example, X.14 (esp. vss. 7–9). The reuniting with the body after death in a distant realm is treated at length in X.56, where it is also likened to birth (X.56.1). The rebirth in our verse is somewhat graphically depicted, with the top (the head of the infant) coming out first, then the rest of his body, until the coming forth is completed. (Or, alternatively, the nirayaṇam may actually refer to the afterbirth.)

The last verse announces the dead and now reborn man's arrival at Yama's delightful seat, with the emphatic annunciatory pronouns idám (7a), iyám (7c), ayám (7d), all meaning "here is, this one right here." The promise of verse 1 has finally been fulfilled.

For a detailed presentation of this interpretation of X.135, see Jamison (forthcoming d).

1. [Boy:] The leafy tree where Yama holds symposium with the gods, toward there the clanlord, our father, follows the track of the ancient ones.
2. [Boy:] Him following the track of the ancient ones, wandering along yonder evil way,
   did I keep looking for reluctantly, but I was longing for him again.
3. [Father?:] The new chariot without wheels that you made with your mind, lad,
   the one that has a single shaft but faces in all directions—without seeing it, you mount it.
4. [Father?:] The chariot which you, lad, sent rolling forth from the inspired poets,
   following it the sāman melody rolled forth from here, set onto a boat.
5. [Yama? Poet?:] Who begat the lad? Who sent the chariot rolling out?
   Who could tell us this today, how the (debt) came to be forgiven?
6. As (the debt) came to be forgiven, after that the top was born;
   the base was stretched out in front and the "coming forth" was made behind.

7. Here is the seat of Yama, which is called the palace of the gods.
   Here is his pipe blown; here is he adorned with hymns.

X.136 (962) Muni [the Keśins "Long-Haired Ones"]

Vātaraśana's seven sons, the munis Jūti 1, Vātajūti 2, Viprajūti 3, Vr̥ṣāṇaka 4, Karikrata 5, Etaśa 6, R̥śyaśr̥ṅga 7
7 verses: anuṣṭubh

This short hymn about the long-haired (keśin) ascetic (muni) has gained a certain measure of fame as an apparent precursor of later extreme ascetic practices and of the Rudra-Śiva cult (based especially on the mention of Rudra in the last verse, where the ascetic drinks an apparent cultic substance in company with Rudra). From the R̥gvedic point of view its closest analogue is the Labasūkta (X.119), describing the sensations of a soma-drinker, with its refrain "Have I drunk of the soma? Yes!" Both hymns depict the experience as flight, especially flight sped by the wind (here see vss. 2–6) and affording a bird's eye view of the earth and its inhabitants (here vs. 4–5), and also emphasize the subject's sense of power over cosmic entities (here esp. vss. 1, 5).

The difference seems to be the identity of the drink that produces these sensations: soma in I.119, "poison" (viṣá) in this hymn. The mention of the latter substance begins and ends this hymn (vss. 1a, 7c) in ring composition. It is unclear what the liquid in question is. However, it should be noted that the drinker himself/itself is provided with characteristic somian vocabulary ("sweet, most exhilarating") in the last pāda (6d) before the final verse depicting the preparation and drinking of the poison, and furthermore that the preparation of this poison by churning/stirring (√manth) and crushing (√piṣ) seems to mimic the preparation of soma: "crush" is semantically close to "press" (√su), and a certain type of soma, mixed with meal, is technically called manthín. The prominence of the wind-god Vāyu (vss. 5, 7) is also reminiscent of the soma sacrifice, for Vāyu, along with Indra, is the first recipient of the soma drink. Thus, the cultic practice here is either being presented as a mirror-image analogue of the orthodox soma sacrifice, or in fact is the soma sacrifice, but in esoteric guise.

1. The long-haired one bears fire, the long-haired one poison, the long-haired one the two world-halves.
   The long-haired one (bears) the sun for all to see. The long-haired one is called this light here.
2. The wind-girt ascetics wear tawny rags.
   They follow the swooping of the wind when the gods have entered (them).
3. "Roused up to ecstasy by our asceticism, we have mounted the winds.
   You mortals see only our bodies."

4. He flies through the midspace, gazing down on all forms.
   The ascetic has been established as the comrade of every god for good action.
5. The horse of the wind, the comrade of Vāyu—so sped by (that) god, the ascetic presides over both seas, the eastern and the western.
6. Ranging in the range of the Apsarases and the Gandharvas, of the wild birds, the long-haired one is their sweet, most exhilarating comrade, who knows their will.
7. Vāyu churned it for him; Kunannamā kept crushing it, when the long-haired one drank of the poison with his cup, together with Rudra.

Bharadvāja 1, Kaśyapa 2, Gotama 3, Atri 4, Viśvāmitra 5, Jamadagni 6, Vasiṣṭha 7
7 verses: anuṣṭubh

The Anukramaṇī attributes these seven verses to seven different authors, and it is a distinguished group of poets indeed: the same foundational ṛṣis in the same order as in IX.67, a hymn that seems intended to bring together the separate poetic lineages into a unified pan-Ārya assemblage for political purposes.

It is difficult to discern such a grand design in this hymn, which, moreover, shows no signs of composite nature. Six of the seven verses (all but vs. 6) are found together in single hymns in both the Śaunaka and the Paippalāda recensions of the Atharvaveda (IV.13 and V.18 respectively), and the contents form a unity. Not surprisingly, given its Atharvaveda parallels, it is a simple Atharvan healing spell, calling on the gods, the wind, and the waters to bring a remedy for the disease afflicting the object of the spell. The poet-officiant is the actual effector of the healing, however, and in the last verse of the hymn (7; see also vs. 4) he deploys both his hands and his voice to bring about the cure—the usual pairing of action and speech characteristic of Atharvan practice.

1. O gods, the one who has been put down, o gods, you lead him up again.
   and, o gods, the one who has committed an offense, o gods, you make him live again.
2. These two winds blow from the river to the far distance.
   Let the one blow skill here for you; let the other blow far away what is malady.
3. O Wind, blow healing here; o Wind, blow away what is malady, for you, possessing all healing, speed as the messenger of the gods.

4. I have come to you with beneficial things, and also with noninjurious things.
   I have brought auspicious skill for you; I drive your disease far away.
5. Let the gods bring rescue here; let the troop of Maruts bring rescue;
   let all beings bring rescue, so that this one here will be without malady.
6. These very waters are truly remedies; the waters banish affliction.
   The waters are remedies for everything. Let them create a remedy for you.
7. With two hands with their ten branches—my tongue is the lead-cow of speech — with the two that free you from affliction, with these two, we touch you.

X.138 (964) Indra

Aṅga Aurava
6 verses: jagatī

This short hymn celebrating a number of Indra's great deeds is surprisingly obscure. It begins without much difficulty, with two verses devoted to the opening of the Vala cave, though even here there are some puzzles. The second verse ends with the triumphant appearance of the sun after the cave is opened.

This appearance seems to set the theme for the remaining verses of the hymn: though these four verses treat several different deeds of Indra (the destruction of Pipru's fortresses in vss. 3–4, the Vr̥tra smashing in at least part of vs. 5), they share a preoccupation with what we might call the deregulation of cosmic time and Indra's participation in and repair of these problems. In 3a the Sun "unhitched his chariot in the middle of heaven," an image that seems to suggest that the normal daily progress of the sun through the sky stopped abruptly and time stood still. This may, or may not, be a version of Indra's stealing the wheel of the Sun (see, e.g., V.29, 31; IV.30.4–5). Two factors favor the identification of the two mythic allusions. On the one hand, Kutsa generally appears associated with Indra's theft of the Sun's wheel, and he appears in our verse 1. On the other, the final pāda of our hymn (6c) may refer, very indirectly, to the restoration of the Sun's wheel in heaven (see below).

Similar to the stopping of the Sun's chariot in 3a is the striking incident in 5cd, also referred to elsewhere (though rarely; see esp. II.15.6, IV.30.8–11), in which Indra smashes the cart of the goddess Dawn, and she runs away in fear. Again, this seems to involve a perturbation of the ordinary progress of time. In between, 4c presents the sun and the moon in some relationship, which is entirely unclear but which does not seem entirely positive.

The second half of the final verse (6) seems to show Indra remedying the situation, perhaps restoring both nightly and daily cosmic time. In 6c he places in heaven

"the apportioner of the months," presumably the moon, while in 6d "the father" (pitā́, the final word of the hymn), presumably Father Heaven, "bears the circlet split apart by you [=Indra]." If we are correct that the stopping of the Sun's chariot in 3a is a preliminary to the stealing of his chariot-wheel, then the "wheel-segment" borne by Heaven could be the disc of the Sun now restored to its proper place.

However, much remains unclear in this hymn, and the interpretations given here are quite tentative.

1. In partnership with you, Indra, these conveyors (of songs), conceiving the truth, thoroughly split apart the Vala cave, when, showing favor to the dawns, making the waters flow, you exerted your wondrous power (on them) and on the fertile cows, for the sake of Kutsa and at his thought.
2. You released the fecund females, and you made the mountains bend. You drove up the ruddy ones, and you drank the dear honey [=soma].
   By your wondrous power you made the wooden (cups) strong for it. The Sun blazed forth with the song born of truth.
3. The Sun unhitched his chariot in the middle of heaven. The Ārya found a match for the Dāsa.
   The firm fortifications of the crafty lord Pipru did Indra throw open, having acted together with R̥jiśvan.
4. Defiant, he threw open the undefiable (fortifications); the unbridled one pulverized the ungodly treasure-houses.
   Like the Sun with the Moon, he took for his own the goods found in the fortress. Being sung, he shattered his rivals with his flashing (weapon).
5. Possessing weapons that cannot be combatted, the far-ranging Vr̥tra-smasher, doing his pious work by means of his splitting (weapon), sharpens (the weapons) to be brandished.
   She feared to be battered by Indra's mace. The preening female ran away: Dawn left her cart behind.
6. These (deeds) worthy of fame are yours exclusively, in that you alone made him alone to be one lacking the sacrifice.
   You set the apportioner of the months [=moon] in heaven. The father [=Heaven] bears the segment of the wheel that was split off by you.

X.139 (965) Sūrya (1–3), Viśvāvasu (4–6)

Viśvāsu Devagandharva
6 verses: triṣṭubh

This hymn is a companion piece to the previous one (X.138), though the Anukramaṇī ascribes them to different poets and assigns different deities to them. The evidence for their connection includes shared vocabulary and close lexical variants—e.g., mádhye… diváḥ 138.3 and divó mádhye 139.2 "in the middle of heaven"; pradhí ("wheel segment") 138.6 and paridhí ("encirclement") 139.4; ahī́ "fertile cow" 138.1, 139.6; daṃsáya / dáṃsas 138.1, 2 "wondrous skill" and dákṣa 139.6 "skill, capability"—as well as ring composition: 138 begins with two verses about the opening of the Vala cave and the release of the fertile cows, and the final verse of 139 (vs. 6) returns to exactly this theme.

More subtle is their shared thematic concern. As noted in the introduction to 138, that hymn seems to treat disturbances to the orderly progress of cosmic time and the heavenly bodies that measure it, the sun, the moon, and dawn. By contrast X.139 focuses on the sun, in part through its (partial) representations: Savitar (vss. 1, 3) and the heavenly Gandharva (see also I.123, the Vena hymn, where Vena and the Gandharva represent an amalgam of the sun and Soma). The hymn also depicts the sun as holding its proper place and performing its proper functions. Though in this hymn (vs. 2) as in the last one (vs. 3) the sun stands still in the middle of heaven, in 138 this stoppage seemed ominous, whereas in this hymn the sun's position seems designed to give him the best view of the whole phenomenal world. It is repeatedly emphasized (vss. 1d, 2a, c, 3b) that he (or his representatives) sees everything, and as heavenly Gandharva he measures the airy realm (5b), again displaying proper cosmic progress.

It must be admitted, however, that many things remain unclear in this hymn, particularly verse 4.

1. With the rays of the sun, with golden hair, Savitar has raised up the unaging light from the east.
   At his instigation Pūṣan travels—the knowing cowherd surveying all beings.
2. With his eye on men, he sits in the middle of heaven, having filled both world-halves and the space between.
   He watches over (his mares? the ladles?) facing toward ghee, facing in all directions, between the eastern and the western beacon.
3. The foundation of wealth, the assembler of goods, he watches over all forms with his powers.
   Like god Savitar's, his ordinances hold true; like Indra, he stands at the confluence of spoils.
4. O Soma, the waters, having seen Viśvāvasu the Gandharva, then went apart by their truth.
   Indra, hastening, went down following that (truth?) of theirs. He looked around the encirclements of the sun.
5. Let Viśvāvasu sing it [=truth] to us—the heavenly Gandharva, the measurer of the airy realm—whether we know it to hold true or not. Spurring on insights, he should help just our insights.

6. He found the winner in the current of the rivers. He opened the doors for those with a rock as their pen.
   The Gandharva proclaimed their immortal (names). Indra came to know all about the capability of the fertile cows.

X.140 (966) Agni

Agni Pāvaka
6 verses: viṣṭārapaṅkti 1, satobr̥hatī 2–4, upariṣṭājjyotis 5, triṣṭubh 6 [per the Anukramaṇī, but this doesn't accurately reflect the meter of 5 and 6. Former is rather satobr̥hatī, while latter is 12 12 12 8]

Metrically varied but unremarkable in contents, this hymn recycles and enchains its vocabulary and phraseology while staying close to its core message: the ritual fire is lovely and brilliant, and it brings—or should bring—precious prizes to the humans who tend it.

1. O Agni, yours are fame and vitality; your beams flash greatly, o you with radiant goods.
   You of lofty radiance, with your power you establish a praiseworthy prize for the pious, o sage poet.
2. Of pure luster, of gleaming luster, of unfailing luster, you rise up with your radiance.
   As a son wandering between your two mothers, you approach (them) helpfully. You fill both world-halves.
3. O Child of Nourishment, Jātavedas, delight yourself with good lauds, when you are roused by hymnic visions.
   In you have those of brilliant help assembled precious-born refreshments of manifold forms.
4. O Agni, exerting control, have yourself extended by the (human) kinsmen. In us (be) riches, o immortal one.
   You rule over a wonder lovely to see. You (ful)fill your resolve that brings gain.
5. (You,) the preparer of refreshment for the ceremony, forethoughtful, holding sway over great benefit, (have they set in front)— you establish the well-portioned gift of a precious thing: great refreshment and wealth that brings gain.
6. (You) the truthful one, the buffalo lovely for all to see: Agni have the peoples set in front for benevolence—you with listening ears, of greatest extent, the divine one have the human generations (set in front) with a hymn.

X.141 (967) All Gods

Agni Tāpasa
6 verses: anuṣṭubh

This simple hymn continues the message of the immediately preceding one, but with far less subtlety. The poet calls upon Agni (vss. 1, 3, 6, and implicitly 5) and an array of other gods, particularly Bṛhaspati (vss. 2–5), to ensure that he and his fellow officiants are well rewarded for their ritual service. The focus on Agni and Bṛhaspati clearly reflects the ritual orientation of the hymn, with Agni representing the physical activity of sacrifice and Bṛhaspati the verbal portion.

1. O Agni, address us here; facing us, become well-disposed to us.
   Provide for us, Lord of the Clan. You are a prize-giver to us.
2. Let Aryaman provide for us, let Bhaga, let Bṛhaspati, let the gods and let Liberality. Let the goddess give riches to us.
3. On King Soma for help, on Agni we call with hymns, on the Ādityas, on Viṣṇu, on Sūrya, and on Bṛhaspati the formulator.
4. On Indra and Vāyu, easy to call, on Bṛhaspati we call here, so that every person will be well-disposed to us on meeting.
5. Spur on Aryaman, Bṛhaspati, and Indra to give—Wind, Viṣṇu, Sarasvatī, and Savitar the prizewinner.
6. You, Agni, with your fires, strengthen our sacred formulation and the sacrifice.
   You, spur on the divine assemblage to give wealth to us.

X.142 (968) Agni

The four Śārṅgas: Jaritar 1–2, Droṇa 3–4, Sārisṛkva 5–6, Stambamitra 7–8 8 verses: triṣṭubh, except jagatī 1–2, anuṣṭubh 7–8

Though short, this hymn displays both a well-articulated structure and intricate patterns of repetition and phonological echoes. The first six verses, in trimeter meter, have an outer ring (vss. 1, 6) and an inner, thematically contrasting core. Verse 1 praises the protective, ritual fire, and verse 6 returns to this prize-giving fire and the divine attendance upon it. In between, verses 2–5 describe fire as an ever-more-dangerous substance. Though in verse 2 the danger is confined and contrasted with the poets' successful productions, the following verses give free rein to the destructive power of wildfire with vivid descriptions of its progress through the land.

The final two verses, in a different meter, append a magical charm, to banish dangerous fire from the land and make that land the abode of water and plants.

The Anukramaṇī identifies "the four Śārṅgas" as the poets of the hymn. This is an allusion to an episode in the Mahābhārata (Śārṅgopākhyānam, MBh I.220–25), in which four birds, sons of an ascetic, are spared by Agni during the otherwise complete burning of the Khāṇḍava Forest. This tale almost certainly postdates the composition of our hymn.

1. O Agni, this singer here has come to abide in you, for there exists no other friendship, o Son of Strength—for auspicious is your shelter, providing threefold defense. Put away in the distance the injurious missile.
2. Your birth, Agni, is a headlong plunge as you seek nourishment. You seem to bear down on all creatures at once.
   Our teams, our insightful thoughts shall gain the lead. They proceed in front like cowherds, by themselves.
3. And truly you bend around, snapping at the abundant brush, o Agni of independent power.
   And there come to be waste-places in the fields. Let us not antagonize your missile, your power.
4. When you travel to the heights and the depths, snapping, you go in all directions, like an army in greedy pursuit.
   When the wind fans your flame, like a barber a beard you shave the ground.
5. His ranks have appeared opposite—many chariots (along) a single downward course—when, o Agni, continually stroking your two arms, you go, bending downward, along the upstretching earth.
6. Let your blasts rear up, let your beam; let your prizes, Agni, for the one who labors for you.
   Arch up, bow down, as you grow. Let all the Vasus attend upon you today.
7. Here is the descending course of the waters, here the settling down of the sea.
   Make yourself another path from this one here. Proceed along it at will.
8. On your course hither and your course away let flowering dūrvā grass grow, and ponds and lotus blossoms. Here is the house of the sea.

X.143 (969) Aśvins

Atri Sāṃkhya
6 verses: anuṣṭubh

The poet of this hymn is presumably one of the younger Atrids, not the Atri who is the eponymous poet of the Vth Maṇḍala, and the whole hymn is devoted to requests for help from the Aśvins for him and his fellows. In the first two verses he asks that the Aśvins aid him as they did others in past times. The third verse offers recompense for their aid: if they help him to produce insightful poems, these poems will be for them alone. Verses 4 and 6 expand the targets of the aid from Atri alone to his ritual companions, while verse 5 offers the mythological example of Bhujyu, often mentioned elsewhere as a client whose life the Aśvins saved, as a model for what we ourselves hope for.

1. (Make) also this Atri, grown old in the truth, (new again), to drive like a horse to his goal, when you two make Kakṣīvant new again, like a chariot.
2. (Unloose) also this one, like a prizewinning horse, to which the dustless (paths) have stretched themselves;
 unloose the youngest Atri, like a tight knot, (to stretch) across the airy realm.
3. You two most wondrous, resplendent men, seek to win insights for Atri, for then, o men of heaven, your praise song will never again (need) to be carved up [=shared with other gods].
4. O very bountiful Aśvins, your generosity and benevolence are to be noted in this:
 that you will bring us safely across to the broad seat and the (festive) assembly (of the sacrifice), o men.
5. Bhujyu, pitched and tossed in the sea at the far end of the airy realm—you drove to him with your winged ones. O Nāsatyas, make (our insight?) to win.
6. O most munificent ones possessing all property, (attend upon us) with your favors, like (parents) wishing (our) welfare; attend to refreshments for us that swell like a spring, o men.

X.144 (970) Indra

Suparṇa Tārkṣyaputra or Ūrdhvakr̥śana Yāmāyana
6 verses: gāyatrī 1, 3–4, br̥hatī 2, satobr̥hatī 5, viṣṭārapaṅkti 6

Although the Anukramaṇī names Indra as the divinity of this hymn, it is dominated by Soma. Indra appears only in the first and last (6) verses as the recipient of the soma drink, represented ring-compositionally by the "drop" (índu) in both verses. His return to the hymn is anticipated by the minimal te "for you" in the penultimate verse 5. In between the poet first describes Soma's talents (vss. 1–2), and then narrates (or alludes to the narrative of) the famous theft of Soma by the falcon. This account is highly poeticized, with vocabulary deployed in obscure metaphors. In our view both 3a and 4c refer, in very different ways, to the fortresses in which Soma was confined (see IV.27.1 and IV.26.3 for the hundred fortresses, also keeping in mind that "fortress" [púr] is grammatically feminine). Since Soma is being guarded in heaven, when he looks down (vs. 3c) in search of his falcon rescuer he sees clouds, again metaphorically represented.

The vivifying effects of Soma are treated in verses 5–6, as is his role in reinforcing the relationship (bandhútā "family tie," 5d) between gods and men, by means of the sacrificial offering. Verse 6b may contain the first occurrences of the later notion of sacrifice as "surrender" (tyāgá, found here in a different nominal derivative of the same root, tyájas). Indra takes the oblation surrendered by men and places it among the gods.

1. Because this deathless drop here, like a courser, displays his mastery as lifelong skill for you, the ritual adept,
2. He is a craftsman in poetic art among us and a mace for the one generous with gifts.
   Like a craftsman, he brings the exhilarating drink with pearls [=bubbles] on top—the exhilarating drink that gets results.
3. Eager for the energetic falcon, the bull among his own females [=fortresses?]
   looked down at those puffing up like snakes [/swelling like fertile cows] [=clouds?] —
4. He whom the fine-feathered (bird), the son of the falcon, brought here from afar— him who had a hundred wheels [=concentric fortresses?]—who is the track of the fertile cow—
5. Whom the falcon brought here for you with his foot, the cherished one who keeps the wolf away, who is the ruddy housing of the stalk—
   by him is vitality, is lifetime lengthened for living; through him does our family tie stay vigilant.
6. Thus, by the drop Indra will secure that great surrender (of the offering) also among the gods.
   By your will is vitality, is lifetime lengthened, o you of strong will; by your will has this soma here been pressed from us.

X.145 (971) Against Cowives

Indrāṇī
6 verses: anuṣṭubh, except paṅkti 6

Attributed to Indra's wife, Indrāṇī, this hymn is spoken in the 1st person by a woman conjuring against her cowife for the affections of their joint husband. In Atharvan style (and with an Atharvaveda correspondent, AVŚ III.18), it combines ritual/magic action with a verbal spell. The speaker digs the efficacious plant (vss.

1–2) and applies the plant to her husband (vs. 6), while confidently proclaiming her victory over her rival (esp. vss. 3–5). A similar hymn against cowives is found at X.159.

1. This plant do I dig, most powerful shoot, with which (a woman) repels her cowife, with which (she) acquires her own husband completely.
2. You with outstretched leaves, luck-bringing, god-sped, possessing victorious might—blow away my cowife, make my husband my own.
3. Higher am I, o higher one, higher even than the higher ones.
   But she who is my cowife, she is lower than the lower ones.
4. I do not take [=mention] her name, nor does she rest by this person [=husband].
   To the farthest farness we (all) make my cowife go.
5. I am gaining victory, and you [=plant] are victorious.
   Both having become victoriously mighty, we two shall be victorious over my cowife.
6. On you [=husband] have I laid the (plant) that wins victory; I have harnessed you with an even more victorious one.
   Let your mind run forth after me, like a cow after a calf, like water along its path.

X.146 (972) Lady of the Wilderness (Araṇyānī)

Devamuni Airammada
6 verses: anuṣṭubh

This lovely and evocative hymn has been much translated. It is dedicated to the spirit of the araṇya, the wild place, and the contrast between the wild place and the settled one, an opposition that runs throughout Indian literature, dominates the hymn. Despite the ostensible dedication, the poet tries as much as possible to evade the wilderness and conjure up the safety of the village. From the start, in the first verse he expresses surprise that the Lady of the Wilderness herself doesn't inquire for a village or settlement (grā́mam); he is surprised that she is not afraid of her own domain. The strange sounds that accompany the Lady in her progress and the strange (and unidentified) animals that make those sounds in verse 2 clearly unsettle the poet, and in verses 3 and 4 the poet, seeming himself to be in the wilderness at nightfall, attempts to transform the threatening sights and sounds of the wild into reassuring domestic scenes—cows grazing and lowing, woodsmen, the creak of a cart—though this cheerful self-deception does not last. The poet abruptly breaks off the sequence with "(something) has shrieked!" The final two verses of this short hymn contain a formal praise of Araṇyānī, but even this begins with the negative, and slightly nervous, reassurance that she doesn't kill unless she's attacked; the positive portions of the praise come second.

1. O Lady of the Wilderness, Lady of the Wilderness, you there, who seem to be lost just ahead.
   How is that you don't ask for the village? Does fear not find you at all?
2. When the ciccika (bird?/bug?) helps out the bull-roarer [=frog? bird?] as it speaks, the Lady of the Wilderness displays her greatness like (a king?) who hurtles along amid the clash of cymbals.
3. And it's as if cows are eating and as if a settlement is seen, and the Lady of the Wilderness at evening—it's as if there's a cart creaking.
4. Surely it's someone calling his cow; surely another has been splitting wood.
   But staying by the Lady of the Wilderness at evening, one imagines "(Something) has shrieked!"
5. In truth, the Lady of the Wilderness does no slaughter, if someone else does not attack.
   Having eaten sweet fruit, one settles down at pleasure.
6. Fragrant with ointments, sweet-smelling, providing much food though she does no plowing, the Mother of wild beasts, the Lady of the Wilderness have I proclaimed.

X.147 (973) Indra

Suvedas Śairīṣi
5 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 5

The poet begins his hymn (vs. 1, 2ab) by proclaiming his trust in Indra's "battle fury" (manyú), on the basis of the god's deeds and his dominance over the cosmic spaces. It turns out that the poet has something more than simply praise on his mind. Indra and his battle fury are much in demand among men in search of victory and its spoils (vs. 2cd), and the poet recommends his patrons to Indra's attention and care (vs. 3). He realizes, however, that securing Indra's help requires proper ritual observance (vs. 4). The hymn ends (vs. 5) with explicit requests for Indra's aid and bounty, such desires having been only indirectly expressed earlier in the hymn.

1. I put my trust in your foremost battle-fury, in that you smashed Vr̥tra and labored at the manly work, in that both world-halves yield to you and even earth trembles from your tempest, o possessor of the stone.

2. You, faultless one, with your wiles shook wily Vr̥tra to pieces, with your fame-seeking mind.
   Just you do superior men choose in their quests for cattle, you when all sacrifices are to be offered.
3. Take pleasure in these patrons, o much-invoked one, the strengtheners who have attained to your bounty, bounteous one.
   They chant to (you) the prizewinner when kith and kin (are at issue), in (hostile) encirclements, at the winning of wisdom, when immoderate stakes (are set).
4. Just that man will find pleasure in wealth that is easy to bear away who will realize that the exhilaration of this one [=Indra] is to be hastened.
   With you as his strengthener, bounteous one, one who performs pious ceremonies quickly bears away the prize, the stakes, along with his men.
5. You—being sung, make wide (space) for the troop with your greatness, bounteous one; show mastery over wealth.
   You are an ally [/Mitra] to us, wily like Varuṇa. You distribute (wealth) like an apportioner of food, wondrous one.

X.148 (974) Indra

Pr̥thu Vainya
5 verses: triṣṭubh

This hymn offers some tricky bits of syntax and phraseology in what is otherwise a standard praise of Indra and request for his aid. The poet seems especially aware that Indra bestows his aid on those whom he likes (see esp. vss. 1c, 3b, 4c) and so emphasizes men's need to offer abundant praise and oblations with a cheerful spirit.

1. After having pressed soma we praise you, Indra, and also after having won the prize, you powerfully manly one.
   Bring us well-being (for him) in whom you take pleasure. Through ourselves and our lineage may we win, aided by you.
2. Lofty were you when you were just born, o champion Indra. Along with the sun, you should overcome the Dāsa clans,
   (as you did) the one placed in hiding, fit to be hidden, hidden in the waters [=Vr̥tra]. We offer soma as if in a gushing (stream).
3. Or, (Indra,) chant in response to the hymns of the stranger—as the wise one, inspired poet among the seers, taking pleasure in good thinking.
   May we be the ones who find enjoyment by means of the soma drinks—through this and through the portions for you, who are conveyed on a chariot.

4. These sacred formulations here have been recited to you, Indra. Give the might of men to men, o champion.
   Be of the same resolve with those in whom you take pleasure. And protect the singers and their people.
5. Hear the call from Pr̥thī, o champion Indra, and you will be praised by the chants of Venya, who has roared toward your ghee-filled womb. Like a wave along the depths, (his chants) run (there) billowing.

X.149 (975) Savitar

Arcat Hairaṇyastūpa
5 verses: triṣṭubh

The poet of this hymn is identified by the Anukramaṇī as a descendant of Hiraṇyastūpa, and in the last verse (6) the poet compares his own invocation of Savitar with that of Hiraṇyastūpa Āṅgirasa, who, in fact, appears in the Anukramaṇī as the author of I.31–35 and IX.4 and 6—with I.35 also a hymn to Savitar. Thus this hymn may be making a cross reference to another hymn in the saṃhitā. Although there are no blatant links between the two hymns, both are concerned with the divisions of the cosmos and Savitar's relationship to them. In this hymn especially Savitar's cosmogonic role is highlighted.

1. Savitar brought the earth to rest with his fastening straps; in the place with no prop Savitar made heaven fast.
   Savitar has milked the boisterous midspace like a stallion, (has milked out) the sea bound within the unfathomable (realm).
2. Where the propped-up sea flooded forth—Savitar knows that, o Child of the Waters—from there was the world, from there was the airy realm arisen; from there heaven and earth spread out.
3. After this (world) here there came into being the other one [=heaven], deserving the sacrifice, with its fill of immortal creation.
   Certainly the fine-feathered Garutmant(-bird) of Savitar [=sun] was born earlier, and it (was born) in accordance with his support.
4. Like cows to the village, like a warrior to his horses, like a bellowing, benevolent milker to her calf, like a husband to his wife—let him come down to us, the supporter of heaven, Savitar bringing all desirable things.
5. Just as Hiraṇyastūpa Āṅgirasa called on you, Savitar, when this prize (was in question), even so, chanting to you for help, extolling you, I stay wakeful facing toward you, as if toward the plant of soma.

X.150 (976) Agni

Mr̥ḍīka Vāsiṣṭha
5 verses: br̥hatī 1–3, upariṣṭājjyotis or jagatī 4, upariṣṭājjyotis 5

A simple hymn with a rigid skeletal structure, despite the variety of meters. The last pāda of every verse begins with a form of mr̥ḍīká "grace, mercy," in all but verse 4 the dative mr̥ḍīkā́ya. (This repetition is clearly responsible for the Anukramaṇī's ascription to a poet with the given name Mr̥ḍīka.) The object of the poet's address throughout is the god Agni; for the first half of the hymn (through vs. 3ab) he is unnamed though easily identifiable from his attributes; from then on a form of his name opens every hemistich. The contents of the hymn are quite straightforward: Agni is urged to come to our sacrifice, bringing the gods along. In the final verse (5) his aid to various legendary humans is recalled, and the poet names himself as Vasiṣṭha (or "best one")—again, no doubt responsible for the Anukramaṇī's patronymic Vāsiṣṭha, although the distinctive clan refrain of the Vasiṣṭhas is not present.

The final two verses also contain the epithet puróhita, literally "set in front," applied first to Agni (4a) and then to the poet Vasiṣṭha (5cd). Ritually speaking the sacrificial fire is indeed "set in front": the offering fire is established on the eastern edge of the ritual ground. However, there is no clear ritual reason to refer to the poet as "set in front," and it seems likely that in this late hymn the term has already become the designation of a particular type of priest, in later times the king's "house-priest."

1. Even when you have been kindled, you are kindled (again), o oblation-bearer for the gods.
   With the Ādityas, the Rudras, the Vasus, come to us here. For grace come to us here.
2. This sacrifice here—having delighted in this speech, come near to it.
   We mortals call you, kindled one; for grace we call.
3. You, Jātavedas, granting all wishes, do I hymn with my insightful thought.
   O Agni, bring here to us the gods whose commandments are dear, for grace (bring) those whose commandments are dear.
4. Agni, the god, became the one set in front [/Purohita] of the gods; Agni have the human seers kindled.
   Agni do I invoke greatly at the winning of the stakes; (I invoke) his grace for the winning of the stakes.
5. Agni helped Atri, Bharadvāja, Gaviṣṭhira, helped Kaṇva and Trasadasyu for us at the challenge.
   Agni does Vasiṣṭha, set in front [/Purohita], call; for grace does the one set in front [/Purohita] (call).

X.151 (977) Śraddhā

Śraddhā Kāmāyanī
5 verses: anuṣṭubh

The word śraddhā́, often translated "faith," has a long and culturally freighted history in Indic religion. In its Vedic origins it refers not to "faith," at least in the Western, Christian sense (cf. its Latin cognate credō), but rather to "trust"—especially in the efficacy of cultural institutions, and there especially in hospitality and the sacrifice, itself a specialized type of hospitality. (For further discussion see Jamison [1996a: 176–84].)

In this hymn its close ties to the sacrifice are quite clear. Note especially the last verse (5), which makes not-so-veiled reference to the three soma-pressings; the appearance of Vāyu in the previous verse probably refers to the fact that he receives the first soma offering at the Morning Pressing. One of the important facets of trust in the sacrifice is the certainty that a properly performed sacrifice will produce material rewards for the performer, and this belief is reflected throughout the hymn; see especially verses 2–4.

1. With trust is the fire kindled; with trust is the oblation poured.
   We at the head of good fortune make known our trust with speech.
2. O Trust, this (speech) spoken by me: make it dear to him who gives, dear to him who intends to give, and dear among the benefactors who offer sacrifice, o Trust.
3. Just the gods created trust in themselves among the powerful lords, so among the benefactors who offer sacrifice make what has been spoken by us trust(ed).
4. Trust do the gods revere, sacrificing for themselves with Vāyu as their herdsman—trust, with a purpose that comes from their heart. By trust one gains possession of goods.
5. Trust do we call early in the morning, trust at midday, trust at the setting of the sun. O Trust, place a trusting heart here in us.

X.152 (978) Indra

Śāsa Bhāradvāja
5 verses: anuṣṭubh

The martial Indra, the "commander," is called upon here to destroy our various enemies. A surprising amount of attention is given to "the scornful" (vss. 2–4). Although verbal abuse may not seem to modern mentalities to pose the same sort of threat as more physical assaults, the ancient Indian belief in the power of speech to inflict real harm is on view here. At issue may also be ritualized exchanges of insults before battle.

1. As commander, you are great in just this way: as the infallible devourer of foes, whose comrade is not slain nor is he ever conquered.
2. As the lord of the clan who gives well-being, the Vr̥tra-smasher, (smasher) of the scornful, exerting his will—let the bull Indra go before us, the soma-drinker, the creator of fearlessness.
3. Smash away the demon, away the scornful; break apart the jaws of Vr̥tra.
   O Indra, Vr̥tra-smasher, (smash) away the battle fury of the foe who assails us.
4. Smash away the scornful for us, Indra. Hold down those who battle us.
   Who assails us, make him go to lower darkness.
5. Away with the thought of him who hates (us), Indra; away with the deadly weapon of the one who seeks to despoil (us).
   Extend shelter (to us) from battle fury. Keep the deadly weapon a wide way away.

X.153 (979) Indra

Devajāmaya Indramātaraḥ
5 verses: gāyatrī

The first verse of this hymn presents a tender image of unidentified females rocking the baby Indra, and verse 2 continues with a more conventional treatment of his birth. But the birth motif disappears (except for an attenuated version in vs. 5c): the hymn then continues with standard praise of his powers—the word ójas "might" is positioned prominently in four of the five verses (2–5).

1. Rocking (him), the busy women attend upon the new-born Indra, receiving (him) as their share of the abundance of heroes.
2. You, Indra, were born from power, from strength, from might.
   You, bull, are really a bull.
3. You, Indra, are the smasher of Vr̥tra. You spread out the midspace.
   You propped up heaven with your might.
4. You, Indra, carry in your arms the chant for joint enjoyment, while sharpening your mace with your might.
5. You, Indra, dominate all created things by your might.
   You came into being throughout all the worlds.

X.154 (980) To a Dead Man

Yamī
5 verses: anuṣṭubh

This hymn has a parallel in the Atharvaveda (XVIIII.2.14–18), where it is found among the funeral verses, and in the ritual sūtras it is used at the burning of the corpse. Each verse describes the character and habits of the distinguished forefathers now resident in the other world, and ends with a refrain urging the dead man to go and join them there.

1. Soma purifies himself for some; others reverently approach ghee.
   Those for whom honey flows forth—right to them let him go now.
2. Those who were unassailable because of their fervor, who have gone to the sun because of their fervor, who have made their own fervor into greatness—right to them let him go now.
3. Those who fight in prize-contests, who as champions abandon their bodies, or who confer a thousand priestly gifts—right to them let him go now.
4. Also those ancients who were servers of truth, truthful, strong through truth, the forefathers full of fervor, o Yama—right to them let him go now.
5. The poets of a thousand devices who protect the sun, the seers full of fervor, o Yama—to those born of fervor let him go now.

X.155 (981) Spell to Remove Misfortune (1, 4), Brahmaṇaspati (2–3), All Gods (5) [Against a Witch]

Śirimbiṭha Bhāradvāja
5 verses: anuṣṭubh

A type of female demon known as the Sadān(u)vā is the target of this Atharvan-type hymn; the Sadānvā is found only here in the R̥gveda, but is well represented in the Atharvaveda (AVŚ II.14, AVP II.4, V.1 and 9, VI.8.1, etc.; see further discussion and references in Zehnder 1999, Lubotsky 2002, Griffiths 2009 ad locc.). The Sadānvās are monumentally ugly (vs. 1) and seem to pose a threat especially to unborn children (vs. 2) and, in the Atharvaveda passages, to the household and livestock in general. In this hymn they are also sexually menacing and sexually repulsive (vs. 4).

In the first three verses the Sadānvā is attacked and sent away in good Atharvan fashion, but the hymn takes another rhetorical turn starting in verse 4, which announces the defeat of Indra's rivals in the high style of a victory paean, to the apparent accompaniment of the Sadānvās beating their breasts in stylized mourning. And in verse 5 the defeat of the hostile forces has been effected not by an Atharvan-like charm, as in the earlier parts of the hymn, but by ritual activity on the sacrificial ground and by the creation of "fame" among the gods—both features that are associated with the more solemn R̥gvedic priestly and martial ethic. This shift in diction and attitude is striking, and it may have been felt necessary (or at least desirable) to "R̥gvedify" the charm when it was incorporated into the R̥gveda collection.

1. You one-eyed, deformed demoness, go to the mountain—you Sadānvā.
   With the warriors of Śirimbiṭha, with them we banish you.
2. She is banished from here, banished from yonder, having assailed all fetuses.
   Go at the demoness, o sharp-horned Brahmaṇaspati, and gore her.
3. That piece of wood over there that floats to the farther shore of the river with no man at the helm, grab hold of that, you with your evil jaws: with it go in the farther distance.
4. When you women with rusty "boxes" [=genitals], leaning forward, *beat your breast, slain were all the rivals of Indra—with their ejaculations ["spurts"] (dissipated like) bubbles.
5. These (men) here have led the cow around; they have taken the fire around.
   They have made themselves fame among the gods. Who will venture against them?

X.156 (982) Agni

Ketu Āgneya
5 verses: gāyatrī

The ritual setting for this hymn is given in verses 4–5: the kindling of fire at sunrise. The first three verses express the hope that this kindling of the fire will bring goods to the ritual participants, an oblique reference to the distribution of the priestly gifts at the Morning Pressing. This blatant desire for reward is somewhat camouflaged by couching it in terms of contests (vs. 1), cattle raids (vs. 2), and chariot racing (vs. 3).

1. Let our thoughts spur Agni on, like a swift span in the contests; with him might we win prize after prize.
2. The weapon with which we will make the cows our own by your help, o Agni, spur that on—to give us bounties.

3. Agni, bring here brawny wealth, broad and rich in cows and horses.
   Lubricate the wheel-nave, make the niggard roll.
4. Agni, you make the unaging heavenly body, the sun, mount in heaven, as you establish light for the peoples.
5. Agni, you are the beacon of the clans, dearest, fairest lap-child.
   Awaken, as you establish vitality for your praiser.

X.157 (983) All Gods

Bhuvana Āptya or Sādhana Bhauvana
5 verses: dvipadā triṣṭubh

Short and simple, this hymn calls for help and cooperation from Indra and a variety of gods in the first three verses. The last two verses are notable for what is probably the only reflection in the R̥gveda of that corporate entity, the Asuras, and of the eternal hostility between them and the Devas ("gods"), ubiquitous in middle Vedic and providing a major mythological cycle in those texts. Elsewhere in the R̥gveda the word ásura generally means "lord" and is applied to gods as well as to humans, viewed positively or negatively. It is only in this very late hymn that we see the germ of the later division of divine beings into the two inimical moieties of Devas and Asuras. For further on this question, which has important implications for Indo-Iranian as well as Vedic religion, see Wash Edward Hale (1986) as well as the discussion in our introduction and passim.

1. These living worlds here let us bring to success—we and Indra and all the gods.
2. Our sacrifice and our own body and our offspring may Indra, along with the Ādityas, set in order.
3. Along with the Ādityas, let Indra, flocking with the Maruts, be the helper of our bodies.
4. The gods upon having smashed the Asuras when they came—the gods guarding their own godhood—
5. Led the ray [=sun] to face toward (us) with their skills. Just after that they surveyed their vigorous self-power.

X.158 (984) Sūrya

Cakṣus Saurya
5 verses: gāyatrī

The sun as the eye in heaven, which enables us to see ourselves and the world, is the theme of this hymn, especially of the last three verses (3–5). The first verse is a request for universal protection in all parts of the cosmos; the ablative ("from") phrases are ambiguous: they may refer to hostile forces located in the various parts of the cosmos, or to the locations from which the protectors are exercising their function. The second verse to Savitar continues the protection theme, but otherwise ill fits the hymn and may be here because of Savitar's role in verse 3.

The given name assigned to the poet by the Anukramaṇī, Cakṣus, is simply adopted from the common noun cákṣus "eye" found repeatedly in verses 3–4; his patronymic means "Son of Sūrya."

1. Let the Sun protect us from heaven, the Wind from the midspace; let Agni (protect) us from the earthly ones.
2. I shall find pleasure in you, o Savitar, whose flaring is worth a hundred impulsions [/soma-pressings].
   Protect us from the heavenly missile as it flies.
3. The eye [=sun] (let) god Savitar (place) for us, and the eye (let) the Mountain;
   the eye let the Placer place for us.
4. Place the eye for our eyeing, the eye for us to see for ourselves.
   May we look at this (world) both whole and distinct.
5. May we look toward you, wholly good to see, o Sun.
   May we, (though) we have the eyes of men [/(because) we possess the "eye of men" (=sun)], see distinctly.

X.159 (985) Against Cowives

Śacī Paulomī
6 verses: anuṣṭubh

Like X.145 this hymn is in the voice of a woman, speaking in the 1st person, against her cowives. But, whereas in X.145 she was in the act of performing the spell with which she hoped to vanquish her cowife, in this hymn her triumph is complete. She recites a victory paean, in the appropriate high rhetorical style—albeit with some dips into the vernacular, such as the diminutivized derivative of the personal pronoun in verse 1, māmaká "li'l ole me." It is worth noting that in verse 3 she extends her triumph to her sons and her daughter; as the early parts of the Rāmāyaṇa teach us, one of the most important reasons that cowives plot against each other is to secure preferment for their children.

1. Up has gone yonder sun; up this good fortune of li'l ole me.
   I, a cunning woman, now have gained victory over my husband, (so that I am) victorious.
2. I am the beacon; I am the head; I am the powerful debater.
   Only my will should my husband follow, when I am victorious.

3. My sons are rival-smiters, and my daughter is a wide ruler.
   And I am a complete conqueror. To my husband my signal-call is the highest.
4. The oblation through which Indra, when he performed it, became the highest brilliant one, that (oblation) I have now performed, o gods: I have therefore become without cowives.
5. Without cowives, smiting cowives, conquering, overcoming—
   I have ripped off the luster of the other women, like the gifts of the feckless.
6. I have completely conquered them, overcoming the cowives, so that I will rule widely over this hero and over his people.

X.160 (986) Indra

Purāṇa Vāiśvāmitra
5 verses: triṣṭubh

A straightforward invitation to soma-drinking, also expressing the usual fear that Indra will attend another sacrifice (vs. 1) and the usual smug awareness that a non-presser will be punished (vs. 4). According to the Anukramaṇī, the poet is a descendant of the Viśvāmitras, and the last two words of the hymn, śunáṃ huvema "for blessing we would invoke" are the first two words of the Viśvāmitra clan refrain, found in most of the Viśvāmitra triṣṭubh Indra hymns (III.30.22, etc.).

1. Drink of this sharp vitalizing (soma). Here unhitch your two fallow bays, chariot and all.
   O Indra, let the other sacrificers not stop you: yours are these pressed (soma drinks) here.
2. Yours are those (already) pressed and yours are those to be pressed. You do the swelling hymns call hither.
   O Indra, enjoying this pressing today, knowing everything, drink the soma here.
3. The man who with willing mind, with his whole heart, with desire for the gods, presses soma for him, Indra does not give away his cows. He [=presser] makes (his soma) acclaimed and dear to him [=Indra].
4. That one becomes spied out by him—the rich man who does not press soma for him.
   The bounteous one holds him out by the elbow [=at arm's length?].
   The one without precedent [=Indra] smites the haters of sacred formulations.

5. Seeking horses, seeking cows, seeking prizes, we call upon you to come right up to us.
   Attending to your new benevolence, we would invoke you for blessing, Indra.

X.161 (987) Against Disease

Yakṣmanāśana Prājāpatya
5 verses: triṣṭubh, except anuṣṭubh 5

With Atharvaveda parallels (AVŚ III.11.1–4, VIII.1.20; AVP I.62), this charm announces the restoration to life, indeed long life, of a man who has succumbed to some disease or other (vs. 1).

1. I release you, with an oblation, to living, from the unknown disease, from the kingly disease.
   Or if a Grabber has truly grabbed him in this way, from her, o Indra and Agni, release him.
2. If his lifetime is exhausted, or he is (already) departed, or if he has just gone down to the face of death,
   I bring him here from the lap of Dissolution. I have redeemed him for a hundred autumns.
3. With an oblation with a thousand eyes, conferring a hundred autumns and a hundred lifetimes, I have brought him here, so that Indra will lead him through a hundred autumns to the far shore of all difficult going.
4. Live in strength for a hundred autumns, a hundred winters, and a hundred springs.
   For a hundred (years) let Indra and Agni, Savitar, and Bṛhaspati restore him, with an oblation conferring a hundred lifetimes.
5. I have brought you here; I have found you. You have come here again, o you who are new again.
   O you with hale limbs, I have found your eye hale and your lifetime whole.

X.162 (988) Against Miscarriage

Rakṣohan Brāhma
6 verses: anuṣṭubh

This charm is meant to deflect the dangers of miscarriage or harm to the embryo in any stage, including immediately after birth. The stages of pregnancy are nicely laid out in verse 3, a good example of the indirect means by which we can gain information about Vedic people's knowledge and conceptualization of "real life." The methods by which the "ill-named affliction" might gain access to the fetus are graphically depicted in verses 4–6. In verse 5 it is somewhat startling that masquerading as a brother (in addition to husband or lover) would give intimate access to the pregnant woman; this whiff of incest is reminiscent of the situation between the siblings Yama and Yamī in X.10.

1. In concert with a sacred formulation let Agni, demon-smasher, repel from here whatever evil-named affliction lies on your embryo, in your womb.
2. Whatever evil-named affliction lies on your embryo, in your womb, Agni, along with a sacred formulation, has banished the flesh-eater.
3. Who smites your (embryo) as it flies, when it is emplanted, as it squirms, who intends to smite your (embryo) when it is just born, that one we banish from here.
4. Who pries apart your thighs, lies between the married couple, who licks within your womb, that one we banish from here.
5. Who, having become brother, husband, lover, goes down on you, who intends to smite your offspring, that one we banish from here.
6. Who, having stupefied you with sleep, with darkness, goes down on you, who intends to smite your offspring, that one we banish from here.

X.163 (989) Against Disease

Vivṛhan Kāśyapa
6 verses: anuṣṭubh

Like X.161, this is another charm against disease with Atharvan parallels (AVŚ II.33, AVP IV.7). This hymn provides us with what we might term a body-part litany. The officiant declares the removal of disease from a series of related body parts in each verse, each associated with a particular area of the body—another valuable window on how Vedic peoples divided up and named reality. Although the names of the more standard body parts (eyes, ears, etc.) are well known and have well-established cognates, the identification of some of the more obscure terms is uncertain, though the locational association narrows the range of possibilities.

1. From your eyes, your nostrils, your ears, your chin,
   I tear the disease of the head out of you—from your brain, your tongue.
2. From your neck(bones?), the (bones of the?) nape of your neck, your vertebrae, your backbone,
   I tear the disease of the torso out of you—from your shoulders, from your arms.

3. From your entrails, your guts, your rectum, your heart,
   I tear out the disease—from your kidneys, your liver, your intestines.
4. From your thighs, your knee-sockets, your heels, the front of your feet,
   I tear out the disease—from your hips, your backside, your buttocks.
5. From your urinator, your love-maker, your hair, your nails,
   I tear this disease here out—from your whole body.
6. From every limb, from every hair, what is born in every joint,
   I tear this disease here out—from your whole body.

X.164 (990) Against Nightmare

Pracetas Āṅgirasa
5 verses: anuṣṭubh 1, 2, 4, triṣṭubh 3, paṅkti 5

The Anukramaṇī labels this hymn duḥsvapnaghnam, literally "destroying bad dreams," while Geldner titles it "Absolution from Sins" and Renou simply "Expiation." None of these characterizations quite captures the varied semantic field of this brief hymn. It begins with the curt dismissal of an otherwise unknown "Lord of Thought" (or "Lord of Mind"), ordering him to go far away and speak to the goddess Dissolution (Nirr̥ti), who presides over chaos and calamity. The Lord of Thought is to provide her with some examples of men's thoughts, in verse 2. These examples seem to be the sort of harmless self-delusions whereby people reassure themselves that all is going well for them. But in verses 3 and 4 the verbal behavior becomes less innocent—culminating in one of the worst offenses in Vedic India (and indeed Indo-Iranian), deceit (vs. 4). We ask various gods, including Indra "Lord of the Sacred Formulation" (voc. brahmaṇas pate), presumably Indra in his role as Br̥haspati, to distance these offenses from us. The final verse celebrates the success of this request and expresses our desire that all such offenses be visited on our enemy.

The unifying theme of the hymn is thus all sorts of mental and verbal action, whether harmless or hostile, whether done consciously (awake) or not (asleep), or even both (the "waking dream" of vs. 5).

1. Go away, o Lord of Thought—stride away; move far away.
   (When) far away, announce to Dissolution: "Of many kinds is the thought of the living.
2. "Lucky is the choice they make; lucky the right (horse) they yoke; lucky the eye (they keep) on the son of Vivasvant [=Yama] (—or so they think). In many places is the thought of the living."
3. Whatever pass we've reached by hope, by blame, by curse, when awake or sleeping.
   let Agni put away, at a distance from us, all those things ill-done and unpleasing.

4. O Indra, lord of the sacred formulation, if we practice deceit, let the attentive Āṅgiras protect us from the coercion of those who hate us.
5. We have conquered today, and we have won: we have become without offense.
   The waking dream, the evil intent—let it land on him whom we hate, let it land on him who hates us.

X.165 (991) All Gods (Bird of Ill Omen)

Kapota Nairr̥ta
5 verses: triṣṭubh

Though the Anukramaṇī identifies the dedicands as the All Gods, the hymn is entirely devoted to countering the possible evil effects of a bird of ill-omen, the dove of death, sent as a messenger from Yama, the lord of the dead. Not surprisingly, given their style and contents, the verses of this hymn are found in variant form in the Atharvaveda (AVŚ VI.27, 29.1, 28.1).

1. O gods, when the dove, sent as a messenger of Dissolution, has come here to seek, we will chant to it, and we will perform expulsion. Let there be weal for our two-footed, weal for our four-footed.
2. Let the dove that has been sent be kindly to us; o gods, let the omen-bird be without offense in our house.
   Let Agni, the inspired poet, take pleasure in our oblation, and so let the winged missile avoid us.
3. The winged missile will not take us by deception. In the corner [?] it sets its footprint in the fireplace.
   Let there be weal for our cattle and for our humans. Let the dove not harm us here, o gods.
4. When the owl screeches, that comes to nothing; likewise when the dove set its footprint in the fire.
   The one for whom it was sent forth as messenger—to that one let there be reverence: to Yama, (who is) Death.
5. With (this) verse give the dove a push. Rejoicing in refreshment, lead your cow around, effacing all difficulties. Having left for us our strengthening nourishment, it will fly away the fastest in flight.

X.166 (992) Against Rivals

Ṛṣabha Vairāja or Ṛṣabha Śākvara
5 verses: anuṣṭubh, except mahāpaṅkti 5

The extremely aggressive 1st-person speaker of this hymn proclaims his triumph over his rivals and their utter humiliation. Using the well-nigh universal tropes of high and low, he repeatedly emphasizes the spatial (and thus conceptual) position of his defeated enemies, who are literally beneath his feet (vss. 2, 5; see also vss. 3–4). Verse 4 is notable for the trio of attributes that the speaker seizes from his rivals, a set that easily accommodates a trifunctional (Dumézilian) analysis: "cognition" as the higher mental power appropriate to the priestly First Function, "commandment" representative of the warrior-ruler Second Function, and "company, assembly" the Third Function mass of followers. Although we are not over-sympathetic to the Dumézilian paradigm, this particular passage gains resonance from such an analysis.

1. Make me bull over my equals, widely victorious over my rivals, smiter of my rivals, wide-ruling cattle-lord of cattle.
2. I am a smiter of rivals, like Indra, unharmable, invulnerable.
   Beneath my feet are my rivals: all these here have been stood upon.
3. Right here I bind you, like the two ends of a bow with a bowstring.
   O Lord of Speech, drive these down, so that they will speak lower than me.
4. I have come here on top, with Viśvakarman as my foundation.
   I take for myself your cognition, your commandment, and your assembled company.
5. Having taken for myself your yoking up [=war] and your peace, might
      I become the highest. I have trampled on your head.
   From beneath my feet, lift up your speech to me, like frogs from the water, like frogs from the water.

X.167 (993) Indra (1–2, 4), Assorted Divinities (3)

Viśvāmitra and Jamadagni
4 verses: jagatī

A fairly conventional invitation to the soma sacrifice. One of Indra's great deeds, the conquering of the sun, is alluded to (vss. 1–2), and already in verse 1 he is asked for wealth. The final verse is spoken by Indra himself, who accepts both the soma and the praise while recognizing that he is entitled to these offerings only if he provides good things in return. One noteworthy feature is the poet-priest's claim to have himself consumed copious amounts of soma (vs. 4).

1. This honey is poured around for you, Indra: you rule over the tub of pressed soma.
   Make for us wealth consisting of many heroes. Having heated up your heat all around, you conquered the sun.
2. The conqueror of the sun who finds great exhilaration in the soma-stalk do we call here to the pressings—the all-around able one.
   Take notice of this sacrifice of ours here. Come here! We beseech the bounteous one who conquers his opponents.
3. Under the ordinance of King Soma and King Varuṇa and under the protection of Bṛhaspati and Anumati, today at our praise invocation of you, bounteous one, I consumed tubs (of soma), you establisher and regulator.
4. [Indra:] Urged on, I have done my own consuming at the vat, and as the foremost patron, I sweep up this praise song, if at the pressing I have come back to you two, Viśvāmitra and Jamadagni, in your house with the winnings.

X.168 (994) Vāyu

Anila Vātāyana
4 verses: triṣṭubh

As with X.186, the Anukramaṇī identifies the deity of the hymn as Vāyu, the god of wind who has been integrated into the ritual system, as the first god, with Indra, to receive the soma drink at the Morning Pressing. But again, as in X.186, the hymn only mentions Vāta, a god of wind with more physical and natural characteristics of wind than Vāyu and little or no ritual profile. Nonetheless, Vāta is given full-dress eulogistic treatment in this little hymn: The first verse begins with his name, and the opening, "now the greatness [acc.] of Wind..." (vā́tasya nú mahimā́nam...), recalls celebratory openings like I.32.1 índrasya nú vīryā̀ṇi... "now the heroic deeds of Indra..."). The final pāda (vs. 4d) is a standard formula of homage, with the recipient in the dative ("to him, to Wind...") and an instrumental of the type of offering ("with our oblation"), ending with the 1st plural optative vidhema "might we do honor"); see numerous parallels, including VIII.48.12–13, I.121.1–9.

In between the swift progress of Wind, his chariot, and his retinue (which we consider to be the eddies and gusts that are characteristic of any strong wind) is nicely described.

1. Now (I shall proclaim) the greatness of Wind and of his chariot: shattering as he goes; thundering is his sound.
   Touching heaven as he drives, turning things red, and tossing up dust from the earth as he goes.

2. The dispersed eddies of the Wind press forward together following (him).
   They go to him, like girls to a festive gathering.
   Yoked together with them on the same chariot, the god speeds on as king of this whole world.
3. Speeding along the paths in the midspace, he does not settle down on any single day.
   Comrade of the waters, the first-born abiding by truth—where was he born? from where has he arisen?
4. The breath of the gods, the embryo of the world, this god wanders as he wishes.
   Only his sounds are heard, not his form. To him, to the Wind, we would do honor with our oblation.

X.169 (995) Cows

Śabara Kākṣīvata
4 verses: triṣṭubh

For the protection, thriving, and safe return of the cows, invoking a formidable range of gods to ensure these goals. In later ritual the first two verses are spoken when the cows go to pasture, the latter two when they return home.

1. Let the wind, joy itself, blow to the ruddy ones. Let them crop plants full of nourishment.
   Let them drink (waters) full of fat, providing riches to the living. Setting them loose, Rudra, be merciful to our food on the hoof.
2. Those who are of the same color, of different colors, of one color, whose names Agni knows because of the sacrifice, whom the Aṅgirases brought here by their fervent heat—to those, o Parjanya, extend great shelter.
3. Who raised their own body up among the gods (as oblation), of whom Soma knows all the colors, swelling with milk, rich in offspring, grant them to us in our stable, Indra.
4. Prajāpati, having given them to me, in concord with all the gods and the forefathers, has sent them here, being well-disposed, to our stable. Might we reside together with their offspring.

X.170 (996) Sūrya

Vibhrāj Saurya
4 verses: jagatī, except āstārapaṅkti 4

This hymn celebrates the god Sun, or more specifically his light, in terms more usually applied to heroic warrior-gods like Indra.

1. Let the lofty (light) blazing forth drink the somian honey, imparting an unswerving lifetime on the lord of the sacrifice—he who, sped by the wind, stands guard by himself, he fosters the creatures; he rules [/shines] widely in many places.
2. The lofty (light) blazing forth, well supported, best winner of prizes, real, is fitted into the foundation, the buttress of heaven.
   Smasher of foes, smasher of obstacles, best smasher of Dasyus, the light has been born, the smasher of lords, smasher of rivals.
3. Here is the fairest, the highest light of lights: the lofty one is called all-conquering, wealth-conquering.
   The all-blazing, greatly blazing Sun spreads his broad might, his unshakeable strength to be seen.
4. Flashing forth with your light, as the Sun you went to the luminous realm of heaven, you by whom all these worlds are supported here, you who accomplish all work, who possess all that is proper for gods.

X.171 (997) Indra

Iṭa Bhārgava
4 verses: gāyatrī

This brief hymn makes allusion to four unknown or little-known myths involving Indra, one per verse. All four verses begin with t(u)vám "you," and three of the four (not vs. 2) contain a vocative addressed to Indra—repetitions that provide some unity to a hymn made up of fragments.

1. You, Indra—you furthered this chariot of Iṭat the presser.
   You heard the call of the one who has soma.
2. You pulled the head of the raging Battler off from his skin.
   You went to the house of the one who has soma.
3. You, Indra—this mortal Venya you made slack in an instant, for Āstrabudhna, who had it in mind.
4. You, Indra—set this sun in front, though it is behind, even athwart the will of the gods.

X.172 (998) Dawn

Saṃvarta Āṅgirasa
4 verses: dvipadā virāj

Although the Anukramaṇī identifies the divinity of this hymn as Dawn, only the last verse (4) clearly belongs to her, and, at least in verse 2, the masculine adjectives preclude Dawn as subject. Commentators have suggested other deities: Dawn (vs. 1), Sūrya (vs. 2), Agni (vs. 3), Dawn (vs. 4), or Sūrya (vss. 1–3). These particular identifications cannot be confirmed, but it is clear that this is a hymn appropriate to early morning. In verse 2 the subject awakens mortals. Though verse 1 is less clear, the cows there are on the move after giving milk (in our interpretation): as real cows, they are going to pasture after the morning milking; as dawn cows they are following the track of the sun out of the east and across the sky, having filled the sky with their milky light. In the third verse the sacrifice is begun, as is appropriate at dawn. And finally in verse 4 Dawn makes an explicit appearance upon her birth.

1. Drive here along with your longing. The cows follow your track, when (they have given milk) with their udders.
2. Drive here with good insight, as the most bounteous one, along with those of good gifts, as you awaken the bountiful while aging the combatants.
3. Like those bringing food, having good gifts we lay out the thread (of sacrifice): let us perform sacrifice.
4. Dawn (rolls) out of the way the darkness of her sister (Night), rolls her track up in a ball, because she has been well born (just now).

X.173 (999) Praise of the King (Royal Consecration)

Dhruva Āṅgirasa
6 verses: anuṣṭubh

This hymn has long been seen as part of a royal consecration (Rājasūya, a term first found in the Atharvaveda), whatever that rite would have looked like in late R̥gvedic times. The keyword of the hymn is dhruvá "firm"—firmness being the quality most desired in the royal candidate—and in fact the Anukramaṇī has extracted this word for the name of the poet. The affirmation of the chosen king by both the human clans (viś, vss. 1, 6) and various gods is required. Among the gods we find Indra, the archetypal warrior king (vss. 2, 5–6), and Varuṇa, the archetypal peacetime king (vs. 5). (For these two aspects of kingship, divided between the two gods, see especially IV.42.) In addition there are the ritually connected gods, who would officiate at the consecration ceremony: Brahmaṇaspati (vs. 3)/Br̥haspati (vs. 5), who represent the verbal portion, and Agni (vs. 5) and Soma (vs. 3), who participate in the physical portion. Soma, as ritual substance, is found in verse 6, which effects the king's installation. The hymn has parallels in both recensions of the Atharvaveda, and elsewhere in Vedic literature.

1. I have brought you here: be among (us). Stand firm, without wavering.
   Let all the clans want you. Let kingship not fall away from you.
2. Be only here; do not budge—unwavering like a mountain.
   Like Indra, stand firm here; here uphold your kingship.
3. This one here has Indra upheld—firm with a firm oblation.
   For him Soma will bear witness; for him Brahmaṇaspati.
4. Firm is heaven, firm the earth, firm these mountains here.
   Firm all this animate world, firm right here this king of the clans.
5. Firm let King Varuṇa, firm let God Bṛhaspati, firm let both Indra and Agni uphold your kingship—firm!
6. We touch firm soma with a firm oblation.
   And now Indra will make the clans bring tribute only to you.

X.174 (1000) Praise of the King

Abhīvarta Āṅgirasa
5 verses: anuṣṭubh

A companion piece to the preceding consecration hymn, but one that focuses only on the combative and confrontational aspects of kingship. Here the signature idiom is abhí-√vṛt "roll over," again providing the Anukramaṇī's poet's name. The king's ability to "roll over" and crush his opponents as Indra did, leaving him the only one standing, is celebrated and ritually effected with an oblation named with the idiom and associated with Indra (vss. 1, 4).

1. The Over-rolling oblation with which Indra rolled over (his enemies), with that, o Brahmaṇaspati, make us roll to kingship.
2. Having rolled over the rivals, over those who are hostile to us, stand over the one who gives battle, over the one who is envious of us.
3. God Savitar has made you—Soma has made you roll over—made you roll over all creatures, so that you will be an Over-roller.
4. The oblation through which Indra, when he performed it, became the highest brilliant one, that (oblation) I have now performed, o gods: I have therefore become without rivals.
5. Without rivals, rival-smiting, (rolling) to kingship, widely victorious—so that I will rule widely over these creatures and over the people.

X.175 (1001) Pressing Stones

Ūrdhvagrāvan Āṅgirasa
4 verses: gāyatrī

This third hymn to the pressing stones (the others being X.76 and X.94) has none of the rhetorical ambition or vividness of the other two. It begins and ends (vss. 1,

4) with an appeal to the god Savitar, literally "the Impeller," to provide the impulsion to set the stones to pressing.

1. Let god Savitar propel you forth according to his ordinance, o pressing stones.
   Yoke yourselves to the chariot-poles. Press!
2. O pressing stones, ward off misfortune, off ill-will.
   Make the ruddy ones [=soma plants] into a remedy.
3. The pressing stones joined in fellowship display their greatness on the lower (stones), providing bullish power to the bull.
4. O pressing stones, let god Savitar now propel you according to ordinance for the sacrificer who presses (soma).

X.176 (1002) Agni [or, according to the Anukramaṇī, R̥bhus (1), Agni (2–4)]

Sūnu Ārbhava
4 verses: anuṣṭubh, except gāyatrī 2

A simple hymn treating the ritual fire on its first appearance. The only real difficulty is found in verse 4. Although the precise meaning of the first hemistich is disputed, it seems to these readers that this verse almost paradoxically frees Agni from his birth as a god in order to situate him firmly in the mortal sphere, where human life takes place: the theme of Agni's "dual citizenship" is a common one in the R̥gveda.

1. The sons of the R̥bhus [=flames], their circles, bellow out loftily—they who, deriving all nourishment, feed upon (heaven and) earth as if on a mother cow.
2. Bring forward the god Jātavedas with a godly insight.
   He will convey our oblations in their proper order.
3. This Hotar right here, seeking the gods, is led forth to sacrifice.
   Decked out like the chariot of a traveler, he comes into view, glowing with heat, in his own person.
4. This Agni delivers himself from his immortal birth, as it were.
   Stronger even than strength, the god was created for living.

X.177 (1003) Pataṃga

Pataṃga Prājāpatya
3 verses: jagatī 1, triṣṭubh 2–3

An enigmatic hymn, mystically representing inspired poetic thought and visionary knowledge as a bird, clothed in light, seen inwardly by enlightened poets and priests. The images, though not always clear, echo many found in similarly mystical treatments of poetic inspiration, such as the famous Vena hymn (X.123), and make a powerful impression.

1. The bird, anointed with the magic power of the lord, do those attentive to poetic inspiration see with heart and mind.
   The sage poets espy it within the sea; the ritual experts seek the footprint of the light beams.
2. The bird carries speech by mind. The Gandharva spoke it within the womb.
   The sage poets protect the flashing, reverberating inspired thought in the footprint of truth.
3. I saw the cowherd who never settles down, roaming back and forth along the paths.
   Clothing himself in those that (alternately) converge and diverge [=light beams?], he keeps rolling along within the living worlds.

X.178 (1004) Tārkṣya

Ariṣṭanemi Tārkṣya
3 verses: triṣṭubh

A being named Tārkṣya is found in a few other places in Vedic literature, with varying identities. Here it seems to be the name of a prodigious and mythical racehorse, much like Dadhikrā(van) (see IV.38–40); indeed verse 3 here is a variant of the Dadhikrā verse IV.38.10. Both horses are associated with Trasadasyu, leader of the Pūrus: his association with Dadhikrā is announced directly in the first Dadhikrā verse (IV.38.1), whereas his association with Tārkṣya is mediated through the horse's name, which is a vr̥ddhi derivative of Tr̥kṣi, himself a descendant of Trasadasyu (see VIII.22.7, see also VI.46.8).

1. This god-sped prizewinner, victorious overtaker of (other) chariots, him whose wheel-felly cannot be damaged, the swift one driving to battle—Tārkṣya would we summon here for our well-being.
2. Summoning his generosity again and again, like that of Indra, we would board him like a boat for our well-being.
   O you two who are broad like the two wide (worlds), voluminous and deep—let us not suffer harm of you in our coming nor in our going.
3. Who just in a single day stretches across the five peoples with his vast power, like the sun across the waters with his light, his is the charge that wins thousands, that wins hundreds. They do not block him, anymore than a youthful arrow.

X.179 (1005) Indra

Śibi Auśīnara (1), Pratardana Daivodāsi (2), Vasumanas Rauhidaśva (3)
3 verses: anuṣṭubh 1, triṣṭubh 2–3

This hymn is later used for the dadhi-gharma (sour milk and hot milk) oblation at the midday libation associated with the Pravargya ritual, and indeed, unlike many R̥gvedic passages pressed into service in middle Vedic śrauta rituals, it seems to have been composed for just this purpose. The first verse invites the priests to assess the readiness of the libation; the second and third verses, later the Puro'nuvākyā and Yājyā respectively, invite Indra to the midday service and offer him the cooked portion, clearly identified in verse 3c.

1. Stand up, (you priests)! Look down on Indra's portion which is due.
   If it is cooked, pour it! If it is uncooked, wait!
2. The oblation is (now) cooked. Indra, fare forth here; the sun has arrived at the middle of its road.
   Your comrades await you with servings (of food), as a housekeeper awaits the master of the barnyard who is making his rounds.
3. (The oblation) in the udder is cooked, I think, and the one in the fire is cooked. Well cooked, I think, is also this newer truth [=hymn].
   O mace-bearing Indra, you who do many deeds—drink of the sour milk of the Midday Pressing, taking enjoyment of it.

X.180 (1006) Indra

Jaya Aindri
3 verses: triṣṭubh

Indra's victories over his (and our) enemies are the special focus of this hymn, but the poet does not fail to mention our interest in his gifts as well (vs. 1).

1. O much-summoned one, you have vanquished your rivals. Your tempestuous power is preeminent. Now let your giving be here:
   Indra, bring good things here along with the priestly gift. You are the master of rich rivers.
2. Like a fearsome wild beast, living in the mountains and roaming wherever it wants, you have come here from the farther distance.
   Having honed sharp your fang and your wheel-rim, Indra, carve apart your rivals. Shove aside the scornful.
3. Indra, you were born to dominion and to might worth winning, you bull of the settled domains.
   You drove away the people that are not allies. You made a wide wide-place for the gods.

X.181 (1007) All Gods

Pratha Vāsiṣṭha (1), Sapratha Bhāradvāja (2), Gharma Saurya (3)
3 verses: triṣṭubh

Like X.179 this hymn is tightly tied to the Pravargya ritual—in this case celebrating the great sāmans associated with that ritual, the Rathantara and the Bṛhat, and the gharma, the hot milk offering that is its high point.

1. Whose name is "Spread" and "Wide-spread," which is the oblation of the oblation in anuṣṭubh meter:
   from the flashing Founder and from Savitar and Viṣṇu has Vasiṣṭha carried here the Rathaṃtara.
2. They found what was placed beyond, what was the highest hidden domain of the sacrifice:
   from the flashing Founder and from Savitar and Viṣṇu, from Agni, has Bharadvāja brought here the Bṛhat.
3. They found, as they reflected with their mind, the yajus that sprang forth first, going the way of the gods:
   from the flashing Founder and from Savitar and Viṣṇu, from the sun, have they carried here the hot milk (gharma).

X.182 (1008) Bṛhaspati

Tapurmūrdhan Bārhaspatya
3 verses: triṣṭubh

Bṛhaspati, the master of ritual speech, is called upon to aid our speech, but also to punish all forms of evil speech and their speakers.

1. Let Bṛhaspati lead (our thought) across the difficult depths, but for the utterer of evil he will lead his thought back (against him).
   – He hurls aside malediction and smites away ill-will; then he will create luck and life for the sacrificer.
2. Let Narāśaṃsa help us at the Fore-offering; let the After-offering be luck for us at the invocations.
   – He hurls aside malediction and smites away ill-will; then he will create luck and life for the sacrificer.
3. Let him of scorching head scorch those who are demons; those who hate the sacred formulation are for his arrow to smite.
   – He hurls aside malediction and smites away ill-will; then he will create luck and life for the sacrificer.

X.183 (1009) For the Birth of a Son [To the Sacrificer (1), the Sacrificer's Wife (2), and the Hotar (3)]

Prajāvat Prājāpatya
3 verses: triṣṭubh

The first two verses present a fragment of dialogue, with patterned repetition, between a wife and a husband, preparatory to attempting to conceive a son. As Geldner points out, the situation seems to be similar to that depicted in I.179 (the Agastya–Lopāmudrā dialogue), with the husband ending a period of asceticism (see vs. 1b) and the wife eager for sex and its product, children. It thus conforms to the pattern common throughout Indian literature of the reluctant ascetic and the sexually aggressive female (see Jamison 1996a: 15–17 and passim), but in the short exchange here the husband seems more amenable than usual, and the rhetorical responsions between the two verses make the pair seem more attuned to each other. The final verse (3) is spoken by an unidentified spirit responsible for all sorts of fertility, who promises sons.

1. [Wife:] I saw you with my mind, as you became ever more cognizant with yours, you born from fervor, developed from fervor.
 Bestowing progeny here, wealth here, progenerate yourself with progeny, o you who desire sons.
2. [Husband:] I saw you with my mind, as you became ever more intent with yours, being in distress in your own body at your period.
 Up here, near to me. You should become a young woman (again).
 Progenerate yourself with progeny, o you lady desiring sons.
3. I placed the embryo in the plants, I within all creatures.
 I generated progeny on earth, I (will generate) sons for wives in the future.

X.184 (1010) Pregnancy/Birth Charm [To Assorted Divinities]

Tvaṣṭar Garbhakartar or Viṣṇu Prājāpatya
3 verses: anuṣṭubh

This little charm follows naturally on the immediately preceding hymn. There a married couple prepares to have sex in order to conceive; here a range of gods and goddesses responsible for conception and safe pregnancy are called upon to ensure conception followed by a full-term birth.

1. Let Viṣṇu arrange the womb; let Tvaṣṭar carve the forms.
 Let Prajāpati pour out (the semen); let the Placer place the embryo in you.

2. Place the embryo, Sinīvālī; place the embryo, Sarasvatī.
   Let the Aśvins, the two lotus-garlanded gods, place the embryo for you.
3. The one that the Aśvins churned out of the two golden kindling sticks, that embryo of yours we call, to be born in the tenth month.

X.185 (1011) Aditi

Satyadhṛti Vāruṇi
3 verses: gāyatrī

This brief appeal for the help of the three most prominent Ādityas, Mitra, Varuṇa, and Aryaman, may have been placed here, after the two pregnancy charms, because it mentions their mother Aditi (vs. 3), whose prodigious pregnancies were legendary. Certainly the Anukramaṇī seems to have concluded something of the sort, since it identifies the divinity of the hymn as Aditi, though she appears only obliquely.

1. Great be the heavenly help of the three—of Mitra, of Aryaman, of Varuṇa—help difficult to assail.
2. For neither at home nor on wild ways does an evil-speaking cheater hold sway over them—
3. For whom the sons of Aditi hold forth inexhaustible light, for the mortal to live.

X.186 (1012) Vāyu

Ula Vātāyana
3 verses: gāyatrī

As with X.168, although the Anukramaṇī identifies the divinity of this hymn as Vāyu, he is only called Vāta "Wind" here. He is credited with the ability to provide healing (vs. 1) and, in all three verses, to keep us alive and prolong our lifetimes. This strong association between life and the wind must be mediated through the latter's identification (bandhu) with breath, although this identification is not made explicit in the hymn.

1. Let the wind blow hither a remedy, which is luck itself, joy itself, for our heart.
   He will lengthen our lifetimes.
2. O Wind, you are father to us, and brother, and comrade to us.
   Make us live.
3. What deposit of immortality has been deposited yonder in your house, o Wind,
   give us of that for us to live.

X.187 (1013) Agni

Vatsa Āgneya
5 verses: gāyatrī

Found in AVŚ VI.34, this unremarkable hymn contains a refrain that suggests the militant Agni, but only verse 3 develops this theme.

1. Rouse forth speech for Agni, for the bull of the settlements.
   He will carry us across hatreds.
2. Who from the distant distance shines across the wastelands,
   he will carry us across hatreds.
3. Who grinds down the demonic forces, the bull with flaming flame, he will carry us across hatreds.
4. Who looks at all creatures separately and sees them whole,
   he will carry us across hatreds.
5. Who on the far shore of this airy realm was born as flaming Agni,
   he will carry us across hatreds.

X.188 (1014) Agni Jātavedas

Śyena Āgneya
3 verses: gāyatrī

Another slight hymn to Agni, this time with his common epithet Jātavedas. The focus of this hymn is the sacrifice and Agni's role in it.

1. Spur forth now Jātavedas, the prizewinning horse, to sit here on this ritual grass of ours.
2. For this Jātavedas here, whose heroes are poets, who grants rewards,
   I rouse forth a great praise hymn.
3. The bright beams of Jātavedas that convey the oblation among the gods, with them let him impel our sacrifice.

X.189 (1015) Sārparājñī or Sūrya

Sārparājñī
3 verses: gāyatrī

The Anukramaṇī assigns this hymn either to Sūrya or to the shadowy figure Sārparājñī ([female] descendant of the Queen of the Snakes), who is also said to be its author. The former identification seems far more likely, or, rather, the hymn appears to be set at the dawn sacrifice and to play with the various sources of light that compete and combine at that time: the sun and the ritual fire, as well as Dawn (vs. 2ab). The fire, and in part its counterpart the sun, is portrayed as a variety of animals: a (male) cow (vs. 1), a buffalo (vs. 2), and a bird. The association of speech with the bird is also found in the Pataṃga hymn (X.177) and probably reflects the importance of ritual speech at the dawn sacrifice. There are no signs of snakes, much less their queen.

1. This dappled cow has stridden here and sat in front of its mother and its father, as it goes forth toward the sun.
2. She moves within the realms of light, breathing in from his breathing-out.
   The buffalo has looked out across heaven.
3. He shines [/rules] over the thirty domains. Speech is established for the bird
   at each dawn and throughout the days.

X.190 (1016) Bhāvavṛttam ("Cosmogonic")

Aghamarṣaṇa Mādhuchandasa
3 verses: anuṣṭubh

This hymn presents a cosmogony with tápas "ascetic heat, fervor" as the ultimate origin of everything. The entities created and the order and source of their creation are curious and thought-provoking, but unlike the famous cosmogonic hymn X.129, there are no puzzles to decode.

1. Both truth and reality were born from heat when it was kindled.
   From that, night was born, and from that the undulating sea.
2. From the undulating sea was born the year, which distributes the days and nights and exerts its will over everyone who blinks [=mortals].
3. The Ordainer arranged, according to their proper order, sun and moon, heaven and earth, midspace and sunlight.

X.191 (1017) Agni (1), Unity (2–4)

Saṃvanana Āṅgirasa
4 verses: anuṣṭubh, except triṣṭubh 3

This last hymn in the Ṛgveda has a programmatic and propagandistic agenda. The Ṛgveda Saṃhitā ("Collection") has assembled the poetic products of numerous separate clans, who also had their own cultic practices and who presumably coexisted in an uneasy vacillation between semi-hostility and wary cooperation. This hymn collection was produced under the new circumstances of a centralized (or centralizing) sociopolitical regime, generally considered to be the Kuru kings, which sought to impose (or encourage) a standardized, shared ritual culture—the R̥gveda collection being its most enduring product—that would also support the political unification.

The hymn begins (vs. 1) with the ritual fire, which brings all the Ārya together, including those who don't seem to want it (1b), and is the most visible representation of the underlying unity of their ritual praxis. There's an implicit warning in this verse: the ritual fire itself will appropriate the goods of any hold-outs. Verse 2 then provides a positive model: like the gods, who put aside their differences to take their common shares in the sacrifice, we should make a common sacrifice (which, implicitly it is said, will make us more successful, once we no long have to compete among ourselves all the time). Verse 3 outlines the results of the program to devise a standardized ritual shared by all. The second half of this verse is a virtual speech act: the speaker performs the two fundamental components of the ritual—ritual speech (the mantra) and ritual action (the oblation)—thus by this announcement effectively creating the new, shared ritual. Verse 4 promises that the results will be worth the effort. For further discussion, see Proferes (2007: 11 and passim).

1. Over and over, o Agni, you bull, you wrest together all things from the stranger.
   You are kindled in the footprint of refreshment. Bring goods here to us.
2. Come together, speak together; together let your thoughts agree, just as the gods of long ago, coming to an agreement together, reverently approach their sacrificial portion.
3. Common to them all is the solemn utterance, common the assembly, common their thought along with their perception.
   I (hereby) utter an utterance common to you all on your behalf; with an oblation common to you all I offer on your behalf.
4. Common is your purpose; common your hearts;
   let your thought be common, so that it will go well for you together.
